"RICHARDSON'S life," says Mr. Birrell, "admirable as is Mrs. Barbauld's sketch, cannot be said to have been written." Richardson shares with Steele the affront of omission from the English Men of Letters series, and in his case the omission has not been remedied by inclusion in the series of Eminent Writers. Nor has any such exhaustive biography of him as Mr. Aiken's Life of Steele ever appeared. Miss Thomson has now published a volume of 291 pages, of which seventy-six are devoted to the biography of Richardson, forty-three to an account of his friends, twenty-two to "the development of the novel," and 152 to accounts and criticism of Richardson's work. Now in the matter of criticism Richardson has already been dealt with in a most illuminating manner by Mr. Henley, Mr. Traill, Mr. Birrell, and Mrs. Oliphant. But of the material left by himself, the mass of correspondence lying in the library at South Kensington—of which Mrs. Barbauld's six volumes are but a selection—none of these critics appear to have made use. There the letters lie, their ink yellowing, their excellent greyish paper cut into gaps where seals have been excised, some of them endorsed in the neat and legible handwriting for whose badness Richardson so often and so unnecessarily apologises, some copied by one or other of his daughters in the small, pointed, young lady's hand of a hundred and fifty years ago, all full of interests, hopes, and customs that have died. Surely there was room for at least another, if not a larger, selection than Mrs. Barbauld's—room for a biography in more than seventy-six pages. The flutter of forgotten love affairs, the little airs of Miss Highmore upon the cheerfulness of Mr. Duncombe in her absence, the singing of Miss Mulso, the conflagration of a lady's curl-papers, the wine-growing enterprises—at Plaistow, of all places!—of the too sanguine Aaron Hill, whom Pope so unjustly included in the Dunciad, the epistolary coqueries of the sprightly Lady Bradshaigh, the rather fulsome compliments of Mrs. Chapone the elder, the difficulty of conveying, per carrier, hares and hams and sage-cheeses—all these lie enshrined in the volumes of Mrs. Barbauld and the MSS. at South Kensington. It is a whole picture of life in an upper middle-class circle, touching, on one side, bishops, ladies of title, and the Speaker of the House of Commons; on the other, printers, poor dependents, and City tradesfolk. Many of the persons with whom Richardson corresponded enjoyed in their own day a more or less deserved eminence, and of his nearer intimates all seem to have been refined, intelligent, cultivated, and of high principle. From these old letters rises the perfume of a life singularly honourable, industrious, liberal, and benevolent, a little formal, perhaps, a little enclosed, though full of interests, a life as blameless as was ever lived by any citizen of London from the days of Whittington downwards. This perfume, it must be said with regret, is not preserved in Miss Thomson's volume. She is everywhere careful and painstaking; she has evidently gone to the authorities at first-hand; but she never makes us feel the pulse of life, still less the warmth of Richardson's delightful kindliness. We look in vain for any of those flashes of sympathetic comprehension which make Mrs. Barbauld's pages still alive: "The fault of his mind was rather that he was too much occupied with himself than that he had too high an opinion of his talents." "He loved to complain, but who that suffers from disorders that affect the very springs of life and happiness does not?" From Miss Thomson's pages we should never guess that Richardson was a man pre-eminently lovable, still less that he was one who saw the full humour of a joke against himself. She actually quotes with a shade of reprehension his smiling account of how a certain master-carpenter, whom he had sent for to be scolded for delays, managed to make the unconscious Mrs. Richardson compliment him on his speed, whereby the husband was made to appear unreasonable, "and the wife, who knew nothing at all of the matter, went off at her honest man's expense with the character of a very reasonable, courteous, good sort of woman." In short, Miss Thomson seems rather to have set herself to write about a man not sufficiently known than to write because she feels the charm which Richardson exercises over some of us who read our Clarissa Harlowe and our Sir Charles Grandison, not once in a lifetime, but once every year or two, and to whom even Miss Byron's "correcting" Uncle Selby is a person as real—and in the circle of the initiated as often quoted—as Sam Weller. Like other human beings, Richardson must be loved to be understood, and a biographer who loved him should be able to see, for instance, something other than mere jealousy in his disapproval of Fielding, and to believe, with Mr. Birrell, that he might have hated "Fielding's boisterous drunkards" almost as much if their creator had "not been a rival of his fame."

The critical examination by which so large a part of the book is occupied is, to speak frankly, the criticism of the ordinary reader. It never touches the how and why, never flashes into that glow of enthusiasm which makes Mr. Henley's couple of pages about Clarissa almost lyric, never gives even the impression of a genuine enjoyment. To explain or understand Richardson's work it is necessary to realise the two stages of its composition. He first laid out a general—very general—outline, the essence of which was some plain moral; then he proceeded to write without any further fixed plan, and being (whether he knew it or not) a realist of the deepest dye, made his people such as they must have been in order to bring about the given situation. In Pamela, for instance, the aim was to show "virtue rewarded" in the person of a young woman who, by resisting her master's efforts at seduction, brings him to marry her. No doubt the virtuous young woman was also designed to be sympathetic. Unfortunately the two aims are incompatible. It is essential to the plan that the marriage should be regarded by the heroine as a reward; and the woman who regards it as a reward to marry a man who has used every kind of endeavour to possess her without marriage can only be even pardonable on the ground that she was wildly in love with him. If her love had been strong enough to outweigh her sense of his faults she would have fallen a victim to him; on the other hand, her sense of his faults being stronger, she forfeits our sympathy by consenting to marry him. We ought not to complain of Pamela for being what she is, rather we ought to admire the art which makes her the only sort of person to whom the story could have happened. Why, then, it may be asked, choose that story to write? And to that question the most ardent of Richardsonians can but answer with a sigh, Why, indeed?

Clarissa Harlowe stands on a different plane. It is one of the great things of the world—great both because of absolute originality, and great also because of achievement. Moreover, though nothing in Miss Thomson's account of it would lead her readers to think so, it is one of the most engrossing books that was ever written. To Richardson its persons were as much alive as any of those to whom he spoke and wrote. He quoted the words of Clarissa as he might have quoted the words of Miss "Hecky" Mulso; his correspondents understood him, and felt with him; but too many later readers see nothing in his attitude deeper or more subtle than vanity. Too many of them, too, following Sir Walter Scott, cry out upon the story as impossible, and talk of Clarissa's foolishness in failing to appeal to that active police magistrate, Mr. Henry Fielding. Mr. Henry Fielding himself, when he wrote about the book in his own paper, made no such complaint; nor, apparently, did any contemporary critic. The truth is that Clarissa was not, as Miss Thomson calls her, a woman of independent character; she was only a woman of absolutely immovable principle. In matters where she had not principle for a clear guide she was undecided, and she had by nature and habit neither enterprise nor initiative—qualities, indeed, much discouraged by the education of a young lady in her day. It should be remembered that until the fatal 10th of April, when she was deluded—as a woman of independent character or indeed of wider experience never would have been—into going away with Lovelace, she had never walked alone, never travelled alone, never decided any important matter without permission.

The character of Lovelace appears to Miss Thomson impossible: “a bundle of contradictions, of conflicting qualities that could not possibly co-exist in the same person. There is, of course, much that is absurd in this conception, much that must strike any reader with a sense of humour as irresistibly comic.” We might make similar observations—as an earlier critic has happily pointed out—about Iago. Lovelace, like Iago, remains, in spite of them, one of the great living figures of literature. “Is there anything better than Lovelace in the whole range of fiction?” says Mr. Henley; “Lovelace, so immeasurably the highest achievement of the author’s genius,” said Mr. Traill. Lovelace, indeed, is that very rare person in fiction—a seducer who is seductive. He need only be compared with any of the fine gentlemen of the early comedy, with the Lothario upon whom some persons have supposed him founded, or with the ruffianly Mr. B. of Pamela. What avails it to say that he does not exist as long as we feel that he does?

Dr. Jowett, it appears, said that Sir Charles Grandison was the longest of novels and one of the best. If he had said one of the most agreeable he would have touched the mark precisely. It has all the pleasantness of a fine and spacious old country house where everything proceeds methodically, where there is always room enough, and never any hurry. As for Sir Charles himself, he is, considering how every person and every circumstance conspire to spoil him, an amazingly pleasant, good-tempered, sensible young man. His fault is really that, like Tom Jones, he has not a spark of imagination. Here again Richardson is faithful to the exigencies of his scheme, for no young man with a spark of imagination could arrive at the age of six-and-twenty without having ever deviated by a hair’s-breadth from the line of propriety. Moreover, only a man without imagination, or a man with an excess of imagination, could manage to be so evenly in love with two ladies at the same time. Clementina is a heroine of a somewhat obsolete pattern, who probably receives less than justice from the modern reader; but even the modern reader cannot but remark how, without a word said on the subject, Clementina is always on a slightly higher social plane than Harriet. The effect is so subtle, so delicate, so complete, that Mr. Henry James himself could not have given it more perfectly.

Finally, will this latest volume help to make Richardson better known? Will it bring fresh readers to Clarissa Harlowe and Sir Charles Grandison? Will it in any measure call to life the persons buried in the many volumes of correspondence? Alas! it appears sadly improbable; for in it both the man and the work assume an aspect of stiffness, hardness, and formality—an air of the old-fashioned “superior person”—which is particularly unattractive to contemporary readers, and which, like a portrait by an unskilled artist, has at the same time a horrible likeness to the original. As we lay down the book Mr. Birrell’s words come back to us. No; Richardson’s life cannot be said to have been written.

A Group of Perfect Worldlings.

The Pageantry of Life. By Charles Whibley. (Heinemann. 7s. 6d.)

WE do not quarrel with Mr. Whibley for what he is not. We are grateful for what he is—a critic with brains. He has no enthusiasms; he abhors rhetoric; romance never creeps into his page; sentiment is alien to him, although when it goes with truth he is quick to seize its import, as when he quotes the dying speech of the courtier “young Weston,” killed in youth to satisfy “the dour temper of the corpulent monster” Henry VIII.: young Weston, detailing his debts, remembered one “to a poorer woman at the Tennes play for bawles I cannot tell howe much.” But Mr. Whibley’s passionless prose rarely touches the sensibility; rather, it titillates the intellect. He has his subject always well in hand, methodically he pursues his way (relieving it now and again by swift probings that find the truth), artless on the surface, but, in reality, the result of a fine artifice. Those who know their Pepys will appreciate the intelligence of the following criticism. It occurs in one of the papers in this volume on “The Real Pepys”:

Even his good resolutions are made but to be broken. “I have made an oathe,” says he one day, “for the drinking of no wine, &c., on such penalties till I have passed my accounts and cleared all.” And in a week he confesses that he has broken his oath “without pleasure.” “Without pleasure”—that is the one phrase in the book that one is persuaded to mistrust. For the first and last time Pepys seems to be posing, to be cutting an antic before a mirror. Had he said the wine was bad, you had understood him. But were the wine good, you know that, oath or no oath, Pepys would have delighted in it.

We like, too, Mr. Whibley’s grave and impersonal seriousness about trifles. He never, to use an expressive vulgarism, “gives himself away.” No imp of a second self ever peeps out to laugh at his elder brother, the way of many humorists. Having chosen his subject, Mr. Whibley treats it with the respect a devotee gives to his creed. Is there not something magnificent about such sentences as the following, which occur in his picture of George Brummel:

The cravat of Brummel was the envy of crowned heads, yet nothing could have been more simple.

Starched cravats and varnished boots might seem to be within the reach of all men; yet in these accomplishments Brummel was without a rival. His cravat was perfect because he touched it with his own magic fingers.

1835 was his Waterloo. In that year he was arrested, and, worse still, obliged to dress before the police. This might have seemed the last insult to anyone who had never revealed the secrets of his toilet to any save his own Prince Regent.

This volume might have been called “A Group of Perfect Worldlings.” It consists of an Introduction, and studies of nine men, such as Sir Kenelm Digby, Pepys, Saint Simon, Beckford, and Barbey D’Aureville, who devoted themselves, “with that perfect consistency which marks only the greatest men,” to the unique cultivation of themselves. Not the least interesting of the nine studies is that on “The Caliph of Fonthill”—William Beckford, author of “the sublimely humorous fable which is Fathek.” Mr. Whibley is clearly among those who have succeeded in making their way to the end of Fathek.

If Fathek do not rank among the greatest works of the world, it is still a miracle of grim wit, caustic humour, contemptuous irony; and once more Beckford distinguished himself—an Englishman—from all his fellows by giving a masterpiece to the literature of France. Some few burlesques, now sliding into forgetfulness, were dictated by the same spirit of careless satire, and if the earliest book of travel be a lyric expression of himself, the latest is a reasoned expression of his art. But his real life lay as far apart from literature as from Spain. Fonthill was Beckford made concrete. There he attempted to create a false world, to translate into practice an imaginative ideal. That he failed was his loss rather than ours. The twelve-foot wall shuts out the Abbey from prying eyes as sternly to-day as it did near a century ago. We can only catch sight at a distance of the Gothic tower, and marvel that his vast resources of wealth and taste could produce no better effect. We can but attribute a furtive confusion between Wardour-street and the perfect collection to the influence of his generation, which, despite his own valiant theory, warped his judgment. But without reserve may we admire a courteous gentleman, splendid in prosperity, brave in adversity, who hated the world's interruption as heartily as he despised its malice, and who, notwithstanding the load of wealth and sycophancy, yet carved his life into a definite and a personal shape.

But the book is more than a clever series of historical studies. It is an aid to that most difficult of all tasks—a task strangely neglected, a task demanding untiring energy, and the absorption of every moment, a task where the “smallest action is an added touch, a fresh detail in the vast design”—the Art of Living. We need hardly say that, coming from Mr. Whibley, the analysis of the lives of these splendid worldlings is unmoral. They are his choice. In his ironical, detached way he sympathises with them, but that is his affair. We are only concerned to say that he has done his work with art, with humour, and with a cheerful spirit. The clouds roll away, whiffs of a delight in life that, alas! is not too common now blow across the ages as we read. They took the world in their two hands, they pecked at it, and left what they did not want. La Joie! that was the end of their ambition, “as it was the end of Pepys's ambling curiosity, and, alas! it is an ambition which in these days has yielded to the harder lust of gold the keener pleasure of advancement.” So we bid good-bye, for the present, to these dandies and perfect worldlings who “shook footstools if they left thrones secure.” Yet they will outlive many who shook thrones. How it would have amused them could they have known that we take their philosophy of life seriously.

The Wandering Army.

Tramping with Tramps. By Josiah Flynt. (Fisher Unwin. 6s.)

“To watch in thought,” writes Mr. Flynt, in that section of his book called “Children of the Road,” “the long and motley procession marching along is to see a panorama of all the sins, sorrows, and accidents known to human experience. Year after year they trudge on and on, and always on, seeking a goal which they never seem to find. Young and old, man and woman, boy and girl, all go on together; and as one wearies of the march another steps into his heel-tracks, and the ranks close up as solidly as ever.”

We have had many books devoted to the vagabond and the criminal, to the outcast and the victim of the Wanderlust. Most of them have been written from specialist or amateur points of view, often misleading, often productive of inevitable insincerities. The specialist, as a rule, studies the incarcerated criminal, who is a person very different from his free self; usually something of an actor or a master of humbug. The amateur sees, but overstates; has an eye too keenly set upon the picturesque, and frequently misses the inwardness of his subject. Mr. Flynt does not profess to be a criminologist, which clears the ground wonderfully; and although he was an amateur tramp he was one for months on end and was accepted as of the elect of Hoboland. And when we say an amateur we do not mean that he merely dressed as a tramp, boarded freight-cars, and caught a smattering of the lingo; he actually lived the life, felt the vermin, begged his food, and served time. Therefore his book is a genuine contribution to the literature of a subject profoundly interesting alike to governments and individuals. Our only regret is that Mr. Flynt saw so little, comparatively, of English trampdom; during a longer stay he might have encountered better—and worse—types than came in his way.

The American hobo, says Mr. Flynt, is, as a rule, a discouraged criminal. He has tried the higher walks of swindling, and either been unsuccessful in them or lost his nerve. The man who gets the “shivers” is undone, and he generally gets them after ten or fifteen years behind prison bars. If the “shivers” become chronic he is unfitted even for a decent road-man, and drifts to the dregs of being in the unutterable ranks of the “tomato can vag.,” which individual picks his living from the “slop-barrels and tomato cans of dirty alleys.” But the criminal class is by no means responsible for the whole of the noisome army; its ranks are swelled by the purely lazy, the instinctive born vagabonds, and the enticed. The pity of it is that the enticed are children who dream adventure, and catch from the “jocker's” snaring voice the thrill of adventure accomplished:

It is really one of the wonders of the world, the power that this ugly, dissipated, tattered man has over the children he meets. In no other country that I have visited is there anything like it. He stops at a town for a few hours, collects the likely boys about him at his hang-out, picks out the one that he thinks will serve him best, and then begins systematically to fascinate him. If he understands the art well (and it is a carefully studied art) he can almost always get the one he wants.

And, being so secured, the unfortunate youngster marches away into the slavery of the “prushun,” a slavery only to cease, probably, when he himself becomes an “ex-prushun,” and gets even with the world by enticing a child himself. This is the deadliest thing in American trampdom; recruits never fail, and the new blood takes its colour from the worst of the old. Once in that fell fraternity these boys are kicked into obedience, bought and sold, and taught every variety of vice and villainy. Here, surely, is a traffic for suppression by a vigorous and uncompromising law.

Of the tramp upon the road Mr. Flynt writes simply and convincingly. We see him in his hang-outs, on his begging rounds, in low-down saloons, in filthy lodging-houses. The creature lives well, if he is good at the game; it takes three hot meals a day to satisfy him, with snacks between. Less than that gives him occasion to rail at the community which he defrauds. There are tramps of so nice a gastronomic turn that they will decide upon what they want for dinner and make it their business to get it. We doubt whether this would be possible in England; our tramps are hardly so jauntily professional, being, indeed, mainly of the “poke-out” variety. The American tramp is, unquestionably, the most successful of his class, and he boasts that he has Irish blood in his veins. Mr. Flynt lost some caste on account of his inability to make this claim. But the English swindling vagabond—the fishhammer, the widow-petitioner, and the like—we imagine still holds his own with his American brother. Only the other day the “Soap Fits King” was in the dock once more; after a time he will be foaming in the Strand again.

Distinctions of class in Hoboland are not less sharp than among those whose way lies not between the kip-house and the casual-ward, the hang-out and the gaol. The tramp community has its methods and its unwritten laws, its benevolences and its justice. The “poke-out tramp” is superior to the “tomato-can vag.,” the true hobo to the “gay-cat.” Mr. Flynt says of the “poke-outs”:

They are constitutionally incapacitated for any successful career in vagabondage, and the wonder is that they live at all. Properly speaking, they have no connection with the real brotherhood, and I should not have referred to them here except that the public mistakes them for the general hoboes. . . . The hobo is exceedingly proud in his way—a person of susceptibilities—and if you want to offend him, call him a “gay-cat” or a “poke-outer.” He will never forgive you.

Now the “gay-cat” is one who sometimes degrades himself by work.

In America a rule of the road is that a hobo shall help a hobo, in England a moocher helps a moocher, in Russia a gorioun helps a gorioun; but in Germany a chaussée-grabentapezir does not often feel called upon to help a chaussée-grabentapezir. That is a most unworthy trait in the vagabonds of the Fatherland. Mr. Flynt tells a pathetic story of “the Cheyenne Baby,” a child born on the road, which became the pet of Hoboland. The mother stipulated that the boy should be taught nothing bad, and the men were so struck with the humour of the idea that they respected it. Therefore, though his vocabulary was packed with curses, he was instructed that they represented the nicest possible things. The child was killed with his mother in a railway smash, and all that was left of him, a right arm, was buried on the prairie and honoured with a wooden slab.

Mr. Flynt devotes an extremely interesting section of his book to the “Tramp and the Railroads.” Writing of America he says:

Taking this country by and large, it is no exaggeration to say that every night in the year ten thousand free passengers of the tramp genus travel on the different railroads in the ways mentioned [boarding freight-cars, &c.], and that ten thousand more are waiting at watering-tanks and in railroad yards for opportunities to get on the trains. I estimate the professional tramp population at sixty thousand, a third of whom are generally on the move.

This free travel system practically does not exist in England, and a universal vigorous policy on the part of the American railway companies would soon end it there. No more deadly blow could be aimed at the heart of Hoboland.

Of the English tramp, as we have said, Mr. Flynt had no extended experience, and he tells us little which the casual student of the subject, added to some actual intercourse with tramps, might not have gathered for himself. But, as a whole, the book is of searching interest, and the author's details and conclusions are so temperately stated as to demand the attention due to an impartial investigator. He approaches the subject with a mind free from prejudice, with ample sympathy, and, so far as we can gather, unhampered by the literature, so often merely sordidly picturesque, which has accumulated about his theme. The tramp, in effect, is a nuisance to society, and in the majority of instances has no claim upon society whatever. He is a wastrel, a fraud, and a potential criminal. He appeals to sentiment, and to sentiment he will continue to appeal so long as the law lets him off with light punishments. The main roads in England, particularly within a radius of forty miles from Charing Cross, are infested with him. His toll upon private charity, in the shape of food and money, cannot amount to much less than a pound a week. Is he, as an institution for frightening women and children, worth so much? We think not.

Astrophel and Stella.

Sonnets and Songs of Sir Philip Sidney. Edited by Philip Sidney. (Burleigh. 7s. 6d. net.)

MR. SIDNEY'S excuse for this new edition is that hitherto Sidney's Sonnets have never been published “at what may be considered a popular price and in a popular form.” The phrases will hardly bear pressing too closely. Certainly, Mr. Sidney's notion of a popular price differs from ours, for his volume is published in purple cloth at seven and sixpence net. For seven-and-sixpence, and nothing said about the net, you can purchase the elegant and scholarly little edition done in 1888 by Mr. A. W. Pollard. That we have always looked upon as a model of good editing, and it is hard to see in what respect Mr. Sidney betters it. We should be sorry to think that a book was the more “popular” merely in proportion to the inferiority of its editing. True, Mr. Sidney has modernised the sixteenth-century orthography; but he has not done so correctly, for he leaves such forms as “stile” for “style,” “poesie” for “poesy,” “hie” for “high,” “captainesse” for “captainess,” “frys” for “fries.” Nor was it worth doing, for the orthography of “Astrophel and Stella” is so little divergent from modern usage that it really offers no puzzle to any reader not absolutely illiterate. On the other hand, the interpretation of the Sonnets does present considerable difficulties; and here Mr. Sidney's thin and scrappy introduction, which, after an ugly fashion set by Dr. Grosart, he chooses to call a “Memorial Introduction,” contrasts ill with Mr. Pollard's judicious, sympathetic, and in no way pedantic discussion of the points of literary history and biography involved.

The precise amount of the personal element in “Astrophel and Stella” is, of course, as with most of the other great love-poems of literature, matter for dispute. Many of the sonnets are undoubtedly exercises in modish versifying. In the tradition of Petrarch, of Desportes. Yet of the underlying human drama, the real passion and the real tragedy, no competent reader, himself sincere, can fail to be convinced. That Sidney saw Lady Penelope Devereux marry Lord Rich without more than a conventional emotion; that he greeted her maturing beauty at court with a conventional homage; that before many months had passed the conventions fell away, and left the consciousness of an irreparable mistake; that passion culminated in proposals gently repelled; that ultimately the stern fibre of the man triumphed over his weakness—these are the human material wrought by the healing gift of imagination—“emotion remembered in tranquillity”—into imperishable poetry. The ordering of the story; the how, the when, and the where, as it is reflected in the Sonnets, has been fully told by Mr. Pollard. One little bit of evidence has cropped up since he wrote, which Mr. Sidney might have garnered, but, somewhat characteristically, has missed. It concerns the circumstances under which Stella's marriage to Lord Rich took place. She had been half-betrothed, as a child, to Sidney; and it has generally been assumed that when Sidney's chances of succeeding to his uncle, Lord Leicester, were vanishing, Stella's relations interfered, and insisted, to his disappointment, on a better match. This is not quite consistent with the language of the Sonnets. Astrophel says:

I might!—unhappie word—O me, I might,
And then would not, or could not, see my blisse;
Till now wrapt in a most infernall night,
I find how heav'nly day, wretch! I did misse.
Hart, rent thy selfe thou doest thy selfe but right;
No lovely Paris made thy Hellen his,
No force, no fraud robd thee of thy delight,
Nor Fortune of thy fortune author is;
But to my selfe my selfe did give the blow,
While too much wit, forsooth, so troubled me,
That I respects for both our sakes must show:
And yet could not, by rising morne foresee
How faire a day was neare: O punisht eyes,
That I had beue more foolish, or more wise!

The natural interpretation of this is that Sidney's own unwillingness had much to do with the fact that Lady Penelope Devereux married another. And this view is confirmed by a passage in a letter written in 1687 to John Aubrey, and published in Mr. Clark's recent edition of the “Brief Lives.” The letter concerns the personages of the “Arcadia.” Philoelea is said to be Lady Rich, beloved by him, upon whose account he made his “Astrophel and Stella. . . . Lord Rich being then his friend, he persuaded her mother to the match, though he repented afterwards; she then very young, and secretly in love with him, but he no concern for her. Her beauty augmenting, he says in his 'Astrophel and Stella,' he didn't think 'the morn would have proved soe faire a day.'"

Of course, this is not contemporary evidence. But the writer, one "D. Tyndale," claims to be "conversant among his [Sidney's] relations." We take him (or her) to have belonged to the family of old Mr. Thomas Tyndale, who was well known to Aubrey, and is described by him as "an old gentleman that remembers Queen Elizabeth's raigne and court." He died in 1672, but was not improbably the source of "D. Tyndale's" information.

In yet another point a knowledge of Aubrey's "Brief Lives" would have kept Mr. Sidney from going wrong. He rather plumes himself upon an identification of a certain "H. S.," who signs an "epistle to the reader" in the "Arcadia" of 1593 with Sir Henry Sidney of Walsingham, in Norfolk, a kinsman of Sir Philip. Unfortunately, Aubrey, in his Life of Lady Pembroke, is quite explicit as to who "H. S." was. He says: "Mr. Henry Sanford was the Earl's secretary, a good scholar and poet, and who did penne part of the 'Arcadia' dedicated to her (as appears by the preface). He has a preface before it with the two letters of his name."

Other New Books.

The War.

THE six War books which we review below are a miscellaneous aftermath, rather than a new crop. We have two books on Mafeking, and we remember that it is nearly three months since we reviewed Major F. D. Baillie's spirited book on the same episode. A book of "South African studies" has a strong affinity to Prof. Keane's work, The Boer States, Land, and People, which we reviewed seven months ago. The Earl of Rosslyn's Twice Captured seems a late arrival, judged by Mr. Winston Churchill's narrative, which appeared in June; a comparison of the periods covered lessens the difference only a little. The Earl De La Warr's narrative is a personal record down to last May, and a tiny point of interest about his modest volume is that it is called "Reminiscences." To that word we have come—after how many publications? In a slower age men would have begun with it, and would be even now only sorting their papers and mending their quills.

THE SIEGE OF MAFEKING.

BY J. ANGUS HAMILTON.

Of necessity one account of the siege of Mafeking must be somewhat like another, and Mr. Hamilton's story, written for the Times and Black and White, tallies frequently with Major Baillie's Morning Post narrative, published in July. But where Major Baillie mentioned a minor event Mr. Hamilton will often describe it. If we remember rightly, the first writer just names the execution of a native spy, which the other describes in detail. Mr. Hamilton's account fills two pages, but his descriptive touches are not placed in the best order. In an abbreviated form this chose vue is as follows. The native, it may be explained, was a Baralong who had been caught trying to enter the town as a spy. It was in vain that he pleaded that his spying had not begun when he was arrested. He was condemned to be shot.

Last night the shooting party came for him. . . . The prisoner, supported on either arm, stumbled in the partial blindness of the bandage, seeming, now that his last hour was at hand, to be more careless, more light-hearted than any of the party. He shook his head somewhat defiantly, but his lips moved, and in his heart one could almost hear the muttered curses. . . . There was a moment of intense silence as we waited for the sun to set, in which the nerves seem to be but little strings of wire, played upon by the emotions. Unconsciously, each seemed to stiffen, as we waited for the word of the officer, feeling that at every pulsation one would like to shriek "Enough, enough!" As we stood the prisoner spoke, unconscious of the preparations, and the officer approached him. He wanted, he said, to take a final glance at the place that he had known since his childhood. His prayer was granted, and, as he faced about, the bandage across his eyes was, for a few brief minutes, dropped upon his neck. In that final look he seemed to realise what he was suffering. The stadt lay before him, the place of his childhood, the central point round which his life had turned, bathed in a sunset which he had often seen before, and which he would never see again. There were the cattle of his people, there were the noises of the stadt, the children's voices, the laughter of the women, and there was the smoke of his camp fires. It was all his once—he lived there and he was to die there, but to die in a manner which was strange and horrible. Then he looked beyond the stadt and scanned the enemy's lines. Tears welled in his eyes, and the force of his emotion shook his shoulders. But again he was himself: the feeling had passed and he drew himself erect. Then once more the bandage was secured, and he faced about. The sun was setting, and as the officer stepped back and gave his orders, a fleeting shudder crossed the native's face. Bayonets were fixed, the men were ready, and the rifles were presented. One gripped one's palms. "Fire!" said the officer. Six bullets struck him—four were in the brain.

Mr. Hamilton's book is improved by fifteen illustrations and two plans. The photographs opposite pages 144 and 146 show the effects of shell-fire on a building to a nicety, being taken just before and just after the catastrophe. (Methuen. 6s.)

THE RELIEF OF MAFEKING.

BY FILSON YOUNG.

The marrow of this book is the march to Mafeking of Mahon's flying column. The long vexed tramp from Kimberley, through Taungs to Vryburg, and across the Molopo River to the relief, is described by Mr. Young with uncommon spirit. After a ten minutes' hail of Boer bullets we read: "It was not the men lying stark and still in the grass that made one astonished; it was the sight of people walking about and talking that made one wonder whether or no one had been dreaming." Mr. Young's note is his selection of the cheerful and humorous incidents of war. The pride and interest shown by our soldiers in their wounds, and in the operations they underwent, is noted by Mr. Young with the remark: "An illness or a wound is often the first view an ignorant man gets of Nature's ingenuity displayed in the construction of his own person." Mr. Young sketches these invalids very happily:

One of them—a man who looked as strong as a horse—was explaining to an admiring group how he came to be alive at all. A bullet had passed through the rim of his helmet, entered his left temple, passed behind his nose, through the roof of his mouth, and out through the lower part of his right cheek. First he would show us the dent in his temple; then describe, with many strange words, the inward passage of the bullet; and then, emerging into the sphere of common things, wind up with: "and came out of my blooming cheek." Then he would show the dent in his cheek, and pass his helmet round for all to see, as a conjurer does. I moved round with this man, and heard him recite his tale three times, and every time he used just the same form of words, which he repeated pat like a lesson. His corruption of "cerebral" was amusing: "Nearly scattered the cervical nerve, so help me!" he said.

A very readable book, this; and it is free from rash judgments. Mr. Young was for the Manchester Guardian. (Methuen. 6s.)

TWICE CAPTURED.

BY THE EARL OF ROSSLYN.

As a plain-sailing though rather awkwardly-written account of personal experiences in the Boer War this book is good reading. The author, who represented the Daily Mail and Sphere, expressly asks his critics to take it not as the efflux of a clever pen but as a true description of personal adventures. Those adventures were varied enough, and included nine weeks' imprisonment at Pretoria. Whether that imprisonment was merited according to the rules of war we shall not undertake to determine. But the author's allegation that he owed his confinement to Mr. Richard Harding Davis is to be taken with some reserve. We had better quote the passage from the Earl of Rosslyn's prison diary:

We had a visitor to-day. Who do you think the visitor was? None other than Richard Harding Davis, the American novelist. Not only had he reached Pretoria (I saw him last at Ladysmith), not only had he obtained a pass to visit our prison, not only had he got the indecency to do so without inquiring for any individual, but he insulted us by refusing to answer any questions, cracking up the Boers under our noses and those of the guards who accompanied him, and telling us plainly that in conversation with Melt Marais, the field-cornet of Pretoria, he had agreed that I was rightly detained as a combatant officer! And yet this is a man whom my family, and myself, delighted to honour in our own country when he first came over. I hope he feels like the Pharisee, and thanks God that he is not like other American men are! Now I know why I am here; it was my diary first, and now it is Richard Harding Davis's untruthful information that I held a commission in Thorneycroft's Horse at the time of my capture. I don't think Mr. Davis had better come here any more during his visit to Pretoria.

That is the whole passage. We have no concern to defend Mr. Davis, but we do not think much of the above statement. Mr. Davis was acting as the representative of an American newspaper; and silence must have been the first condition of his professional visit to the Pretoria gaol. As for the "untruthful statement" about the author's connexion with Thorneycroft's, it is only necessary to state that the Earl of Rosslyn began his adventures with a commission in Thorneycroft's Horse, and that Mr. Davis might well be ignorant of the fact that the Earl's resignation had preceded his arrest. After this we attach little importance to the Earl of Rosslyn's criticisms of British generals and other officers in the chapter called, not inaptly, "Idle Reflections." (Blackwood. 10s. 6d.)

SOUTH AFRICAN STUDIES.

BY ALFRED HILLIER.

"Sixteen years' participation in South Africa" undoubtedly gives Mr. Hillier a claim to be heard on such subjects as "South Africa, Past and Future," "The Native Races of South Africa," "Boer Government in the Transvaal," "Before the Jameson Raid," "Issues at Stake in South Africa," &c., &c. On all these Mr. Hillier's information and reflections are worth perusal. We are not greatly struck, however, by his defence of the capitalists. Take this sentence:

For a desperate evil a desperate remedy was sought, and the capitalists, once having taken to politics, decided to "spare no expense," and in conjunction with Mr. Rhodes financed the Jameson plan.

The satin phrasing of this sentence amuses us. Twenty years hence a reader might pass it by without ever scenting blood, or realising the real desperateness of the "plan." By all means let justice be done to the capitalists, if there is still justice due to them, but let plain words be used. Not that we dispute Mr. Hillier's general rightness of view. We merely point out that whatever is wrong in his view seems to reveal itself in his curiously cautious phraseology. (Macmillan.)

SOME REMINISCENCES OF THE WAR IN SOUTH AFRICA.

BY THE EARL DE LA WARR.

The author sent these letters from the front to the Globe, and was wounded and invalided home last May. Reprinted in limp covers, the record cannot be said to present any special features, but it is eminently modest and business-like. The Globe was fortunate in possessing a correspondent who was present at many of the most stirring struggles of the war—including Magersfontein and Spion Kop. In his account of the last-named affair we have a picture in a sentence:

It was a heart-breaking sight watching the two processions filing up and down the hill—one consisting of hearty, jolly men going up full of dash and eagerness, the other chiefly consisting of dead and wounded, carried down under the greatest difficulties on stretchers, which were often in a perpendicular position.

(Hurst & Blackett. 1s.)

SHOULD I SUCCEED IN SOUTH AFRICA?

BY A SUCCESSFUL COLONIST.

A sensible little handbook that should find many readers. The author explains the chances and conditions of South African life with knowledge. He gives a list of fifty sorts of men who can do well there, and twenty who will do better at home. Among a hundred pieces of information we note that only first-class millinery hands have any prospects in Cape Town, Kimberley, and Johannesburg, for "the latest Paris and Regent-street styles are worn." The author denounces the drinking and gambling habits of colonists in Johannesburg and elsewhere, but looks for a general purification. (Simpkin, Marshall. 1s.)

We have received two more volumes in Prof. Edward Arber's "British Anthologies"—those treasure-houses of the minor poets of many centuries. These are The Surrey and Wyatt Anthology (1509-1547), and The Goldsmith Anthology (1745-1774). The next, or tenth, volume will be The Cowper Anthology, which will close the series. (Frowde. 2s. 6d. each.)

Sailor Songs (Warne) is a pocket shilling collection, edited by Mr. J. E. Carpenter. The selection appears to be good, but for the amazing omission of "Wapping Old Stairs."

New editions are plentiful. Of these, the most interesting are the late Mr. J. A. Symonds's Shakespeare's Predecessors in the English Drama (Macmillan), and Pierce Egan's Life in London (Chatto, 6s.). The letterpress of Pierce Egan's work is faithfully reproduced, so faithfully as to include a tantalising list of illustrations which appeared in the early editions, but which—with the exception of a frontispiece—are absent from this. As a budget of faded London delights the book has a lasting interest.

We have also received a "popular edition" of Sir Wemyss Reid's Memoirs and Correspondence of Lyon Playfair (Cassell, 7s. 6d.); the eighth edition (revised and enlarged) of the Rev. Malcolm McColl's The Reformation Settlement (Longman's 3s. 6d. net—a very cheap volume); the fourth edition of Mr. E. Griffith-Jones's The Ascent Through Christ (Bowden); the second edition of Mr. Arthur W. Jose's The Growth of the Empire (Angus & Robertson); the third edition of Mr. F. W. Puller's The Primitive Saints and the See of Rome (Longmans, 16s.); the third edition of Major W. H. Turton's (Royal Engineers); The Truth of Christianity (Jarrold); and a sixpenny reprint of Mrs. Humphry Ward's Marcella (George Newnes), issued by arrangement with Messrs. Smith, Elder. Lastly, we have a new translation of Grimm's Fairy Tales, by Miss Beatrice Marshall (Ward, Lock, 3s. 6d.)—a handsome volume, worth almost any dozen modern "children's books."

Fiction.

Wounds in the Rain: Stories Relating to the Spanish-American War. By Stephen Crane. (Methuen.)

No one can escape, in reading this last of Mr. Crane's extraordinary work, from the reflection that it ridiculously resembles his first. Almost every impression was pre-conceived in The Red Badge of Courage, and for verisimilitude the author might have stayed for the one as for the other in his own armchair, and never have gone at all to the wars. This might lead to either of two conclusions: that the reporter was obsessed by the author's battles in the brain, or that the author had successfully divined truth which the reporter's observation could but verify. Which, it were not easy to decide; especially because a large part of the observation, and that the most characteristic, is concerned altogether with the inner man. The objective operations are of secondary importance, and, as Mr. Crane tells them, are not always easy to follow; that which mainly interests him is the variation, under certain abnormal conditions, in the fundamental conceptions of time and space, the sharpening of the senses or their temporary anaesthesia, the effects of fear, the strange sources from which in emergency courage may derive; and what he is interested in, that he desires to express. "The battle broke with a snap far ahead. Presently Lige heard from the air far above a faint, low note as if somebody were blowing in the mouth of a bottle. It was a stray bullet that had wandered a mile to tell him that war was before him." Then what? It may be observation, but the author of The Red Badge would easily have divined it: "he nearly broke his neck in looking upward." Forthwith the Spanish guns become as it were articulate. "Ss-sa-swow-ow-ow-pum"—that is how they talk; also "flut-flut, flut, fluttery-flut-fluttery-flut," they say. Bullets sing, sping, spang, snap, snatch, sliver, sneer. The war correspondent in the derelict steel boiler meanwhile "dreams frantically of some anthracite hiding-place, some profound dungeon of peace, where blind mules chew placidly the far-gathered hay." With nerves (to use his own phrase) standing on end like so many bristles, he writes like a man hag-rid by a terror of common things:

Lying near one of the enemy's trenches was a red-headed Spanish corpse. I wonder how many hundreds were cognisant of this red-headed Spanish corpse? It rose to the dignity of a landmark. There were many corpses, but only one with a red head. This red-head. He was always there. Each time I approached this part of the field I prayed that I might find that he had been buried. But he was always there—red-headed.

Mr. Crane preserved to the last his Japanese-like sensitiveness to the paradox of perspective. Over and over again he points to it with a worried grin.

There was a man in a Panama hat, walking with a stick! That was the strangest sight of my life—that symbol, that quaint figure of Mars. The battle, the thunderous row, was his possession. He was master. He mystified us all with his infernal Panama hat and his wretched walking-stick. From near his feet came volleys and from near his side came roaring shells, but he stood there alone, visible, the one tangible thing. He was a Colossus, and he was half as high as a pin, this being.

His description of the return of Hobson, of Merrimac fame, to the army, is a piece of saner observation:

Most of the soldiers were sprawled out on the grass, bored and weary in the sunshine. However, they aroused at the old circus-parade, torch-light procession cry, "Here they come." Then the men of the regular army did a thing. They rose en masse and came to "Attention." Then the men of the regular army did another thing. They slowly lifted every weather-beaten hat and dropped it until it touched the knee. Then there was a magnificent silence, broken only by the measured hoof-beats of the company's horses as they rode through the gap. . . .

Then suddenly the whole scene went to rubbish. Before he reached the bottom of the hill, Hobson was bowing right and left like another Boulanger, and above the thunder of the massed bands one could hear the venerable outbreak, "Mr. Hobson, I'd like to shake the hand of the man who—."

To our mind the finest work in the volume is the last story, "The Second Generation." It is of wider scope than the rest, treating with serious purpose and in less unmeasured language of the consequences of inherited wealth and position. On the whole, however, this posthumous volume is a brilliant last word from one who had discovered himself completely from the beginning.

The Shadow of Quong Lung. By Dr. C. W. Doyle. (Constable. 6s.)

"Of course," writes Dr. Doyle in his preface, "the best thing to do with Chinatown would be to burn it down." And we have the honour politely to disagree with him. First, because in that case we might not reasonably hope to have from his pen any more stories about it; and in the second place, because the existence in the midst of San Francisco, or of any other Anglo-Saxon burgh, of a colony of people of such exquisite courtesy and tact cannot but have an improving effect on the social atmosphere.

Quong Lung, the bully of Chinatown, was a gentleman in all his ways—a sing-song of the finest water. Even his victims and tools could not but make such report of him. Thus, when once his silk handkerchief had been snatched by a police officer from his hand to cleanse the pavement upon which he had spat:

It was great to see and hear Quong Lung! He never showed that he felt the insult put upon him. Drawing a gold piece from his purse, he thus addressed the man of authority: "Thou wast right in what thou didst. If Quong Lung offended against the laws of this city, it is but right that the law should be vindicated, and he herewith inflicts on himself the penalty required by the law in such cases. Bestow this, thou Worthy Officer, where it belongs; and know that no one is a stouter upholder of the law than Quong Lung." . . .

We regret to add that this engaging scoundrel came to an unhappy end, being "electrocuted" in a snare he had laid for another.

But there is pathos in these stories too. This book, though by no means of equal excellence throughout, is written by one who knows.

The Valley of the Great Shadow. By Annie E. Holdsworth (Mrs. Lee-Hamilton). (Heinemann. 6s.)

AN Alpine health resort populated by doomed consumptives is necessarily rich in pathos, yet one must complain that Mrs. Lee-Hamilton exacts too much tribute of it. Frankly, we do not believe in the genius who was belated in a three-mile walk with a child of six and perished of his fatigue in carrying her through a snowstorm. Nor are we impressed when Miss Blake attempts to toboggan out of this world because she is hurt in her self-respect and disappointed in her affections. And then, when we are asked to weep over what may be called "Dodo" pathos—the giddy mother and the sick child "curtain"—we loose our patience. For be it remarked that the author does not work up, as she might have done, a supreme pathos out of the normal conditions of such a place as "Mittenplatz." She sugars her book through and through with detached anecdotes of artful pathos, pathos of the boards. Life is not enough for Mrs. Lee-Hamilton, though she spells it frequently with a capital L. At the same time, here is a woman who can both write and feel. Moreover, she can paint character. Pass by her "intense" types, which are choke-full of her emotions, and there is much to reward you.

Yes, there are smiles even in The Valley of the Great Shadow, and the end is really surprisingly cheerful.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the week's Fiction are not necessarily final.
Reviews of a selection will follow.]

QUISANTE.

BY ANTHONY HOPE.

This latest story from the pen of Mr. Anthony Hope is of English life at the present day, and is mainly concerned with the career of Alexander Quisante, member for Denstead, a prominent politician. It relates how he made his way, married Lady May Gaston, was much in the public eye, and how at last, "being faced by a great alternative, he chose what was to him a necessity, and how the choice fell out."

THE HEART'S HIGHWAY.

BY MARY E. WILKINS.

From New England, where she has entertained us so long and pleasantly, Miss Wilkins takes us to Virginia—Virginia in the seventeenth century, when Jamestown was in all its pride of name and priority, and tobacco and love were all. (Murray. 6s.)

TONQUES OF CONSCIENCE.

BY ROBERT HICHENS.

Mr. Hichens's new book is not a single novel but a group of five stories under one title. The first, "Sea Change," opens at nightfall in East London, where the Rev. Peter Uniacke has a cure of souls near the Docks. This vicar, a skipper, and an artist are the chief characters. In the second story, "William Foster," we are concerned with a morbid writer who uses this nom-de-guerre. The third, "How Love Came to Professor Guildlea," brings that gentleman into intimate relations with Father Murchison. "The one was all faith, the other all scepticism." (Methuen. 6s.)

THE FOOTSTEPS OF A THRONE.

BY MAX PEMBERTON.

Mr. Pemberton is still, for purposes of fiction, in Russia. In the prologue to The Footsteps of a Throne Lord Dane meets the beautiful Princess Fëkla, "richest of all the women who, in our capital, have the disposition of their own fortunes." And "her uncle, General Prezhnev, would sell his soul to the devil for ten thousand roubles." The story gallops through Russia, which means intrigues, arrogant officials, and the menace of Siberia. But all is well in the end, for Mr. Pemberton is kind, if a little breathless:

"Fëkla, beloved, mine, mine! I will not say good-night to you."

"Ivor—husband—the night is no more." (Methuen. 6s.)

CHARMING RENÉE.

BY ARABELLA KENEALY.

Miss Kenealy writes with a purpose. When we read the first sentences of this novel: "The girl had come home finally from school. The question was what to do with her," we divine at once that we are "in for" a study of female development, despite her mother's dismay at finding her daughter splendidly and athletically beautiful. "There wasn't a man in the place," she reflected, "who would cast anything but attention as distinct from intention upon this enchanting young beauty. One cannot entertain a goddess in a suburban villa." And this was after Renée had been deliberately "toned down." (Hutchinson. 6s.)

PETERSBURG TALES.

BY OLIVE GARNETT.

Miss Olive Garnett, who is a daughter of Dr. Garnett, has written under the above title four stories, called "The Case of Vetrova," "Roukoff," "The Secret of the Universe," and "Out of It." All the stories are animated by knowledge of, and sympathy with, New Russia. (Heinemann. 6s.)

SERVANTS OF SIN.

BY JOHN BLOUNDELLE-BURTON.

Mr. Bloundelle-Burton has written both romances and novels of to-day. This is a romance, and it has been dramatised and produced for copyright purposes. "Snow! snow! snow! Always snow!" exclaims the first character. He is looking through a tourelle window, "from which the Bastille might be seen frowning over the Quartier Ste. Antoine a third of a mile away." But the story is not, as may be supposed, of the French Revolution; it opens in the winter of 1719. (Methuen. 6s.)

EDMUND FULLERSTON.

BY B. B. WEST.

"Halchester lies, as everybody knows, on the banks of the River Yarnold. We are concerned with two old-established families, "allied at every turn by intermarriages," and greatly admired by the author, who, however, keeps disaster up his sleeve, until he remarks: "Very reluctantly, and with the gloomy conviction that I have no alternative, I am compelled to tell of—THE CRASH." (Longmans. 6s.)

THE HEIRESS OF THE FOREST.

BY ELEANOR C. PRICE.

A romance of old France; or, precisely, "A Romance of Old Anjou," opening with pleasing conventionalism of four giants and a dwarf in the Forest of Montaigne, with foresters, woodmen, feudal customs, the autumn wind, and a boy's voice singing:

Écoute, belle!
Réveille-toi!
Mon cœur t'appelle:
Viens dans les bois.

(Isbister. 6s.)

We have also received For Lack of Love, by Lillias Campbell Davidson, a love story with chapter headings like "Love Crowns," "The Time of Roses," "Who Doubteth Love Can Know Not Love," and "Rhoda Decides" (Horace Marshall & Son. 6s.); Monica, by Evelyn Everett-Green, a good story of the "family reading" order, introducing "The Trevlyns of Trevlyn Castle"; The Order of Isis, a Story of Mystery and Adventure in Egypt, by James Bagnall-Stubbs, culminating in the battle of Omdurman (Skeffingtons. 6s.); The Boers' Blunder, a Veldt Adventure, by Fox Russell, in which the author, "although strictly adhering to fiction," bases some of his incidents on facts within his personal knowledge (Wells Gardner. 6s.); A Twentieth Century Parson, by Rev. E. H. Sugden, an episodic story of clerical work in all its phases, laid in "Bradford," a factory town of 10,000 population (Skeffington. 3s. 6d.); The Secret of the Crater: a Mountain Moloch, by Duffield Osborne, a story of a mislaid island in the Pacific, in which priests and volcanoes play their tragic parts, and massacre and mystery fill the picture (Putnam); My Afterdream, by Julian West, a sequel to Looking Backward, supposed to be written by Julian West (Unwin. 6s.); Barcali the Mutineer, by C. Dudley Lampen, a "Tale of the Great Pacific," opens with "a ghost in the engine-room . . . that most modern department of a modern iron steamship!" (Everett. 6s.); In White Raiment, by William Le Queux, postulating and showing that "in the wild whirl of social London there occur daily incidents which, when written down in black and white, appear absolutely incredible" (F. V. White. 6s.); The Baron's Sons, another translation from Maurus Jokai, to whose historical romances there seem no end (Macqueen. 6s.); A Modern Suburb, by R. A. Sinclair, a story of family and church life in the West of Scotland (Alex. Gardner); An Obstinate Parish, by M. L. Lord, a somewhat similar story of English life, laid at "Carchester" (Unwin. 2s. 6d.)

* * * Owing to the heavy arrivals of new novels, we are unable to print notes on a dozen novels besides the above.

THE ACADEMY.

Editorial and Publishing Offices, 43, Chancery-lane.

The ACADEMY will be sent post-free to every Annual Subscriber in the United Kingdom.

Price for One Issue, Threepence; postage One Halfpenny Price for 52 issues, Thirteen Shillings; postage free.

Foreign Rates for Yearly Subscriptions 20s. including postage.

American Agents for the ACADEMY: Brentano's, 31, Union-square, New York.

A Word to the Aspiring.

In surveying those wandering fields of literary foam which are called Fiction, we sight many a novel which we are loth to neglect, but to which we cannot give the space which is due to definitely good work. To "slate" such a novel is poor sport. To praise it faintly is waste of time. The best course seems to be to take one of these novels from time to time, and discuss it as a type. There may be difficulty in finding a novel sufficiently typical; but once it is found the object-lesson it affords ought to be of some little value. It happens that we have alighted on such a novel, one with brains in it, and written with evident care, purpose, and patience; but exhibiting, like a "perfect" hospital case, some of the most current vices and insufficiencies of these spacious days of authorship. The novel in question is called A Son of Austerity. It is written by Mr. George Knight, and is published by Messrs. Ward, Lock. If we seem to treat it unkindly, we can only say that unless we recognised its good points we should not publish an article on its bad ones.

Let us say at once that Mr. Knight sins through being too literary. It is not a question of style alone. His whole view of the characters and world he has created is distorted, we think, by an excessive love of literary expression and intellectuality. The plot of A Son of Austerity needs little indication. Paul Gotch is the twenty-four-year-old son of Selina Gotch, a soured woman who was deserted by her husband while her son was yet unborn, and who, by hard worldly abilities, and fierce devotion, has established herself in a brick-making business and given Paul a good education. Paul, in fact, is the most educated, assertive, long-winded, and philosophising young man we ever encountered in fiction. The story opens in the Gotches' brickfield residence one afternoon when Gotch père suddenly turns up to try conclusions with his wife, see his son, and ascertain—after twenty-four years' total neglect of his family—his family position. To a hayloft, where Paul is reading Goethe, comes Mrs. Gotch, shaking with, and shaken by, this arrival, and consumed with jealous forebodings about the probable relations of the son she has reared to the father she will never forgive. And presently we have this situation:

"You surely don't imagine he's here for my sake," she snapped.

Regardless of the gibe, Paul began to descend the hidden stairway. He halted abruptly, and returned, his face alight with a dreamy simplicity.

"What is my father like?" he inquired.

His mother lifted her hand and struck him upon the cheek—a desperate, vicious blow, that stamped a quadruple bar of scarlet on a saffron ground. Paul's clenched fingers leapt to a level with his elbow; then dropped.

"I think you forget yourself," he observed icily.

It will be noticed that Mr. Knight, too, has forgotten himself; though we have no wish to say it icily. He has a literary, but not a moral, understanding of the situation he has created in these lines. Murder is lovely and pleasant compared with a blow on a man's cheek struck by his mother in vicious anger and jealousy. We doubt whether the situation is ever required—is ever justified—in fiction or drama. But waiving that, what are we to say of the art which thiinks it is fulfilling itself by adding in one breath that the blow "stamped a quadruple bar of scarlet on a saffron ground"? And yet Mr. Knight has only committed, in exemplary degree, an error that is nearly as common as ink. It is the fallacy of sight. It is the tyranny of the thing seen. The notion that because a thing is seen it may be fitly written has been fostered in late years to such an extent that it threatens to annihilate moral, as distinct from physical, vision. It also produces a thousand vulgarities and unseemlinesses by unhappy accident. "Paul's clenched fingers leapt to a level with his elbow; then dropped"! So we are spared fisticuffs, when we should have been awed by the tragedy and pitifulness of human hearts.

We spoke of the tyranny of the thing seen, meaning precisely its tyranny, not its assured helpfulness and just authority. Mr. Knight does not always err. He can see things when they may properly be seen, and describe them when they may properly be described. We not only say this, but we will prove it by these sentences from the description of the dreary funeral of the elder Gotch:

At the border of the clayfield was a hearse and a single carriage. A little crowd marked, with its opposing groups of spectators, the way to the two pompous equipages. The coffin slid shriekingly between the plaques or frosted glass and shining enamel; Paul mounted into the lumbering ark behind, there was a clatter of hoofs, and the wheels, clearing the kerb, settled into those slow revolutions which, all too quickly, devour the Last Journey.

That is good. Again, when Hero comes back from her first London visit:

Hero, left alone, looked out of the window and pondered the harsh browns and greens of the prospect. The pug-mill was thudding monotonously; the sunshine danced on the windy surfaces of the mimic meres; some juvenile anglers, tattered and barefoot, were bobbing for "jack-sharp" in the dusky water.

"If I don't have the dismsals before I'm much older," reflected the spectator, caudidly, "my name is not Hero Gotch."

That also is serviceable. We could multiply such instances of Mr. Knight's competence; it is only "bitter constraint sad occasion dear" that prevents us.

The disastrous effect of word-mania and rampant intellectuality may be more closely indicated. They may cause an author to guy or destroy his own drama. So resolved is such an author to put down every thought that flits through his brain, that he turns his best characters into beasts of burden, making them say things which he wants said, but which they—being sane—would never say. Thoughts which in the writer are clever and helpful may, on the lips of a character, become irrelevant, vulgar, or screamingly funny. You may recognise a writer's thought to be good, but be consumed with laughter by its improper dramatisation. Mr. Knight—again in common with scores of writers—is a prey to this confusion. No estimate we can form of Paul Gotch's natural priggery can reconcile us to some of the speeches he addresses to his sweetheart and his mother. In a heart-to-heart explanation between him and his mother, shortly before that lady's death, we have this bit of dialogue:

Mrs. Gotch touched the brimming tears from her lashes; she could not speak.

"Because," said Paul, still stroking the fine, strong fingers, "because you are my mother, and desolate; because life has been bitter in your mouth—but most of all because, while my heart is breaking for a woman who is nothing to you, your heart, forgetting itself, bleeds for me. There is a language of gesture, it has told me this. And now I know that I love you, you grey, grave paradox of warm blood and cold lips. Ten minutes from now I shall be ashamed to have told you so, and you will wonder if you have dreamed it. But ten years hence there may be balm in the memory of this odd moment."

Had Paul's mother cuffed him with quadruple-scarlet effects when he called her a grey grave paradox we should have felt no surprise. It is, we fancy, in sheer prepossession with the writing of his story, instead of with the thinking of it out, that Mr. Knight makes his Paul say, "Hero—I may call you Hero, may I not?" after he is betrothed, after she has come under his mother's roof, and—actually—at the moment when he is handing her fifty pounds in bank-notes to buy her trousseau.

If words and literary ideas can cloud an author's vision of life, they are none the less to be condemned for their smaller mischiefs, done to style itself. Mr. Knight's book is a veritable jungle of clever but needless phrase-making. Take a sentence at sheer random. It is from that scene in the hay-loft, from which mother and son are now descending:

Both encountered at the base of the slope, and mounted together the acute scarp that led to a trapezium of unspoiled turf, whereon was perched a single white cottage.

Here the taste for words assumes control over the pen, which should be controlled always by a higher power of which this delicate taste is only the lieutenant. And as is very usual, pride goes before a fall. The writer will not say that mother and son "met" at the base of the slope, though "met" is actually the better word, because "encountered" carries the idea of an unexpected meeting (which it was not), or—but this we have nothing to do with—a meeting in battle. The right and simple word was "met." The writer prefers the verb encounter in its somewhat rare intransitive use, which is yet familiar in the speech of the First Lord in "Timon of Athens," when he meets the Second Lord and presently remarks: "Upon that were my thoughts tiring when we encountered." But mark how Mr. Knight's unnecessary quest of a rare word betrays him. Full of "encountered," he gives it an incorrect nominative—"Both encountered." He should have written "They encountered." The whole mission of the pronoun "both" in the English language is to indicate two people, neither of whom is excluded from a given act or state, though either might be so excluded. Its bottom is knocked out of it in "both encountered" not less completely than if one said of a bride and bridegroom that they were both wedded at the altar. This may seem trivial criticism. But it is not trivial; it concerns the whole art of writing. For we are almost certain that it was a zeal for the rare "encountered"—a zeal more holy than discreet—that relaxed Mr. Knight's hold on the meaning of the simple word "both." But the affectations of this sentence do not end here. For why, in the name of unspoiled English, a trapezium? A trapezium is a geometrical figure of four sides, no two of which are parallel. That is all. Try making trapeziums on a sheet of paper, and you will find that the figure is the most indefinite in the world. And yet there is a notion abroad among young writers that such a word as "trapezium," because it is demonstrably correct, is the "inevitable" word in such a connexion as the above. It is forgotten that the mind has no thanks for such an excursus into geometry, when all it wants is a general idea. It is forgotten, also, that the mere apparition of a word like "trapezium," in a common connexion, is disconcerting, and that it starts an unnecessary train of thought. It is in the nemesic fitness of things that, having showered strange words on us in a sentence of less than four lines, Mr. Knight should employ the easy expression, "perched a single white cottage"—thus denying to his sentence even the grace of homogeneity of style. We must end abruptly, after confining ourselves to one or two pages of a novel which we have twice read. Mr. Knight should feel encouraged. But let him strive to see life as it is, and not love unwisely the iridescent pother of words.

Things Seen.

Parson's Green.

As I alighted from the train, a girl—demure, quietly dressed, pale—just one of a type, nothing more, made a grab at the carriage. Whereupon I lingered a moment, just to imply (in all men the schoolmaster is engrained) that her feverish haste could expedite her nothing. I alighted, and was gone a dozen paces along the platform when the patter of feet, into which a timid voice broke, arrested me. It was the demure girl. "Your umbrella—," she began, nodding wildly towards the train that had already begun to move. With a fire of thanks I made a dart for the nearest carriage, which, unfortunately, was not the compartment I had occupied. But as my umbrella was not flying away from me, curiosity as to how the kind little lady had fared propelled me, as if shot from a catapult, to the window. Flushed and disconsolate she was standing on the platform. She had lost the train, and I—my umbrella and I—were being whirled away from our comfortable home to—Parson's Green. Surely something was wrong. A kind action, unselfish and unpremeditated, should not cause acute discomfort to two people. I sat down to think it out. The solution became clear: it was due merely to a lack of grey matter—kindness without brains—the cause of much of the friction and many of the disappointments of communal life. If she had thought a moment, how simple was her procedure. She might have called me, she might have tossed the umbrella from the carriage. Instead of which she alighted, full of good intentions, but without the umbrella. "Kindness without brains, kindness without brains," the words buzzed themselves into the rhythmic roar of the train. "And where on earth is Parson's Green?" I asked myself.

The Candidate.

CURIOSITY sent me last night to that unknown land we call the East End of London. There, an hour before midnight, I came upon a huge, gloomy open space, alive with a swaying mass of men, listening and gazing. They gazed towards a brewer's dray at the far end of the square, upon which a naphtha lamp flamed. The candidate stood against the lamp. His voice was thin and hoarse, like a corn-crake with a cough, and half the notes were stifled before birth. Still he persevered. He stood between me and the naphtha flame, and when he raised his hands to invoke the brooding mass that confronted him the red blood gleamed between his fingers. At intervals his wife handed him a cordial, and, when he had drunk, the flaming naphtha picked out the drops glistening on his beard. His audience was silent and indifferent. The dull and incessant toil of their lives was such that this business of parliamentary representation was too remote to move them. Wars, Australian Federation, grievances of Uitlanders—what were such things to men who were Uitlanders in their own parishes? What was all the big talk of Imperialism to men whose lives were summed up in three words—work, squalor, sleep? Just there and then the moment of insight came to the candidate. Suddenly he broke off in his set harangue. He paused, he threw up his arms in a gesture that embraced the mighty congeries of mean houses and meaner hovels that slunk from the light of day through uncharted miles; he paused, then he spoke, and for these few words the full volume of his voice returned to him. "Men of —," he said, "we 'ear a deal of talk about Africa and China and Australia, but what I say is, 'ow about 'ome sweet 'ome?" Then they awoke, and others surged into the meeting to know what the shouting meant.

In the Manner of the Amir.

THE instalment of naïve autobiography of the Amir of Afghanistan, in the first number of The Monthly Review, which we commented upon in our issue of September 22, seems to be setting a fashion in literature. So we gather from the brief passages which follow, giving, as Abdur Rahman did, details of daily life. The fact that the contributor from whom the MS. comes vouches for their genuineness leaves us (who know this contributor too well) without any doubt on the matter.

Mr. Guy Boothby.

As habit is second nature, it has become a habit of mine that even when I am ill, when I cannot move from my bed, I still keep on working as usual at writing new stories. Those who have seen me at such times know how hard I work, and they have often heard me say that, if my hands and feet cannot move from my bed, I can still go on moving my tongue to dictate stories, several at a time, to those about me. It is no trouble to me to invent new stories; on the contrary, I love it, and I never feel tired, because I am fond of such labour. There is no doubt that every person has some sort of ambition, and this is my ambition: to have a new story running in all the magazines at once.

The more I see of other writers running fast in the manufacture of books, the less I can rest and sleep; the whole day long I keep thinking how I shall beat Richard Marsh and S. R. Crockett, and at night my dreams are just the same. There is a saying that the cat does not dream about anything but mice; I dream about nothing but the multiplication of new stories.

The following people are always in attendance upon me, from the time that I awake until I go to sleep: Romeik Khurtis (officer who brings me all newspaper cuttings relating to myself), Watto Pinka (literary agent, with whom I consult regularly), Ukhant Seehim (officer who interposes himself between my person and the interviewers, and gives them the required information), six phonograph assistants, six typewriters. There are also body servants, tobacco-bearer, and the keeper of the bulldogs.

Mr. Joseph Conrad.

It is a curious thing that the harder I work on Lord Jim the more anxious I am to continue working, instead of getting tired. The appetite grows by what it feeds upon! Lord Jim began as a sketch, but I sometimes think it will go on for ever. It was to run through two numbers of Blackwood, and it has now run through ever so many.

To those who would like to know some particulars of my daily life I would say that I have no fixed time for sleeping, nor any definite time for taking my meals; sometimes my meals are kept on the table in front of me for many hours, while I, being absorbed in Lord Jim, forget all about them. So deeply do my thoughts take possession of me when I am planning to end Lord Jim, that I do not see any of the people who are in my room. Many nights I begin reading the back numbers of Lord Jim, and wondering when the thing will stop and how long it would be if it were really a novel and not a sketch; and I do not raise my head until I see that the night is past and the morning has come.

I go on working at Lord Jim from morning until evening and from evening until morning like any labourer. I eat when I am hungry; and some days do not remember that I have not eaten my meals—I forget all about it, and ask suddenly, raising my head from writing: "Did I eat my dinner to-day, or not?"

Mr. Winston Churchill.

I am always ready, as a special correspondent and non-combatant on the march to a battle, in such a manner that I could start without any delay in case of a telegram from the Morning Post. The pockets of my coats and trousers are always filled with loaded revolvers, and one or two loaves of bread for one day's food; this bread is changed every day. Several guns and swords are lying always by the side of my bed or the chair on which I am seated, within reach of my hand; and saddled horses are always kept ready in front of my residence. I have also ordered that a number of gold coins should be sewn into the saddles of my horses when required for a journey; but there is a chance that this order may not be carried out. Meanwhile, I have got in for Oldham.

Mr. Andrew Lang.

My entertainments are very simple: throughout the whole of the time I am working, at intervals of a few minutes after I have finished answering a letter or a piece of work, I stop for a moment and talk with members of the Folklore Society and members of the Society for Psychical Research. The professional cricketers and professional golf players play their games before me; I watch them sometimes, and sometimes I will play myself, though this is not often.

I do not go to sleep directly I lie down in bed; but the person who is specially appointed as my reader sits down beside my bed and reads to me from some new book, as, for instance, histories, books on geography, biographies, and novels. While he is reading I review them for all the papers. I listen to this reading until I go to sleep, when a new official takes his place and reads the latest minor poetry from presentation volumes. This is very soothing, as the constant murmur of the reader's voice lulls my tired nerves and brain. It is, I think, the only use of minor poetry. There is another advantage in sleeping through the droning noise of minor poetry read aloud—namely, that one gets accustomed to noise, and I can now sleep soundly in a South-Eastern Railway carriage.

Correspondence.

Expression in Poetry.

SIR,—I am a simple person, and although I enjoy reading poetry for myself, I am always pleased to have it explained to me by other people who understand it better; and therefore when I found in the current number of the National Review an article by the Rev. H. C. Beeching on "Expression in Poetry" I was very glad. It is so nice to be taken behind the scenes and shown how the effects are produced; and I felt, as I read, something of the pleasure which the frequenters of the Alhambra must derive from the latest exploit of the cinematograph, whereby they are enabled to see the whole of the movements of a celebrated dancer from the moment that she enters at the stage door until she actually bursts from the flies, with all her no longer mysterious preparations completed.

But, sir, I was just at the end of the article—jam tula tenebam—when I was suddenly hurled from this apparently secure vantage point of observation into a positive slough of perplexity, and that by the very hands of the writer himself. Mr. Beeching had approved Milton and Wordsworth, and had disclosed one by one the cosmetics of Tennyson's best make-up. I was about to retire to rest with the conviction that the secret of poetry lay in the proper use of monosyllabic verbs of motion, had not Mr. Beeching—not he unmindful of the pleasant shades of Yattendon, loved of the Muses—felt called upon to add that to Mr. Robert Bridges alone since Tennyson had the proper use of monosyllabic verbs of motion been vouchsafed; and he proceeded to say that he held Mr. Robert Bridges's representation of "a modern steam-thresher," for instance, to be as near perfection as one could wish; and he went on to quote the following lines:

And from the barn hard by was borne
A steady muffled din,
By which we knew that threshèd corn
Was winnowing, and went in.

Now, sir, I have a horrid suspicion that "went" is one of those monosyllabic verbs of motion, and that Mr. Beeching derives a special satisfaction from referring it to the corn going into the machine, whereas it refers to Mr. Bridges and his friends going into the barn. But there is worse to come. Will it be believed that those four lines are not, in truth, any part of any description of a "modern steam-thresher" at all? They come from a very charming poem called "The Winnowers," in the course of which Mr. Bridges is careful to specify the man who turns the handle. There is no threshing, there is no steam; for aught I know the machine may be of great antiquity; and, indeed, in any case a steam-thresher neither looks nor sounds nor smells like a hand-winnowing machine. This is surely very serious; for either there must be something wrong with Mr. Beeching's canons of expression or Mr. Bridges was describing "a modern steam-thresher" all the time, and ought at once to change the title of his poem, and make the man who turns the crank into the man who stokes the fire or the man who oils the wheels or whatever the corresponding occupation may be. Something ought to be done, or what is the humble student in these matters to think?—I am, &c.,

DISCIPULUS.

Style.

SIR,—As the improvement of style has occupied the columns of your paper for some weeks past; I think the following extract from the Autobiography of Benjamin Franklin will add some interest to that subject:

I met with an odd volume of the Spectator. It was the third. I had never before seen any of them. I bought it, read it over and over, and was much delighted with it. I thought the writing excellent, and wished, if possible, to imitate it. With this view I took some of the papers, and, making short hints of the sentiment in each sentence, laid them by a few days, and then, without looking at the book, try'd to compleat the papers again, by expressing each hinted sentiment at length, and as fully as it had been expressed before, in any suitable words that should come to hand. Then I compared my Spectator with the original, discovered some of my faults and corrected them. But I found I wanted a stock of words, or a readiness in recollecting and using them, which I thought I should have acquired before that time if I had gone on making verses; since the continual occasion for words of the same import, but of different length, to suit the measure, or of different sound for the rhyme, would have laid me under a constant necessity of searching for variety, and also have tended to fix that variety in my mind and make me master of it. Therefore I took some of the tales and turned them into verse; and, after a time, when I had pretty well forgotten the prose, turned them back again. I also sometimes jumbled my collections of hints into confusion, and after some weeks endeavoured to reduce them into the best order, before I began to form the full sentences and compleat the paper. This was to teach me method in the arrangement of thoughts. By comparing afterwards with the original, I discovered many faults and amended them; but I sometimes had the pleasure of fancying that, in certain particulars of small import, I had been lucky enough to improve the method or the language, and this encouraged me to think I might possibly in time come to be a tolerable English writer, of which I was extremely ambitious.

Whether this method is worthy of imitation or not, I leave it to the reader's estimation.—I am, &c.,

Cork: September 25, 1900. HUGH W. FLANAGIN.

Education and Family History.

SIR,—In this great day of education, with the present century shortly drawing to its close, permit me, as one who has had some experience in the study of human pedigree, to call attention in your columns to what appears to me a subject sadly lost sight of in the past, and which, I trust, will claim at least some position in the code of education in the future. I refer to the study of family history and pedigree, with due consideration and analysis of their influences and bearings. This, surely, should not be a mere personal or private matter. It is a subject of the highest and widest order; of the utmost importance to the nation and to the world at large, but the utter indifference and ignorance of the subject are really surprising. A large amount of time and attention are given to the investigation of beings and objects of centuries ago, and the utmost care and scrutiny bestowed upon tracing the history and pedigree of the dog, horse, or cow, while the human animal upon which so much depends is entirely forgotten. Even in the all-important subject of marriage, it is a matter of pounds rather than of pedigree, the latter being almost completely ignored save so far, perhaps, as outward appearances and position are concerned. Knowledge is power, and the proper study of mankind is man, and this study should begin at home; the study is invaluable, showing as it does the why and the wherefore of certain effects, what to stimulate and what to avoid, and if reduced to a science endless physical and mental mistakes might be avoided. Man is a bundle of habits, and these are traced down from one generation to another, and no knowledge is of such vital importance to the human race as the careful analysis and understanding of the laws of pedigree. Lunacy is proved to be largely increasing, and no wonder when such ignorance prevails; the very keystone to its prevention and treatment is to be found in this study and in this study alone. The very gist of success depends upon detection of the real cause. What is born in the bone need not come out in the flesh. I know as a fact that members of certain families have been plunged generation after generation into helpless lunacy—every case of which might have been absolutely avoided had their first indications of eccentricity been attributed to their true causes, and, by skilful manipulation, diverted in their courses and nipped in the bud. The weak points have been clearly brought to light, when, alas! it has been too late, upon simple investigation of early pedigree and history, but from lack of knowledge of the true causes the axe has never been laid to the root of the evil. I repeat that the most mysterious mental and physical complications which have puzzled alike parson, philosopher, and physician, have been made as clear as the sun at noon-day when viewed by the penetrating Röntgen Rays of family history. I maintain that this study duly considered may become one of the mightiest levers for the development and improvement of the human race. It is never too late to mend, and if we have to remain largely in the dark from lack of adequate statistics in the past, we may at least help future generations by a better education upon the subject, thus handing down for the guidance of our progeny some intelligent basis for the delineation of their family history, with its particular characteristics and proclivities.—I am, &c.,

T. THATCHER.

44, College Green, Bristol.

Mr. Murray Gilchrist.

SIR,—The reviewer of Mr. Gilchrist's latest book in your last issue inadvertently suggests that this graceful writer is now adventuring for the first time on a long novel. Perhaps he is better known as a writer of short stories; but he published a novel, entitled Willowbrake, some time ago with Messrs. Methuen & Co. which was decidedly above the ordinary run of such things, and was,

I think—I speak from memory only—applauded by the ACADEMY, as well as other organs of literary opinion which grind less readily and, perhaps, more steadily than the daily press.—I am, &c.,
 VERNON RENDALL.
 123, Gower-street, W.C.: October 3, 1900.

A Word to an Editor.

SIR,—That same work of reference to which you refer on p. 267 of this week's ACADEMY makes a still more singular blunder in the case of W. L. Murdoch. This world-renowned cricketer is stated to have been born in 1885, and to have come over with the first Australian Eleven in 1878.
 R. T.

September 29, 1900.

"Cold" or "Pure"?

SIR,—Mr. Colvin, in his Life of Keats, thus quotes the last sonnet:

The moving waters at their priest-like task
 Of cold ablution round earth's human shores.

Is there any authority for the word "cold"? It sent a chill through me. "Pure" is the word that I find in the text.—I am, &c.,
 JOHN B. TABB.

St. Charles' College, Ellicott City, Md.:
 September 24th, 1900.

Our Weekly Competition.

Result of No. 54 (New Series).

LAST week we offered a prize of One Guinea for the best address to the electors of Bookland. We award the prize to Mr. Archibald Gibbs, 2, Lynton Place, Cheltenham, for the following:

GENTLEMEN,—I beg to offer my candidature for your acceptance. If elected to sit in the Mother of Parliaments, I shall do my utmost to forward, in a general sense, the interests of Literature and Literary People, but more particularly I shall concern myself with—

(A) A reform in the present unsatisfactory legislation governing Copyright, by which rascally, foreign Barabbases—to speak Byronically—are able to pirate an author's work and render him absurd and inferior into the bargain.

(B) I shall concern myself with endeavouring to improve the status of the journalist (journeyman and freelance) who has now become such a power in the land. Journalism ought, I conceive, to be regarded as a liberal profession, and the Institute of Journalists endowed with similar powers of examination, emoluments, cashiering, &c., as the Incorporated Law Society.

(C) I shall concern myself with an alteration of the present condition of things relating to the Poet Laureateship. I consider, gentlemen, that the time has come either for this office to be abolished or that distinguished prose authors should be equally eligible with bards for laureation.

(D) And finally, I shall concern myself with an alteration of the law relating to libel, with a view of affording more protection than is at present the case to respectable newspaper proprietors from adventurers and men of straw who seek notoriety. I shall feel myself more particularly nerved to action when I recall the views on this matter held by so great an authority as the late Lord Russell.

These seem the salient points for our consideration.
 I have the honour to remain, gentlemen, your obedient servant,
 ARTHUR PENDENNIS, JUN.

Other replies are as follows:

GENTLEMEN,—I stand before you as the embodiment of your yearning. Let me not be misunderstood. You, citizens of Bookland, have long yearned for a representative to guard your interests, and air your grievances. Until now your yearning has assumed no concrete form. Gentlemen, I am the "concrete form, I am the embodiment of your yearning, I address you as a brother. My name is not unknown in Bookland. I am one of you. Your pains my pains; your triumphs, my triumphs.

By the activity of your brains, by the enormous output of intellect, fluent and unflagging, by which you earn your bread, you are, consciously or unconsciously, the moulders of public opinion. Yet you have no representative! Is it not strange that public opinion should go unrepresented?

I venture to assert that your intellects and mine would constitute a dominant force in modern affairs. Will you throw your combined grievances into the expanded end of a funnel, as it were, so that a steadier and more concentrated expression of them may issue from the narrow end? Will you elect me your funnel?

Beyond being a general champion of the aspirations of the enlightened persons whom I am privileged to address, I may state that the principal planks in my platform are:—

(A) The total reinstatement of the Minor Poet.

(B) The absolute annihilation of Barabbas in favour of a "Combined Authors' Publishing House," engineered solely by authors, with myself at the head.

(C) Drinks, at the expense of the Government, for inspiring purposes.

These, gentlemen, are my main planks, combined with, I repeat, a general appreciation of your wants—and mine. It remains with you to do your duty. Will you do it? [H. A. M., London.]

GENTLEMEN,—Parliament having been dissolved, I beg to submit myself, at the request of the Literary Council, as candidate for the representation of this division in the House of Commons.

Amongst the questions by which we are at present affected perhaps the first place must be given to the price of fiction. Many have considered the six-shilling novel as most unsatisfactory, and reforms have been attempted, only to result in failure. I shall give my most strenuous support to a price upon which author, publisher, bookseller, and the reading public shall substantially agree.

I advocate the repeal of the Public Libraries Act. It is unfair that that portion of the public, uninterested in literature, should submit to taxation for the benefit of that portion therein interested; and the rural districts, where the Act is not practicable, afford sufficient proof of its undesirability, for although the communities are poorer, no one objects to an expense by which he alone must benefit. I also object to an Act which will ultimately end the useful and honourable career of the bookseller and threaten the publisher with ruin. I would not allow any tradesmen, other than the bookseller, the liberty to sell books. This would mean the extinction of the piratical publisher, and the end of the cheap and nasty editions sold in drapers' establishments.

I would not have fiction debased by questions of a theological or sexual nature; and I deplore the influence of those sensation-mongers who have now a terrible notoriety, but no true eminence.

I am in favour of greater reforms in the laws of international copyright; of placing a needed restriction on the output of minor poetry; and of submitting the election of poet laureate to yourselves.

I am, gentlemen, yours obediently,

GENTLE READER.
 [A. H., Durham.]

Replies also received from: M. A. W., London; J. L. C., London; V. E. J., Stratford-on-Avon; K. E. T., Bristol; T. C., Buxted; J. D. A., Ealing; C. D. F., Liverpool; F. W. S., London; J. R. W., Worcester; H. W. D., South Tottenham; L. K., London; "A. Dunderhead."

Competition No. 55 (New Series).

THIS is the time of the year when new papers and magazines appear. The first essential of a new publication is that it should fill a place not already occupied. We offer a prize of One Guinea for the best suggestions for a new daily or weekly paper or magazine which shall best fulfil this condition.

RULES.

Answers, addressed "Literary Competition, THE ACADEMY, 43, Chancery-lane, W.C.," must reach us not later than the first post of Wednesday, October 10. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found on the second page of Wrapper, or it cannot enter into competition. Competitors sending more than one attempt at solution must accompany each attempt with a separate coupon; otherwise the first only will be considered. We cannot consider anonymous answers.

Special cloth cases for binding the half-yearly volume of the ACADEMY can be supplied for 1s. each. The price of the bound half-yearly volume is 8s. 9d. Communications should be addressed to the Publisher, 43, Chancery-lane.

F. V. WHITE & CO.'S LIST. ELEVEN POPULAR NOVELS.

At all Libraries and Bookstalls. Price 6s. each.

A SELF-MADE COUNTESS.

(3rd Edition.) JOHN STRANGE WINTER.

IN WHITE RAIMENT.

WILLIAM LE QUEUX.

IN SHEEP'S CLOTHING.

HUME NISBET.

THE SHIELD OF HIS HONOUR.

RICHARD HENRY SAVAGE.

BROTHERS OF THE CHAIN.

GEORGE GRIFFITH.

THE PRINCESS OF COPPER.

ARCHIBALD CLAVERING GUNTER.

THE GODDESS—A DEMON.

RICHARD MARSH.

DAUNAY'S TOWER.

ADELINE SERGEANT.

THE WORLD'S BLACKMAIL.

LUCAS CLEEVE.

THE LOVE OF TWO WOMEN.

JOHN JONES.

THE FLICK OF FORTUNE.

THOMAS PARKES.

"An interesting and clever book."—Vanity Fair.
"A book that is certainly to be read."—Black and White.
"We hope that it will meet with the recognition it deserves."—Illustrated London News.

F. V. WHITE & CO., 14, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C.

MUDIE'S LIBRARY (LIMITED).

SUBSCRIPTIONS for 3 Months, 6 Months, and 12 Months
CAN BE ENTERED AT ANY DATE.

THE BEST and MOST POPULAR BOOKS of the SEASON
ARE NOW IN CIRCULATION.

Prospectuses of Terms free on application.

BOOK SALE DEPARTMENT.

Many Thousand Surplus Copies of Books always ON SALE
(Second-hand). Also a large Selection of

BOOKS IN LEATHER BINDINGS

SUITABLE FOR

BIRTHDAY AND WEDDING PRESENTS.

30 to 34, NEW OXFORD STREET;

241, Brompton Road, S.W.; 48, Queen Victoria Street, E.C.,
LONDON;

And at 10-12, Barton Arcade, MANCHESTER.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK,

SOUTHAMPTON BUILDINGS, CHANCERY LANE, LONDON, W.C.

2% CURRENT ACCOUNTS on the minimum monthly balances, when not drawn below £100. 2%

2½% DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS on Deposits, repayable on demand. 2½%

STOCKS AND SHARES.

Stocks and Shares Purchased and Sold for Customers.

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free.

FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

Telephone, No. 5, Holborn.

Telegraphic Address, "BIRKBECK, LONDON."

PORTRAIT SUPPLEMENTS TO "THE ACADEMY,"

Consisting of Thirty-seven Portraits of Old and New Celebrities in Literature, may still be obtained, singly, or in complete sets for 3s. 6d., on application to the Office, 43, Chancery Lane, W.C.

NEW POEM.

AD ASTRA.

BY

CHARLES WHITWORTH WYNNE.

THIRD and CHEAPER EDITION.

Fcap. 4to, 5s. net.

"It is an essentially religious poem, and no one can read it without being deeply impressed by the lofty spirit breathed throughout its flowing and dignified measures."—Liverpool Mercury.

"'Ad Astra' is a lengthy poem of a very high order, full of the most poignant thought and convincing truths. Reminiscent of, and in style and treatment like to 'In Memoriam.'"—Middlesex Gazette.

"Lovers of verse will find much to admire in Mr. Wynne's work, in which he demonstrates the possession of a rich poetical gift."—York Daily Herald.

"Here and there the spirit of the dead Laureate seems to breathe in Mr. Wynne's poem."—South Africa.

"There is much in this poem to admire, and shining couplets that fix themselves in the memory."—Dundee Advertiser.

"In speaking of nature Mr. Wynne nearly achieves eloquence, and later, while emphasising his belief that the world will pass from religious cliques to a grand and consoling catholicity, he rises to and maintains utterance worthy of his theme."—Literary World.

"We dare venture to say that this poem would have created quite a sensation towards the close of the last, or at the commencement of the present century."—Court Circular.

GRANT RICHARDS, 9, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

A CHARMING GIFT BOOK

6s., claret roan, gilt, Illustrated.

LONDON in the TIME of the DIAMOND JUBILEE

London: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL & Co. Llangollen: DARLINGTON & Co.

DARLINGTONS' HANDBOOKS.

Edited by RALPH DARLINGTON, F.R.G.S.

Maps by BARTHOLOMEW.

Fcap. 8vo. ONE SHILLING EACH. Illustrated.

THE VALE OF LLANGOLLEN.—With Special Contributions from His Excellency E. J. PHELPS, late American Minister; Professor JOHN RUSKIN, LL.D.; ROBERT BROWNING; A. W. KINGLAKE; and Sir THEODORE MARTIN, K.C.B.

BOURNEMOUTH and NEW FOREST. THE CHANNEL ISLANDS.
THE NORFOLK BROADS. THE ISLE OF WIGHT.
BRECON and its BEACONS. THE WYE VALLEY.
ROSS, TINTERN, and CHEPSTOW. THE SEVERN VALLEY.
BRISTOL, BATH, WELLS, and WESTON-SUPER-MARE.
BRIGHTON, EASTBOURNE, HASTINGS, and ST. LEONARDS.
{ LLANDUDNO, RHYL, BANGOR, PENMAENMAWR, }
{ LLANFAIRFECHAN, ANGLESEY, and CARNARVON. }
ABERYSTWYTH, BARMOUTH, MACHYNLETH, and ABERDOVEY.
CONWAY, COLWYN BAY, BETTWS-Y-COED, SNOWDON, and FESTINIOG.
BARMOUTH, DOLGELLY, HARLECH, CRICCIETH, and PWLLHELL.
MALVERN, HEREFORD, WORCESTER, GLOUCESTER, & CHELTENHAM.
LLANDRINDOD WELLS and the SPAS of MID-WALES.

1s.—THE HOTELS of the WORLD. A Handbook to the leading Hotels throughout the world.

"What would not the intelligent tourist in Paris or Rome give for such a guide-book as this, which teaches so much that is outside the usual scope of such volumes!"—The Times.

"The best Handbook to London ever issued."—Liverpool Daily Post.

THIRD EDITION, REVISED, 6s.,—60 Illustrations, 24 Maps and Plans.

LONDON AND ENVIRONS.

By E. C. COOK and E. T. COOK, M.A.

With Index of 4,500 References to all Streets and Places of Interest

Llangollen: DARLINGTON & CO.

London: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, HAMILTON, KENT & Co., LTD.

The Railway Bookstalls, and all Booksellers'.

CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY PRESS.

AN INTRODUCTION to the OLD TESTAMENT in GREEK. By H. B. SWETE, D.D.,
Regius Professor of Divinity. With an Appendix, containing the Letter of Aristas, edited, with Prolegomena, by H. ST. J. THACKERAY, M.A. Crown
8vo, 7s. 6d. net. [Nearly ready.]

A CRITICAL EXPOSITION of the PHILOSOPHY of LEIBNIZ, together with an Appendix of Leading Passages. By BERTRAND RUSSELL, M.A., Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge, Author of "An Essay on the Foundations of Geometry." Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

EXPLORATIO PHILOSOPHICA. By the late JOHN GROTE, B.D., Senior Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge, and Professor of Moral Philosophy in the University of Cambridge. Part I., Re-issued. Part II., Edited by JOSEPH B. MAYOR,
M.A. Demy 8vo, 9s. each Part.

FRANCIS HUTCHESON. By W. R. SCOTT, M.A., Trinity College, Dublin, Assistant to the
Professor of Moral Philosophy, and Lecturer in Political Economy in the University of St. Andrews. Demy 8vo, 8s. [Nearly ready.]

SAVONAROLA. Meditations on Psalm li. and Part of Psalm xxxi. in Latin. With an English Translation by E. H. PEROWNE, D.D., Master of Corpus Christi College, Cambridge. Crown 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

THIRTEEN HOMILIES of ST. AUGUSTINE on ST. JOHN XIV. In Joh. Ex Tractatus, LXVII.-LXXIX. With Translation and Notes by H. F. STEWART, M.A., Chaplain of Trinity College, Cambridge, formerly Vice-Principal of Salisbury
Theological College. Crown 8vo, 4s.

THE USE of the APOCRYPHA in the CHRISTIAN CHURCH. By WILLIAM HEAFORD
DAUBNEY, B.D., Jeremie Prizeman, 1873, Rector of Leasingham, Diocese of Lincoln. Crown 8vo, 3s.

DICTIONARY of the HAUSA LANGUAGE. By C. H. ROBINSON, M.A., Trinity College,
Lecturer in Hausa in the University of Cambridge, assisted by W. H. BROOKS, B.A., late Hausa Scholar of Christ's College. Demy 8vo. Vol. I., Hausa-
English, 12s. net; Vol. II., English-Hausa, 9s. net.

HAND-LIST of MUHAMMADAN MSS. preserved in the Cambridge University Library, including all those (Arabic, Persian, Turkish, Urdu, Malay, &c.) which are written in the Arabic character. By E. G. BROWNE, M.A., M.B., Fellow of Pembroke College, and Lecturer in Persian in the University of Cambridge. Demy 8vo, 15s.

SONGS of MODERN GREECE. With Introductions, Translations, and Notes. By G. F.
ABBOTT, B.A., Emmanuel College. Small 8vo, half-parchment, gilt top, 5s. net.

THE EARLY HISTORY of ENGLISH POOR RELIEF. By E. M. LEONARD, former Student of Girton College. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

POLITICAL THEORIES of the MIDDLE AGES. By Dr. OTTO GIERKE. Translated by F. W. MAITLAND, Litt.D., Downing Professor of the Laws of England. [Nearly ready.]

A TREATISE on GEOMETRICAL OPTICS. By R. A. HERMAN, M.A., Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge. Demy 8vo, 10s. net.

THE TEMPLES and RITUAL of ASKLEPIOS at EPIDAUROS and ATHENS. Two Lectures delivered at the Royal Institution of Great Britain. By RICHARD CATON, M.D., F.R.C.P. Second Edition. Royal 8vo, with 34 Illustrations, 3s. net.

FIFTEEN STUDIES in BOOK-KEEPING. By WALTER W. SNAILUM, P.A.S.I. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

This book has been written to combine a thorough explanation of the principles of double-entry book-keeping with a course of work suitable for preparation for the examinations held by the Society of Arts, Civil Service, Lancashire and Cheshire Union of Institutes, and kindred examining bodies.

THE CAMBRIDGE HISTORICAL SERIES.

General Editor—G. W. PROTHERO, Litt.D., Hon. Fellow of King's College, Cambridge, and formerly Professor of History in the University of Edinburgh.

CANADA UNDER BRITISH RULE, 1760-1900. By Sir J. G. BOURINOT, LL.D., K.C.M.G.
With 8 Maps. [Nearly ready.]

THE FRENCH MONARCHY, 1483-1789. By A. J. GRANT, M.A., Professor of History in the Yorkshire College, Leeds. With 4 Maps. 2 vols. [Nearly ready.]

AN ESSAY on WESTERN CIVILISATION in its ECONOMIC ASPECTS (Mediaeval and Modern Times). By W. CUNNINGHAM, D.D., Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge. [Nearly ready.]

THE CAMBRIDGE BIBLE FOR SCHOOLS AND COLLEGES.

NEW VOLUMES.

General Editor for Old Testament and Apocrypha—A. F. KIRKPATRICK, D.D., Regius Professor of Hebrew.

THE PSALMS. Books IV. and V. Psalms xc.-
cl. Edited by the Rev. Prof. A. F. KIRKPATRICK, D.D. In the press.

THE BOOK of DANIEL. Edited by the
Rev. S. R. DRIVER, D.D. 2s. 6d. net. [Nearly ready.]

FROM MR. MURRAY'S LIST OF NEW BOOKS.

THE WORKS of LORD BYRON. A

New Text, Collated with the Original MSS. and Revised Proofs, which are still in existence, with many hitherto unpublished Additions. This will be the most complete edition of Lord Byron's Works, as no other editors have had access to the original MSS. With Portraits and Illustrations. To be completed in 12 vols. Crown 8vo, 6s. each.

POETRY.

Edited by ERNEST HART-
LEY COLERIDGE.

Vol. I. The Early Poems.

Vol. II. Child Harold.

Vol. III. The Giaour.

Vol. IV. Prisoner of

Chillon, Manfred, Beppo, Ma-zetta, Vision of Judgment, Marino Faliero,

&c., &c.

[In the press.]

LETTERS.

Edited by ROWLAND E.
PROSEMER.

Vol. I. 1788 to 1811.

Vol. II. 1811 to 1814.

Vol. III. 1814 to 1816.

Vol. IV. 1816 to 1820.

Vol. V. 1820 to 1822.

[In progress.]

A POPULAR EDITION.

THE ORIGIN of SPECIES by MEANS of NATURAL SELECTION. By CHARLES DARWIN, M.A., LL.D., F.R.S. With a Photogravure Portrait of the Author. Large crown 8vo, 2s. 6d. net. [Just published.]

THE LIFE of Sir JOHN FOWLER,
BART., K.C.M.G. A Record of Engineering
Work, 1834-1893. By THOMAS MACKAY.
With Portraits and many Illustrations. Demy
8vo, 16s. [Just published.]

A HERO OF TIARH.

LIEUT.-COL. JOHN HAUGHTON,
Commandant of the 36th Sikhs. A Memoir by Major A. C. YATE, 2nd (Duke of Connaught's Own) Baluch Battalion; F.R.G.S.; Author of
"England and Russia Face to Face in Asia," &c.
With Portraits and many Illustrations. Demy
8vo, 12s. net. [Ready shortly.]

CHINA AND HER COMMERCE.

From the Earliest Times to the Present Day.
By E. H. PARKER, Consul-General in Corea,
1886-7; Consul-General in Kiang Chow, 1891; &c.,
&c. With 19 Maps. Crown 8vo. [Ready shortly.]

THE LAND of the LONG NIGHT.

By PAUL DU CHAILLU, Author of "The Viking Age," "Ivar the Viking," "The Land of the Midnight Sun," "Exploration in Equatorial Africa," &c. Illustrated by M. J. Burns.
Crown 8vo, 7s. 6d. [Just published.]

LORD MONBODDO, and some of

His Contemporaries. By Professor KNIGHT, of St. Andrew's, Author of "A Life of Wordsworth," "The Philosophy of the Beautiful," &c.
With Portraits. Demy 8vo, 16s. [Next week.]

IN TUSCANY. Tuscan Towns—

Tuscan Types—The Tuscan Tongue, &c., &c.
By MONTGOMERY CARMICHAEL, British
Vice-Consul for West Tuscany. Large crown 8vo.
[Ready shortly.]

THE COMPLETE AUTHORITATIVE EDITION OF

GEORGE BORROW'S WORKS.

Large crown 8vo, 6s. each.

THE GYPSIES of SPAIN. Their Manners, Customs, Religion, and Language.

[Nearly ready.]

WILD WALES. With a Photo-gravure and 12 Illustrations. By A. S. HARRICK.

[In preparation.]

A NEW WORK by the Rev. CHARLES GORE,
M.A., D.D., Canon of Westminster.

THE BREAKING of the BREAD.

A Study of the Institution and Doctrine of the Holy Communion. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.
[Ready shortly.]

JOHN MURRAY, Albemarle Street, W.

NOVELS.

MARY E. WILKINS.

THE HEART'S HIGHWAY. A

Romance of Virginia in the Seventeenth Century.
By MARY E. WILKINS. With a Frontispiece by F. M. Du Mond. Large crown 8vo, 6s.
[Just published.]

LEONARD MERRICK.

THE WORLDLINGS. By Leonard

MERRICK, Author of "The Actor Manager,"
"One Man's View," &c. Large crown 8vo, 6s.
[Just published.]

HORACE ANNESLEY VACHELL.

JOHN CHARITY. A Tale of the Early Part of Her Majesty's Reign. By HORACE ANNESLEY VACHELL, Author of "The Procession of Life," &c. Large crown 8vo, 6s.

[Just published.]

ARTHUR H. NORWAY.

PARSON PETER. By Arthur H.

NORWAY. Large crown 8vo, 6s.
[Next week.]

THE Hon. Mrs. WALTER FORBES.

A GENTLEMAN. By the Honourable Mrs. WALTER FORBES, Author of "Flight." Large crown 8vo, 6s.

[Ready immediately.]

ARTHUR HENRY.

A PRINCESS of ARCADY. By

ARTHUR HENRY. Crown 8vo, 6s.
[Ready immediately.]

JOEL CHANDLER HARRIS

("Uncle Remus").

ON the WING of OCCASIONS.

Stories of the Secret Service in America during the War of 1860-1. By JOEL CHANDLER
HARRIS, the Author of "Uncle Remus." Crown
8vo, 6s. [Ready immediately.]

LILLIAS HAMILTON, M.D.

A VIZIER'S DAUGHTER. A Tale of the Hazara War. By LILLIAS HAMILTON,

M.D., some time Medical Adviser to Abdur
Rahman, Amir of Afghanistan. With Illustrations. Crown 8vo, 6s. [Ready immediately.]

PARIS OF TO DAY.

THE LIFE of PARIS. By Richard

WHITING, Author of "No. 5, John Street."
Crown 8vo, 6s. [Ready immediately.]

A NEW STORY FOUNDED ON FACT.

A SEA KING'S MIDSHIPMAN. An

Episode in the Life of the famous Lord Cochrane
(afterwards Lord Dundonald). By A. LEE
KNIGHT. With 12 Illustrations by Monro
Orr. Crown 8vo, 6s. [Ready shortly.]

A CENTURY of our SEA STORY.

By WALTER JEFFERY, Author of "The King's Yard," &c. With a Photogravure Frontispiece.
Crown 8vo, 6s. [Ready shortly.]

CHRISTMAS in FRENCH CANADA.

By LOUIS FRECHETTE. With Illustrations by Frederick Simpson Colburn. Large crown 8vo, 6s.

This volume, by an author whose name is familiar to everyone acquainted with the best Canadian literature of to-day, affords a charming insight into some of the old Christmas customs and traditions of the Dominion. [Ready shortly.]

A. & C. BLACK'S LIST

NOW READY.

In 2 vols., square demy 8vo, cloth, price £2 2s. net.

THE VENETIAN REPUBLIC.

Its Rise, its Growth, and its Fall,
421-1797.

By W. CAREW HAZLITT.

Mr. Carew Hazlitt's volumes are the only complete history in English of the once great and famous Venetian Republic. In 1860 the author brought out a book which was recognised as the standard work on the subject, but in the forty years which have since elapsed, such vast stores of additional information have been made accessible, that the present book is,
to a large extent, not only rewritten, but rearranged, while the narrative is carried down to the close of the independent government, and a series of chapters illustrating social institutions has been introduced.

A TREATISE on ZOOLOGY.

By E. RAY LANKESTER, M.A., LL.D., F.R.S.,
Hon. Fellow of Exeter College, Oxford; Director of the Natural History Departments of the British Museum; Fullerian Professor of Physiology and Comparative Anatomy in the Royal Institution of London. Profusely Illustrated. To be completed in Ten Parts.

NOW READY.

Part II. THE PORIFERA and COELENTERA. By E. A. MINCHIN, G. H.

FOWLER, B.A., Ph.D., and GILBERT G.
BOURNE, M.A. Part III. THE ECHINO-DERMA. By F. A. BATHER, M.A., assisted by
J. W. GREGORY, D.Sc., and E. S. GOODRICH,
M.A. Demy 8vo, paper covers, price 12s. 6d. net each; cloth, price 15s. net each.

"It is marked by three characteristics, which, indeed, may be regarded as now indispensable to any scientific work of value—perfect lucidity in the illustrations, which are numerous, and, of course, specially drawn by, or under the direction of, the author; a careful exposition of the historical development of life-forms; and complete bibliographies on each branch of the subject."—Literature.

NOW READY.

Crown 8vo, cloth, price 10s. 6d.

HANDBOOK to CHRISTIAN

AND

ECCLESIASTICAL ROME.

Part III. and IV. in One Volume. By M. A. R.
TUKER and HOPE MALLESON. Part III.
MONASTICISM in ROME. Part IV. ECCLE-SIASICAL ROME. Containing Illustrations of the Badges of Monastic Orders, Plan and View of a Monastery, Plan of the Vatican, Arms of 83
Popes, and 9 Coloured Pages of Monastic Orders and Habits.

"Messrs. Taker and Malleson have brought together into some 300 pages an enormous quantity of information, always pertinent and interesting, about Mono-asticism—Monks, Friars, Canons, Sisters of Charity, &c.—and their 'Ecclesiastical' section, which treats of the Pope, Papal Ceremonies, Papal Palaces, Cardinals and Orders, major and minor, is nearly as ample."

Literary World.

"Contains a compilation of facts which will be most useful to visitors and others who are desirous of making some acquaintance with the religious institutions of modern Rome."—The Pilot.

NOW READY.

In 1 vol., large crown 8vo, containing 151 Illustrations, price 7s. 6d. net.

STUDIES in FOSSIL BOTANY

By DUKINFIELD HENRY SCOTT, M.A.,
Ph.D., F.R.S., F.L.S., F.G.S., Honorary Keeper of the Jodrell Laboratory, Royal Gardens, Kew; Author of "An Introduction to Structural Botany."

"An excellent book.....To the botanist it will appear as a thoroughly sound and scientific piece of exposition, which is a considerable contribution to a recent and important branch of the subject."

The Spectator.

NOW READY.

Crown 8vo, price 1s., in paper covers.

MUNICIPAL LONDON, 1900.

By C. A. WHITMORE, M.P.

"An exceedingly useful shilling handbook."

Daily Graphic.
"Very welcome because interesting and useful."
Globe.

ADAM & CHARLES BLACK,
Soho Square, London.

The Academy

A Weekly Review of Literature and Life.

No. 1484. Established 1869.

13 October, 1900.

Price Threepence.

[Registered as a Newspaper.]

The Literary Week.

THE new House of Commons is not yet complete, but glancing over the biographies of those members who have been already returned, particularly the miniature biographies in the Pall Mall Gazette, always smart, and often witty, we have been struck by the number of members who have a connexion, of some sort, with literature or journalism. The list includes :

Mr. John Morley, Mr. Lecky, Mr. James Bryce, Mr. A. J. Balfour, Sir R. C. Jebb, Mr. Gilbert Parker.
Hon. L. Walter Rothschild. Articles on Zoology.
Sir J. Gorst. Edited a New Zealand Paper.
Sir Michael Foster. Text-Book of Physiology.
Mr. George Wyndham. Edited North's Plutarch, Shakespeare's Poems, &c.
Hon. H. D. Elliot. Editor of Edinburgh Review.
Sir W. R. Anson. Law and Custom of the English Constitution, &c.
Sir Charles Dilke. Proprietor Athenaeum, &c.
Mr. L. Harmsworth. Daily Mail, &c.
Mr. Henniker Heaton. Newspaper proprietor (Australia).
Mr. J. Tully. Editor Roscommon Herald.
Mr. P. M. Thornton. The Stuart Dynasty, &c.
Mr. F. W. Horner. Editor Whitehall Review.
Mr. W. R. W. Peel. War correspondent Græco-Turkish War (Daily Telegraph).
Mr. Henry Labouchere. Truth, &c.
Mr. J. C. Rickett. The Christ That Is To Be, &c.
Sir George Newnes. Westminster Gazette, Tit-Bits, &c.
Mr. Henry Norman. The Peoples and Politics of the Far East, &c.
Sir M. M. Bhowaggree. Translated Leaves from the Journal of our Life in the Highlands into Gujarati.
Dr. T. J. Macnamara. Editor of the Schoolmaster.
Mr. G. M. Brown. Edinburgh publisher.
Sir L. McIver. Contributor to Imperial Gazetteer of India.
Sir W. Pearson. Proprietor Sunday Sun.
Sir H. Seymour King. Proprietor Homeward and Overland Mails.
Sir C. McArthur. The Evidences of Natural Religion.
Mr. T. P. O'Connor. M. A. P., &c., &c.
Mr. W. R. Cremer. Editor Arbitrator.
Mr. Winston Churchill. War Correspondent. The River War, &c.
Mr. James O'Connor. Was connected with the Fenian organ, the Irish People.
Sir J. Kennaway. On Sherman's Track.
Hon. J. W. E. Scott-Montagu. Times' Correspondent in Matabele War.
Sir F. D. Dixon-Hartland. Genealogical and Chronological History of the Royal Houses of Europe.
Sir John Leng. America in 1876.
Mr. W. L. A. Burdett-Connors. Correspondent of the Times.
Mr. H. C. Cust. Ex-Editor Pall Mall Gazette.
Mr. William Allau. A Book of Poems, &c.
Mr. Murray Guthrie. Founded The Granta.
Mr. S. Buxton. Handbook to Politics.
Mr. T. R. Dewar. A Ramble Round the Globe.

MR. LESLIE STEPHEN will contribute to the forthcoming issue of the Agnostic Annual a paper on "The Triumph of Rationalism."

THE publication of children's books, and books for Christmas presents, has begun early this year. We have already received enough volumes to cover the walls of a roomy nursery.

THERE is not the slightest foundation for the report, published in several newspapers, that Mr. Henry James intends ceasing to reside in this country.

THE books that are sent to a literary paper for review are obviously as varied as the faces of their writers; but not often are we greeted by such a mixture of titles as those belonging to the books mentioned below, which happen at this moment to lie in a group upon our table :

History of the Devil. Illustrated.

Mary's Menagerie. Illustrated.

The Bible True from the Beginning. Vol. VII.

Dr. Johnson's Table Talk.

Atlantis: The Book of the Angels. Illustrated.

The Resurrection of Peter. By Princess Catherine Radziwill.

The Lively City o' Legg. Illustrated.

WE wish that all the letters we receive could be answered as easily as this inquiry: "DEAR SIR,—I notice that in writings on book illustrations distinction is often drawn between wood-engravings and wood-cuts. Will you kindly get one of your experts to explain the difference to one who is—PUZZLED?"

There is none.

CHAUCER has waited five hundred years to be honoured by that City of London of which he was a citizen and officer. A bust of him is to be placed in the Guildhall. In Southwark more elaborate honour is to be done to the poet of the Tabard. A memorial window, picturing the Canterbury Pilgrims starting from that inn for the shrine of St. Thomas of Canterbury, will be unveiled by Mr. Alfred Austin in St. Saviour's Collegiate Church on October 25th, which day will be the 500th anniversary of Chaucer's death. Little by little this noble church is gathering literary associations—or rather, these are increasingly recognised. The bones of John Gower lie here, and his tomb bears his own quaint lines :

En toy qui est Fitz de Dien le Père, Sauvé soit qui gist sous cest pierre.

Here, too, are buried the poet Dyer and John Fletcher and Philip Massinger; and here is the nameless tomb on which are the lines often attributed to Quarles :

Like to the damask rose you see,
Or like the blossom on the tree,

Even so is Man; Man's thread is spun,
Drawn out, and cut, and so is done.

Four more memorial windows are proposed, each celebrating the connexion of a great man with the church and parish; one to Gower, one to Johnson, one to Goldsmith, and one to Sacheverell.

WHATEVER monuments may be raised to the memory of John Ruskin, the block of Borrowdale stone, which was placed last Saturday on Friar's Crag, is likely to be, in some respects, the most interesting. Standing in the midst of scenery he loved, it stands also on the spot where Ruskin's consciousness of Nature may be said to have begun. "The first thing I remember as an event in life was being taken by my nurse to the brow of Friar's Crag, Derwentwater." That there may be no mistake, these words are incised on the stone which, however, bears, as its principal inscription, this from Deucalion :

The spirit of God is around you in the air you breathe — His glory in the light you see, and in the fruitfulness of the earth and the joy of His creatures. He has written for you day by day His revelation, and He has granted you day by day your daily bread.

On the opposite side of the monolith, facing the lake view which Ruskin described as "one of the three most beautiful scenes in Europe," is a bronze medallion, by Signor Lucchési, representing Ruskin in his prime. The head is in profile and in high relief; a crown of olive is seen in the background over the head, and among its leaves is introduced Ruskin's motto: "To-Day." The inauguration of this finely conceived memorial was as simple as we could wish. The unveiling was done by Mrs. Severn.

THE picture of this monolith, so gloriously placed and envired, yet so devoid of unreal or insincere pomp, reminds us—by mere association—of a splendid passage in Flaubert's Par les Champs et par les Grèves, on the tomb of Chateaubriand. We are tempted to quote it for the sake of its suggestive bearing on the Lakeland stone :

There he will sleep, his head turned to the west, in the tomb built on a cliff, his immortality will be like his life, deserted of all and surrounded by storms. The waves with the centuries will long murmur round this great monument; they will spring to his feet in the tempests, or in the summer mornings, when the white sails are spread and the swallow comes from beyond the seas, loving and gentle, they will bring him the voluptuous melancholy of distances, and the caress of the open air. And the days thus slipping by, while the billows of his native beach shall be for ever swinging between his birthplace and his tomb, the heart of René, cold at last, will slowly crumble into nothingness to the endless rhythm of that eternal music.

EVERY week we seem to chronicle the birth of a new paper. The latest is Talent, of which the first number appeared on Wednesday. The editor is Mr. Edwin Drew, the periodicity is once a month; and the price is three-pence. The editor's bow is a deep one. Here is part of it :

I take "Talent" in a rather broad aspect. I do not confine my attention to the Drama and the Platform. I add the open air, and in all conscience that is fairly universal. I add Art, Literature, Lecturing, Conversation, Music, &c., though over it all is the dominating idea that the noble and picturesque monosyllable "Art" embraces the lot.

From the rest we cull these flowers :

My prayer, in taking up this pen to write you a letter, is that I may lessen the thorns and multiply the roses in life's path. The mission of Art is to every soul.

Perhaps I am a bit eccentric.

We imagine that any man who starts a new magazine is "a bit eccentric." We wish Mr. Drew success.

WHEN Ouida writes on literature it is not with surprise that one finds Mr. Andrew Lang writing on Ouida. He has done so this week, in the Daily News, and with the playfulness that scathes :

She wants to know why so many bad books are published, and we presume that the answer is simple. Many foolish persons pay for the publication of their own books, and some publishers find it profitable to gratify the vanity of these feeble folk. "Man," says Ouida, "is a ravenous and insatiable brute," and such a fellow will even publish novels at his own expense. We regret that it is so . . . ; but, with her theory of human nature, she should not be surprised that all authors are not on a level with the author of A Dog of Flanders. Why, she asks, do shilling novels appear, later, in cheap editions? Well, to suit a less opulent class of readers, we presume. And the reason why novels do not appear in paper covers, as in placid and philosophic France, is that the public does not like to be at the trouble of having them bound. This may be contemptible, or even ferocious and brutal, but such is life.

Cruel, too—having regard to Ouida's foreign sympathies—is this: "Ouida thinks that 'some unwritten law should prescribe and limit the license of [English] caricature.' We interpolate 'English,' as probably French caricature needs no discipline."

Greybeards at Play, issued this week by Mr. R. Brimley Johnson, is ostensibly a children's book, but there is a good deal of pleasing satire lying round loose in it; and the nonsense is of a kind that we enjoy. The author, Mr. Gilbert Chesterton, dedicates his pages to "E. C. B.," in a poem which begins touchingly :

He was, through boyhood's storm and shower,
My best, my nearest friend;
We wore one hat, smoked one cigar,
One standing at each end.

And the inversion is pleasing which gives us :

Far, far behind are morbid horrors,
And lonely hearts that bleed.
Far, far behind us are the days
When we were old indeed.

TURNING to the book itself, we like Mr. Chesterton's natural history :

I know the strange tale of the Slug;
The Early Sin—the Fall—
The Sleep—the Vision—and the Vow—
The Quest—the Crown—the Call.

The verses on "The Disastrous Spread of Æstheticism in All Classes" are of a distinctly Gilbertian flavour, but there is something more than this in the "Envoy," wherein the Greybeard author interviews a little child :

I looked into his awful eyes:
I waited his decree:
I made ingenious attempts
To sit upon his knee.
The babe upraised his wondering eyes,
And timidly he said,
"A trend towards experiment
In modern minds is bred.
"I feel the will to roam, to learn
By test, experience, nous,
That fire is hot and ocean deep,
And wolves carnivorous.
"My brain demands complexity."
The lisping cherub cried.
I looked at him, and only said,
"Go on. The world is wide."
A tear rolled down his pinafore—
"Yet from my life must pass
The simple love of sun and moon,
The old games in the grass;
"Now that my back is to my home
Could these again be found?"
I looked on him, and only said,
"Go on. The world is round."

THERE are many ways of approaching an editor, and one of them is to get him to mistake you for a namesake of proved literary ability. It is a method, however, that is best left to chance. Mr. Alfred Church has been telling in the Critic how he became a regular contributor to the Spectator through Mr. Hutton mistaking him for R. W. Church, afterwards Dean of St. Paul's. In the same article Mr. Church relates how Hutton himself became connected with the paper. He had taught mathematics and written stray articles when in 1861 came his opportunity:

Early in that year, Mr. Meredith Townsend, who had for some years been editor of the Friend of India, returned to England, and purchased the Spectator. This journal (first issued in July, 1828) had had a time of prosperity, but was then in an almost moribund condition. For about six months Mr. Townsend "ran" it alone. This he found exhausting work, and looked out for help. Mr. Hutton, introduced by a mutual friend, called at the office, and an agreement was arrived at. As he was going away, Mr. Townsend called after him: "Have you any money?" Hutton explained that he could find some. A joint proprietorship was then arranged, with a clause in the deed which gave the original owner the final voice in any matter where there might be a persistent difference of opinion.

Mr. Church concludes his recollections of the partnership thus formed as follows:

The two editors had each an easily distinguishable style of his own. Mr. Townsend's sentences are short, clear, incisive. Mr. Hutton's, to borrow the language of a writer in the Pall Mall Gazette, "went tottering on, bent double under all their burden of thought." And yet, when one or other was on his annual holiday, no one could detect which hand had ceased to contribute.

A triumph of editing.

THE ordinary contributor, who has no clever namesake with whom he may be beneficially confused, must adopt more prosaic methods. Unfortunately he is rarely very happy in his choice, and there is therefore some point in the mock-serious advice tendered him by the editor of an American magazine, who is evidently a little embittered. Among his maxims are these:

Write and ask him if you may call to talk over literary projects with him. That will oblige him to dictate a polite note saying that you may.

Begin the interview by saying that you have not thought of any subject to treat of yourself, but you hope that he may have something that he wants written up. It is well to add that it is almost impossible to get ideas, as all the articles seem to have been written already. Being in hourly dread of turning down a future genius, he will labour patiently to make you betray a spark of ability.

Explain to him how you came to take up literary work, setting forth at length your financial difficulties. He is paid by the week, so his time is not important to him.

Ask him if he knows that his magazine printed a portrait of Li Hung Chang over the title of Mrs. Burke-Roche several months before. He has already received ten thousand letters on the subject, but will no doubt be glad to explain for the ten thousand and first time just how it happened.

As you rise to go (if you ever do) produce a MS. poem and ask him to write you frankly what he thinks of it. Do not leave a stamp; he will gladly pay two cents to get it taken away.

Explain that you have never happened to read his magazine, but are going home to do so at once, in order to see just what sort of things he wants. Cheered by this sign of intelligence on your part, he will doubtless present you with a copy.

MR. CHARLES FERET still disputes our criticism on his work, Fulham Old and New, that it is somewhat lacking in clear typographical guidance. We did not say this idly, or captiously, and we cannot recall the remark. But we willingly print Mr. Feret's defence:

I maintain that there is not a particle of ground for your statement that Fulham Old and New is wanting in clear typographical guidance. Each side-heading, which is printed in heavy type, governs the text down to the next side-heading. No arrangement could well be clearer. Where two or more names describe a site or a building, or a building which in course of years may have been rebuilt and been known by sundry names, such appellations are given in the side-headings which are placed at the commencement of the account. Take your reviewer's quotation of one of these side-headings—viz., "Brightwell's—Parson's Green House—Villa Carey—Peterborough House." Now, these names applied to a particular site or to successive buildings on such site, and, as such, are collectively dealt with. I have given the history of this estate, covering a period of five centuries, and I have, of course, introduced, in the text, the names in the order in which they obtained currency. True, I have not given the actual years in which one name died out and another came in for the all-sufficient reason that it is not possible to supply such facts. The text, however, clearly shows the periods during which each name was in general use, while, as I have already stated, the side-headings further give the reader the names in correct historical sequence. Added to all this there is a voluminous index, which will, in a moment, refer a searcher to any name of place or person which he may want. What more is needed in the way of guiding the reader it is difficult to conceive.

SOME interesting information concerning the library which the late Mr. Henry Spencer Ashbee bequeathed to the British Museum is given by the Daily Chronicle. A City man, fervent in business, Mr. Ashbee was also an ideal book-collector, a keen antiquary, and a traveller who had literally surveyed mankind from China to Peru. That he was rich goes without saying. His tastes and wealth were both reflected in his splendid library, containing many thousands of books, every one of which was worthily bound. His speciality was editions of Don Quixote, of which he had a noble collection. They are described in his Iconography of Don Quixote literature, published in 1895. Extra-illustration he did not despise and a grangerised copy of Nichols's Literary Anecdotes which he constructed was extended from nine to thirty-four volumes by the addition of more than 5,000 portraits, views, &c.

THE probable value of Mr. Ashbee's bequest to the British Museum is assessed in these general terms by the well-informed Chronicle writer:

So far as the British Museum is concerned, the great value of the Ashbee library will lie in the section of French books, printed chiefly in small numbers for the members of several short-lived "bibliophile" clubs. These books rarely appear in the market, and the funds of the British Museum do not allow the authorities to indulge in "luxuries." Now, however, Mr. Ashbee's bequest renders the Museum not only complete in this respect, but far ahead of any other public library. Not only this, but Mr. Ashbee had several of these exquisitely-produced books specially illustrated, commissioning eminent French book-illustrators to execute a given number of drawings in water-colours, &c., and having these original designs bound up with the book which they illustrate. . . . Only a catalogue could do justice to the richness of the Ashbee Bequest, for the "unique" and very rare books may in this collection be numbered by hundreds. Many, of course, are already in the British Museum, and having regard to the congested condition of our national library it seems a pity that the bequest should be tantamount to accepting all or none. But there can be no manner of doubt about the decision of the trustees.

A CORRESPONDENT questions a point of grammar in one of the extracts which we made last week from Mr. Knight's novel, A Son of Austerity. He asks whether it was correct to write:

At the border of the clayfield was a hearse and a single carriage.

We think this was correct. The hearse and the carriage belonged strictly to each other; collectively they were the funeral cortège, and only collectively did they need to be considered. Therefore the singular verb is true to the spirit, while a plural verb would have been only pedantically, and even misleadingly, true to the letter. Exactly the same point has been raised about Mr. Kipling's line in "The Recessional":

The tumult and the shouting dies.

This, oddly enough, is dealt with this month by a writer in Munsey's Magazine, who says:

Mr. Kipling is right. The figure of speech known as "hendiadys" is defined as "the use of two words connected by a copulative conjunction to express a single complex idea." In the verse under discussion "tumult and shouting" might almost have been hyphenated to indicate that the condition expressed was conceived by the poet as a single entity.

Mr. T. FISHER UNWIN has done a logical thing. As a publisher, it is to his interest that books should be written. He has therefore published a pen. It is called the Literary U, and its purpose is to encourage the Literary Ego. Mr. Unwin's retained poet sings:

The new U Pen is quite unique,
It can do everything but speak.
For Christian, Pagan, Turk or Jew
There's but one Pen—and that's the U,
Which quietly without a fuss
Assists the brains of genius;
So smooth the flow of this new pen
The joy of literary men.

We have tried the U and like it.

Bibliographical.

To the making of anthologies, apparently, there is no end. We are threatened with at least four this season. One is Mr. Quiller-Couch's—A Treasury of English Poetry, which is to include verse by living writers. In this work Mr. "Q." must needs traverse again a good deal of the ground he covered in his other collection—The Golden Pomp. Then there is the Treasury of Irish Poetry (poetry written by Irishmen in English) promised us by Mr. Stopford Brooke and Mr. T. W. Rolleston. The appearance of this will be a very effective criticism upon the Book of Irish Verse issued a year or two ago by Mr. W. B. Yeates—an obviously inadequate performance, bound to be speedily superseded. From another editor will come An Old English Anthology, which I take to mean an anthology of Old English verse. To me, I confess, this does not sound promising. As for The Troubadour, which is to see the light through the agency of Messrs. Cassell, I "admire" (as Mr. Lang might say) the taste which could conceive such a title, so alien to the spirit of English poetry.

Great praise and glory to Macmillan & Co., inasmuch as they promise us, in the "Eversley" series, more letters of Edward FitzGerald's, and, in the "Golden Treasury" series, a collection of his Miscellanies, such as "Euphranor," "Polonius," and the like. To do this latter is to do especially well, because for some years past the public has been led to regard FitzGerald as the translator-adaptor of Omar, and that only—except so far as it has been able to approach and appreciate him in his Letters. We have to thank the same firm for also including in the "Golden Treasury" Cicero's discourses on Old Age and Friendship, as translated and edited by Mr. E. S. Shuckburgh, to whom we owe (or shall owe shortly) the Englishing of the whole correspondence of Cicero, in chronological order.

Poor Tennyson! Not only is he about to figure in a series of "Saintly Lives," but a writer (wisely anonymous) announces yet another "critical study" of him, and we have just had a volume on The Mind of Tennyson, of which the title is, I suppose, a sort of echo of the title of Prof. Dowden's well-known book on Shakespeare's "Mind" and Art.

It never rains but it pours. The Rev. J. H. Batt is to bestow upon us a book concerning the late Mr. D. L. Moody. As if that were not sufficient, the Rev. J. W. Chapman is to produce a volume on The Life and Works of D. L. Moody, and a Mr. R. A. Torrey is to distill for us the Lessons from the Life and Death of D. L. Moody. That is pretty well to go on with.

Mr. Frank Murray, publisher, Derby, announces as "nearly ready" a Bibliography of Austin Dobson, "attempted" by "Francis Edwin Murray," who may, or may not, be Mr. Frank Murray himself. There will be fifty large pages, and five hundred ordinary copies for English consumption—ten of the one and fifty of the other being allotted to America (a not extravagant number). Some "Notes for a Bibliography of Austin Dobson" appeared a few years ago in the columns of the Bookman. That Mr. Frank Murray should have been led to make a volume out of the subject speaks eloquently for the popularity of Mr. Dobson—a popularity thoroughly well deserved. If I remember rightly, the writer in the Bookman dealt only with Mr. Dobson's verse; Mr. Murray has extended his labours to Mr. Dobson's prose also.

Do we want another Life of Sir Walter Scott? We are to have one, it seems, from the pen of Mr. W. H. Hudson, hitherto known chiefly as the writer of such books as The Naturalist in La Plata, Birds in a Village, Lost British Birds, Idle Days in Patagonia, and Birds in London. But Mr. Hudson is also the author of a book on Mr. Herbert Spencer's philosophy, and of another on Keats, Clough, and Matthew Arnold (Studies in Interpretation). It is through these, no doubt, that we arrive at this latest study of the "Great Magician."

Centenary celebrations of authors do at least some good: they lead usually to the popularisation of the authors' works. Thus, the recent mild exploitation of James Thomson, of "The Seasons" fame, has been followed by the inclusion of his Poems in the "Canterbury Poets" series, which will present the only cheap edition available. The Aldine edition costs five shillings. I am presuming that the "Canterbury" edition will be "complete."

Miss Olive Birrell has given to her forthcoming novel the title of Lore in a Mist—a pretty title, and "alluring"—possibly new to the world of narrative fiction, but assuredly not new to that of dramatic fiction, inasmuch as it was the name which Mr. Louis Parker gave to a play of his which saw the light some half-dozen years ago.

With reference to the forthcoming new edition of John Heneage Jesse's anecdotal histories and biographies, some of my readers may like to have the dates of their first appearance:—The Court of England during the Reign of the Stuarts (1840), The Court of England from the Revolution to the Death of George II. (1843), George Selwyn and his Contemporaries (1843), The Pretenders and their Adherents (1845), Richard III. and Some of his Contemporaries (1862), The Life and Reign of George III. (1867), and Celebrated Eltonians (1875). I suppose that Jesse's "historical drama on the Battle of Bosworth" will be reproduced with the Richard III. Jesse rather fancied himself as a poet, and published three books of verse; but I doubt if they will ever be reprinted.

There does not appear to be much ground for the production of a new edition of Puckle's Club. The book, me judice, has little literary merit, and it was reprinted so recently as 1890, with the illustrations by Thurston, which first saw the light in 1817. Previously to that, we had the edition of 1831, prefaced by Samuel Weller Singer. First issued in 1711, The Club was reproduced in 1713, 1721, 1723 (revised by the author), 1733, and 1731. Mr. Austin Dobson, its latest editor, has already written about it in the pages of Bibliographica.

THE BOOKWORM.

Reviews.

A Book by Itself.

Thirteen Stories. By R. B. Cunninghame Graham.
(Heinemann. 6s.)

MR. GRAHAM, we may remark, is not a new-comer. To go no further back than last year, we had his Mogreb-el-Aksa, which was published as a book of travel in Morocco, but is treasured by the discerning as a satire on things done in Mayfair and Mincing-lane. The same unfettered wit is abroad in these pages. In Mogreb-el-Aksa there was a constant playing-off of British character against the types of Morocco under a convention of social and political equality as between us and them. It was as though Mr. Graham refused to distinguish between the two humanities except for tricky purposes of his own. But in his new book of South American reminiscences the satire is not only less, it is different. It merges into pathos. The juxtaposition is not that of prosperous judges, clergy, and stockbrokers with prosperous emirs, sheikhs, and cut-throat tribesmen—it is the juxtaposition of the prosperous Briton and Spaniard with the poor Indian, who wavers and sickens when he has looked for a little time into the white man's face. And these dusky fools have a place in Mr. Graham's heart, such as the butcher's son and the boy who drove the milk-cart have in yours, though you may not remember what has happened to them since they bumped you over an orchard wall. Years ago he knew them, and their life, and gathered memories of them from their gay oppressors. His book is steeped in memories; the ache of many nostalgias is in its bones. It is like Mr. Graham to carefully emphasise this in his Preface. He has learned to distrust readers. "Let there be no mistake; the writer and the reader are sworn foes." "Therefore"—after suitable jibes—"why strip the soul stark naked to the public gaze without some hesitation and due interval, by means of which to make folk understand that which you write is what you think you feel; part of yourself, a part, moreover, which once given out can never be recalled?" That is finely, if rather crazily, said. It is, we say, a bit of Mr. Graham's character that he puts a tranquil law of literature as a highly specialised personal grudge. He does the right academic thing, and makes a sore point of it. He writes travel as it ought to be written, and says he has done it in lieu of kicking you for a book-sniffing ingrate. All of which shows how these times do embitter and aride the writer who has something to say, and knows it.

If our design were the vulgar one of winning readers for Mr. Graham we should stir his pot and display his tit-bits; we should inform the reader that "Cruz Alta" is a tale of horse-driving and horse-bargaining between Uruguay and Brazil, with interludes of very mixed dancing and very mixed love-making, and maté drinking in lonely fazendas, and night-chases after runaway horses; we should insist that "The Gold Fish" is a capital story of a Moorish runner's devotion; that "A Hegira" is a story of man-hunting in Mexico second to none in its kind, and that "Victory" and "Rothenberger's Wedding" are very strong meat. But we deem the sentiment of the book more precious than its constructive interests. What a fine welter of minor humanity is here. What little lands and peoples, what skills and traditions, what a coming and going in remotest inns and market-places of lands whose names are hid in gazetteers. The fine thing is that Mr. Graham writes so familiarly and with such heart and with such back-flung irony of these Brazilian, Uruguayan, Paraguayan folk—these lost Gauchos, negroes, cattle-farmers, "China" girls, British wastrels and polygamists, pious horse-copers, sooty missionaries, revolutionists with song and knife equally ready—all that Spanish-negro fringe of humanity, hot of blood and petty of achievement, that litters South America. We are delighted by the zest with which the author's thoughts fly from London to some remote Brazilian town, like flat-roofed, sandy High Cross, stored with hogsheds of sugar and bales of black tobacco from Bahia. Even there they wander speculatively back to old Jesuit days—dim origins and formative politics:

It may be that the Rood set up on high was but a landmark, or again to mark a frontier line against the heathen to the north, or yet it may have been the grave of some Paulista, who in his foray against the Jesuits in Paraguay died here on his return, while driving on before him a herd of converts to become slaves in far San Paulo, to the greater glory of the Lord. All these things may have been, or none of them; but the quiet, sleepy place, the forests with their parrots and macaws, their herds of peccaries, their bands of screaming monkeys, the bright-striped tiger-cats, the armadillos, coatis, capibaras, and gorgeous flaming "seibos," all intertwined by ropes of living cordage of lianas, and the supreme content of all the dwellers in the district with God, themselves, their country, and their lives, still after twenty years is fresh, and stirs me, as the memory of the Pacific stirs a reclaimed "beach-comber" over his grog, and makes him say, "I never should have left them islands, for a man was happy in 'em living on the beach."

And again, at Santa Rosa—reached along a palm-bordered trail, where faith is dead but where the Angelus, "much more important," remains:

To this day, when in our hurried life I dream of peace, my thoughts go back to the old Paraguayan Jesuit "capilla" lost in the woods of Morosomo, Curupay, and Yba-hai, and with its two tall, feathery palm-trees rustling above the desecrated church; to the long strings of white-robed women carrying water-jars, and to the old-world life, perhaps by this time altered and swept away, or yet again not altered, and passing still in the same quiet fashion as when we were there.

Sometimes it is a mere solitude that comes back, but a solitude full of history:

We passed by palm-groves and deserted mandioca patches, reed cottages in ruins, watched the flamingoes fishing in the lake, the alligators lying motionless, and saw an Indian all alone in a dug-out canoe, casting his line as placidly as he had lived before the coming of the Spaniards.

Sometimes it is all history, and crude at that, as in the mouth of Xavier Fernandez, retired slave-dealer and mule-dealer, versed in all points of mules and negroes:

Most graphically did he tell how the last Indians were hunted down with dogs, and in a pantomime he showed how they jumped up and fell when they received the shot, and putting out his tongue and writhing hideously he imitated how they wriggled on the ground, explaining that they were worse to kill than is a tapir, and put his father and the other patriots to much unnecessary pain. And as he talked, the fields, the river and the plain bathed in the sun . . . great lizards drank its rays, flattening themselves upon the stones in ecstacy, humming-birds quivered at the heart of every flower; above the stream the dragon-flies hung poised; only some "infidel" whom the patriots had destroyed seemed wanting, and the landscape looked incomplete without a knot of them in their high feather crowns stealthily stealing round a corner of the woods.

In "A Hegira" we do not merely hear of such killing; we witness it. Three Apache Indians, escaped from prison, are pursued across hundreds of miles of country in rage and deadly fear by a party of heroes to whom the word Apache is as an absolution from courage as from mercy. Town after town, plain after plain, were traversed, and still these three lone figures—a man, his squaw, and a boy—were ahead, and with them a little white dog.

So Monterey became a memory; the Cerro de la Silla last vanishing, when full five leagues upon the road. The dusty plains all white with alkali, the grey-green sage-bushes, the salt and crystal-looking rivers, the Indians bending under burdens, and the women sitting at the cross roads selling tortillas—all now had changed. Through oceans of tall grass, by muddy rivers in which alligators basked, by "bayous," "resacas," and by "bottoms" of alluvial soil, in which grew cotton-woods, black-jack, and post-oak, with gigantic willows; through countless herds of half-wild horses, lighting the landscape with their colours, and through a rolling prairie with vast horizons bounded by faint blue mountain chains, we took our way.

The Indians were starved, yet if they could but reach the tribe they were safe. At last the Santa Rosa chain of mountains rose in front. "I knew that in the mountains the Indians were safe. . . I wished them luck after their legira, planned with such courage, carried out so well, had ended, and they were back amongst the tribe." Alas! this was early reckoning:

Just outside Cruceitas we met a Texan who, as he told us, owned the place, and lived in "kornkewbinage with a native gal," called, as he said, "Pastory," who it appeared of all the females he had ever met was the best hand to bake "tortillers," and whom, had she not been a Catholic, he would have made his wife. All this without a question on our part, and sitting sideways on his horse, scanning the country from the corner of his eye. He told us that he had "had right smart of an Indian trouble here yesterday just about after-noon. Me and my 'vaquerys' were around looking for an estray horse, just six of us, when close to the ranch we popped kermash right upon three red devils, and opened fire at once. I hed a Winchester, and at the first fire tumbled the buck; he fell right in his tracks, and jest as I was taking off his scalp, I'm doggoned if the squaw and the young devil didn't come at us jest like grizzly bars. Wal, yes, killed 'em, o' course, and anyhow the young 'un would have growed up; but the squaw I'm sort of sorry about. I never could bear to kill a squaw, though I've often seen it done. Naow here's the all-firedest thing yer ever heard; jes' as I was turning the bodies over with my foot a little Indian dog flies at us like a 'painter,' the varmint, the condemnedst little bufler I ever struck. I was for shootin' him, but 'Pastory'—that's my 'kornkewbyne'—she up and says it was a shame. Wal, we had to bury them, for dead Injun stinks worse than turkey-buzzard, and the dodgasted little dog is sitting on the grave, 'pears like he's froze, leastwise he hasn't moved since sun-up, when we planted the whole crew."

Of Mr. Graham's philosophy of life, as exhibited once more in these pages, we will say nothing. It lies about casually; it is generous; it is just; and it is full of bias towards the natural man. Failure alone is interesting, not successful generalship, not going to the colonies with a half-crown and returning rich:

But those who fail after a glorious fashion, Raleigh, Cervantes, Chatterton, Camoens, Blake, Claverhouse, Lovelace, Alcibiades, Parnell, and the last unknown deck-hand who, diving overboard after a comrade, sinks without saving him: these interest us, at least they interest those who, cursed with imagination, are thereby doomed themselves to the same failure as their heroes were. The world is to the unimaginative, for them are honours, titles, rank and ample waistbands; foolish phylacteries broad as trade union banners; their own esteem and death to sound of Bible leaves fluttered by sorrowing friends, with the sure hope of waking up immortal in a new world on the same pattern as the world that they have left.

A hatred of all commerce and a love of all courtesy are not the smallest ingredients of our author's philosophy. His is the talk of a mau of the world, who has so completely cleared his mind of ordinary cautions that he is in danger of entertaining a cant of his own. Still, Mr. Graham is one of the wittiest commentators on civilisation, imperialism, and the trading spirit in our midst. And his method—you see his method?—he is not merely caustic; he appeals to the rude man in us all. Rolling a cigarette with an aslant, upward, kindly look, he makes us sigh for the desert and weep for the Indian.

Close-Packed History.

A History of Greece to the Death of Alexander the Great.
By J. B. Bury, M.A. (Macmillan.)

AN independent history of Greece, by one of the most solid and brilliant of living historians, the author of The Later Roman Empire, the editor of Gibbon, is naturally a considerable book. The volume before us will admirably serve a double purpose. It will be, probably for many years, the leading text-book of the sixth form and university student, the peg which will hold together his ethnology, his epigraphy, and his "Hellenic studies," his interpretations of Herodotus, Thucydides, Demosthenes, Aristotle, and his complementary readings in Abbott, Holm, Busolt, Beloch, Duncker, Curtius, and Grote. At the same time it will be for the general reader an adequate exposition of the whole matter, rendered equally instructive and fascinating by Prof. Bury's sound erudition, sane judgment, and thorough command of vigorous and, at times, picturesque English. Among many other merits we are particularly struck by the author's subtle and sympathetic criticism of Athenian politics and personalities, by the skilful use he makes of such stories as that of Pheidippides, treating them neither uncritically as gospel, nor contemptuously as merely idle legend, but scientifically as throwing real light upon the conditions of popular sentiment out of which they arose, and by his wise determination to exclude the special treatment of literature and art, philosophy and religion, except in so far as this can be worked into the general texture of his narrative. "The interspersions," says Prof. Bury, "in a short political history, of a few unconnected chapters dealing, as they must deal, inadequately with art and literature seems useless and inartistic." It is true, and we recall the oases of aridity which such chapters present in many otherwise respectable treatises.

One point in the book we cannot but regret, and that is its extreme compression. This is deliberate. Prof. Bury tells us that while it would have been "natural and certainly easier to allow it to range into several volumes," he thought that compression would produce a more useful book, and therefore undertook "the more laborious task." That it was the more laborious task we feel sure, and only Prof. Bury's lucid and nervous style, and his gift of putting into a few telling sentences the upshot of much investigation, could have enabled him to triumph, as he has triumphed, over the difficulties in the way. And still we are not quite satisfied that the result is the more useful. At the best such closely-packed matter makes exigent reading. The extreme compression sometimes necessitates at least an appearance of dogmatism where the conclusions advanced are, after all, not quite certain, and the student and general reader alike are excluded from the mental benefit to be derived from seeing the pros and cons of difficult problems fully set out by the hand of a master. Then, again, there is, of course, no room for foot-notes. A few terminal pages of references to archaeological and other authorities make the mouth water for more; and in the remembrance of the careful analysis and criticism of the "Sources" for the history of the Byzantine period which Prof. Bury wrote for his Gibbon, the regret that he has not been able to do the same thing here for the Hellenic period is redoubled.

It is, of course, in dealing with the earliest epochs of Greek history, the epochs before Herodotus, or indeed any written texts except Homer, begin to be of service, that a tentative rather than a dogmatic method is essential. In recent years anthropological and archaeological research has thrown a flood of light upon the long period of wide-spread Mediterranean and Aegean civilisation out of which Hellenism, as we know it, slowly grew. Prof. Bury's work is far more up-to-date on this subject than any other Greek history known to us—naturally so, as the evidence is accumulating from day to day. His account of the various types of pre-Mycenæan and Mycenæan culture in Greece, Asia Minor, and the isles; his discussion of the ethnical relations of the Aryan Greeks to the peoples among whom this civilisation was developed, represent the best that is known or conjectured at the present moment upon these difficult questions. How tentative it all is, Prof. Bury himself is well aware.

Prehistoric Greece cannot be treated satisfactorily except by the method of discussion, and in a work like this, since discussion lies outside its scope, a writer can only describe the main features of the culture which excavation has revealed, and state with implied reserve the chief general conclusions which he considers probable as to the correlation of the archaeological evidence with the literary traditions of the Greeks.

An example of the revolution in archaeological knowledge which a turn of the spade may produce is ready to hand. Prof. Bury points out the possibility of much new light to be derived from excavations in Crete. Before his prophecy was printed it was fulfilled. Last winter Mr. A. J. Evans unearthed a magnificent palace at Cnossus, the traditional city of Minos. The discoveries made there sound like the Arabian Nights. Thrones and frescoes have stood untouched for 4,000 years. A great bull, naturalistically modelled in painted plaster, recalls the legend of the Minotaur. The intricate corridors of the palace recall the famous labyrinth. A series of clay tablets, both in hieroglyphic and linear script, appear to contain correspondence and records of the treasure-house. These carry back the history of writing in the Mediterranean at least six centuries beyond all previous records. Unfortunately they are at present untranslatable, for no man knoweth in what tongue they are written. Probably it is a form of that language spoken all round the shores of the Mediterranean before the Aryans came, which appears to be represented by modern Basque and Berber, and which, according to Prof. Rhys, considerably affected the Celtic of these islands. In any case, should it ever be deciphered, one result, among others, will be that Prof. Bury will have to rewrite the first chapter of his history.

His Collected Poems.

The Collected Poems of T. E. Brown. (Macmillan, 7s. 6d.)

CLOSE on the heels of T. E. Brown's Letters, which we reviewed in our issue of September 23, comes his Collected Poems. It is a volume of 736 pages in Messrs. Macmillan's green-cloth, uniform edition of the poets. "Once," records Mr. Irwin, "when I remarked on the omission of Brown's name in an article on 'Minor Poets,' in one of the magazines, he said with a smile, 'Perhaps I am among the major.'" That smile, adds Mr. Irwin, "had just sufficient irony—no more." T. E. Brown is No. 7 in this edition of the poets. His predecessors are Tennyson, Wordsworth, Shelley, Coleridge, Matthew Arnold, and Lowell. The longer narrative poems fill three-fourths of the volume, the remaining quarter comprises Lyrical Poems and Poems of Aspects and Characters.

To a few these poems—racy, rushing, pathetic, ironic, humorous, as the mood took him—have been long familiar; the remnant who love fine poetry have a keen intellectual and emotional pleasure awaiting them. His was a teeming brain; his poems never give the impression of artifice, although it is on record that he was a conscientious literary craftsman, as became the son of a father so fastidious about composition that he would make his son read some fragment of an English classic to him before answering an invitation. Like his own Tom Baynes, Brown favoured the asynartete octosyllable. Turn to the series of "Fo'e's'le Yarns." It is his rollicking mood:

First comes Tom Baynes among these sorted quills,
In asynartete octosyllables.
Methinks you see the "fo'e's'le" squat, the squirt
Nicotian, various interval of shirt,
Enlarged, contract—keen swordsmen, cut and thrust:
Old salt, old rip, old friend, Tom Baynes comes fust.

By way of contrast read that lovely lyric, "My Garden":

A garden is a lovesome thing, God wot!
Rose plot,
Fringed pool,
Ferned grot—
The veriest school
Of peace; and yet the fool
Contentends that God is not—
Not God! in gardens! when the eve is cool?
Nay, but I have a sign;
'Tis very sure God walks in mine.

The note of his poetry, a note which distinguishes and lifts him from the ranks of modern versifiers, is the conviction it produces in the reader that it had to be written. Behind every poem, however slight, the impulse to sing shows. He did not say to himself: "I feel in the mood to write poetry. Now, what shall my subject be?" No! We seem to see him breaking off from another occupation to dig his thought upon paper. At heart he was a patriot, a Manx patriot, with a fierce love for his native island, its people, its customs, its language, its legends—all that thereunto belonged. He had, too, an abounding pity for all things human, and a religion that was half entirely orthodox, and half wholly pantheistic. His verse changes with his mood. Now it is the racy, racing dialogue of "Fo'e's'le Yarns"; now a poem travelling under the cloak of Browning's rugged religiosity; now one breathing the sane, large utterance of Whitman; now a lyric, and now a mourner's cry. Other of his poems go at a run—thus:

Now the beauty of the thing when childher plays is
The terrible wonderful length the days is
Up you jumps, and out in the sun,
And you fancy the day will never be done;
And you're chasin' the bumblees hummin' so cross
In the hot sweet air among the goss,
Or gath'rin' blue-bells, or lookin' for eggs,
Or peltin' the ducks with their yalla legs,
Or a climbin' and nearly breakin' your skulls,
Or a shoutin' for divilment after the gulls,
Or a thinkin' of nothin', but down at the tide
Singin' out for the happy you feel inside.
That's the way with the kids, you know,
And the years do come and the years do go,
And when you look back it's all like a puff,
Happy and over and short enough.

Also he had a good, grim grip of words, and when he was in a mood he could pack them in a sentence with the best—pack them like herrings in a barrel. Mr. Kipling would appreciate this picture of a certain schooner:

So to the jetty gradual she was hauled:
Then one the tiller took,
And chewed, and spat upon his hand, and bawled;
And one the canvas shook
Forth like a mouldy bat; and one, with nods
And smiles, lay on the bowsprit-end, and called
And cursed the Harbour-master by his gods.
And, rotten from the gunwale to the keel,
Rat-riddled, bilge be-stank,
Slime-slobbered, horrible, I saw her reel,
And drag her oozy flank,
And sprawl among the deft young waves, that laughed,
And leapt, and turned in many a sportive wheel,
As she thumped onward with her lumbering draught.

But such passages (and there are many of them) may be regarded as literary exercises in which the capable workman delights to show his strength. It is in his elegiac poems that Brown finds his way to the hearts of those whose appreciation of poetry is emotional rather than artistic. There are many such poems in the book. Here is a little sheaf of them :

Dead !

Dead, say you ? " Yes, the last sweet rose
Is gathered "—Close, O close,
O, gently, gently, very gently close
Her little book of life, and seal it up
To God, who gave, who took—O bitter cup ! O bell !
O folding grave—O mother, it is well—
Yes, it is well. He holds the key
That opens all the mysteries ; and He
Has blessed our children—it is well.

She knelt upon her brother's grave,
My little girl of six years old—
He used to be so good and brave.
The sweetest lamb of all our fold ;
He used to shout, he used to sing,
Of all our tribe the little king—
And so unto the turf her ear she laid,
To hark if still in that dark place he played.

O God to Thee I yield
The gift Thou givest most precious, most divine !
Yet to what field
I must resign
His little feet
That wont to be so fleet,
I muse, " O, joy to think
On what soft brink
Of flood he plucks the daffodils,
On what empurpled hills
He stands, Thy kiss all fresh upon his brow,
And wonders, if his father sees him now !

Best known, and deservedly, of his elegiac poems is the beautiful "Epistola ad Dakyns." A little longer, and differing from it inasmuch that it is the expression of a great sorrow that is past, is the poignant "Aber Stations." In this lament over the death of a child, the grief that palpitates in the written words is so vivid as to be scarce bearable. We quote the "Statio Septima" :

The heavens are very blue
Above the western hill ;
The earth is very still—
I will draw near, and view
The spot
Where he is . . . not.
But O dear cliff, O big, good-natured giant,
I think some delicate dint must still remain
On your broad surface, from the strain
Of limbs so sweetly pliant.
Behold !
The lamb ! the lamb ! fallen from the very rock !
Cold ! cold !
Dead ! dead !
His little head
Rests on the very block

That Braddan trod—
Dear lambs ! twin lambs of God !
Old cliff, such things
Might move some stubborn questionings—
But now I question not—
See, see ! the waterfall
Is robed in rainbows—what !
Our lambs ? My Braddan shall have charge
Of him, and lead him by the marge
Of some bright stream celestial.
Braddan shall be a happy shepherd boy ;
No trouble shall annoy
That soft green pasture—Ah, Murillo, saint !
Kind friend ! that for all sorrowing hearts didst paint
John Baptist and the Lamb—those arms thrown round
That neck ! Forgive me, God, that I have found
Some comfort in this little parable—
It gives me strength to climb the hill,
And humbly so return—
God bless the merry burn !
I have no will
But thine, O God ! I know that Thou art true—
Be blue, O heavens, be blue !
Be still, O earth, be still !

More War Books.

Ian Hamilton's March. By Winston Spencer Churchill.
(Longmans. 6s.)

How We Escaped from Pretoria. By Captain Aylmer
Haldane. (Blackwood. 1s.)

From Aldershot to Pretoria. By W. E. Sellers. (Religious Tract Society.)

Thus, Mr. Churchill's second book on the Boer War, is a continuation of his Morning Post Letters, and describes his various experiences, between the relief of Ladysmith and the fall of Pretoria. It is written with a running pen, by one whose enterprise and good luck was always leading him into adventures, and enabling him to be present at critical moments. In Chapter V. Mr. Churchill is as near death as a man could be, and saved only by the coolness and bravery of a scout ; in Chapter XV. he and the Duke of Marlborough have the joy of being the first two men to tell the prisoners at Pretoria that the British are in the town. One of the features of this campaign is the way special correspondents have taken certain generals under their wing. Now it is Lieutenant-General Ian Hamilton's turn. The book is mainly an enthusiastic account of his fine march on the flank of Lord Roberts's main army from Bloemfontein to Pretoria. On that march ten general actions and fourteen smaller affairs were fought, and five towns were captured. After the fall of Johannesburg Mr. Churchill had an interview with Lord Roberts. Here is a pen picture of "Bobs" :

His eye twinkled. I have never seen a man before with such extraordinary eyes. I remember to have been struck with them on several occasions. The face remains perfectly motionless, but the eyes convey the strongest emotions. Sometimes they blaze with anger, and you see hot yellow fire behind them. Then it is best to speak up straight and clear, and make an end quickly. At others there is a steel grey glitter—quite cold and uncompromising—which has a most sobering effect on anyone who sees it.

And here is a passage that brings home the danger that Lord Roberts faced to win :

I cannot end this letter without recalling for one moment the grave risks Lord Roberts bravely faced in order to strike the decisive blow and seize Pretoria. When he decided to advance from Vereeniging without waiting for more supplies, and so profit by the enemy's disorder, he played for a great stake. He won, and it is very easy now to forget the adverse chances. But the facts stand out in glaring outline : that if the Boers had defended Pretoria with their forts and guns they could have checked us for several weeks ; and if, while we were trying to push our investment, the line had been cut behind us, as it has since been cut, nothing would have remained but starvation or an immediate retreat on Johannesburg, perhaps on the Vaal.

The volume also contains a vivid account by Lieutenant H. Frankland of his experiences while prisoner of war at Pretoria.

Captain Haldane was a fellow-prisoner of Mr. Winston Churchill at Pretoria when that war correspondent made his successful escape from the Model School at Pretoria. He tells us :

In order to conceal the sudden departure of the special war correspondent of the Morning Post, and obtain for him as long a start as possible, we made up a dummy figure which, placed in his bed, had such a natural appearance that early on the morning of the 13th it was invited to accept a cup of coffee by a soldier servant.

The ruse served its brief purpose. Captain Haldane's own escape, in company with two others, was no such sudden dash for liberty, but a long game of patience. They led their gaolers to believe they had broken out, while they were really in hiding under the floor of the gymnasium. There they remained, moving on hands and knees, bumping heads, restraining coughs and sneezes, and receiving food from above. After eighteen days of intolerable life under the floor the adventurers had the unspeakable satisfaction of learning that a general removal of prisoners from the gaol, a step on which they had been calculating, was about to take place. They heard the commandant go his last round, and the last sentry quit his post. Escape was then comparatively easy. The story is told very briskly, and is a notable addition to the annals of prison escapes. Captain Haldane's companions were Lieut. Le Mesurier, of the Dublin Fusiliers, and Lieut. Brockie, of the Natal Carabineers. The story is issued in paper covers, and is the best shilling's-worth of Boer war adventure we have seen.

Mr. Sellers has written this record of Christian work among our troops in South Africa, and of soldierly godliness, at the instance of the Religious Tract Society; and has compiled it from reports received from chaplains at the front. The most interesting page in the book is that on which appears the "Short Prayer for the Use of Soldiers in the Field," which the Primate of Ireland composed, and which—acting on no precedent that can be found in the annals of the British Army—Lord Roberts circulated among the troops with an expression of his hope that they would find it helpful. This is the prayer:

Almighty Father, I have often sinned against Thee.
O wash me in the precious blood of the Lamb of God.
Fill me with Thy Holy Spirit, that I may lead a new life.
Spare me to see again those whom I love at home, or fit me for Thy presence in peace.

Strengthen us to quit ourselves like men in our right and just cause. Keep us faithful unto death, calm in danger, patient in suffering, merciful as well as brave, true to our Queen, our country, and our colours.

If it be Thy will, enable us to win victory for England, and, above all, grant us the better victory over temptation and sin, over life and death, that we may be more than conquerors through Him that loved us, and laid down His life for us, Jesus our Saviour, the Captain of the Army of God. Amen.

The Little Touches.

A Master of Craft. By W. W. Jacobs. (Methuen. 6s.)

GRADUALLY, but surely, as Mr. Jacobs adds to his slender supply of stories, there is coming to be a Jacobs world—as definite a Jacobs world (though infinitesimal by comparison) as that which we call the Dickens world. Its boundaries are on the west the Pool of London, and on the east certain sleepy riverside villages in Essex and Suffolk; and its inhabitants are simple-minded elderly mariners, simple-minded comfortable old ladies, simple-minded irascible skippers of amatory disposition, sardonic irascible mates, ironical crews, very sharp boys and pert maidens. Of such is the Jacobs world composed. It is a world not only of simple folk, but of a non-resisting folk. In the Jacobs world to see a pretty girl is to fall in love with her, to see a public-house is to go inside it and probably drink too much, to see something provocative of sarcasm is to be sarcastic, and to disapprove angrily is to fight with fists. Whether the Thames is really populated in this way we do not know, and probably Mr. Jacobs has no critics among literary men that do know. Personally we have our misgivings; we are disposed to think that an idealist has been at work. If not, why we would struggle to be supercargo on a coaster to-morrow.

After all, fidelity to every fact matters very little, provided there is fidelity to some important ones; and when a humorist like Mr. Jacobs offers a representation of life it is, of course, life so specially selected to please his own whimsical taste, as to be very unlike life as we know it. The people are right, their behaviour is right, the accessories are right; but there is too much laughter to the square inch. Yet there are signs in this book that Mr. Jacobs could write a very faithful novel if he permitted himself. For ourselves we hope that he will never do it; the other thing is too good. But he has the power. The Wheeler family is done so well, Miss Poppy Tyrell is done so well, the mate Fraser, within certain limits, is done so well, and the atmosphere of Poplar and Seabridge is done so well.

Mr. Jacobs has two great gifts: one is the power to place a simple-minded man in a corner, excite our sympathies for him, magnify his embarrassments, and keep us engrossed all the time. To do this the author requires no violences, no black passions, no supernatural happenings, such as other novelists find so useful. If he is interested in the fracture of any commandment it is the tenth, in its application to handmaidens and wives; but he can be independent even of this. With very unusual and masterly skill in making the most of a normal difficulty of quiet life, Mr. Jacobs can hold a reader in as firm a grip as if he dealt exclusively with blood and mystery, and give the reader a much better time. It is this power that makes for the enthralling interest of A Master of Craft, which, though it is the record merely of the escapades of a too affectionate skipper who was engaged to three women at once, is no more to be set aside than Gaboriau's finest detective mosaic.

But we do not consider that herein lies Mr. Jacobs's special distinction. After all, the construction of a story can, to a certain extent, be acquired, and to make the most of amatory embroilments is within the power of any farce writer. It is in his eye for character, his knowledge of a certain kind of human nature, his genius for the little touches, as we prefer to call them, that Mr. Jacobs stands out so notably. No one now writing can manage the little touches as Mr. Jacobs can, at once so naturally, so truthfully, so usefully, and so joyously. By little touches we mean such generous gratuities from Mr. Jacobs's store as these which follow, all of which might have been omitted by a less patient and conscientious writer. None of them actually helps the plot, but every one of them is so much added to the characters and conditions of the story. Without them, we mean, Captain Fowler's troubles would not be a whit less acute or his story a whit less engrossing.

[On the morning of the wedding] ladies with pins in their mouths wandered about restlessly until coming into the orbit of one of the brides they stuck one or two into her, and then drew back to watch the effect.

Captain Barber came out of church with a buzzing in his ears and a mist before his eyes. Something was clinging to his arm, which he tried several times to shake off. Then he discovered that it was Mrs. Barber.

He had to go over his adventures again and again, Captain Barber causing much inconvenience and delay at supper time by using the beer-jug to represent the Golden Cloud, and a dish of hot sausages the unknown craft which sank her. Flower was uncertain which to admire most—the tactful way in which Mrs. Barber rescued the sausages or the readiness with which his uncle pushed a plate over a fresh stain on the table-cloth.

Mr. Jacobs also has a true humorist's appreciation of surprise. Speaking of his captain's betrothed, Joe says: "She's that sort o' young lady that if she come up now and told me to jump overboard, I'd do it." "You could swim ashore easy," assented Mr. Green.

We trust that Mr. Jacobs will never permit the importunities of his public to deprive him of the gift of patience, which is at the back of his admirable quiet humour.

An All-Round Mountaineer.

Among the Himalayas. By Major L. A. Waddell. Second Edition. (Constable. 6s.)

"IN a hundred ages of the gods I could not tell you of all the glories of the Himalaya," cried an old Sanskrit singer. He would have been amazed to see what has been accomplished by Major Waddell—to whom we owe the quotation—within the limits of a single volume. In spite of the many bold spirits who have brought us knowledge of this remote region—from Sir Joseph Hooker, who published his Journal in 1854, to Dr. and Mrs. Workman, whose promised book is eagerly awaited—it is still, in a sense, an undiscovered country, from whose bourne any traveller returning is sure of an enthusiastic reception.

Major Waddell deals especially with the Himalayas of Sikkim, among which he has "lived in tents for four or five months of several successive years," and portions of which he has "traversed nearly every year for the past fourteen years, sketching, shooting, collecting, and especially exploring the customs of the people on the frontiers of Tibet and of Nepal," accompanied, it should be added, by such a host of native porters—and their wives—as no European mountaineer would dare to be responsible for. Of mountaineering proper, however, there is next to none in the book, though in every other chapter we are higher than Mont Blanc. The difficulties are not so much cold and snow and ice as heat, malaria, and insects, tropical forests, unbridged rivers and hostile tribes, food, shelter, and transport.

The author is artist, scientist, and humanist, and combines the enthusiasms of them all. His pages teem with minute observation pleasantly recorded of outlandish men and outlandish things; and though to some readers the interest of his story will culminate in his account of those unconquerable giants, Everest (29,002 ft.) and Kanchenjunga (28,150 ft.), the long, slow journeyings to and fro across their stupendous flanks—ground largely untrodden hitherto by Europeans—will have even for them an irresistible fascination. Many, tied by circumstance to commonplace pursuits and commonplace pleasures, will be caught up into another world, if only they can be induced to open this volume, and some, accustomed to see no further than their own tills, will be touched, it may be hoped, to a sense of England's responsibility towards the dark-skinned peoples over whom she has stretched out her hand. The climber will be disappointed that Major Waddell made no climbing record, and never got within twenty miles of Kanchenjunga or within sixty of Everest. But it is no small thing to be transported even within eye-shot of perhaps the highest peak in the world—the Tibetans maintain that some of their "sacred mountains" in the unexplored country to the North are still higher—and to be enabled to survey its approaches, its contour, and its surroundings under capable guidance. It is something, too, to realise that there are "new roads" which bring the glaciers of Kanchenjunga within five or six days of Darjeeling, and so within a week of Calcutta.

It may be a source of surprise to those who only know the mountains of Europe that there should be passes of 18,000 ft. without snow in June, and that Major Waddell and his companions should have enjoyed a comparative immunity from mountain-sickness, but it will but add to the zest of future explorers to learn that the demons and dragons so long banished from the Alps are still lords of the Himalayas.

Except that it is considerably cheaper, this second edition of the book does not materially differ from the first edition of last year. Binding, paper, and margin have suffered somewhat, and the large map is no longer coloured, but text and illustrations are unchanged—with the single exception that "the splendid" Siniokhu Peak, the reference to which still stands in the Preface, has disappeared from the title-page.

The Man in Red.

Richelieu, and the Growth of French Power. By James Breck Perkins, LL.D. (London and New York: Putnam's Sons. 5s.)

"Voilà l'homme rouge qui passe!" cries Marion Delorme at the close of Victor Hugo's thrilling tragedy. The "man in red"—otherwise Armand du Plessis, Cardinal de Richelieu—passes very clearly and arrestingly before our eyes in these pages of Dr. Perkins, which belong to the "Heroes of the Nations" series. At the same time, as his sub-title implies, we have a few of the important developments of France—internal and external—of which Richelieu was the cause and worker-out. Save the crafty and cruel Louis XI., no man so transformed France as Richelieu since the time of Charlemagne, who, after all, belongs as much to German as French history. He said himself to Louis XIII.:

When your Majesty called me to your councils, I can truly say that the Huguenots divided the state with you; the nobles conducted themselves as if they were not subjects, and the governors of provinces as if they were independent sovereigns. Foreign alliances were despised, private interests preferred to public, and the dignity of your Majesty so abused it could hardly be recognised. I promised your Majesty to use all my industry and power to ruin the Huguenot party, lower the pride of the nobles, lead all subjects to their duty, and restore the nation's name among foreign nations.

He did all he promised. The Huguenots, who formed a state within the state, were crushed without persecution, the turbulent nobles were made obedient as children, Austria and Spain were brought low, and France made the first power in Europe. And this was done, although Richelieu depended on a king more weak, dissimulating, capricious, and unreliable than our own Charles I.; a king jealous and suspicious. The man who accomplished it was a singular mixture of subtlety and courage, strength and wile. He intrigued his way to rule by the arts of the woman, and ruled with the strong hand of the man. He attained power like the serpent, and used it like the lion. He was neither cruel nor merciful, without vindictiveness and without forgiveness. No personal enemy of his suffered, and no public enemy escaped. Perhaps he could not afford clemency. The great princes could not believe that the right of rebellion was taken from them, and the only way of bringing conviction to heads turned with power and impunity was to strike some off. They never ceased plots to shake down his power, and each plot only shook down their own heads. These plots, and Richelieu's narrow escapes, are matter of romance no less than history. The very end of his life saw the most dangerous and best known of them. He lay ill at Narbonne; the king was at Perpignan, worked upon by his boyish block-head of a favourite, Cinq Mars. The Duke de Bouillon and others joined the plot, and all believed that Richelieu's favour was gone. A plan of assassination was laid, and Gaston d'Orleans, the king's brother, was privy to it. Then Richelieu recovered. A treaty which the conspirators had secretly made with Spain fell into his hands. Forthwith he sent it to the king, the cowardly Gaston turned informer, and Cinq Mars and his friend De Thon went to the scaffold. Dr. Perkins's book is worthy of its theme, and does much to obliterate the Red Bogey of the romancers.

Other New Books.

THE HISTORY OF EDUCATION. BY THOMAS DAVIDSON.

This volume is no dry as dust production, a wearisome repetition of an oft-told story, but a learned, original, and fascinating introduction to The History of Education as Conscious Evolution. It is an attempt to correlate each system of education with the age in which it is formulated, and to connect the systems in such a way that their historical and philosophical evolution becomes evident.

The most difficult chapters are the first two, which, however, will repay careful study; and perhaps the most valuable deals with Muslim education, in which it is shown how profound a part Islām played in building up mediæval scholasticism and mysticism. The significant ideas in the teaching of Rousseau, Lock, Pestalozzi, Herbart, Froebel, and Rossini are brought out succinctly, the merits and defects of each being hit off swiftly and with precision. Of Froebel, Mr. Davidson observes that the minor weaknesses of his system were compelling children to learn consciously what they would learn unconsciously and without effort; and that in confining their attention exclusively to things about them there was a tendency to stunt the imagination. We have only left ourselves space for a single criticism. On page 238 the author writes: "We should never forget that unconscious learning is the best." Surely this generalisation needs serious modification to come within the truth; but it is a peculiarly unfortunate remark in a book which has for its main thesis that all progress in education has been the result of "conscious" evolution. Not the least useful part of the book are the bibliography and the quotations (intended as texts for discussion) at the head of each chapter. The author's death at Montreal last month withdraws a great figure from the teachers' world. (Constable. 6s.)

THE STRUGGLE FOR SUCCESS. BY J. STODHART-WALKER.

Most of us are or have been "aspirants for success," and Mr. Stodhart-Walker, therefore, makes a wide appeal. He is a member of the medical profession in Edinburgh, and, as might be expected, lays great stress on the advantage of choosing a calling suitable to one's physique. Thus, if you have rheumatic tendencies avoid being a farmer or agricultural labourer; and if you suffer from phthisis it is not good to be a bargeman. Other tit-bits of advice culled from a book that ranges far and wide is that the said aspirant may say "dancin'" and "singin'," but ruin is inevitable should he say "singging," and "many a worthy aspirant has been banished into uttermost darkness for wearing a "jemima"—whatever that may be. From his own practice it would appear that a writer may quote Greek and split his English infinitives, while no more exactitude in quotation is required than to render a famous line "Far better a day of Europe than a cycle of Cathay." But, judging from his extracts, he is more deeply read in Mr. Robert Buchanan than in Tennyson. In delivering his soul on so many topics Mr. Stodhart-Walker gives vent to several curious opinions. For instance, he will have it that the citizen, to qualify as a registered voter, should answer a series of questions of which the following is a specimen, the italics being ours: "What were the resultant factors in the repeal of the Corn Laws?" "Resultant factors" is a shibboleth indeed for the illiterate voter. Despite these quaintnesses, however, there is a great deal of shrewd, interesting conversation—we can think of no other term—in this book. Most of it deals with the more important issues of life, but the author has so little sense of proportion that he seems to attach as much importance to the wearing of a "jemima" as to the greatest of the eternal verities.

AUTUMNS IN ARGYLSHIRE WITH ROD AND GUN. BY THE HON. A. E. GATHORNE-HARDY.

This volume is a collection of descriptive papers which have appeared elsewhere, in which are recounted experiences with rod and gun during thirty years on rivers and hills from the Border to Sutherland. Its name, obviously, is derived from many autumns spent at Poltalloch, in Argyshire, a sovereign place for mixed shooting as well as for salmon streams. Our author's observant manner, both as a sportsman and as a naturalist, and his flexible literary style, enable the reader to share with him the delights of his many highly privileged days. Whether with deer, snipe, grouse, seal, or salmon, Mr. Gathorne-Hardy must have proven to associates a very pleasant companion, for the catholicity of a rare temper is all through these pages. Their illustrations, by Mr. Archibald Thorburn, sustain the refinement and good taste with which the records of many happy hours during all these years are set forth. It will interest Mr. Gathorne-Hardy to know, in return for his allusiveness, that, at any rate in south-west Perthshire, the wild cat is by no means extinct, and that there also the golden eagle has its eyries. The present writer saw both a few days ago. Like all manly hunters, Mr. Gathorne-Hardy reluctantly views diminution of species, about which in many instances there is only too much reason for well-grounded alarm. But on the frontiers of Argyre- and Perth-shires owners of estates are at length doing something in defence of the fauna, so that, generally speaking, since the old Poltalloch days, that which most ails is the salmon unaccountably disappearing from all the Scotch rivers. It would be impossible now to write that rich "Nil Desperandum" chapter at monarchical Poltalloch. (Longmans.)

TRAVELS IN THE EAST OF NICHOLAS II. BY PRINCE E. OOKHTOMSKY. WHEN CESAREWITCH. VOL. II.

This is the second volume of the really gorgeous work in which is enshrined, for English readers, the experiences of the present Czar when he was Cesarewitch, in his great educative tour through Asia in 1890 and 1891. The author, Prince E. Oukhtomsky, accompanied his royal master. He writes in a naïve and picturesque way—yet always in the way of a courtier. The translation has been done by Mr. Robert Goodlet, and the work, as edited by Sir George Birdwood and published in folio by Messrs. Constable, is simply magnificent in its visual features. The "gorgeous palaces" and "solemn temples" of the East have been recorded by artists and wood-engravers of distinction, and occasionally by the finest photogravure. As a mere picture-book this royal itinerary is almost above praise. Such engravings as those of the "Primeval Forest in Ceylon," "Storm in a Siberian Forest," "On the Orion, the Cradle of Girghiz Khan," and "Bangkok from the Golden Hill," and such photographic reproductions as "The King of Siam's Gondolas" and "South Indian Sanctuaries," are intrinsic works of art as well as triumphs of illustration. The gorgeous effect of the whole is not easily expressed, but as we turn these pages there somehow runs in our mind these sumptuous lines from one of Lord Beaconsfield's poems:

Jewels from the furthest Ind,
And silks from dusky Samarcand.

Unfortunately there is that in the book which will diminish an English reader's delight. It is the author's frank, not to say brutal, patriotism, and his unceremonious, not to say unfair, treatment of British rule in India. Again and these elements are present. Prince Oukhtomsky thus again exclaims:

The farther the Cesarewitch penetrates into the East, and the more complex our protracted journey becomes, the greater is the author's difficulty: first, in restraining the expression of his patriotic feelings. . . . The journey of the Cesarewitch through the civilised countries of the East is full of deep significance for Russia. . . . We ourselves, as a nation and a state, do not fully comprehend their full meaning and the duties they entail on us, both in our home and foreign policy.

There is no need to examine all this special pleading, which, after all, adds to the informing character of his work. We know—or may guess—what is in the hearts of Russian politicians of this Prince's stamp. (Constable. £2 12s. 6d.)

SPORT AND TRAVEL: EAST AND WEST.

By F. C. SELOUS.

Everybody knows that Mr. Selous is a great traveller and a mighty hunter, but most people imagine that he has confined his energies to South Africa in general and to Rhodesia in particular. How wide is his knowledge of sport the present book will show, for it contains the record of his expeditions in search of game in Asia Minor and in the Rocky Mountains. Mr. Selous went to Asia Minor in 1894 after the large long-faced red deer and the magnificently horned wild goats, which last he shot on the Maimun Dagh. In 1897 he went out to the Rocky Mountains after the big game still left there, and returned in the following year, as he had not been quite satisfied with his sport. To the sportsman the book is a most fascinating account of the pursuit of game, which every man who has handled a gun would like to participate in. It is a capital book for the country house in the long winter evenings. (Longmans, Green & Co.)

WILLIAM COTTON OSWELL, HUNTER AND EXPLORER.

By W. E. OSWELL.

A precursor of Mr. Selous was Mr. William Cotton Oswell, who was a companion of Dr. Livingstone in his South African exploration, although his fame has been overshadowed by that of the better-known traveller. Mr. Oswell was at Rugby under Dr. Arnold, and afterwards entered the H.E.I.C.'s service. In 1848 he was at the Cape, and the next year set out on a journey into the interior. He was joined by Livingstone, and penetrated to Lake Ngami, where he spent a year shooting and exploring. In 1851 he shared in the discovery of the Zambesi in those regions, and during the Crimean War he was actively engaged at the front. Mr. Oswell appears to have been, as General Fred Cotton described him, "one of the most really noble of men"; and we can only regret that questions of space prevent us from dealing at greater length with this most interesting record of a notable explorer and lovable man. The book is admirably illustrated with sketches, photographs, and plans, and should be read by all interested in South Africa. (William Heinemann.)

THE ROYAL OBSERVATORY, GREENWICH.

By E. W. MAUNDER, F.R.A.S.

Greenwich contains the most famous observatory in the world, and yet it is to be feared that but few Londoners, or even visitors to London, realise the fact. Mr. Maunder is a member of the staff of the Observatory, and has consequently been able to write a very full account of the history and working of the great institution which gives the longitude, and in many cases the time, to the civilised world. The interior of the Observatory must always be more or less an unknown spot to the majority of mankind, for the rules regarding visits are very stringent, as "the work carried on therein is too continuous and important to allow of interruption by daily streams of sightseers." This little book, then, is intended as a substitute for a personal visit, and describes in detail the important work done in connexion with navigation, the fixing of time, and the various departments connected with the ceaseless study of the heavens day and night. Mr. Maunder's monograph has all the fascination which astronomy possesses, even for those who understand nothing about it. (The Religious Tract Society.)

JANE THE QUEEN.

By PHILIP SIDNEY.

Mr. Sidney's biographical narrative of Lady Jane Grey may serve as a popular account, but it has little historical or literary value. The writer is evidently interested in his subject, and has done his bookmaking to the best of his ability, but he has not the necessary equipment for a critical biography. His method of quoting his authorities does not inspire confidence, and he has few gifts or graces of style. (Sonnenschein.)

Mr. Frederic G. Kitton continues his enthusiastic quarrying in the Dickens mine. He now gives us, in the "Book-Lover's Library," a "bibliography and sketch" of The Minor Writings of Charles Dickens (Stock). A complete survey of Dickens's smaller work from 1833, when his first paper appeared in the Monthly Magazine, to his death in 1870, is essayed by his indefatigable commentator.

Topical patriotic verse enshrines itself in Mr. Harold Begbie's The Handy Man, and Other Verse (Richards, 3s. 6d.). The handy man is told that he keeps his left for hitting and his right for guard—"But there comes a time, my hearties, and the sailor isn't loth, When yon sling two iron fists in, when you slog and slam with both."

The Royal Historical Society adds to its publications, through Messrs. Longmans, The Despatches and Correspondence of John, Second Earl of Buckinghamshire, Ambassador to the Court of Catherine II. of Russia, 1762-1765, in two volumes.

German enterprise is shown in the publication in English of the Official Catalogue of the German Exhibits at the Paris Exhibition. The volume is a beautifully produced quarto, but why is it printed throughout in Gothic lettering? If our speech is considered, why not our eyes?

The Sanitary Publishing Co. send us Essays on Consumption, by Dr. J. Edward Squire, M.D., and with an introduction by Sir William Broadbent. Dr. Squire addresses himself particularly to the discussion of preventive measures.

Among new editions, Mr. Murray issues a handsome fifth edition, at fifteen shillings, of Mr. Whympers Scrambles Among the Alps in the years 1860-69. Messrs. Isbister re-issue, in two delightful little volumes, leather-bound, the Rev. Stopford A. Brooke's Tennyson, His Art and Relation to Modern Life, first published in 1894. In a new series of pocket reprints, Mr. John Lane sends us an outwardly pretty Lavengro. But the type is too small, the lines too close, the paper too transparent.

Fiction.

The Novel of Middle-Age

The Infidel. By M. E. Braddon. (Simpkin. 6s.)

The Fourth Generation. By Sir Walter Besant. (Chatto. 6s.)

The New Order. By Oswald Crawford. (Richards. 6s.)

To Pay the Price. By Silas K. Hocking. (Warne. 6s.)

NONE of the four novels before us is of so dubious a perfection, but all are plainly the products of middle-age. Of these sobriety is an occasional one. The middle-aged man or woman is a fool who has not learned that still waters run deep, that much cry may mean little wool, and that too many cooks spoil the broth. Such facts belong to the elements, but youth is slow to detect them. The maker of more than sixty novels has achieved sobriety; let us give thanks. Lady Audley no longer beckons us to the sepulchral well, Jasper refrains at last from washing his hands in blood. The Infidel is a study in development of character. A woman, romantically widowed, lovely, and of deep philanthropy, reads Voltaire and is bomb-proof to Whitfield. Braddonians of the ancien régime will scent in this situation another "Tyrone ghost story," unimpaired by conflicting "real particulars." They will err. From the altitude of middle-age, every step of it climbed, even a novelist perceives no ghost confiding the truth of revealed religion to agnostical ears. Miss Braddon's heroine receives grace, but John Wesley is the minister, and her husband, ominous of adventitious action though he was upon his deathbed, rests in peace. The Infidel is a mere novel in the sense that its spiritual interest is not the interest of exploration and discovery, but the interest of sentiment. The reader feels that it was "nice" rather than essential that Antonia should be converted, and at the end it seems to him that she had mistaken sympathy for conviction. The satisfaction that he obtains by her loyalty to the husband of an hour points to the true significance of the story, which the doctrinal element merely confuses—namely, that the reward of virtue lies wholly in the perfecting of souls. Middle-age is pathetically inclined to the agnosticism which yearns towards the peep of day. It dare not suppose that the monster audiences of a Whitefield may be mistaken, that one salient lie could be affirmed in all the languages of the world. This timidity is touching, but it renders philosophical literature nugatory.

And so, being both sober and timidly yearful, The Infidel boasts both a virtue and a weakness of middle-age. But it has another virtue: it patiently erects itself; it is not flimsy. The period—that of George the Second—is carefully studied. The revivalist movement, Richardson's novels, the taking of Quebec, Ranelagh, Mr. Garrick, fall into place unobtrusively as they might in a contemporary memoir. The style is singularly finished. It were to be wished that many a young impressionist showed the feeling for good English which is a Braddonian tradition. Some of the crackers of youth are still left for display on the peak of middle-age. Here is a small one: "To be in the fashion . . . to be mobbed in the Park . . . to introduce the latest mispronunciation, and call Bristol 'Bristo,' is it not the highest prize in the lottery of woman's life?"

And so we leave Miss Braddon—the prima donna of our quartet—the only one of the four who does not betray the great defect of the middle-aged novelist—indolence. Indolence comes when a man has found his public, and the public mechanically buys his novels as they come out, because it also is indolent and finds it easier to go to the same old shop. Sir Walter's indolence is not betrayed in a slovenly style; he writes excellent, brisk English. It is betrayed in the growing insipidity of his stories. We cannot but tire of the fabulous riches of uncertain destination with which he persistently endows them. Even the ingenuous girl of independent views begins to pall. She is less human because less realised than of yore. Diluted Dickensian types do not, for all their Jack-in-the-box alertness, compensate for the lack of wireless hips. A problem of heredity is presented with excessive picturesqueness in The Fourth Generation. The patriarch who lays on himself a doom of silence for scores of years has, of course, committed a crime, and the crook of character which led to this phenomenon was productive in his kindred of other instructive results. Finally, the daughter of the man he murdered cries out: "Oh, we have all forgiven you! . . . At last—at last—forgive yourself." It is pathetic on this page, but in the book it has the artificial effect of a statue in a park. It did not grow there; it was imported. Pathos recognisably "arranged" is inconceivable. Yet to arrive at effects without the obtrusion of artifice often means the expenditure of considerable exertion. Indolence forbids. Indeed, it is possible to love artifice for its own sake. Did Sir Walter cherish this love it would be an irony indeed, for his plots are as ingenuous as plate-glass. He beams with sympathy for the bourgeoisie, and, like Mr. McCarthy, he is inherently too good-natured to evolve a criminal type. He dallies with the humours of chicane, and a soi-disant lawyer whose income is derived from supplying "stickit" orators with speeches leads him unerringly to a laugh. To use the obvious adroitly is one of the talents of middle-age. The young fumble for new ideas: they seek the felicitas curiosa; they despise the obvious. But it is the obvious that tells. Laughter is already mortgaged to it. Burnt cork or a spotted mask is a signal that never fails. Sir Walter is too urbane to be uproarious, but he is by no means unwilling to falsify life for the sake of a laugh. To write All Sorts and Conditions of Men he tramped all over the East End. But you can falsify life in an easy chair, and middle-age has a penchant for easy chairs. And so in Sir Walter's latest novel a solicitor observes, by way of deprecating cadging, to a Member of Parliament who has partaken of cake in his house: "You will acknowledge that it was a noble Tea." We laugh—knowing that no solicitor ever spoke so—and shrug our shoulders.

Mr. Oswald Crawford differs from Miss Braddon and Sir Walter inasmuch as he writes like an enthusiastic amateur. The New Order is a suet pudding of theory plummed with fantasy. Farmers and artisans, who must have been uncommonly intelligent, are represented as having been "startled" by the remark, "Political economy must now make way for political adjustment." A German savant has been "startled" to see us hold "an envious and irritated world . . . at bay" during the Anglo-Boer War; and ourselves are perhaps mildly startled to read at this date a plea for the reinstitution of the Corn Laws. The plums of fantasy belong to the order of athletic romance. The hero takes "his opponent heavily with the point of his left shoulder at a spot just below the frontal juncture of the ribs"; the heroine fences superbly, and there is scientific cudgelling in the tale to boot. Mr. Crawford seems indeed to represent middle age asserting an indomitable youthfulness. He is in love with motion, whether of fist or sword or butterflies. His optimism, which is flagrant, savours less of the club than Sir Walter's. Of artistic form he has hardly a notion, though he may possibly achieve the symmetry of a bundle of wood tied together with a piece of string. "Don't you remember," says one of his characters, "an Irishman always takes the first word to hand, and then, as often as not, has to carve his real meaning out of the wrong expression?" Mr. Crawford is something like the Irishman. He has taken the first plot, or rather the first bundle of melodramatic situations he could lay his hand on, and whoever dislikes his argument for a temporary tariff on foreign corn can easily relieve his feelings by ridiculing the inconsequence of his narrative.

We follow the old order and keep the worst wine till the last. To Pay the Price has nothing that announces the estate of a man who has climbed to maturity except its trite, trite moral, "Honesty is the best policy." Forgery and murder are here, and the suggestion of a girl's shame. But there is no life in the terrible things that pop in and out. The story goes like a whirling toy wound up with a key. One does not stop to criticise this or that inconsistency. One asks a root-question instead, "To what end was this farrago compiled?" There is no knowledge in it, no probability. It dangles before the eyes a series of ugly sgorbs, none of them real. It is, indeed, an irony. Every weekday for the whole of Mr. Hocking's past life the newspaper has served up daily its budget of veritable iniquity, of historical sin. And yet even iniquity, even sin, have their natural squint distorted in Mr. Hocking's laboratory. We shake our sides at them. Yet this man knows the hideous dialect of the Londoner, and how he says "rand" for "round," and "sty" for "stay." But so does the newsboy; so do we. The only thing that excuses the perpetration of an unpleasant fiction is art; it is the one thing needful. Mr. Hocking has it not. Beside him Miss Braddon is a great master.

And so we close sadly. Mr. Hocking has written many novels, and this is the latest. It is clear that middle-age is no talisman against literary jerry-building. In its wadded comfort middle-age is easily proof against conscience pricks. It is even capable of appealing to its circulation as an excuse for its offence, although that is the very thing which aggravates it. But the knowledge that comes of increased experience, the skill that comes of repeated attempts, the patience and sobriety that come of seeing less before than there is behind, and the clairvoyance born of the subsidence of the passions—of these is middle-age the rightful heir. It is consoling to know that there are some who look to their inheritance.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the week's Fiction are not necessarily final. Reviews of a selection will follow.]

THE BRASS BOTTLE.

By F. ANSTEY.

A long, humorous story by an author who can always count upon a welcome. But The Brass Bottle is not in the manner of those admirable tales The Giant's Robe, and The Pariah. It is a story of modern life, with fantastic and supernatural elements. The worker of mischief is a Jinnee who emerges from an "antique brass bottle, very rare," which the hero buys at a sale. The story ran serially in the Strand Magazine. (Smith, Elder. 6s.)

THE DISSEMBLERS.

By THOMAS COBB.

Mr. Cobb has a facile, amusing pen, but he is in danger of admittance to the "prolific set." He published a book a fortnight ago. The Dissemblers is a light, clever tale of modern life. (Laue. 6s.)

MANSFIELD THE OBSERVER.

By EGERTON CASTLE.

A collection of studies of character and action. "Mansfield the Observer" is Mr. Castle's "Sherlock Holmes." His object is "to study and know," and he has been good enough to tell these tales to the author of The Bath Comedy. (Macmillan. 6s.)

RUE WITH A DIFFERENCE.

By ROSA NOUCHETTE CAREY.

The writer's name is warrant for expecting a pretty love-story, in which the right quantity of cloud will be dispelled by the right quantity of sunshine. The heroine, Valerie, is just complex enough, and she is a young widow. September and a cathedral close, in the second chapter, may suggest the tone of quiet interest pervading the story. (Macmillan. 6s.)

JOAN BROTHERHOOD.

By BERNARD CAPES.

A characteristic novel, unlike any other novel, except a novel by Mr. Capes. We shall deliver ourselves upon it later. (Pearson. 6s.)

THE CONSCIENCE OF CORALIE.

By F. FRANKFORT MOORE.

Coralie's conscience is, of course, chiefly engaged in deciding between the claims of her suitors. You observe her on the cover, in throes of doubt as she reclines in the correct attitude of perplexity on a sofa. The story is social, political, and wholly entertaining. The Minister of the Annexation Department a promising character, also Bernard Mott is a socially successful Socialist, who "would not feel hurt if an enemy had made the attempt to calumniate him by calling him a gentleman." (Pearson. 6s.)

MODERN BROODS.

By CHARLOTTE M. YONGE.

Miss Yonge's works fill three pages of advertisement at the end of the volume. Modern Broods is a story of the relations between a lady not old, but old-fashioned, and her four young step-sisters, who have received part of their education at a high school. Some of the names familiar in the Daisy Chain and the Pillars of the House reappear in these pages. (Macmillan. 6s.)

MEN OF MARLOWE'S.

By MRS. HENRY DUDENEY.

A new novel by the author of The Maternity of Harriott Wicken—that study in suburban pessimism. This story introduces us to Inn-life in London, Marlowe's being an Inn of Law off Holborn inhabited by bachelors and cranks. We are much in Bloomsbury, and we do not disdain Theobald's-road. There is intellect, and there is Music Hall-ism. (Long. 6s.)

THE WORLDLINGS.

By LEONARD MERRICK.

The Worldlings opens at Kimberley, but long before the war. To a young Englishman "paid to watch twelve Kaffirs and Zulus, who broke the lumps of diamondiferous soil into smaller pieces," and hating the loathsome life," came a temptation. He succumbs, and is made rich. England receives him. Then the story—Mr. Merrick's seventh. (Murray. 6s.)

THE SLAVES OF SOCIETY.

By "THE MAN WHO HEARD SOMETHING."

"A Comedy in Covers," on one of which, in strong black and white, is a foot-boy in cockaded hat, standing at the salute. "'After all,' sighed the Marchioness, as she conveyed a three-cornered piece of muffin from the silver chafing-dish to her mouth, and nibbled delicately at one of the corners, 'after all, what are we but slaves of Society?'" (Harper. 6s.)

THE HALF-HEARTED.

By JOHN BUCHAN.

As in his last novel, Mr. Buchan plants us on the Border. But the sheepfolds of Etterick give place to the valleys of Kashmir; and there is a flavour of things literary. "Lewis Haystoun?" he asked. "What can he know about such things? A wandering dilettante, the worst type of the pseudo-culture of our universities. He must see all things through the spectacles of his upbringing." (Isbister. 6s.)

THE LOVE OF TWO WOMEN.

By JOHN JONES.

Apart from its love interest, or its pictures of smart life, this is a novel of the House of Commons. It opens in the dining-room of the House, and contains a speech delivered in its legislative chamber. There is a rather humorous account of Aubrey Fitzgerald's candidature at Southborough. (F. V. White. 6s.)

A FURNACE OF EARTH.

By HALLIE ERMINIL.

A delicate love-story beginning with boy and girl, with a Maeterlinckian fragrance. Miss River, the heroine, desires spirituality and permanence in love, and makes great sacrifice of her happiness because she does not find it. The story is uncommon, and is told with picturesqueness and power. (Grant Richards. 6s.)

THE CHASE OF THE RUBY.

By RICHARD MARSH.

Mr. Marsh exhales novels; no pun or offence intended. This one is about ghosts. Ghosts where? Why, in Africa, of course. "The will is plain English. You are to obtain a certain ring from a certain lady and deliver it to me within a certain time. If you do so you are your uncle's heir; if you do not, Mr. Horace is." (Skeffington. 3s. 6d.)

We have also received In Sheep's Clothing, by Hume Nisbet, a glorification of Queensland—"Golden Queensland," as this colony has been called by Mr. Philip Mennell; the "crime-encrusted soul" of John Lupus gives shadow to the story (F. V. White, 6s.); The Brand of the Broad Arrow, by Major Arthur Griffiths, who never disappoints the lovers of prison romance (Pearson, 6s.); The Murder, by John Ackworth, the author of Clog Shop Chronicles, dealing cleverly with the "Courtship, Call, and Conflicts" of John Ledger, "minder" and minister in a Lancashire mill town (Marshall & Son, 6s.); The Plunder Ship, a story of adventure, by Headan Hill (Pearson, 6s.); The Madness of David Baring, by Joseph Hocking, with "nice" pictures (Hodder & Co., 3s. 6d.); and A Sugar Princess, by Albert Ross (Chatto, 3s. 6d.).

THE ACADEMY.

Editorial and Publishing Offices, 43, Chancery-lane.

The ACADEMY will be sent post-free to every Annual Subscriber in the United Kingdom.

Price for One Issue, Threepence; postage One Halfpenny Price for 52 issues, Thirteen Shillings; postage free.

Foreign Rates for Yearly Subscriptions 20s. including postage.

American Agents for the ACADEMY: Brentano's, 31, Union-square, New York.

Then and Now.

IN glancing through the full and systematised list of autumn book announcements which we give elsewhere in this issue, every reader will be struck by the remarkable number and variety of the volumes promised. That is obvious and inevitable. As the years go by, we all note and comment upon the steady (though it may be slight) increase in the literary production of the country. Broadly speaking, each succeeding twelvemonth "goes one better," in this respect, than its immediate predecessor, and, with painful regularity, one finds oneself wondering where purchasers are to be found for the multitudinous wares submitted.

The mere extent of our annual book-production is not, however, of much interest except as testifying to the growth both of the reading and of the writing population. That growth has indeed been great. Some of us can lay claim to an intimate acquaintance with the published literature of, say, the past twenty-five years. Travel back in memory over that quarter of a century, and what does one find? In the year 1875 there was no such stir and stress in the book-world as we see and feel in the book-world of to-day. The Education Act of 1870 had not had time to add appreciably to the normal number of readers, and the writers of that time catered for a comparatively small public. There were "popular" authors then as there are "popular" authors now, but they could not command either the sales or the prices which fall to the lot of "popular" scribes in 1900. The reading world of 1875 was not only smaller but quieter and more leisurely than that in which we now live and move. The voice of the boomster was not heard in the land. Literature and men of letters were not then at the mercy of the paragraphist and the interviewer. Reputations were not made and unmade in a season. The writers of 1875 appealed for the most part to an educated constituency, which had learned not only how to read but what to read, and was not given to the encouragement of mere "side" and quackery.

Looking over the names of the authors who were producing work in the year we have chosen to consider, one is struck, of course, by what we have lost in the interval through the hand of death. In the realm of poetry—Tennyson, Browning, Arnold, Morris, and Miss Ingelow; in that of fiction—Ainsworth (who belonged really to the previous generation), Anthony Trollope, Whyte Melville, Wilkie and Mortimer Collins, Henry Kingsley, William Black, James Payn, Blackmore, Mrs. Oliphant, Mrs. Lynn Linton, Mrs. Henry Wood, and Mrs. Craik; and in that of the belles lettres generally—John Forster (who in 1875 was engaged upon the Life of Swift which he was destined never to complete), E. A. Freeman, J. A. Symonds, Henry Morley, and so forth. All of these have left behind them work which (in varying degrees and within certain limits) may be described as permanent. Thus, whatever literary criticism may have to say (and it has a good deal to say) about John Halifax, Gentleman, and East Lynne, there seems to be no likelihood that those ad captandum stories will ever wholly cease to attract people, and notably women, of a certain temperament.

On the other hand, there were, twenty-five years ago, some literary reputations off which time has rubbed a little of the bloom. Take, for example, the poetic vogue, such as it was, of W. C. Bennett, Dora Greenwell, and Menella Bute Smedley. These names have practically no meaning or significance for present-day readers. In the department of fiction, what has become of the stories of Thomas Adolphus Trollope and Mrs. Trollope? Who now peruses the tales of Dutton Cook, of Julia Kavanagh, of Anna Drury, of Anne Beale, of Mary Cecil Hay—all of them very much to the fore in 1875? Who now takes up a volume by Mr. Hepworth Dixon, one of the most successful of successful bookmakers? It says a good deal for the spread of genuine literary appreciation that, apparently, there is no room in the book-world of 1900 for a writer with the methods and the style of the author of Spiritual Wives. Yet how "popular" he once was! The demand for his books at Mudie's was "immense." He knew how to sway the ladies of the middle classes, and so secured fame and fortune—for a time.

Twenty-five years are a large slice out of life, and it is not surprising that so many of those who were active in 1875 should now be resting on their oars, or using them but rarely. We cannot expect to have from our veterans very much more imaginative work, if any.

It was in 1875 that Mr. George Meredith brought out his Beauchamp's Career, in which, one remembers, there was more than a dash of politics—it was, in fact, his Election novel, as Felix Holt was George Eliot's. In the same year Mr. Hardy had on the stocks his Hand of Ethelberta, not published in volume form till 1876. Mr. Leslie Stephen had just issued one series of his Hours in a Library, and was on the eve of issuing another. In like manner, Mr. John Morley had just produced his book on Compromise, but was to give us nothing further in book shape for a year or two. Robert Browning, in 1875, tendered to us one of the least popular of his poems—The Inn Album; Matthew Arnold, on the other hand, too absorbed in theology to write or print much poetry, concentrated his energies upon God and the Bible, with what results we know. Of those still left to us, Miss Thackeray, though she writes occasionally on general subjects, and has not long concluded her delightful prefaces to her father's works, seems, alas! to have done finally with novel writing. And, indeed, it is a far cry now to the Miss Angel of 1875. Nevertheless, of some of those who were writing in that year, the staying power has proved conspicuously great. Among the most widely-read novelists twenty-five years ago were Ouida, Miss Broughton, Miss Braddon, Miss Sarah Tytler, Miss Annie Thomas, Mr. Farjeon, Mr. Baring Gould, and Mr. Robert Buchanan; and most of these can still be depended upon to produce at least one story annually. Miss Braddon, very wisely, has dropped the "sensational," and turned her attention to historical fiction, in which she has made of late quite a new reputation. Miss Broughton, too, has of recent years considerably subdued the effervescence of her early manner. Ouida, meanwhile, remains very much what she was, though her pictures of English society (as seen from Italy) have even less verisimilitude than they formerly possessed. Mr. Baring Gould seems inexhaustible. He is only sixty-six, and may make numerous additions to his works, already voluminous. In 1875 Sir Walter Besant was represented only by his French Humourists, but his partnership with James Rice had begun a few years earlier, and from him, also, much fiction is yet to be looked for. In 1875 a certain Mr. John Dangerfield brought out a story called The Fool of the Family. "John Dangerfield" was one of the many noms-de-guerre of Mr. Oswald Crawford, who, within the last few weeks, has resumed the business of novel writing, dropped by him some years ago. In 1875, again, a tale called Comin' Through the Rye was generally attributed to Miss Rhoda Broughton, who had set the fashion of christening novels by means of well-known phrases. The actual author of the book, as the world soon discovered, was Miss Helen Mathers, who is still a candidate for the favour of fiction-lovers. On the continued vitality of Mr. Swinburne as a producer of verse we need not dwell. He is now engaged in preparing a collected edition of his poems. His rhythmic work has not the arresting quality which it once had, but his ingenuity and facility as a metrist is obviously as great as ever.

There are many minor respects in which the year 1875 must be memorable to all students of Victorian literary history. If it seems strange to us now that Ainsworth should be publishing a romance in that year, it is no less strange that Longfellow should be publishing a poem—"The Masque of Pandora." To us, nowadays, Longfellow seems so far off—his fame so distant—his influence so characteristic of an earlier day. Even in 1875 the announcement of a new book by him produced no thrill; how very little excitement would it cause in these so much more advanced times! Again, it was in the year named that George Henry Lewes brought out his volume on Actors and the Art of Acting—one of the very few classics of dramatic criticism. George Eliot did not publish anything within that twelvemonth, but from Lewes she is inseparable in the literary mind and conscience. How would a new novel by George Eliot fare at the hands of the extant reviewer? How would it please the crowd which delights in a story by Miss Corelli? In 1875 James Greenwood issued his "Low Life Deeps." May we not fairly regard him as the fons et origo of the modern "slum" novel? Surely the "Amateur Casual," with his descriptions at first hand of the London poor, paved the way for Mr. Morrison and Mr. Whiteing? Twenty-five years ago the best-beloved of writers for the young were "A. L. O. E.," Mrs. Ewing, and Lord Brabourne. "A. K. H. B.," active in 1875, has left no successor in the domain of amiable platitudes, though the lack of such must have pressed hardly upon the occupants of a good many blameless parlours. It may be pointed out, further, that Prof. Dowden's Shakespeare: his Mind and Art, belongs to the twelvemonth, a quarter of a century ago, which we are discussing. The book is a landmark in the history of English Shakespearian criticism, to which it gave an immediate and useful impulse. Owing, admittedly, a good deal to German labours in the same direction, it quickened the intellects of many, and helped to make possible the subsequent Shakespearian revival in the study and on the stage.

The changes in Periodical literature are quite beyond the scope of this article. But one remembers the New Quarterly which Mr. Oswald Crawford made eminently interesting, but which, unfortunately, has not descended to to-day. No more has Fraser's Magazine, which, potent in 1875 as in previous years, has long been only the shadow of a name. The New Quarterly, perhaps, was before its time; but Fraser ought to have been able to hold its own, even in these days of magazines at fourpence-halfpenny. Perhaps Fraser would have been alive now had it fallen latterly into the hands of editors more in sympathy with the current taste of the public.

Into the vicissitudes of publishing during the last twenty-five years we need not enter. The firm of H. S. King & Co., vigorous in 1875, has long been merged in that of Kegan Paul. That of Samuel Tinsley has vanished, along with that of Tinsley Brothers, of whom, we gather, Mr. William Tinsley is to be the historian. Publishing, like literary production, is not what it was. New times, new methods. The trail of the novel is over us all. Twenty-five years ago all forms of literature had their opportunities. Now the romancist is cock of the walk, and knows it. Let us pray for the poor poets and essayists; they need our prayers.

The Marquis of Bute in Fact and in Fiction.

THE Marquis of Bute had nothing but goodwill for Lord Beaconsfield. At the same time he had only amused contempt for Lothair, so far as the hero of that book was supposed to be a portrait of himself. Lord Beaconsfield made no such claim for it. But he took the accidents of the career, he threw in the trustees and other persons-in-waiting, he even spelled, by accident or design, the name of his Monsignor Catesby as Capel on one page of his first edition; and he left out all intimate character-drawing, and this for the best of reasons, that he had really no acquaintance with the young man who, having enormous possessions in this world, set his thoughts at once upon another. Lord Bute was a very shy man. He combined hesitations and a huge physique. "Oh!" was an exuberance with him. Twice repeated, and he felt he had been talkative. On only one occasion, before he wrote Lothair, did Lord Beaconsfield meet Lord Bute; and, as it was on a public platform, phrases were not necessary and confidences were out of question. Lord Bute, born a Presbyterian, baptised an Anglican, and, becoming a Roman Catholic as soon as ever he attained his majority, had crowds of serious thoughts, not to be bought off by the acceptance of Lady Corisande's rose. Persistent and original, he saw himself exposed to the world's eyes as a weakling. He was strong enough not to mind. Subsequent courtesies passed between himself and the creator of his double who was really not even half of him. Lord Bute bade Lord Beaconsfield to his wedding. Lord Beaconsfield made Lord Bute a Knight of the Thistle; and, whatever might be thought of Lothair, nobody who knew Lord Bute said of him then that it was no good giving him the Thistle because—he would only eat it.

Coming into his great possessions and innumerable titles when he was a baby one year old, Lord Bute went to Harrow and Oxford, by order of the Court, and against the will of one of his trustees, a lady and a relative, who seemed to fear for him a contact with the liberal world. His allowance was £7,000 a year, and more than ten times that sum accumulated against his coming of age. Already he had begun his subsidies to church restorers; and though he took no degree before he left Christ Church, he had become a good student, which, indeed, he long remained, learning Coptic, for instance, when he was thirty years old. At Cardiff, soon after he attained his majority, he became connected with the press—and a troublesome association he found it—so that before long he ceded the Western Mail to one of its staff. Later in life he thought a quarterly might be more tolerable; and he had a hand in the Scottish Review. His favourite studies began to find expression in lectures, which he hated to deliver, and in books, every detail of the publication of which he investigated and controlled—the price of the printing to a penny, the precise arrangement of the type, and the shade of the paper in particular. The Marquis of Bute on St. Brendon, the Marquis of Bute on William Wallace, the Marquis of Bute on Ilewelyn, the Marquis of Bute on Libraries, the Marquis of Bute on the Language of Teneriffe, the Marquis of Bute on the Origin of the Chaldees—these are but a sample of the subjects to which his name seemed to give an interest, in Cardiff, at St. Andrews, or in Glasgow, to the man in the street. Only once his courage failed him; it was before an address he had been announced to deliver in Dundee. He cancelled the appointment in a letter which enclosed a fine of £1,000. "Perhaps it is better," he said, "as it will do more permanent good than half-an-hour of, say, indifferent talk."

In 1879 Lord Bute's translation of the Latin Breviary appeared in two small volumes—the year's spiritual reading of the Roman clergy, done into English for daily use. It represented nine years of hard labour, not of translation only, but of annotation. At first people either smiled or frowned. Had a marquis nothing better to do with his time—on the turf (where his cousin, the Marquis of Hastings, had gone to destruction), or at one of the dozen clubs of his he hardly ever entered, or in the House of Lords, where the ins and the outs dully wrangled? The frowners had some mutterings of anathemas hurled by the Church herself against any unfilial hand that should reduce her Office to the vulgar tongue. Smiles and frowns alike were transitory, and anybody sent by a footnote in Robert Orange in search of Lord Bute's Breviary must have found himself forced to pay a fancy price for a stray copy of a long-since-exhausted issue. When Lord Bute compiled a Form of Prayers for the use of people who cannot hear mass on Sundays, he, in fact, gave to the public what he had intended only for himself and his friends.

Perhaps no man ever united so perfectly as Lord Bute great skill as a yachtsman with great scholarship in Scripture. The two qualifications are not waywardly forced into strange companionship. For it was while he was on a yachting cruise round Patmos that he made observations of real account to the student of the Apocalypse. The white stones upon its beach, with their red veins forming themselves into names and words at the bidding of the finder's fancy, suggested to Lord Bute, and may have suggested to St. John himself, the promise of the text that to the true lover and believer would be given "a white stone with a name written thereon which no man can read save he that receiveth it." Commentators have failed before the awful phrase, "there shall be blood up to the bridles of the horses." But Lord Bute, standing where St. John had stood, beheld the bay at sunset as it were a bath of blood; and there in its midst were rocks with something of the form of horses, and from their necks hung immemorial seaweed as it were bridles that surged to and fro upon that crimson flood.

The New Battalions.

WHEN a people reach the top of a hill
Then does God lean toward them,
Shortens tongues, lengthens arms.

A vision of their dead come to the weak.

The moon shall not be too old
Before the new battalions rise—
Blue battalions.

The moon shall not be too old
When the children of change shall fall
Before the new battalions—

The blue battalions.

Mistakes and virtues will be trampled deep,
A church and a thief shall fall together,
A sword will come at the bidding of the eyeless,
The God-led, turning only to beckon.

Swinging a creed, like a censor,
At the head of the new battalions—
Blue battalions.

March the tools of Nature's impulse—
Men born of wrong, men born of right,
Men of the new battalions—

The blue battalions.

The swish of swords is Thy wisdom,
The wounded make gestures like Thy Son's,
The feet of mad horses is one part,
Aye, another is the hand of a mother on the brow of a son.

Then swift as they charge through a shadow,
The men of the new battalions—
Blue battalions.

God lead them high, God lead them far.
Lead them far, lead them high,
These new battalions—

The blue battalions

STEPHEN CRANE.

Things Seen.

The Monument.

HE thought to raise himself a monument that would last for ever, and yet—

Dusk was gathering as I stepped into the Franciscan Church at Innsbruck, and there before me loomed the mighty figures that Maximilian I., nearly four hundred years ago, decreed should immortalise his memory. His own huge monument is in the middle of the nave, and on the marble sarcophagus he, wrought in bronze, kneels. On either side stand the twenty-eight great bronze figures of his ancestors and contemporaries, mourners and torch-bearers, mute witnesses to the arrogant vanity of the kneeling monarch. Clovis of France, Philip of Spain, Rudolph of Hapsburg, Theodoric King of the Ostrogoths, Arthur of England, Eleonora of Portugal, Charles of Burgundy—how the names roll off the tongue! And in their midst, towering above them all, kneels the proud monarch who decreed that these effigies of human splendour should, in his honour, dominate the house of God. It came to pass that, four hundred years later, I, a chance traveller, found myself in this church musing on the littleness of human greatness. I hardly looked at the sarcophagus of the Emperor, with its twenty-four reliefs in marble, "representing the principal events in his life." That seemed insignificant before the solitary, virile flanking figures. My eyes roamed from emperor to pope, from queen to king: then suddenly one figure rivetted them. He looks towards the East, his eyes glance upwards, his hands are raised, his brows show the stigmata of suffering of this king who "refused to wear a crown of gold where his Saviour had worn one of thorns." The artist has wrought into the bronze of his massive face a light that does not shine on the faces of the monarchs who stand by him. Of all that great company he alone marches, living, through time. Something more purdurable than bronze, something stronger than death, animates this figure of Godfrey de Bouillon crowned with thorns.

The Guide.

OUR Siyott guide, weeks out of his reckoning, had thrown up the sponge. Saddle-bags had shrunk like our camels' humps. Our small stock of water looked but a few pints as it swung in the flabby rubber bag from my camel's neck.

We had passed through the morning's usual monotonous round of thought, when presently out from under the sun appeared three small black specks; glasses resolved them into animals, and, later, nearer, into—dogs. An hour brought us up to them, three poor little brown, ungainly, starved puppies, with hunger written on their ribs. They would not be carried, but struggled painfully after us until we reached our mid-day halt, a parched patch of mimosa scrub, marked on our chart—Water. A stone well was found to contain but an inky liquid, and our party—now increased to six—had to rely on the water-bag.

The place had evidently been deserted for some five or six weeks, and it seemed impossible that the dogs could have existed so long in such a place. Taking them on with us was out of the question; feeding them equally so. After the little fellows had thirstily lapped up the last of their allowance of water, they were taken a few yards away and each little tragedy of a life snuffed out with a revolver bullet. So we thought. Not so our guide; for while we were repacking our foolish silver ingots, he was over by the little family of three, sitting down, and earnestly talking to them, while from his breast he drew forth his last little hoard of food, a small piece of dried meat. Cutting this into three portions, he gently placed one into the mouth of each dead puppy: "In the next life they shall not hunger, Lord Buddha."

For a Little Clan

SHORTLY after Mr. Pater's sudden death it was the present writer's bitter-sweet privilege to examine much of his unpublished and unfinished MS.: fragments of rich treasure were there, unfulfilled promises to us of fresh delight in the perfected achievements of his lovingly laborious art. It had been less sad to have seen nothing; to have been untantalised, unprovoked, by the revelation of what might have been but for that swift intervention of death. Fifty-five years of life, some thirty of literary labour: it affords room for production in goodly quantity when, as in this case, there are also leisure, felicitous circumstances, scant hindrance from the pressure of the world. Yet Mr. Pater published but five works. Since his death there have been published three volumes—or, if we take note of a privately printed little volume, four. Only one of his works is of any considerable length, designed upon an elaborate scale. Gaston de Latour, which would have been, in that and other respects, a companion of Marius the Epicurean, is a fragment. To the reckoners by quantity this does not seem a notable tale of work achieved, designs accomplished. True; but to the worker himself, in the first place, and secondarily to all who knew him, it represented as great an amount of intellectual and emotional toil and pains as those thirty years could contain. The fruits of them are presently to be offered to us in an especial form of honour, in an édition de luxe.

Certainly, if jealous vigilance on behalf of artistic purity, and the utmost strenuousness of æsthetic self-examination, ever had their consequence in work worthy of distinguished honour, Mr. Pater's work is the consequence of those disciplinary virtues. The edition will present its possessors with nothing of "happy negligence," easy inaccuracy, blemishes of haste, or indifference or ignorance or sloth. The athlete, whether of Greek games or of philosophic study, or of religious passion, or of artistic devotion, was ever an image dear to Mr. Pater; asceticism, in its literal and widest sense, the pruning away of superfluities, the just development or training of essentials, the duty of absolute discipline, appealed to him as a thing of price in this very various world. He wrote with certain literary virtues, in what theology calls the "heroic degree" of virtue, and was obedient to "counsels of perfection": the right word for the right thought, the exact presentation of the exact conception, matter and manner "kissing each other" in complete accord, and truth throughout prevailing. With what austere patience, what endurance of delay, he wrought for that, content with nothing less, even physically hurt and vexed by less! To disentangle good from evil in the conduct of life, to be a master of honest casuistry in the matter of moral right and wrong, tasks the holiest of men hardly; and Mr. Pater, beyond most writers of his time, felt the hardness of the kindred task in art. Clearness of vision, integrity of thought, he held difficult of attainment, exacting ideals. We find him always striving to disintegrate, to set free, in dealing with an age or a temperament or a work of art, that soul of value which makes it what it is, makes it important, considerable, vital. Others might think themselves "born free" of the kingdom of art; with "a great sum," at a great expense of the spirit, distrustful of light first impressions, Mr. Pater acquired his freedom; and so, little modern writing is so remarkable for its air of finality; his reader may dissent, but can never doubt that Mr. Pater has expressed what, for himself at least, is the last truth, or a part of the last truth, about Wordsworth or Botticelli or Lamb or Plato; never doubt that every sentence, in its every phrase and word, represents a profound quest after exactitude, and had its discarded predecessors. Had he, as the saying goes, had "nothing to say," such intensity of workmanship would have perforce been ranked beside the foolish and vain kinds of Alexandrianism, Ciceronianism, Euphuism. Having had much to say, his zealous resolve to say it in a form of ultimate precision did but mean that to his mind anything short of entire correspondence between the things to be said and the mode of saying them was an injury and an insult to those things. To any readers, should any still exist, who conceive of Mr. Pater as primarily an artificer in words, let us commend the consideration of this fact: that wherever a sentence or a paragraph fails in part to please, it is never through an affectation in language, some excess of curiousness and strangeness in the use of words, but always through a too great compression of meaning, assemblage of ideas. We do not claim perfection for Mr. Pater; but when we seem to take less than our customary delight in some page of his writings, it is because the man with much to say has been too much for the man who says it. Wealth of thoughts, not of words, is to blame for any falling away from lucid grace in Mr. Pater; and such falling away is very exceptional and rare. Perfect correspondence between conception and expression was ever his aim, and miraculously well he was wont to find it: it was what he prized above all artistic excellences of a wayward and casual character. Writing anonymously, we do our modesty no violence by quoting some words of generous praise in a letter from Mr. Pater to ourselves; deserved or not, they express his instinctive relish of "congruity" between matter and form. "By the way," he wrote, "I was much pleased with a poem of yours I read in the ——. A certain firmness and definition in the sentiment there expressed, congruous with the thoughtful finish of the manner, mark it very distinctly."

FitzGerald, writing to an American friend, confesses more than once that he cannot appreciate Hawthorne, cannot take to him comfortably, though he feels that Hawthorne is a writer of distinction. These repugnances, or, in milder phrase, ineffectual attempts at admiration and enjoyment, are matters of temperament. We can drill and school ourselves into respect for a writer, seldom into genuine pleasure in his writings. Mr. Pater brought to bear upon his large scholarship and various culture a personality of exceeding distinction, an individuality most marked. His works have plenty of pathos, plenty of humour, an abundance of human sympathies; he can dwell upon "little" common things with no less pleasure than upon the Roman Catholic Church or the genius of Michael Angelo. It is wholly a misconception to conceive of him as confined to the chambers and precincts of a palace of art, shudderingly averse from the spectacle or the intrusion of the "vulgar" world. Yet, if his inevitable mode of presenting life and thought distress you, if his style, which is himself, displease you, you will with difficulty see the rich appreciation of life in his books, his faculty of intimacy with the ways of life and feeling among many various vanished generations of men. We speak of writers who make an "universal appeal." The phrase is very questionable, even when applied to Homer, Shakespeare, the Bible, to Rabelais or Cervantes. And assuredly it is no reproach to any writer that he is not, probably will never be, widely popular. Messrs. Macmillan's édition de luxe of Mr. Pater is to consist of less than a thousand copies; that number, for certain, does not profess to represent the number of those who honestly delight in him, of those to whom his genius is a friend and full of charm. But, if it did, were that anything against him? To court obscurity by wilfulness is not the same thing as to accept it upon the dictates of conscience, by obeying the daimon within you and "hearkening what the inner spirit sings." Mr. Pater kept the laws of his literary conscience as the monk keeps the rules of his order; their rigour was often burdensome, but relaxation would have been treason. They limited his productiveness and the number of his readers, but they were imperative; self-dedicated to his art, he accepted its limitations. If he died "leaving great" prose "unto a little clan" of appreciators, "a little clan" sure of increase and of successors, satis est, for him as for them.

"It is not to be thought of" that Marius and Sebastian van Sterck, and Duke Carl and Denys of Auxerre and Emerald Uthwart, should fade from sight with all their plenitude of bright wistful youth; that the portraits of Ronsard and Montaigne, Marcus Aurelius and the Christians of Rome, should lose their poignancy and fascination. None will surpass in nobility of interpretation these lectures upon Plato and Platonism given at Oxford: few will with greater subtlety of skill pluck out the heart of the secret than he who explored and expounded the secret of Coleridge, Sir Thomas Browne, Winckelmann, Giorgione. Courtliness, suavity, an elegant severity, an excellent persuasiveness, are qualities making for life in literature; they are preservatives against decay, a "savourseme" salt. And Mr. Pater could be, in a peculiar and characteristic way, almost homely also, with little confidences and asides to his reader. Many pages, to some honoured with his friendship, recall the gravely measured voice, in which there was often an undertone of quiet humour, gentle irony, delightful and bland. Learned as he was, he wore his learning lightly. It is possible to read Marius over and over again, and at each reading to discover some fresh proof of those toils and studies whence sprang the book, but which were carefully bidden to conceal themselves. If there be weight in all his writings, there is no touch of pedantry; that was as far from him as slovenliness and flippancy. He will live, indeed, by virtue of much else, but in great measure by virtue of the loveliness, the winning personality, of his gracious writings. There is a sedulous avoidance of "I" in them, yet they have some spiritual affinity with Montaigne and Lamb. They will live, "if precious be the soul of man to man." Their édition de luxe will prove no sumptuous casket enshrining fine gold waxen dim, scentless spices, and treasure turned to dust.

J.

Paris Letter.

(From our French Correspondent.)

Léa, the sequel of M. Marcel Prévost's striking Frédérique, is perhaps a more deeply interesting study than the former. The first volume treats of the start of the Feminist struggle, breathes of all the hope, strength, and enthusiasm which serve to carry forward a new idea or movement on an impetuous wave. In Léa we see all the fatal obstacles destined to produce lassitude, depression, the despairing conviction that the forces of society, the Church, and all that represents the existing state of things, are inevitably leagued against progress and the triumph of individual effort. We witness the breakdown of varied temperaments in the crucial test of arbitrary discipline, the revolt of young blood and nerve against an unwise opposition to natural law. M. Prévost cherishes an unexpressed belief that celibacy is impossible for young and ardent natures without producing insanity or consumption. He does not definitely say so, but it is the moral of his powerful story. But the normal life of woman is there to disprove his theory. All the convents of the world where celibacy is practised are not peopled with lunatics or phthisical subjects. All the old maids of irreproachable lives are not fit subjects for La Salpêtrière. But, apart from this difference, I have nothing to complain of in the book. What interests is the masterly tale of womanly effort and masculine persecution and hostility. Ah, the author is not kind to his own sex! He shows us with terrible conviction and a poignant satire that women who wish to live apart from men, and work on their own account, will never succeed because men will never forgive them and will unscrupulously and mercilessly persecute them. What, after all, do these young women ask of men and of society? The right to live to themselves, to lead chaste lives, and bring up little girls to be virtuous, independent, free, and active. They are young apostles, with a passionate desire to improve the lot and nature of woman. Like all dreamers, apostles, and reformers, they are at loggerheads with actual facts, at war with reality. How are they treated by those in power to do them harm? Because the beautiful and haughty Frédérique would not become the mistress of their landlord, a capitalist, he decides on the ruin of the Feminist College, which, had she become his mistress, he would have protected with all his might. Because these romantic enthusiasts decline to have a priest attached to their college, and assert their intention to walk independent of the Church as well as of society and men, the Abbé Minot works their ruin by means of anonymous and calumniating articles in the clerical papers. These were the tactics of the clerical party in the Affaire Dreyfus, and M. Prévost has dexterously used them here. Through intrigue and anonymous calumny, this hateful and far too familiar type of priest breaks the lives and hearts of a group of noble women for no other reason than that they declined his interference in their affairs. Then the State pronounces against them because their leader, Romaine Pirnitz, decides that they shall be independent of the State too, and will not hear of the school cringing to a minister. The minister, who would have been delighted to patronise and protect them, regarded himself as flouted, and he, too, had a personal slight to revenge. So with the angry capitalist, the angry priest, the angry minister, and a hostile neighbourhood, "The School of Women's Arts" was foredoomed. In Léa the double interest lies in this long agony of an interesting enterprise and the long agony and revolt of a temperament. The charming, tender, and rather weak Léa, in spite of a passionate striving after forgetfulness, cannot forget the lover she renounced at the bidding of her implacable sister and her leader, Romaine Pirnitz: the hour of revolt, we understand, preludes the hour of death. The slow dying of a heroine is a difficult thing to make original and poignant, but M. Prévost here draws us a new and profoundly true picture of a slowly dying life. The revolt of the united lovers is finely revealed: "Georg had known Léa so overflowing with young health! In London, while he himself suffered from a kind of nervous languor, was she not a fountain of joy at whose source he drank? Child of the melancholy north, by her had he learnt the taste of life, of movement; by her had he obtained a glimpse of love." Their brief marriage is a long unsleeping anguish, waiting for the inevitable they feel every hour to be closer upon them; and now and then the sunshine of hope brightens, and Léa seems to promise amendment. All this is told with extraordinary strength and vividness and a charm new in the work of M. Prévost. Torquay is delightfully described; and one feels, in reading these delicate and mournful pages of a love so futilely, so misguidedly interfered with, the misery, the uselessness of this eternal struggle of the sexes. Man is not perfect, neither is woman, and the best both can be taught, since the one lives by the other, is to make the best of each other. "I think," says Léa to her husband, looking gravely across the sea, "that at this moment Pirnitz and Frédérique are struggling against harsh obstacles to free women from the authority, the protection, and love of men. They believe that such is their duty. I myself for long held such a belief. Now I am sure that my duty is to remain near you and to love you." But she does not renounce the old belief unreluctantly, for there is nothing coarse or commonplace about her. She is a fragile and lovely flower, meant by nature to shed perfume and joy around her. Dying, she avers that the two conflicting truths, that of yesterday and that of to-day, engender no hate or revolt within her. Her best reward is to love worthily, for her husband, Georg, is both noble and generous, full of chivalry and delicate sentiment. All these last pages of Léa are beautiful, instinct with poetry, with fervent hope, and a magnanimous conception of humanity.

H. L.

Beating the Bacon by a Neck.

THE inevitable has happened, the pre-ordained has eventuated: the Isabel Carnaby Birthday-Book may now be had of all booksellers. Last May, in dealing with The Farringtons, we quoted this sentence from p. 185 of that novel: "She had run downstairs at full speed in order to enter the dining-room before the dishes, completing her toilet as she fled; and she had only beaten the bacon by a neck." This seemed to us the supreme example of Miss Fowler at her most characteristic—beaten the bacon by a neck. The phrase still haunts us when we turn the pages in which Miss Edith D. Berrington has segregated the good things in "those delightful books"—Concerning Isabel Carnaby, A Double Thread, and The Farringtons. These extracts read like one long defeat of the bacon—they are so breathlessly smart, so thumpingly effective in their own kind. To the present writer they bring back a remote personal experience. He stayed for a week in a Margate boarding-house—that is to say, of course, in a Cliftenville boarding-house. The suburbs simmered and simpered round the punctual table; and the internal arrangements of semi-detached London villas were touched on by their chatelaines. Only one thing relieved their competitive allusions and their silent assessment of each other's incomes. This was a flow of drollery from a young woman who talked pure carnaby, or, as you may say, the finest double thread. She was really very droll and valuable. Her wit was miraculously adapted to the company. They turned to her for a comment, and she uncorked their laughter each time. At that very moment, we fancy, Isabel Carnaby was being written. How delightful are such thoughts!

He who would talk or write carnaby must grasp its simple canon, which is this: to level ideas down. Connect the Parthenon with the pantry, or love with lozenges, or Shakespeare with boots, and you are safe. This kind of wit is not necessarily contemptible. It has its place in the world, and even in literature. But it should stand alone, and be scarce. As the woof of a dramatic representation of life, it is rather terrible. Consider the effect on one's birthday of any one of the following sentences:

It must be delightful to care for a man so much that one would even wash one's face with yellow soap to please him.

I always pray that I may never outlive my illusions or my front teeth, though all else may fail me.

Admiration is like porridge—awfully stodging, but you get hungry again almost as soon as you've eaten it.

A good nose is an abiding resting-place for . . . vanity. You know that it will outlast your time, . . . and that age cannot wither nor custom stale its satisfactory proportions.

There must be something wrong with your back if "God save the Queen" does not send a thrill all down it.

You may change his haberdasher; but you cannot change his nature.

The quality of mercy should not be measured out by teaspoonfuls in a medicine glass, but should be sent round in a watering-cart by the County Council.

Under the date, November 4, we read:

There are few things in the world more heartrending than a humorous recitation—with action. As for me, it numms me completely, and I quietly weep in a remote corner of the room until the carriage comes to take me home.

Alas, even that relief is denied us. But not always are we domestically witty; we are sometimes churchily witty. On Sunday we dangle our gloves over Streatham-hill in a certainty of roast beef. And then we remember comfortably that:

Everything will come right somehow. There is plenty of time between now and the other end of Eternity.

Or we reflect that:

What you call art, is the worship of beauty by the human mind; what you call love, is the worship of beauty by the human heart; and what you call religion, is the worship of beauty by the human soul.

Or we translate the sermon:

You haven't any faults; not a single one. But your virtues are rather overcrowded, and would be all the better for a little thinning out.

After sermon, dinner, and we remark, apropos of both:

They've no sense, men haven't; . . . The very best of them don't properly know the difference between their souls and their stomachs; and they fancy that they are a-wrestling with their doubts, when really it is their dinners that are a-wrestling with them.

We now indulge in such open pleasantries as are not discordant with the rustle of silk. As this:

I feel sure I shall become an old woman before my time, through suffering agonies of indecision as to whether I shall take my waterproof to church or not.

Or this:

It is the duty of all women to look happy; the married ones to show that they don't wish they weren't married, and the unmarried ones to show that they don't wish they were.

Or this:

I have kept my eyes open. Nevertheless there are two things which I have never been able to find out—namely, why people fall in love, and why Punch is published on a Wednesday.

Or this:

I mean to fall in love because every one does, and I hate to be behindhand with things.

Sh-sh-sh! This is Sunday, my dear.

Correspondence.

Lowell's Puns.

SIR,—I fear the writer in Lippincott who records Lowell's puns has heard them very "second hand." That on Eudamidas I heard him make, and unless my memory is worse than that of the Lippincott writer, he spoke of "the brother of Agis, King of Sparta." I have not (living in the country and with a very limited library) a biographical dictionary at hand, but I fear that some of your correspondents may, on the strength of the passage in question, accuse Lowell of ignorance of history, and as he was the very opposite of a random or careless maker of historical allusions, I will run the risk of inaccuracy myself rather than allow Lowell to be accused of a false reading. What I am certain of is, that he did not speak of "the first King of Sparta."

I fear the story of Horsford and the Norse landing is equally incorrect. I knew Horsford intimately, and have talked with him at length on the landing of the Norse, and I never heard him speak of Cambridge as their first landing-place; and as it is miles from the sea, on a stream navigable only by row-boats, we should never have heard the end of students' jokes on the "landing at Cambridge" had he done so.—I am, &c.,

W. J. STILLMAN.

Deepdene, Frimley Green, Surrey:

October 6, 1900.

The Public Eye.

SIR,—I hope you will not consider me hypercritical if I venture to point out, with all deference, what appears to be a curiously-mixed metaphor in the current issue of the ACADEMY. In the paragraph on the first page referring to

MR. T. FISHER UNWIN'S LIST.

FOR LOVERS OF DOGS.

A THOROUGHbred MONGREL. The Tale of a Dog
Told by a Dog to Lovers of Dogs. By STEPHEN TOWNESEND, F.R.C.S. With Drawings by J. A. Shepherd. Cloth, 3s. 6d.

THE HOME of SANTA CLAUS. A Story of Leslie
Gordon's Visit to Father Christmas, and of the Strange Sights he Beheld in the Town of Toys. By GEORGE A. BEST. 100 Illustrations by Arthur Ulyett. Crown 4to, 6s.

THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY of MARK RUTHERFORD.
Edited by his Friend, REUBEN SHAPCOTT. New Edition. Cloth, 3s. 6d.

100 LARGE PICTURES AND DESCRIPTIONS.

THE PARIS SALON of 1900. Nearly 100 Full-Page Illustrations of all the leading pictures exhibited at the Salon this year, with letterpress description of each picture.
Bound in cloth, 5s.
Also in Four Paper-covered Parts, 1s. each.

IN the ICE WORLD of HIMALAYA. Among the Peaks and Passes of Ladakh, Nubra, Sura, and Baltistan. By FANNY
BULLOCK WORKMAN, F.R.S.G.S., M.R.A.S., and WILLIAM
HUNTER WORKMAN, M.A., M.D., F.R.G.S. Authors of "Algerian Memories." With 4 large Maps, and nearly 100 Illustrations. Demy 8vo, cloth gilt, 16s.

A NEW BOOK FOR LOVERS OF POETRY.

RUS DIVINUM. A Nature Poem. By Auguste
SMADA (Capt. Adams, 5th Lancers). Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

A NEW WORK ON JAPAN.

HALF-HOURS in JAPAN. By the Rev. Herbert
MOORE, M.A. (some time S.P.G. Missionary in the country). With over 70 Illustrations and a Map. 6s.

TRAMPING with TRAMPS: Studies and Sketches of Vagabond Life. By JOSHUA FLYNT. 6s.

"This book, fascinating from the point of the mere reader, is a genuine contribution to sociology."—Daily Chronicle.

London: T. FISHER UNWIN, Paternoster Square, E.C.

A HISTORY of the ISLE of MAN. By A. W. Moore.
M.A., Trinity College, Cambridge, Speaker of the House of Keys, Author of "Manx Surnames and Place Names," "Sodor and Man" (S.P.C.K.),
"The Folklore of the Isle of Man," &c. With a new Map of the Island.
In 2 vols., demy 8vo, cloth gilt, 32s.

A FASCINATING NEW NOVEL OF LIFE IN NEW ZEALAND.

THE DEVIL'S HALF ACRE. By "Alien." Author of "The Untold Half," &c. (Unwin's Green Cloth Library), 6s.
The St. James's Gazette says:—"The Devil's Half Acre" is a really good and powerful work. . . . The book is a book to read, and cannot fail to add to 'Alien's' reputation."

THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY of ALLEN LORNE, Minister of Religion. By ALEXANDER MACDOUGALL. Cloth, 6s.

SKETCHES OF AUSTRALIAN BUSH LIFE.

LANDLOPERS. The Tale of a Drifting Travel and the Quest of Pardon and Peace. By J. LE GAY BRERETON.
Cloth, 3s. 6d.

CRITICAL STUDIES. By Ouida. Second Edition.
Just Ready. Cloth, 7s. 6d.

AN IMPORTANT BOOK FOR POLITICIANS.

THE SPEAKER'S CHAIR. Its Origin, the Procedures Historically Associated with it, and Biographical Sketches of its most Notable Occupants. By EDWARD LUMMIS. Cloth, 2s. 6d.

NEW VOLUME IN "THE MASTERS OF MEDICINE SERIES."

THOMAS SYDENHAM. By Joseph Frank Payne,
M.D. (Oxon), Fellow and Harveian Librarian of the Royal College of Physicians, late Fellow of Magdalen College, Oxford. With Photo-gravure Frontispiece. Cloth, 3s. 6d.

Mr. Gilbert Parker's latest book, The Lane that Had No Turning, the book is stated to contain twenty-six stories and sketches, "gleaned from the well-harvested levels of the Pontiac mine." Would it not have been better to have written either of the following phrases—viz., "quarried from the rich levels of the Pontiac mine," or "gleaned from the well-harvested fields of Pontiac"?—I am, &c.,
London, W.: October 6, 1900. D. H. A.
[It would.—Ed.]

An Abuse of "R."

SIR,—There has been an increasing tendency in modern England to refine away the emphatic, original sound of the letter r, with the effect of softening it down when it precedes a vowel, and very frequently of annihilating it when it occurs at the end of a word. The earlier pronunciation still prevails on the Continent and in certain districts of the British Isles, but this is no longer the recognised English usage.

At the present time, however, an inclination to go a step farther has developed itself. It having become understood that ar in such a word as "part" has the sound of ah, the deduction is now often made that, conversely, the sound ah may be expressed in print by ar. Thus, one may see the Indian khaki spelt as kharki, although the true r sound is wholly absent from the word. Similarly, in a dialect story which I have recently seen, the broad Scotch pronunciation of "crab" is expressed by the spelling erarb, instead of by erabb, eraab, or eráb. (The author, of course, was English.) Perhaps as good an illustration as any is the phonetic rendering, by several English writers, of the gypsy word for "yes," which is ah'wa, or ah'wali. This becomes our and ourli.

In all of these cases the letter r is regarded as nearly equivalent to h, and its true sound is completely lost.

Curiously enough, this refining away of the trill in r does not proceed from any inability to pronounce the letter; because we find many of the people who ignore its value in one instance deliberately introducing it in another where it is not wanted. For example, the same person who scarcely pronounces, if he pronounces at all, the final letter of fear and near will voluntarily transform idea into idear, more especially when it is followed by a word beginning with a vowel. There is here, in fact, a remarkable distinction. An Englishman who invariably says idear is, beyond all doubt, underbred. But many Englishmen who pronounce "idea" quite correctly will speak of "the idear of," in obedience to a phonetic instinct which is exhibited in the German "daran" and the French "a-t-il." It is astonishing how many English people of excellent education add this phonetic r in certain connexions. I remember, many years ago, hearing a former Chief Secretary for Ireland, the late Mr. W. E. Forster, speak of "the West Indiar Islands." This was in the course of a lecture delivered before an Edinburgh audience, and a faint shudder ran through the assembly as the words were uttered. Because—although many Scottish people speak the English language in a defective way—this misplacement of r is not one of their peculiarities, and they are apt to regard it as invariably a sign of low breeding.

The gradual modification of r has long been accepted in England; but what is to be the fate of the extreme move illustrated by erarb and kharki? The previous stages are quite intelligible, and may be defended; but when it is proposed to represent the sound ah by the symbol ar, surely it is time to call a halt?—I am, &c.,

DAVID MACRITCHIE.

4, Archibald-place, Edinburgh: October 6, 1900.

Our Weekly Competition.

Result of No. 55 (New Series).

LAST week we offered a prize of One Guinea for the best suggested new paper or magazine which should fill a definite and undoubted gap in periodical literature. The replies are numerous and interesting. There is, in particular, a demand for (a) a magazine devoted to poetry; (b) for a paper in which two writers of opposite opinions should be engaged to deal with each subject; and (c) for new literary papers in the interests of the amateur. But, in our opinion, the most conspicuous gap would be filled by a new halfpenny daily paper, such as is described by two competitors, Mr. E. W. Hendry, 27, Central-road, Manchester, and Mr. Lewis Longfield, 1, Thyra Villas, Ramsgate. We have decided to divide the prize between these two competitors, and we would express our sense of the interest and originality which characterise many other suggestions.

Mr. Hendry writes:

A halfpenny morning paper written in English, not journalese, printed on good paper, in clear type: its news at least founded on fact, not imaginative, and not consisting of scraps and snippets: its politics a very sane Imperialism: its illustrations few, but clearly engraved: its serial story, if it have one, written by some novelist worthy of the name, and not in the style of the penny novelette. At least a quarter of a column should be reserved for verse. Criminal and divorce news should be compressed as much as possible, and not written in pseudo-humorous style. One column should be set apart for intelligent literary criticism, or a literary article written by a man with a mind above the level of the ordinary reader, and its dramatic criticism should not be scamped.

The paper would be content to appeal to the public by its own intrinsic merit, and would not aim at a largest-circulation gained by self-advertising pushfulness. In time it would appeal to that no small portion of the public that has a soul (but not a pocket) above sensational yellow journalism.

Mr. Longfield writes:

Wanted—a halfpenny daily for the masses; with a conscience; that shall not be as extreme as the poles: that shall make accuracy of news its greatest object; shall taboo log-rolling advertisements, and view politics from the standpoint of moderation; whose colour shall be white—not yellow.

(Other replies are as follows:

No magazine as yet exists, to my knowledge, wholly devoted to poetry, wherein a wide field is open. New poets can be brought to light, unknown ones unearthed, and translations can be made from the works of contemporary foreign poets. A paper such as this would give the aspirations of young poets a hearing and encourage poetry for its own sake. The magazine would, of course, include prose articles on poetry, poets, &c. [G. E. M., London.]

Considering the low ebb at which poetry now is, I think that a small periodical, issued monthly, and devoted not to poetry merely, but to all branches of literature and art, would be an important step in reviving it. One thing it must be, and that is—homely; a sort of fireside journal, in which young and old of any rank can delight. Anything that would excite in people a love of poetry and its sister arts could be inserted. [L. F., Manchester.]

A daily paper, called Both Sides, the Arena, or Fair Play, to be run on impartial lines, where people can get the best that can be said on both sides of a question. All articles and reviews to be signed. No advertisement of any kind, except theatrical announcements. Some good fiction always running—subscribers to choose the author of this by ballot. [E. S. C., Redhill.]

I suggest a new weekly paper for the discussion of literary, social, and political topics (after the manner of the Spectator), which shall place before its readers opposing points of view, written by men who are considered the ablest to do so. For example, a Times leader against a Daily News leader in parallel columns.

With regard to literary matters, a book or literary movement should be dealt with from the aspect of each recognised school of criticism. [M. H. H., Sheffield.]

Let the magazine which is meant to fill a place not occupied already be published on the fifteenth day of each month. In each number should be given the name of a subject upon which two writers will express their opinions in the next issue. Both should be authorities upon that class of subjects, but should hold widely divergent ideas thereon. Thus the public will obtain expert views from the opposite poles of thought. [F. P., Kirton-in-Lindsey.]

A paper to be entitled the Imperialist, where Mr. C——n will advocate the extension of England to the planet Mars, and the annexation of the moon, amid unbounded enthusiasm. [C.]

New weekly paper: the Literary Competition. Prospectus sets subjects for competitions in first number. Competitions to be literary in style, but not necessarily in subject. Utmost variety of subjects to be set, so as to secure as many contributors—and purchasers—as possible. Cookery and fashions, for instance, to be prominent subjects. Prospectus to point out, not too apologetically, that the greatest writers have written their best on eating and dress. Such subjects to be treated as a branch of aesthetics, in deference to the fact that questions of taste are capable of indefinite discussion and infinite variety of treatment. [J. D. A., Ealing.]

The new publication I should advocate would be a monthly Journal of Fiction, to do for the great art of novel-writing what the Journal of Art is supposed to do for Art. [R. E. T., Bristol.]

The Literary Passport. Contents: To consist of articles, stories, &c., from totally unknown authors, upon whose efforts no success has hitherto accrued (of course, this would not entail the insertion of matter devoid of interest and merit). Upon acceptance, the work to be paid for in a sum adequate to the labour and thought involved, and the author's name or nom-de-plume to be given prominence on publication. The editorial office to be available as a bureau where aspirants may, at little expense, seek all reasonable help, advice, and information. [E. St. C., Cheltenham.]

I suggest a new weekly journal to be called the Scrap Book. Its contents to consist of extracts from the daily newspapers such as a man of cultured and literary tastes would cut out and paste in his scrap book if he had time to look for them. [A. M., London.]

There seems to me to be a want for a really good weekly periodical for young people. The existing ones, such as the Captain or the Girls' Realm are all very well in their way, but they are very limited and narrow in their scope. Most girls and boys, between the ages of fourteen and twenty, take an intelligent interest in subjects that these periodicals do not write about; I therefore suggest that a paper, to be named Youth, should be published weekly with good articles on politics, literature, science, music, &c., written from different points of view, and in a manner to make them interesting and easily understood.

[Mrs. H., St. Leonards.]

There is a distinct "felt want" in the case of youths between fifteen and eighteen years of age, and a magazine entirely devoted to their requirements would assuredly be a grand success.

A periodical to be called either the Crocheteur, Cranks' Review, or Grievance-Monger, last for preference. A suitable editor might, methinks, be found beachcombing at Brighton, or wandering discursively, his ris comica temporarily eclipsed, about the lanes of Cuckermouth, or run to earth at the office of the Fabian Society. At the start, paper might be published at the Whirlwind's old premises in the Strand, if rooms unoccupied.

[A. G., Cheltenham.]

A reliable Sunday evening paper.

[A. H. L., London.]

I would suggest that a daily paper, which I would call Big Print or some similar title, would be largely bought by people who, like myself, desire to know the morning's news, but find the type of the ordinary daily paper somewhat trying. [T. W. W., Handsworth.]

Other replies received from: C. S., Tarbet; E. L., Didsbury; "Without Fear or Favour" (no name or address); L. C. J., Edinburgh; H. J., London; M. C. N., London; A. M., Glasgow; H. S. W., Durham; A. R. P., Worthing; H. R. C., Egham; M. H., Hampstead; T. C., Buxted; E. A. M., London; J. W. H., Stoke-on-Trent; J. J. B., Glasgow; Mrs. S., London; C. W., Hull; G. R. W., Cambridge; W. S. B., London; M. H., Waleham St. Laurence.

Competition No. 56 (New Series).

We publish this week a special supplement, containing publishers' announcements for the autumn season. From the lists therein printed we ask our readers to pick out what, in their opinion, promise to be:

- (a) The two most interesting biographies.
- (b) The two most interesting works of history.
- (c) The two most interesting works of travel.
- (d) The two most interesting religious works.
- (e) The two most interesting novels.
- (f) The two most interesting books for children.

To the competitor whose selection most nearly resembles that produced by a collation of all replies received a cheque for a guinea will be sent.

RULES.

Answers, addressed "Literary Competition, THE ACADEMY, 43, Chancery-lane, W.C.," must reach us not later than the first post of Wednesday, October 17. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found on the second page of Wrapper, or it cannot enter into competition. Competitors sending more than one attempt at solution must accompany each attempt with a separate coupon; otherwise the first only will be considered. We cannot consider anonymous answers.

F. V. WHITE & CO.'S LIST. ELEVEN POPULAR NOVELS.

Price 6s. each.

A SELF-MADE COUNTESS.

(3rd Edition.) JOHN STRANGE WINTER.

IN WHITE RAIMENT.

(2nd Edition.) WILLIAM LE QUEUX.

IN SHEEP'S CLOTHING.

HUME NISBET.

THE SHIELD OF HONOUR.

RICHARD HENRY SAVAGE.

BROTHERS OF THE CHAIN.

GEORGE GRIFFITH.

THE PRINCESS OF COPPER.

ARCHIBALD CLAVERING GUNTER.

THE GODDESS—A DEMON.

RICHARD MARSH.

DAUNAY'S TOWER.

ADELINE SERGEANT.

THE WORLD'S BLACKMAIL.

LUCAS CLEEVE.

THE LOVE OF TWO WOMEN.

JOHN JONES.

THE FLICK OF FORTUNE.

THOMAS PARKES.

"An interesting and clever book"—Vanity Fair."A book that is certainly to be read"—Black and White."We hope that it will meet with the recognition it deserves."—Illustrated London News.

F. V. WHITE & CO., 14, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C.

JUST ISSUED BY THE RATIONALIST PRESS ASSOCIATION, LIMITED.

414 pages, price 6s. net; by post, 6s. 1d.

THE RIDDLE OF THE UNIVERSE

At the CLOSE of the NINETEENTH CENTURY.

By PROFESSOR ERNST HAECKEL

(OF JENA).

This great work, already famous on the Continent, contains the ripened conclusions based on the writer's life-long and well-known scientific researches. It is a unique exposition, both from the philosophic and the historical point of view, of the evolutionary Monism of modern science.

"About the energy, the vigour, and the conviction with which Professor Haeckel presses his views there is as little doubt as there is of his immensity of attainments and the authority with which he speaks on all questions of natural science."—Daily Chronicle.

London: WATTS & CO., 17, Johnson's Court, Fleet Street, E.C.

THE ENGLISH HISTORICAL REVIEW.

Edited by S. R. GARDINER, D.C.L., LL.D., and REGINALD L. POOLE, M.A., Ph.D.

No. 69.—OCTOBER, 1900.—Royal 8vo, price 5s.

1.—ARTICLES.

CUSTOMS of the WESTERN PYRENEES. By A. R. WHITEWAY.

COLCHESTER and the COMMONWEALTH. By J. H. ROUND.

THE FOREIGN POLICY of ENGLAND under WALPOLE. By

BASIL WILLIAMS. Part III.

NELSON at NAPLES. By Captain A. T. MAHAN, D.C.L., U.S.N.

2.—NOTES and DOCUMENTS. 3.—REVIEW of BOOKS. 4.—NOTICES of PERIODICAL PUBLICATIONS.

THE EDINBURGH REVIEW.

No. 394.—OCTOBER, 1900.—8vo, price 6s.

1. THE WAR in SOUTH AFRICA.

2. M. ROSTAND and the LITERARY PROSPECTS of the DRAMA.

3. THE COMPLETION of ITALIAN UNITY, 1861-1871.

4. THE WORKS of LORD BYRON.

5. HERMANN VON HELMHOLTZ.

6. MUNICIPAL TRADING.

7. THE ROMAN CONQUEST of GAUL.

8. CHINA and INTERNATIONAL QUESTIONS.

9. THE RESTORATION RÉGIME in SCOTLAND.

10. THE SICK and WOUNDED in SOUTH AFRICA.

11. THE GENERAL ELECTION.

LONGMANS, GREEN & CO., London, New York, and Bombay.

NEW SERIES.

No. 36.

MIND:

OCTOBER Number, Price 4s.

A Quarterly Review of Psychology and Philosophy

Edited by Dr. G. F. STOUT.

With the co-operation of Dr. E. C. CHEAD, Professors WARD and E. B. TITCHENER.

Contents: I. PRAGMATISM. W. CALDWELL.—II. ON the CONCEPTION of 'ENEPTEIA' 'AKINHETIA', by F. C. S. SCHILLER.—III. THE PRINCIPLE of LEAST ACTION as a PSYCHOLOGICAL PRINCIPLE. W. R. B. GIBSON.—IV. THE NORMAL SELF: a Suggested Formula for Evolutionary Ethics. R. R. MARSH.—V. THE PSYCHOLOGICAL and SOCIOLOGICAL STUDY of ART. Y. HIRN.—VI. DISCUSSIONS: Some Physical Conclusions in Respect to Space. Dr. S. TOIVAS PERSTON.—VII. CRITICAL NOTICES: John Burnet, The Ethics of Aristotle, R. P. HARDIE; J. H. STUBBS, What is Thought? W. H. FAIRBROTHER.—VIII. NEW BOOKS.—IX. PHILOSOPHICAL PERIODICALS.—X. NOTES and NEWS.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE,

14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, London; 29, South Frederick Street, Edinburgh; and 7, Broad Street, Oxford.

Smith, Elder & Co.'s New Books.

MR. CONAN DOYLE'S HISTORY OF THE BOER WAR.

ON OCTOBER 23rd.—With Maps, large post 8vo, 7s. 6d.

THE GREAT BOER WAR

By A. CONAN DOYLE,

AUTHOR OF "THE WHITE COMPANY," "RODNEY STONE," "THE GREEN FLAG, AND OTHER STORIES OF WAR AND SPORT," &c

Mr. Conan Doyle was present in South Africa during a considerable portion of the war. He saw something of the operations with his own eyes, and he had exceptional opportunities of meeting and cross-examining officers and men who had taken part in those events. He combines considerable knowledge of military affairs with a fearless impartiality. Mr. Conan Doyle's history is the first attempt to gather the events of this drama into a single complete one-volume narrative.

Second Impression of

MR. MERRIMAN'S NEW NOVEL.

NOTICE.—A SECOND IMPRESSION of

"THE ISLE OF UNREST,"

by H. SETON MERRIMAN, Author of

'The Sowers,' &c., is Now Ready. With illustrations, crown 8vo, 6s

MORNING POST.—"A really admirable novel, vigorous and vivid, artistic in conception and execution, with an ingenious plot, and with characters of flesh and blood, whose doings we follow with eagerness. The sort of tale for which the reader neglects everything until he has finished it."

NEW NOVEL BY THE AUTHOR OF "VICE VERSA."

With a Frontispiece, crown 8vo, 6s.

THE BRASS BOTTLE.

By F. ANSTEY,

AUTHOR OF "VICE VERSA," "THE GIANT'S ROBE,"

"A FALLEN IDOL," &c.

BOOKMAN.—"A remarkably clever and brilliant novel."

NEW WORK BY FRANK T. BULLEN.

PUBLISHED ON OCTOBER 10th.—Large post 8vo, 7s. 6d.

THE MEN OF THE MERCHANT SERVICE.

Being the Polity of the Mercantile Marine for Longshore Readers.

By FRANK T. BULLEN, F.R.G.S.,

AUTHOR OF "THE CRUISE OF THE 'CACHALOT,'" "THE LOG OF A SEA-WAIF," &c.

NEW NOVEL BY SIR WILLIAM MAGNAY, BART.

NOW READY.—Crown 8vo, 6s.

THE MAN-TRAP.

By Sir WILLIAM MAGNAY, Bart.,

AUTHOR OF "THE PRIDE OF LIFE," "THE HEIRESS OF THE SEASON," &c.

NEW NOVEL BY OLIVE BIRRELL.

ON OCTOBER 26th.—Crown 8vo, 6s.

LOVE IN A MIST.

By OLIVE BIRRELL,

AUTHOR OF "THE AMBITION OF JUDITH," "ANTHONY LANGSYDE," &c.

NEW VOLUME OF SMITH, ELDER & CO.'S POPULAR 2s. 6d. LIBRARY.

NOW READY.—In limp red cloth, crown 8vo, 2s. 6d.

THE HEIRESS of the SEASON. By Sir William

MAGNAY, Bart., Author of "The Pride of Life," &c.

London: SMITH, ELDER & CO., 15, Waterloo Place, S.W.

A. & C. BLACK'S LIST

NOW READY.
In 2 vols., square demy 8vo, cloth, price £2 2s. net.
THE VENETIAN REPUBLIC.
Its Rise, its Growth, and its Fall,
421-1797.

By W. CAREW HAZLITT.
Mr. Carew Hazlitt's volumes are the only complete history in English of the once great and famous Venetian Republic. In 1860 the author brought out a book which was recognised as the standard work on the subject, but in the forty years which have since elapsed, such vast stores of additional information have been made accessible, that the present book is, to a large extent, not only rewritten, but rearranged, while the narrative is carried down to the close of the independent government, and a series of chapters illustrating social institutions has been introduced.

A TREATISE on ZOOLOGY.

By E. RAY LANKESTER, M.A., LL.D., F.R.S., Hon. Fellow of Exeter College, Oxford; Director of the Natural History Departments of the British Museum; Fullerian Professor of Physiology and Comparative Anatomy in the Royal Institution of London. Profusely illustrated. To be completed in Ten Parts.

NOW READY.
Part II. THE PORIFERA and Cœlentera. By E. A. MICHIN, M.A., G. H. FOWLER, B.A., Ph.D., and GILBERT C. BOURNE, M.A. Part III. THE ECHINODERMA. By F. A. BATHER, M.A., assisted by J. W. GREGORY, D.Sc., and E. S. GOODRICH, M.A. Demy 8vo, paper covers, price 12s. 6d. net each; cloth, price 15s. net each.
"What is undoubtedly the text-book of zoology for advanced students."—Glasgow Herald.

NOW READY.
Crown 8vo, cloth, price 10s. 6d.
HANDBOOK to CHRISTIAN
AND
ECCLESIASTICAL ROME.

Parts III. and IV. in One Volume. By M. A. R. TUKER and HOPE MALLESON. Part III. MONASTICISM in ROME. Part IV. ECCLESIASTICAL ROME. Containing Illustrations of the Badges of Monastic Orders, Plan and View of a Monastery, Plan of the Vatican, Arms of 83 Popes, and 9 Coloured Pages of Monastic Orders and Habits.

"It is written in a reverent and liberal critical spirit, recourse has been had to the latest authorities, and we do not hesitate to recommend the volume as certain to be most useful not merely to the visitor to Rome, but also to all who desire to know something of Western Monasticism."—Guardian.

NOW READY.
In 1 vol., large crown 8vo, containing 151 illustrations, price 7s. 6d. net.

STUDIES in FOSSIL BOTANY

By DUKINFIELD HENRY SCOTT, M.A., Ph.D., F.R.S., F.L.S., F.G.S., Honorary Keeper of the Jodrell Laboratory, Royal Gardens, Kew; Author of "An Introduction to Structural Botany."

"An excellent book. . . . To the botanist it will appeal as a thoroughly sound and scientific piece of exposition, which is a considerable contribution to a recent and important branch of the subject." The Spectator.

READY SHORTLY.
Cloth, gilt top, price 2s. net per volume.
HORÆ SUBSECVÆ.

By JOHN BROWN, M.D., LL.D., &c. New Edition. In 3 vols., 6½ × 4½ in., printed on thin Bible paper, uniform in size with Nelson's New Century Library.

READY SHORTLY.
Crown 8vo, cloth, price 2s. 6d.
ON SANITARY AND OTHER MATTERS.

By GEORGE S. KEITH, M.D., LL.D., F.R.C.P.E., Author of "A Plea for a Simpler Life," "Facts of an Old Physician," &c.

This volume, as the title indicates, treats of subjects varying somewhat in kind, but all pointing out errors on sanitary or economic matters which seriously affect the well-being of the community, and which, but for the strong resisting power of conventionalism, might be easily remedied, and with much advantage to all. The last three papers go mainly to confirm what the author has already brought forward as to the evils resulting from the present system of over-feeding, over-stimulation, and drugging, both in health and disease.

ADAM & CHARLES BLACK,
8, ho Square, London.

HODDER & STOUGHTON'S
NEW WORKS.

S. R. CROCKETT.
THE STICKIT MINISTER'S
WOOLING, and other Galloway Stories. By S. R. CROCKETT, Author of "Ione March," &c. Crown 8vo, cloth, price 6s.

JOSEPH HOCKING.
THE MADNESS of DAVID
BARING. By JOSEPH HOCKING, Author of "The Purple Robe," &c. With 8 Illustrations by Sydney Cowell. Cloth, price 3s. 6d.

THE BOOK OF THE MOMENT.
THE EARL of ROSEBURY, K.G.
By JANE T. STODDART.
An Illustrated Biography.
Price 6s. net.

IAN MACLAREN.
CHURCH FOLKS. By Ian MACLAREN, Author of "Beside the Bonnie Brier Bush," &c. Cloth, price 3s. 6d.

ARCHBISHOP ALEXANDER.
THE FINDING of the BOOK, and other Poems. By WILLIAM ALEXANDER, D.D., Archbishop of Armagh and Primate of All Ireland. Price 6s. net.

ARCHDEACON DIGGLE.
SHORT STUDIES in HOLINESS.
By the Venerable JOHN W. DIGGLE, M.A., Archdeacon of Westmoreland. Price 3s. 6d.

THE BISHOP OF DERRY.
POEMS, Chiefly Sacred. By the Right Rev. GEORGE A. CHADWICK, D.D., Bishop of Derry and Raphoe. Cloth, price 5s. net.

THE SECOND VOLUME OF STUDIES of the PORTRAIT of CHRIST. By the Rev. GEORGE MATHESON, M.A., D.D., F.R.S.E. Edinburgh. Second Volume, completing the Work. Crown 8vo, cloth, price 6s. The First Volume of the work is now in its Fifth Edition, price 6s.

REV. G. CAMPBELL MORGAN.
THE SPIRIT of GOD. By the Rev. G. CAMPBELL MORGAN. Cloth, price 3s. 6d.

REV. T. G. SELBY.
CHINAMEN at HOME. By the Rev. T. G. SELBY, for Twelve Years Missionary in China, Author of "The Unheeding God," &c. Cloth, price 3s. 6d. net.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "CLEWS to HOLY WRIT."

IRENE PETRIE, Missionary to KASHMIR. By Mrs. ASHLEY CARUS-WILSON, B.A. With Illustrations by Geoffrey Milne and others. Crown 8vo, cloth, price 6s.

GEORGE WHITEFIELD.
GEORGE WHITEFIELD, M.A., Field Preacher. By JAMES PATERSON GLEDSTONE. With Illustrations. Crown 8vo, cloth, price 6s.

ELLEN THORNEYCROFT FOWLER.
THE ISABEL CARNABY BIRTH-DAY BOOK. Including Selections from "Concerning Isabel Carnaby," "A Double Thread," and "The Farringtons." Arranged by E. D. BERRINGTON. Cloth, price 3s. 6d.

ERNEST SETON-THOMPSON.
THE BIOGRAPHY of a GRIZZLY, and 78 Drawings. By ERNEST SETON-THOMPSON, Author of "Wild Animals I have Known." Cloth, price 6s.

AMY LE FEUVRE.
BROWNIE. By Amy Le Feuvre. With 4 Illustrations by W. H. C. Groome. Price 2s.

London: HODDER & STOUGHTON,
27, Paternoster Row, E.C.

MACMILLAN & CO.'S
LATEST LIST.

READY THIS DAY.
OLIVER CROMWELL

By JOHN MORLEY.

With Portrait. 8vo, 10s. net.

* Also an Edition fully Illustrated with carefully Authenticated Portraits in Public and Private Galleries, and with Reproductions of Contemporaneous Prints in the British Museum and the University of Oxford. Extra crown 8vo, 11s. net.

The Latest 6s. Novels.

MARION CRAWFORD.
IN THE PALACE of THE KING.
[Wednesday.]

EGERTON CASTLE.
MARSHFIELD THE OBSERVER.

SECOND IMPRESSION.
ROSA N. CAREY.
RUE WITH A DIFFERENCE.

CHARLOTTE M. YONCE.
MODERN BROODS.

GRACE M. HURD.
THE BENNETT TWINS.

SOLDIERING in CANADA: Recollections and Experiences. By Lieut.-Colonel GEORGE T. DENISON, Author of "A History of Modern Cavalry," &c. With Portrait. Extra crown 8vo, ss. 6d. net.

A LIFE of FRANCIS PARKMAN
By CHARLES H. FARNHAM. With Portrait. Extra crown 8vo, gilt top, ss. 6d. net.

TWO NEW BOOKS for the YOUNG

THE TALE of the LITTLE TWIN
DRAGONS. With Coloured Illustrations by S. ROSAMOND PRAEGER. Oblong 4to, Picture boards, 6s.

MRS. MOLESWORTH'S NEW BOOK.
THE HOUSE THAT GREW. Illustrated by ALICE B. WOODWARD. Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d.

Crown 8vo, 7s. 6d.
COLLECTED POEMS of
T. E. BROWN
Author of "Folk's-le Yarns," "The Marx Witch," &c. With Portrait.

GOLDEN TREASURY SERIES.
NEW VOLUMES.
MISCELLANIES (including EUPHRANOR, POLONIUS, &c.). By EDWARD FITZGERALD. Pott 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.
[Ready on Tuesday.]

TWO ESSAYS on OLD AGE and FRIENDSHIP. Translated from the Latin of Cicero by E. S. SHUCKBURGH. Pott 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

MACMILLAN & CO., LTD., London.

The Academy

A Weekly Review of Literature and Life.

No. 1485. Established 1869.

20 October, 1900.

Price Threepence.
[Registered as a Newspaper.]

The Literary Week.

IN our Competition column will be found the results of a plébiscite which we have taken on the question, Which are the most interesting books announced by publishers this autumn? The combined opinions of our competing readers are embodied in the following list of announced books, which are placed in the order of their ascertained popularity, and with the number of votes received by each:

L. Huxley	Life and Letters of Macmillan.
Huxley	Huxley
D. Morley	Oliver Cromwell
Dr. Doyle	The Great Boer War
J. McCarthy	The Four Georges
E. S. Grogan and	Chatto & Windus.
A. H. Sharp	From the Cape to Cairo
Henry James	Hurst & Blackett.
Principal Fairbairn	A Little Tour in France
Philosophy of Christian	Heinemann.
Religion	Hodder & Stoughton
F. T. Bullen	With Christ at Sea
J. M. Barrie	Hodder & Stoughton
Mrs. H. Ward	Tommy and Grizel
A. Lang	Cassell.
Author of Elizabeth	Eleanor
and her German April Baby's Book of	Smith, Elder.
Garden	Grey Fairy Book
Tunes	Longmans.

OF Chaucer celebrations there will be many next week. We have already referred to the Chaucer Exhibition at the British Museum; this should not be missed by those interested in the poet. Next week's celebrations will serve a very useful purpose, but the real appreciation of Chaucer that exists to-day is already embodied in Dr. Furnivall's edition of the Tales; in Prof. Skeats's complete edition of the poet's works; and in the Kelmscott Press Chaucer, with its ornaments by Morris and its pictures by Burne-Jones.

LAST week-end was no time for novel reading. Dr. Morrison's account of the siege of the Peking Legations was begun in the Times on Saturday, continued on Monday, and added to on Tuesday. In all, there were nearly twenty-four columns of thrilling reading.

THE long-expected Memoirs and Correspondence of Coventry Patmore, in two large octavo volumes, unobtrusively handsome in their dull red covers, will be published on Monday. The illustrations, mostly in photogravure, are numerous. The first volume contains, among other portraits, that of Emily Augusta Patmore, the poet's first wife, and the heroine to some extent of The Angel in the House. The extent to which Mrs. Patmore was portrayed in that poem has been frequently exaggerated. Of direct portraiture there is little. "This view," says Mr. Champneys, "is confirmed by the fact that none of the very few people living who knew Emily Augusta Patmore well can point to more than a few passages in The Angel which appear to them to represent her personality. I also find in a diary of Patmore's, written after her death, the following heading: 'Passages of The Angel in the House which more particularly describe or apply to her.' This is all:

the passages were never transcribed. But the entry appears to me to imply—a very moderate space being left between this and the next—that he would have found but few quotations which embody direct portraiture."

IN connexion with the vexed question of cut versus uncut edges, Mr. Murray has devised a means by which all books can have open and yet not smooth cut foredge and tail; and this with no more cost than that of trimming as at present. The result is attained by the simple expedient of so "imposing" that the "bolts" fold out (instead of in as formerly) and are opened by the circular trimming knife acting in the usual way, but cutting off the closed bolts instead of the open edges. Mr. Murray hopes that now everyone will be satisfied, since the top will be smooth cut to keep out dust and enable the leaves to be turned readily, the foredge and tail open to satisfy the busy man, and yet left rough to please the eye of him who loves, and will now be entirely deprived of, the joy of the paper knife.

ON Wednesday the 31st Mr. Stephen Phillips's poetical drama, "Herod," will be produced at Her Majesty's Theatre. A great deal of interest centres in this event, especially as Mr. Phillips has been disappointed hitherto of seeing "Paola and Francesca" staged. The new play has but one scene, and little "scenery." The play will emphatically be the thing, the play and the players. That "Herod" will contain many beautiful lines is to be expected; but the purely literary beauty of the drama is not the most important consideration; the questions to be answered are: Has Mr. Phillips developed a true dramatic sense? and, Can he, working in such fine material as his poetical instincts lead him to select, obtain a hold on playgoers?

MR. HAROLD GORST asks us to say that, having resigned the editorship of the Review of the Week, he is no longer responsible for any further issues of that paper.

THE supplement to the Encyclopædia Britannica, which is now being prepared, will be published next year. A supplemental volume to the Dictionary of National Biography, bringing the work up to the end of 1900, is also in preparation.

THE work on Egypt and the Soudan on which the late Mr. H. D. Traill was engaged for some time before his death will be published almost immediately.

TO the list we gave last week of newly-elected Members of Parliament who have some connexion with literature, the following additions must be made:

Mr. R. B. Haldane, Studies in Philosophic Criticism.
Col. A. M. Brookfield, The Speaker's A. B. C., and novels.
Sir J. T. Brauner, interest in the Star and Speaker.
Mr. J. W. Crombie, contributor to Edinburgh Review and periodicals.
Mr. F. S. Stevenson, Life of Bishop Grosseteste.

THERE seems to be a good deal of misapprehension about the new Stevenson book, In the South Seas. This is not a new work, though it is a comparatively unknown one, being accessible only in the Edinburgh edition. Moreover, the series of letters forming the book was published in New York four years ago by Messrs. Scribner. We understand that these letters were the result of three voyages—one of seven months, from June, 1888, to January, 1889, in the yacht Casco, which embraced a trip with San Francisco as a starting-point to the Marquesas, to Paumotu, Tahiti, and northward to the Hawaiian Islands, where the Casco was paid off, the next six months being spent at Honolulu. The second voyage, which was taken in the trading schooner Equator, was from Honolulu to the Gilbert Islands; while the third voyage, which lasted from April to September, 1890, was taken in the trading steamer Janet Nicoll, starting from Sydney to Penrhyn in the Eastern to the Marshall Islands in the Western Pacific. Before starting on these voyages Stevenson had made arrangements for the serial publication of the letters which go to make up the volume, a portion of which originally appeared in London in the pages of Black and White, February to December, 1891, the letters as a whole appearing in the columns of the New York Sun during the same period.

MANY of Stevenson's letters, as edited by Mr. Colvin, contain descriptions of the same tour; but we do not know whether the book announced by Messrs. Chatto & Windus will embody any of these. Among these letters is the draft of a dedication to John Addington Symonds, which was intended for the Scribner volume, but was never used. The following is part of it:

You are to conceive us, therefore, in strange circumstances and very pleasing; in a strange land and climate, the most beautiful on earth: surrounded by a foreign race that all travellers have agreed to be the most engaging. . . . It was you, dear Symonds, who should have gone upon that voyage and written this account. With your rich stores of knowledge you could have remarked and understood a thousand things of interest and beauty that escaped my ignorance: and the brilliant colours of your style would have carried into a thousand sick rooms the sea air and the strong sun of tropic islands.

This is certainly not up to Stevenson's level in dedications.

It is curious that two men so closely associated with Dickens as Mr. John Baird, of Chatham, and Mr. George Dolby, Dickens's secretary, should have died within a few days of each other. Mr. Baird was Dickens's double; Mr. Dolby was his shadow. It is suggested that the resemblance between Mr. Sapsea and the Dean of Cloisterham, in Edwin Drood, was suggested to Dickens by the likeness between himself and Mr. Baird. Possibly. Mr. Baird was an estimable man, pardonably proud of a likeness to Dickens so complete that his six-year-old daughter once mistook the novelist for her own father!

THE Society for the Protection of Birds is offering two prizes, of £10 and £5 respectively, for the best papers on the protection of British birds. The mode of dealing with the subject is left entirely to competitors, but certain suggestions are made by the Secretary, who may be addressed at 3, Hanover-square, W.

WE are pretty well hardened to the adventures of authorship, we are not easily surprised, but we confess that our breath is taken away by The Nineteenth Century: a Poem, written by Mr. J. Rutter, and published by Mr. Burleigh. The mere appearance of the book is out of the common; its oblong shape, card-board covers, and red backing give it the appearance of a book of statistics, or a commercial diary. But it contains a poem in twenty-nine cantos. Twenty-nine cantos on such subjects as "Agricultural Depression—Old Times—Remedies," "The Masses—the Working Man—Strikes," "Review of the Anglican Church Generally," &c., &c. Mr. Rutter tells us that his poem was not written of "set purpose," but has "grown like a tree during the last twenty-three or twenty-four years—portions having been written from time to time without any plan, as the thoughts occurred." We are abashed by the magnitude of a poem in which the interests of a century are surveyed, and if we quote it must be at random. This is how Mr. Rutter disposes of Volapuk and rival schemes for a universal language:

The brand-new language just complete
For human favour to compete,
And fit for international use—
Up starts some aggravating goose
And rakes his brain to make another,
And emulate his learned brother.

Thus two new languages are found
Contending for the envied ground.
Alas for universal speech!
I know not when the goal you'll reach.
I should not wonder if at last
Babel yet held the fortress fast.

Seeing our fruitful English race
Fills o'er the earth each vacant space,
Whole continents has colonised,
With force by no means minimised,
And spreading, ruling, still prevails,
Whatever foe her march assails—
If any tongue shall stand in force
For international discourse,
To bind in one for common good
The universal brotherhood—
I rather think we soon shall see
The ENGLISH language that will be!

The poem is "wholly composed of lines like these."

THE editor of Crampton's—formerly Chapman's—Magazine makes frank confession this month of his inability to hold his subscribers by that exclusive diet of short stories with which they have hitherto been satisfied. Henceforth Crampton's Magazine is to be stiffened with articles of serious interest. The editorial mind is not often unbattered so freely as in the following pronouncement:

Crampton's had a special characteristic; fiction monopolised its space. If it succeeded as a "magazine of fiction"—and sixty-five numbers are evidence on that point—why should it not continue to succeed by the same policy? Alas! as the potter's song hath it—

All things must change
Nothing that is can pause or stay.

Blame the public mind, if you will, and not only the philistine part of it. Chapman's (as it was first baptised) rose upon the wave of interest in the New Short Fiction that reached its height five years ago. Modesty forbids that we should attempt to say how this single publication has managed to survive the death of that fashion. Where are all the brave young conteurs of that swelling-time? Has the success of Kipling and Conan Doyle and Marie Corelli killed them? Where are Mr. Lane's Yellow-Book makers, where the lions cub of the National Observer and Pall Mall, the sugary eroticisms of Richard Le Gallienne, the savage analysis of George Moore, the breezy Cornish sketches of A. T. Quiller-Conch, the minor notes of the newly-arrived London Irish, and the crabbed imaginings of John Davidson? Gone, with the snows of yester-year. It is best to face the fact that the impulse has worked itself out. Short-story writers remain; short-story writers of a sort are more plentiful than ever. But the movement is at an end. Exceptions there are, and it will be our endeavour no less than heretofore, to catch and constrain them into these pages. Fiction will still be their chief, though no longer their only constituent. The short-story is a genuine and permanent literary form, but a monthly limited to short fiction is a pretence to an inspiration which, in fact, has passed away.

We do not necessarily subscribe to all the adjectives in the above extract. But the magazine in its new form has our best wishes. A feature of the present issue is an interview with the Chinese Ambassador, Sir Chi Len Fo Leng Luh.

THE National Home Reading Union is active again. It propounds for its winter season courses of English History, Modern English Literature, Shakespeare, Brown-ing, Mediaeval and Early Renaissance Literature, British Colonies and Dependencies—India, French History, &c., &c. The home-reader takes his choice. He next consults the list of books (a) required and (b) recommended for the course he selects. It may be of interest to give the list of books for the Modern English Literature course. The books required for this course are :

Macanlay's Essays.	Matt. Arnold's Poems.
Carlyle's Hero Worship.	Romola.
Lowell's Study Windows.	In Memoriam.
Browning's Poems (Selections).	Diana of the Crossways.

The books recommended are these :

Clough's Poems.	Saintsbury's Corrected Im-
Morris's Life and Death of	pressions.
Jason.	Scherer's English Literature.
C. M. Rossetti's Poems.	Seeley's Lectures and Essays.
D. G. Rossetti's Poems.	Stephen's Hours in a Library.
Mrs. E. B. Browning's Poems	Swinburne's Studies in Prose
—Selections.	and Poetry.
Swinburne's Poems — Selec-	Garnett's Life of Thomas
tions.	Carlyle.
Watson's Lachrymæ Musarum.	Tennyson's Lord Tennyson, a
Gosse's Modern English Liter-	Memoir.
ature.	Cross's Life of George Eliot.
Oliphant's Victorian Writers.	Sharp's Life of Robert
Arnold's Essays in Criticism	Browning
(2 vols.).	Letters of R. and
Balfour's Essays and Ad-	E. B. Browning.
dresses.	Blackmore's Lorna Doone.
Birrell's Obiter Dicta (2 vols.).	Brontë's Shirley.
Church's Essays.	Dickens's David Copperfield.
Davidson's Prolegomena to In	„ The Pickwick Papers.
Memoriam.	Gaskell's Cranford.
Dowden's Studies in Litera-	Kingsley's Two Years Ago.
ture.	Oliphant's Salem Chapel.
Lang's Letters in Literature.	Reade's Cloister and Hearth.
Maurice's Friendship of Books.	Thackeray's Vanity Fair.
	Morley's Studies in Literature.

The list is long, but it is intended only as a well from which the reader may draw as much good water as he wants.

WE agree with the Daily Chronicle in thinking that the Society of Arts has worded the inscription it has just placed on the Ruskin birthplace in Hunter-street, Bruns-wick-square, without much regard to the man in the street. The inscription is :

JOHN RUSKIN,
ARTIST AND AUTHOR,
BORN HERE.
B. 1819 — D. 1900.

It was not the least tragedy of Ruskin's life that he could not win the description "Artist and Author," but had to be, in his own and the world's estimation, Author and Artist. As the Chronicle says, the future man in the street who reads the tablet in Hunter-street may easily be led to look for Ruskin's pictures in the National Gallery, instead of applying for his books at the Free Library.

THE new threepenny society paper, the Onlooker, prints a story, from its Paris correspondent, "Adrienne," of Marie Bashkirtseff, whose final letters and diaries have just been published in the Gentlewoman. The writer knew Marie Bashkirtseff, and admired her beauty and wit; nevertheless she has no scruple in saying that Marie was "an impertinent minx." She tells the following story :

I often met her in the house of a mutual friend, who one day gave a little fiête in his country seat near Paris. Marie Bashkirtseff and Bastien Lepage graced the party, and the lovely Russian girl, who, with her halo of pale blonde hair and her clinging soft white frock, looked like a Druidic priestess, began the day in the most triumphant mood—for was not she the star, nay, the sun, towards which we all turned our eyes, blinking before so much loveliness! Bastien Lepage, her somewhat heavy but decidedly quaint adorer, was walking in her train, the fumes of incense were rising around her, she was in her own element, and her little feet did not touch the ground to which we, simple mortals, were attached.

It happened, however, that myself and a friend had just returned from Venice, and a few words were said at lunch about the city so dear to all artists, and which Bastien Lepage had just then the intention of visiting. So, a little later in the afternoon, as we had both gone to sit under a shady tree somewhat apart from the noisy rest, the young painter came, bringing with him a rustic seat which he installed near ours, and began asking questions about Venice. He grew interested, and I may as well confess that we fell quite under the charm of his original mind, and that the conversation lasted a good three-quarters of an hour, if not more. Suddenly a most perfect little hand fell heavily on the young man's shoulder, and I saw Marie Bashkirtseff, white, and trembling with rage, looking at us with the eyes of a cat who sees her kittens in danger. She unceremoniously pulled the chair under Bastien Lepage: "Eh bien!" she cried, hoarsely, "have you nothing more interesting to do than lose your time with old women?" (To shelter our feminine vanity, let me say that the elder of us was scarcely above thirty.) Bastien Lepage got up; he could not help it, for his seat was upset on the grass: "No, nothing more interesting, mademoiselle," he answered, frigidly. A flood of tears came to the large eyes of the violent little witch, and—let those who have never loved throw the first stone—Lepage became red to the ears, turned on his heels, and left us "in the lurch."

To the Agnostic Annual Mr. Leslie Stephen contributes a striking paper, called "The Triumph of Rationalism in Religion." He suggests that much that has ceased to be dogma may, perhaps, be retained as symbols, and concludes an article—which we do not attempt to summarise—in these words :

To "prove" a religion would be as irrelevant as to prove a poetry. An unbeliever may listen to the music of the mass, and set it to what words he pleases. It may stimulate emotions of love or reverence, of joy or sadness; and they may be associated in the mind of each hearer with an entirely different set of concrete images. If to the believer it suggests the Christian legend, it may call up to others any series of events, real or imaginary, by which his deepest emotions are aroused and stimulated. If the divine were to accept such a position, he would have to resign the claim to govern the intellect: but, when no longer troubled by that unruly faculty, he might reign the more securely in the sphere of the imagination. Theology would be no longer the "queen of the sciences," but might be the highest of the fine arts. No doubt certain difficulties suggest themselves which need not here be considered. I only venture to throw out the hint because it often seems as if the substance of much modern apologetic really pointed in this direction, and that a good many divines would say pretty much the same if they could speak quite plainly. But I admit that a long time will probably pass before they perceive the tendency of their teaching.

THE joint-winner of our Competition last week, whom we named as Mr. G. W. Hendry, was Mr. G. W. Hendy, who informs us that "Hendy" is West Country, whereas "Hendry" is "merely Scottish."

WE have received from an unknown source a prospectus of a story of Highland life by a professor in a German university, whose book ought to make some of our kail-yard writers tremble in their shoes. The table of contents is so rich in suggestion that we cannot forbear quoting portions of it:

Chapter I.—Saved from Starvation—"We must not Emigrate!"—How They used to Live in "Auld" Scotland—Music and Song in the "Highlands"—Shepherd-Poets and Composers—Pretty Lass with a Sweet Voice: Musician, Poetess, Preacher and Declamator—Curious Guitar—Quaint Girl in Boy's Clothes—Darling of the People.

Chapter XI.—A Grand Future—"You Cannot Wash a Gypsy Clean"—Villa Casati—Gypsy Love and Devotion—Handsome Booty—Credulous Widow.

Chapter XIII.—The Earthquake—Interview in a Dark Wood—Stumbling over a Grave—What a Gypsy Saw by a Flash of Lightning.

Chapter XVI.—Five Years Later.—Proud Governess—Dangerous Rival—Despair—Regret—Young Lady arrested for Theft—Two Valuable Relics—Forsaken by Friends and Dismissed from Situation—Grand Flower Show—Lovers' Dialogue Overheard—A Tipsy Gentleman—Insulted Out Walking—Sad Sight of an Inebriate Father—Filial Affection—Repentance—The Bird Flies Away Again—Irretrievable—Conclusion.

The author is circularising schoolmasters in the hope that they will give readings from his work in their schools or literary institutes.

Bibliographical.

WE are not told whether Mr. Walter Raleigh's approaching book on Milton is to be a biography or a criticism, or both. One could wish that it might prove to be a criticism only, for of critical comment upon Milton there has been, of recent years, but little. Macaulay's famous essay still survives, for it was reprinted as lately as the spring of last year. Johnson's memoir also has been reproduced within the last five years or so. The Age of Milton, again, has been made the topic of a volume which is not without utility. Meanwhile, Mark Pattison's monograph in the "Men of Letters" series was the handiest we possessed till we received from the American Professor, Mr. W. P. Trent, a Short Study of Milton's Life and Works, published by Macmillan's in July, 1899. I have not forgotten Mr. Robert Bridges's discourses upon Milton's prosody and blank verse; these, however, do not come under the head of general estimate or "appreciation." There is room, it will be seen, for a quite new summing-up of Milton's claims to recollection and to gratitude.

I was attracted the other day to a book simply and solely because of its title. I saw that, though (perhaps because) it was published in London by "Simpkin's," it was of provincial origin; but that did not matter. It was called The Witchery of Books, and I could not resist dipping into it. Unhappily, my first dip occurred at page 14, whereon I found the following, in small type:

All the charm of all the Muses
Often flowering in a single word.

How often, I wonder, is Tennyson's lovely line going to be misquoted in this fashion, even by people who apparently have a real feeling for literature? If I had as big a majority as Lord Salisbury has, in both Houses, I would make the misquotation of great verse punishable by law.

The history of English literature which (as we learn on the best authority) is being written for Mr. Heinemann by Dr. Garnett and Mr. Gosse must needs be interesting, and perhaps valuable in parts; but are there any two men—any four, five, six, or any dozen men—living who, collectively, can lay claim to having mastered English literature as it should be mastered by those who venture to pronounce upon it? English literature should be dealt with as English biography has been treated in Mr. George Smith's monumental work. It should be put into the hands of experts on every section of the subject—as, I understand, has been the case with the new edition of Chambers's Cyclopædia of English Literature, on which many busy pens are now engaged.

It seems that we shall have to wait some little time for the promised new edition of Horace Walpole's correspondence—an edition which, happily, is to contain so many unpublished letters of his. It will be welcome when it arrives. There is the Selection edited by Mr. C. D. Yonge, and republished so recently as August, 1898, and there are the Passages from the letters, chosen by L. B. Seeley and reprinted so lately as 1895. But who wants Horace Walpole in Passages or a Selection? One wants everything or nothing. I suppose that the edition of the letters brought out by Peter Cunningham in 1857 is practically unobtainable.

Poor George Dolby—what a fate was his! He has, of course, a place in all the biographies of Dickens, to whom he was ever loyal, and who, moreover, fully recognised his loyalty. Dolby's well-known book—Charles Dickens as I Knew Him: the Story of the Reading Tours in Great Britain and America (1866-70)—did not come out till fourteen years after the novelist's death (1884), a "popular" edition of it being issued in 1886. At present, I fancy, it is out of print. It is by no means a catchpenny or trivial thing, but does actually contribute to the general knowledge and estimate of Dickens.

Mr. Mowbray Morris's introduction to the new edition of The Last of the Mohicans reminds one that the writer has done less in the book-world than might have been hoped for. It was he—was it not?—who accused the theatrical critics of being amenable to the influence of "chicken and champagne." I have on my shelves his Essays in Theatrical Criticism (1882), but he seems to have ceased for some time to write about "the play." In the department of the belles lettres he has given us an anthology called The Poets' Walk, and it will be remembered that he contributed a monograph on Montrose to the "Men of Action" series. This, I think, exhausts the list of his publications.

Mr. Whibley's promised book on Thackeray should be refreshing, for in it we ought to find, at any rate, Thackerayan criticism "up-to-date." What are the young men thinking about Thackeray? To be sure, it does not matter very much; but one's curiosity is mildly stimulated. A Study of Thackeray, by Mr. A. A. Jacks, came out in 1895, but I am obliged to confess that I did not read it. Of other recent analyses of Thackeray's performances I am equally ignorant. If I were asked to recommend a work on the subject, I should point to James Hannay's Studies on Thackeray, which I dare say is difficult of access save at the British Museum and the second-hand booksellers'.

The Life of Francis Parkman, of which announcement is made, will no doubt have many readers on this side of the Atlantic. One would not have supposed that Parkman enjoyed much popularity among us; yet it is a fact that Messrs. Macmillan published, so recently as last year, new editions of several of his works. The Conspiracy of Pontiac and the Indian War, France and England in North America, A Half-Century of Conflict, The Jesuits of North America in the Seventeenth Century, La Salle and the Discovery of the Great West, Montcalm and Wolfe, The Old Régime in Canada, The Oregon Trail, and Pioneers of France in the New World.

Glancing through Mr. William Tinsley's Random Recollections of an Old Publisher, I came across the name of a "Mr. Eraud" printed thus more than once. At first I was puzzled, but at last it dawned upon me that the author was referring to the late J. A. Heraud, journalist and dramatist. But, really, Mr. Tinsley ought not to drop his h's in this way!

THE BOOKWORM.

Reviews.

Dr. Pusey's Love Story.

The Story of Dr. Pusey's Life. By the Author of Charles Lowder. (Longmans.)

AFTER the author of The Ecclesiastical Polity, Dr. Pusey holds probably the foremost place among the apologists of primitive Anglicanism; among such of them, at any rate, as maintained to the last their faith in the Church of their baptism unmoved.

The history of the movement in which he played so important a part has been written and written again, not only in the lives of Newman and Ward, who found at last the actual conditions of Anglicanism subversive of their theory as to its ecclesiastical character, but in the life of Dean Church, and particularly by Liddon in his masterly history of Pusey himself. In availing himself for the most part of the materials from which Liddon worked, the author of the present memoir has aimed rather at a personal presentment than at a critical history of the important events with which the name of Pusey is associated: as he modestly writes by way of introduction, he has attempted a kind of handmaid of Liddon's great biography.

An excellent understanding, extraordinary industry, and a narrow outlook were the instruments or conditions of Pusey's successful career. It is seldom that so great a flood runs in so narrow a channel and remains always so obedient to its banks. Pusey's mind was less a field than a chamber, less a chamber than a corridor—a corridor handsomely furnished, and offering here and there a peep into the outside world through the stained glass of a little Gothic window. The religion he had learned at his mother's knee dominated his life. "I always," he says, "wanted to be a clergyman. . . . When asked why I wished it, I used to say: 'I wish it because it is the best.'" And so at the end he still believed it. With tears in his eyes he added: "It was very good of God to teach one so early what was best."

From Eton to Christ Church; from Oxford to Göttingen, because he had decided to devote his life to the Old Testament: "I saw that that was the point of attack in our defences which would be most easily breached." Fourteen hours was the least that he counted a decent day's work; and he quickly found that a real knowledge of Hebrew requires a background of Arabic, Syriac, and Chaldean. The little frail man was more than once in those days stupefied by the arrival of a challenge: with so many things crowding his memory he found it impossible to remember that in Germany you must not take the right-hand side of the path. At the age of twenty-six he congratulated himself that he saw clearly as to the genuineness of the whole of Daniel. "My having felt these difficulties will not probably be an objection to my being entrusted with the office I propose"—a theological lectureship—"as had they not been removed, God forbid that I should ever have unsettled the opinion of another upon them." So, with a shiver, he drew back his head from the casement, which for a moment he had unfastened, and latched it close and finally.

Upon the threshold of manhood he met the lady whom afterwards he married. She came right into the corridor; and for eleven years, during which he saw but little of her, she was the one woman in the world for him, while in his humility he saw no hope. His mother, in her kind, prim letters, made frequent allusions to her, in which her sacred name, by a freak of delicacy, is represented by a dash. What sort of woman Mrs. Pusey was it would be impossible to learn from anything written here. Certainly there is no sign of any originality of intellect or character. She shows only as the reflection of her husband's mind. His letters to her are, nevertheless, couched in language which in a remarkable way mingles marital—not to say uxorious—affection with an explicit piety that makes them painful to read. For he had no grace of style, no virtue of reticence; he braved ridicule because he had no sense of humour. Frankly, it may be said here, we do not understand how any earnest admirer should care to give to the world documents at the same time so laboured and so ineffective; documents so sanctimonious in the unhappy effect of their phrasing that it is not easy to remember that their writer was indeed a man of saintly character. Shortly before their marriage, in answer to her expression of a fear lest he should have overlooked in her some fault of which she accused herself, he wrote:

Few would probably dare to confess to themselves, fewer to tell the being whom they loved, that they were aware that she had defects; yet it is but a timid half-love which will not venture to see the whole truth: it implies a suspicion of its own strength and firmness; and though I trust that we shall love each other better when the defects inherent in each shall be, through God's assistance, diminished, and most then, when, altogether purified and made fit for the presence of God, there shall no longer be "speck or spot" in either of us, yet I trust also that no discovery which either may make shall weaken that love; nay, our very knowledge of them may increase it; since nothing so much increases it as the endeavour to improve one another, and as mutual prayer to our Father to improve us.

The extracts from her diary are of an extreme brevity, and refer, many of them, to the work in which from time to time she was assisting him, or to the birth of her children, and their baptism by "their dear papa" or by "Mr. Newman." Mr. Newman came to tea sometimes, and so did Mr. Keble.

If a man cannot rule them of his household, how shall he guide the Church of God? The three children trotted by their parents' side down the corridor. No sooner had they learned what a birthday was than they were taught to regard with greater devotion the "second birthday" on which by the waters of baptism they had been born again. He records of his little five-years-old girl that she "sighed penitent" for having been naughty in the morning.

I went to console her as soon as I returned home yesterday [he wrote], but she was looking very composed and demure. Afterwards she brought her knitting to my study, and . . . seeing her very contented, I made a bad, or, rather, no playfellow. I do not find it in me.

His profoundest regret when, on the verge of womanhood, this daughter died, sprang from the consideration that there was no longer any hope of her aiding him in his scheme for the institution of an order of Sisters of Charity in what by that time he had learned to call "our poor rent Church." Over her deathbed, as over that of his wife, he held a kind of spiritual autopsy. You have it in a long letter to Philip, his son.

Poor Philip! A sad, pathetic figure; the most touching of all that moved in the corridor. Shuffled along it—pained, stricken, deaf, strenuous, smiling, loved of children. Let the handsomest and haughtiest of deans and lexicographers tell of him:

While I am writing this [sermon] tidings reach me of the sudden death of the only son of our oldest and most honoured canon. Most of you must have seen that small emaciated form swinging itself through the quadrangle, up the steps or along the street, with such energy and activity as might surprise healthy men. But few of you could know what gentleness and what courage dwelt in that frail tenement. . . . In pursuing his studies, whenever it was necessary to consult manuscripts at a distance, he shrank from no journey however toilsome. Everywhere on those journeys he won hearts by his simple, engaging manner, combined with his helplessness and his bravery. He was known in Spain, and Turkey, and Russia: at Paris, or Madrid, or Moscow, the impression was the same. The first question put by the monks of Mount Athos to their next Oxford visitor was significant—"And how is Philippos?" . . . When it was brought home to him that his infirmities disabled him from taking Holy Orders, as he had desired to do, he only said that his wish, then, was to do what he might be able for God's service at any time and in any way. To such a one death could have no terror—death could not find him unprepared.

The Church of England, his wife, Keble, Newman—these were Dr. Pusey's earthly loves. The first—with suspensions, with equivocal denials of what he held to be the teaching of the Fathers, with Jerusalem bishoprics, Gorham judgments, doubts of the Athanasian Creed, and the like—wounded him in the house of his friends. His wife was his "dearest blessing," but she died. Her death renewed his "solemn memory of past sinfulness"—the eleven years during which, in his longing for her, he had not perfectly acquiesced in the will of God. Keble was his prophet; he died. The little, tired, humble, truculent troubler of the Anglican traffic crouched in the church upon the wood of the coffin—arbor felix—that covered the dead face of his friend who wrote The Christian Year: the book that sounded the tonic of the Movement. And Newman—to Newman he was loyal to the last. By a difficult paradox he supposes that his conversion must be the fruit of the persistent prayers of those to whom at last he had joined himself: "Our rulers could not use the instrument God gave into their hands." "For Newman himself, one can well imagine that He who formed him as so special an instrument, may well employ him as the restorer of the Roman Church."

For a while Pusey had stood almost alone—convinced, infallible. No moment of doubt had troubled him. He had suffered as only a sensitive and timid man might suffer from the alienation of those from whom in the natural course he might have enjoyed sympathy and co-operation; for years he was a pariah among his brethren and contemporaries. At last, when events had gone far to discredit his principles, there came a St. Luke's summer of popularity, following upon the publication of his commentary on the Book of Daniel. The nave and aisles of the cathedral when he was to preach were crammed. At the Norwich Church Congress he received an ovation:

When he rose to deliver his speech a roar of welcome greeted him who had been treated, even by old friends, as a man tainted, suspected, dangerous. One who was present told the writer that at first he gave a gracious little smile of acknowledgment for his reception, but that when repeated attempts to read his paper were baffled by bursts of cheering, which seemed as if they would never cease, then, at last, his lip trembled, and he nearly broke down.

His Eirenicon (discharged, as Newman characteristically said, in a word Pusey could never have found, as an olive-branch from a catapult) was received by the Times with "a five-columned, respectful review."

For three months, during an outbreak of cholera in the East End, he laboured, with poor Philip and the present president of the E.C.U., in the neighbourhood of City-road. It was the truest endorsement of the generosity that, in the early days of his married life, constrained him, after an anonymous donation of £5,000 to the Bishop of London's fund, to put down his carriage. His foundation of the Church of St. Saviour at Leeds, with its inscribed supplication of prayers for the "sinner who built this church," was a similar testimony to the genuineness of his confidence in the Church of England. St. Saviour's was to him a fruitful source of disappointment—which never discouraged. By batches its clergy sought in the Church of Rome the ideal which at home they had striven in vain to realise. But he felt himself all the time "blessed"; he never so much as dreamed, it would seem, of reconsidering whether his own corridor were tenable.

Of Pusey as a preacher Dr. Liddon writes:

He had no phiancy of voice, no command over accent or time or tone: . . . his eye was throughout fixed on the

MS. before him, and his utterance was one strong, unbroken, intense monotonous swing, which went on with something like the vibrations of a deep bell. . . . Masses of learning . . . were only relieved by long reiterated exhortation, to which fancy or invective or anecdote rarely contributed any such element as could modify the reign of a stern monotony. Yet men, old and young, listened to him for an hour and a half in breathless attention; because his moral power was such as to enable him to dispense with the lower elements of oratorical attraction. . . . As J. B. Mozley said, Pusey seemed to inhabit his sentences.

Of the events of the outside world we learn nothing from the letters published here. Changes of ministry, wars and riots, the rise and fall of statesmen, are passed over in silence. Thackeray and Dickens and Disraeli, Ruskin and the Pre-Raphaelites, Browning and Tennyson—these had nothing to do with the attitude of St. Cyril to the Roman See, they shed no light upon the text of Haggai or the obscurities of Habakkuk: they are left out. Straitly bounded in his outlook, indefatigable in his labours upon all that it embraced; brave to the point of temerity in his enunciation of the conclusions he thus hazardingly reached; single-minded, tender-hearted; an orator without eloquence, a prophet without inspiration, an adept with no touch of genius; built up on a faith of which he never cared to test the foundations, Pusey, we may suspect, uttered the last word of weight in behalf of a habit of thought characteristic of the sixteenth rather than of the nineteenth century.

Two Books of Essays.

Non Sequitur. By M. E. Coleridge. (Nisbet. 6s.)

Worldly Ways and Byways. By Eliot Gregory. (Lane.)

Who would not wish to achieve a good book of essays? Success in the Essay is so flattering. Even a poet is not often so present in his poems as an essayist is in his essays. A novelist may be lost in his creations. It is the essayist who is always himself, whose profession it is to reveal himself. When that is difficult he may still dally in ingenuities of half-revelation, and publicly rummage for ideas. What he is, what he was, what he remembers, what he likes, what he adores: these are his materials. Therefore, an essayist must be a full man. Though he is only essaying, and though from the first he is exonerated from every kind of finality, he must not hope to win us by playing coloured lights over a few ideas. The bringing of much "style" to a little matter is of no earthly use. Much is written of the styles of Lamb and Hazlitt. But these writers are full of matter; their pages are packed with observation of life and character, of criticism that is unlaboured only in its expression, and of reading that was not done in a railway carriage.

Hence when we come to a new volume of essays our first question is not: How is it written? It is: What does it contain? Our new essayist, Miss Coleridge—who has written historical fiction notably well—cannot be accused of giving her readers innutritive sweetmeats. Compared with the great essayists we have named, she has not a great deal to say. But is it always fair or wise to apply such standards? Compared with some other essayists, who have written in her own time, Miss Coleridge has a good deal to say. She does not prattle literary journalism, but writes out interesting thoughts in a literary manner. She has graceful ideas, a pleasant wit, and a multitude of book memories. Her travel essays are not all travel; her essays on the South Kensington Museum are not all museum; she has the essayist's mind in which everything suggests all other things, and to which digression is only association indulged. So equipped, she gossips on "Prefaces," on "Gifts," on "The Old Entrance to the South Kensington Museum," on "Words," on "Cologne," on "Recollections of Fanny Kemble," and on "Paper Matches." If anything, Miss Coleridge is too bookish. In one or two of her essays she seems to swing herself from rung to rung on a horizontal ladder of quotations. But her use of books is very deft, as, for instance, in "Gifts," where she says:

There is in some natures a high intolerance of the airy fetters cast round the heart by the constant memory of beneficence. They give freely, but freely they do not receive. They must send something by return of post, like the two friends in Elizabeth and Her German Garden, who regularly transmitted to each other the same candlestick and the same note-book, turn about, as each anniversary chimed the hour on their clocks—whereby they saved an incalculable amount of time, money, and emotion. One sweet lady goes so far as to say that all presents should be of perishable character—a basket of fruit, a bunch of flowers—that they may be at once forgotten.

Not often can we complain of Miss Coleridge's wit; but we do not care for a touch in her "Fountains and Flowers" about the Cochin-China trees at Homburg. We are told that their tops have been cut off because the smaller plane-trees "cried out, like Goethe, on his death-bed, for Light." Better is the easy humour of the following:

There is a brightness and gaiety about Brussels which makes it very seductive. I never arrive there but it is all ablaze with light, and half the inhabitants are riding merry-go-rounds. Even in the hotel it is a difficult matter to contrive darkness enough to fall asleep. The electric light is no sooner out over the washhandstand than it rekindles over the bed.

Miss Coleridge's most original essay vein is well represented in her cogitations on unmusical people, which are pleasantly ingenious:

The unmusical are often devoted to music. They love not only the Martial Air which sets them fighting, and the Minuet which sets them dancing in costumes of the time of Gluck, but much that is no more intelligible to them than the murmur of waves, the soft, dull falling of rain on grass, or the wind. They pass into a state of mesmerism, of senseless bliss or melancholy; they are held entranced in a delicate twilight of the mind. They do not know what o'clock it is, or whether they are in South Kensington or Hong-Kong. Their features are vacant. They do not look as people look at a Theatre, when the varying motives of the actors are repeated in a minor key among the audience. They are not keenly awake and argumentative like the congregation of an eloquent preacher, responding or contradicting. They are lotus-eaters; theirs is the music that gentler on the spirit lies

Than tir'd eyelids upon tir'd eyes.

Yet they are by no means asleep, for they never forget to see—as the musical do. The lyre-shaped stands of the orchestra send them back to Orpheus. They wonder what reed-piping Pan would have thought of that vast porcupine, the organ, with the small, bright eye of looking-glass. They take occasion to notice how like their instruments men become; so that a good violinist is no more separable from his violin than a good rider from his horse. They enjoy the flower-bed effect of the chorus—the twinkle of the paper parts when a new page is reached, as though the wind were turning up the leaves. Most of all they delight to watch the eloquent back of the conductor—the cabalistic waving of arms and hands with which he rouses or quells that storm of harmony. A true magician he, so ruling and compelling time that every sense of the tyrannous thing is lost in those who listen; a true general—not only the incarnate spirit of the host that he leads, but the commander in a Holy War of the immaterial against flesh and blood.

Whether a revival of the Essay is imminent it were hard to say. We do not think the signs of the time are unfavourable. Be this as it may, we cannot do better than quote the last words of Miss Coleridge's last essay in part answer to our wonder: "This is the Hope we want; no gentle girl, no melancholy musician, but Hope, the Horn-Blower!"

Miss Coleridge's title, Non Sequitur, would not have fitted Mr. Gregory's book. His papers have sequence; indeed, with a little alteration they might be printed as chapters. Mr. Gregory is an American; these papers appeared in a New York paper; and they are studies of American social life, written with great sagacity and frankness, with an abundance of anecdote, and with the superficial persuasiveness of a man of the world. Mr. Gregory does not spare his countrymen. He is hard on the "gilded misalliances" contracted by his fairest countrywomen, and, always ready with modern instances, he tells of the disillusion of two brides, one of whom married into Italy, and the other into Vienna. The dull people who excuse themselves from doing anything because some remote ancestor governed a colony or signed the Declaration of Independence receive their share of flagellant laughter. Indeed, their complacent snobbishness is almost immortalised in this story:

A painter I know was once importuned for a sketch by a lady of this class. After many delays and renewed demands he presented her one day, when she and some friends were visiting his studio, with a delightful open-air study simply framed. She seemed confused at the offering, to his astonishment, as she had not lacked aplomb in asking for the sketch. After much blushing and fumbling she succeeded in getting the painting loose, and, handing back the frame, remarked:

"I will take the painting, but you must keep the frame. My husband would never allow me to accept anything of value from you!"—and smiled on the speechless painter, doubtless charmed with her own tact.

Again, the disposition of many Americans to consider every human product as so much value for so much money, and their consequent inability to behave well when confronted by the artistic temperament, are thrown into relief in a story of Carolus Duran. This great painter was putting the last touches to a portrait of a fair American when her husband and a party of friends arrived to pronounce judgment. Duran was not entirely satisfied with his work; he breathed quickly as he painted, tapped the floor with his foot, and made swift backward springs to obtain a better view: in short he was on pins and needles.

The sound of a bell and a murmur of voices announced the entrance of the visitors into the vast studio. After the formalities of introduction had been accomplished the new-comers glanced at the portrait, but uttered never a word. From it they passed in a perfectly casual manner to an inspection of the beautiful contents of the room, investigating the tapestries, admiring the armour, and finally, after another glance at the portrait, the husband remarked: "You have given my wife a jolly long neck, haven't you?" and, turning to his friends, began laughing and chatting in English.

If vitriol had been thrown on my poor master's quivering frame, the effect could not have been more instantaneous, his ignorance of the languages spoken doubtless exaggerating his impression of being ridiculed. Suddenly he turned very white, and before any of us had divined his intention he had seized a Japanese sword lying by and cut a dozen gashes across the canvas. Then, dropping his weapon, he flung out of the room, leaving his sitter and her friends in speechless consternation, to wonder then and ever after in what way they had offended him.

Along a dozen routes Mr. Gregory follows up American foibles. He laughs to scorn the meekness of Americans under the stupidities and tyrannies of their paid servants of every class; their contentedness with inferior food, so it be plentiful; and among a crowd of pungencies says of New Englanders: "They refused the Roman dogma of Purgatory and then, with complete inconsistency, invented the bearding-house." But he does not always rail, and perhaps his praise of the young American goes far to wipe out all his bad marks:

It is a constant source of pleasure to me to watch this younger generation, so plainly do I see in them the influence of their mothers—women I knew as girls, and who were so far ahead of their brothers and husbands in refinement and culture. To have seen these girls marry and bring up their sons so well has been a satisfaction and a compensation for many disillusion. . . . One despairs at times of humanity, seeing vulgarity and snobbishness riding triumphantly upward; but where the tone of the younger generation is as high as I have lately found it, there is still much hope for the future.

That the American middle classes are now beginning to come multitudinously to Europe is of some significance, and it is sure to result in social changes that Mr. Gregory will welcome. This can be said without conceit. We have the list of our own faults to mend, but that—for the moment—is another story.

Philosophy with a Coronet.

Characteristics. By Anthony, Earl of Shaftesbury. Edited by John M. Robertson. 2 vols. (Grant Richards.)

The Life, Unpublished Letters, and Philosophical Regimen of Anthony, Earl of Shaftesbury. Edited by Benjamin Rand, Ph.D. (Sonnenschein.)

THE cacoethes scribendi on any given subject has often been observed to be epidemic, and here is another proof of it. "A new and complete edition of this celebrated work," says Dr. Rand, speaking of Shaftesbury's Characteristics, "is a desideratum." And within a week of Dr. Rand's own book appears Mr. Robertson's edition of the Characteristics, the first, or at least the first to reach completion, since 1773. Two comely volumes Mr. Robertson makes of it, admirably printed, and with a modest introduction which, for the reader not deeply versed in the philosophic systems of the eighteenth century, places Shaftesbury adequately. Old-fashioned scholars may raise the eyebrow at Mr. Robertson's thinking it necessary to offer English renderings of his author's numerous quotations from the Greek and Latin classics, but in our days of the democratization of thought and letters this is not impossibly the more discreet course; and Shaftesbury, apart from the fact that he lived in an age when even philosophers were expected to write tolerably, is not unworthy the attention of a modern thinker. He has his assured, if not a pre-eminent, place in the development of European speculation. As a moralist, by his insistence on the analysis of the actual motives of human conduct, and his assertion, against Hobbes, that these include primarily benevolent as well as primarily self-regarding impulses, he helped to shift the centre of gravity of ethics from the abstract contemplation of laws of nature to the more concrete terrain of psychology. In this task he is yoke-fellow with Butler, diverging greatly from the protagonist of the eighteenth-century church in matters theological and metaphysical. For Shaftesbury suspects "enthusiasm" and stands throughout as the best English example of that optimistic deism which in its continental forms became a fair mark for the ironic criticism of "Candide." Scholarship and optimistic deism together explain the affinity of which Shaftesbury was conscious between his own habitual attitude of thought and that of the great Stoic thinkers. It was from Epictetus and from Marcus Aurelius that he drew his counsels of practical wisdom, and upon their precepts he strove not unsuccessfully to model his actual conduct of life.

The new matter which Dr. Rand has disinterred for the illustration of Shaftesbury's personal and mental history comes mainly from the hitherto somewhat neglected collection of "Shaftesbury Papers" in the Record Office. It consists partly of letters (to which we shall come presently), partly of two notebooks written between 1698 and 1712, and containing, under the title Ἀσκήματα, a series of reflections upon various philosophical subjects. The value of these is considerable, but it is not quite of the character which Dr. Rand, who has invented for them the title of "The Philosophical Regimen," declares. They are not sufficiently formal or systematic to take rank as "a new and brilliant presentation of a moral system." They are, in fact, precisely what the author himself called them, Ἀσκήματα, exercises, mental gymnastics, fragmentary jottings and feelings after truth, quite obviously modelled both in matter and in style upon those meditations "to himself" of Marcus Aurelius which form one of the most fascinating volumes on the ethical shelf. And although Shaftesbury is neither so tragic a figure nor so original a thinker as Marcus Aurelius, yet his meditations, too, gain rather than lose in interest by the informality, the personal mode of their composition. A couple of quotations will give a better idea of their nature than elaborate description or impossible analysis. The first, then, shall show Shaftesbury, the cosmic optimist:

"O, the world! the world! What will become of the world? The poor world! sad world! and was there ever such a world?"—Fool, was there ever any other world? Was it ever other than it is?—Where is the world going?—Nowhere, but there where it has gone a thousand and a thousand times: the earth round the sun, or the sun round the earth, annual, diurnal, eternal. Hither and thither, and hither again. Dark and then light. Winter and then summer, and then winter again. Is not this right? Would it please you should it be otherwise?—Nay, but for the world's sake.—What world? Saturn, Jupiter, the planets and their circles? Fear not, they will go as they stand. And if these greater and including circles hold but their order, I warrant thee (man!) these inward ones (the circles and revolutions of this planet of thy own) will go well enough, and as they should go, both for the planet's sake and for the rest of the system. Fear then for thy own sake if thou pleasest, but for the world there is care taken, the administration is good. Do not thou father thy own wretched fears on it, and place thy selfishness and low-spiritedness to so wrong an account.

And in the second there is a note of true Stoic morality, austere yet tonic:

Continue, therefore, and keep the harmony, if possible, uninterrupted; if not, restore it again as soon as possible, and dwell not on the miscarriage. No echoes, no repetitions; no running over again what is past. If anything slipped in the music, if a finger went wrong, a false string struck, a time mixed, pass it over and go on undisturbed, for this is the next perfection of art, not to interrupt, not break the symphony, not let the music sink nor the ear dwell upon what was wrong, but drown it by better play, overcome it by an easy transition and agreeableness of what succeeds.—But no, I have failed in the rule of art; I must stay and show the error. This stop was wrong, this key, tone, measure.—O Pedantry! And how in life? Must the gamut there, in the midst of play, be conned over? Must it be sol, la, mi, fa? Dost thou not know that, even at the best, these rules are burdensome and irksome to those who are not of the art? Was this so hardly seasonable in that very school and in those days, too? And wilt thou nevertheless abroad, and in such days as these, come out with such things, suspend performance to make demonstrations and by these excuses teach thy art? Rare pedagogue!

A certain number of Shaftesbury's letters were published in three instalments by Toland, Ainsworth, and Thomas Forster. Those now printed by Dr. Rand are a useful supplement. They show the writer in more than one pleasing aspect, the affectionate, if not a romantic husband, the generous patron of young men of brains and character, the friend and intimate correspondent of leading minds in England and upon the Continent. Upon English letters, in particular, they throw some distinctly interesting sidelights. The high-principled and consistent Whig that was Shaftesbury is not, perhaps, the person to whom one would look for much sympathy with the meteoric and more or less venal pen of Swift. Nor, indeed, does he mince matters when he refers to "the detestable writing of that most detestable author of the Tale of a Tub, whose manners, life, and prostitute pen and tongue are, indeed, exactly answerable to the irregularity, obscenity, profaneness, and fulsomeness of his false wit and scurrilous style and humour." Swift could not, perhaps, have given Shaftesbury a lesson in charity, but he might in the restraint of epigram. Another letter is written to Le Clerc, a scholar of some reputation in his day, and editor of a Bibliothèque Universelle. Shaftesbury concedes with his correspondent upon the "anger and malignity" with which he has been "fallen upon" by a critic of his recent edition of Menander. "The peevish temper of your adversary," he says, "is sufficiently known, and his judgment and wit as much undervalued as his learning and mere scholarship is esteemed." He goes on to lament "that captious, insulting, emulous, and quarrelsome humour for which universities are so famous." But Le Clerc will be revenged; for the adversary has in turn written a book, and Shaftesbury has but a poor notion of it:

His Horace will be the most elaborate monster that the learned world ever saw produced. He has mangled and torn him in pieces, so as that the author is scarce knowable in his own text. I have seen many of his horrible corrections, and not one of them but had been presumptuous, even in an annotation or in the margin.

Here Dr. Rand might have vouchsafed a note, for the "disguised author" who is not named by Shaftesbury is clearly none other than Bentley. In 1710—we learn from Prof. Jebb's excellent little monograph on Bentley—the great scholar wrote a crushing review of Le Clerc's Menander under the pseudonym of "Phileleutherus Lipsiensis." In 1711 appeared his own Horace, of which, so far as the emendations go, Prof. Jebb's judgment jumps with Shaftesbury's. "Of Bentley's readings Horace would have rejected the immense majority with a smile or a shudder." Let us hope that it was generosity and not poor-spiritedness that induced Le Clerc to close the literary passage-at-arms with an amiable review of Bentley's work in the Bibliothèque Choisie.

Other New Books.

THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF A TRAMP. BY J. H. CRAWFORD.

We are in doubt as to whether Mr. Crawford's narrative is intended for fiction or for a record of fact; in either case the title might have been more happily chosen. But having said that, we have said all by way of adverse criticism; the rest must be frank and unqualified praise. The book being read once, it is odds but you will turn back to the first page and read it again, picking up points missed before. For it is a book to be read with close attention; Mr. Crawford never underlines; you must hold the thread in your own fingers. The story opens with Dick (he is merely Dick) and his mother lying in the straw of the stackyard of a farm, and Dick learns that he was born in that same stackyard nine years before. From that he carries on the story through a hundred road-vicissitudes—of death, and change, and parting—till, in the last chapter, he is on the tramp with the gipsy girl whom he first saw looking through the wands in the Kelpie's Pool. They had come back to the old place by the stream:

"Let's ha' it over again," said I.

Kelpie looked at me, and with no more ado was in among the saughs. O'er they fell, the best of 'em one after t'other.

Plash! Plash!

And o'er went another, till I thought it might be all a dream. So I looked to see the feet moving.

Plash! Plash!

The plashing came my way, and Kelpie's face looked out among the wands.

Mr. Crawford has produced a book which is full of good things, both in observation of character and nature; it would not be difficult to pick out a score or two of memorable and beautiful sayings. But we repeat that the reader who takes up the book must do Mr. Crawford the justice to follow him with close attention; it is not work to be scanned casually. Therein lies by no means the least of its many virtues. (Longmans. 5s. net.)

POEMS: LYRICAL AND DRAMATIC.

BY S. K. WILEY.

Miss (or Mrs.) WILEY is ambitious. She essays in this volume the ode-form, the lyric, and the drama. In lyric or ode-form she does not show to advantage; she lacks the winged impulse, the concentration of feeling, or of expression; she shows small power of imagery. Her best work is in the drama which concludes the volume, "Cromwell." Yet, in saying this, we cannot assert that she has succeeded where even the bold and fiery Victor Hugo failed—in making a convincing play out of the great Puritan's career. Her dialogue is often spirited, very fairly dramatic, and with a pictorial touch; the imagery, too (which is so deficient in her lyric work), is frequently fresh and good. But the construction is woefully undramatic; it follows the model of Shakespeare's chronicle-plays unwisely and unskilfully. Scarce saved, sometimes, by Shakespeare's splendid handling, it is a perilous model for lesser and modern dramatists to imitate. In the present author's hands the result is invertebrate, diffuse, and wandering. Even the dialogue has a knack of becoming tame just at the critical points, the trial-scene of Charles I., with its fine and dignified opportunities, hangs fire altogether. Rashly discontent with Cromwell, she even (quite without dramatic pretext or necessity) brings on the stage that other "chief of men," John Milton, and the figure is as pitiless as might be expected. In the dissolution of the Long Parliament Cromwell opens with blank verse, and then the whole scene drops suddenly into prose, while his speech, and the rest of the dialogue generally, is taken verbatim from history. Not so did Shakespeare deal with North's Plutarch, closely though he has followed it—in "Coriolanus," for instance. Rupert is the open cavalier of romance, not the cynical, arrogant, if dashing, leader of history. Yet the opening scene in which he appears is among the best written in the play. A good specimen of the author is these lines, put in Cromwell's mouth:

It will not storm, although the air is damp.

The moon is struggling there along the sky,

Silvering the floating mists that dim the stars.

On that same moon gazed Cesar, stealing home

From some night-revel, or amid the woods

Of Britain, where the wolves howled through the night

And all about him gleamed the Roman spears.

That has the historical imagination. The author shows certainly promise enough to justify further effort. Experience and a careful study of dramatic structure are her first of needs. (Chapman & Hall.)

LORD ROSEBERY: HIS LIFE AND SPEECHES.

BY T. F. G. COATES.

Some months ago it was said by those who professed to be behind the scenes in politics that, in the language of the Stock Exchange, there was going to be a "boom" in Lord Rosebery. Somehow the "boom" did not "come off," but to the observant there are plain signs that the ex-Premier's followers have been hard at work. Perhaps it is to this that we must attribute the splendid volumes which Mr. Coates has produced, volumes which, as the subject of them is still, politically speaking, quite a young man, seem somewhat premature. Many statesmen who have done the State much service and passed away, with a record of many years behind them, have not such a monument as these two well-written and well-illustrated volumes. Mr. Coates writes as an enthusiastic admirer of Lord Rosebery, and tells us all that need be said on the matter. Cartoons from Punch, Fun, and the Westminster Gazette add their value to the book. (Hutchinson & Co.)

THE EARL OF ROSEBERY, K.G. BY JANE T. STODDART.

The plain man does not quite know what to make of Lord Rosebery—his premiership, his resignation, and his retirement from public life—but many of the ladies seem quite to have made up their minds on the subject, and to regard him with feelings little short of adoration. Miss Stoddart's biography, if we mistake not, originally appeared in a ladies' monthly magazine, with all the illustrations here given. The book is better written than might have been expected, and is a very pleasant and readable account of Lord Rosebery's life. The illustrations are remarkably good and well printed, and the volume will be welcome to those who have not the mental equipment for a biography of the size of Mr. Coates's work. Publicity is everything nowadays, and Lord Rosebery has evidently some good friends who work hard on his behalf. Neither of the volumes under notice can be considered a critical biography; for that we shall have to wait until there is greater reason for it. Meanwhile both works will no doubt satisfy the ex-Premier's admirers. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

Our congratulations to Messrs. Chapman & Hall. In designing their Authentic Edition of the works of Charles Dickens, they were using the last opportunity which the law of copyright gave them to present Dickens's works with the advantages which they, as his original publishers, could give to a library edition. The Pickwick Papers is the first work issued, and it is a very satisfactory volume. The illustrations by Seymour and "Phiz" have come out well, and the special coloured frontispiece is an agreeable addition. The book is as light as could be expected, and the scheme of printing has been well conceived.

Messrs. Constable have issued a new (fifth) six-shilling edition of Captain Siborne's standard book, The Waterloo Campaign, 1815. Captain Siborne, who constructed the Waterloo model in the United Service Institution, published his work in 1844, in which year it reached a second edition. In its present form, and at its present price, it cannot fail to enjoy new popularity.

Messrs. Macmillan have issued this week the third, fourth and fifth volumes of Lockhart's Life of Scott in their "Library of English Classics." The set—inexpensive as it is—has a regal appearance, and no better edition can be desired.

To their "Golden Treasury" series the same firm have added Two Essays on Old Age and Friendship. The translation has been done by the editor of Cicero's Letters, Mr. E. S. Shuckburgh, who writes a suitable introduction.

The aim of Mr. J. W. Robertson-Scott's book, The People of China (Methuen, 3s. 6d.), is succinctly stated in the Preface. It is "to supply, in as compact and interesting form as possible, the kind of information about the Country and its Peoples, and their Relations with the Foreigner, which an intelligent newspaper reader would be likely to seek from a friend who had lived in the far East." The information given by Mr. Robertson-Scott is classed under such chapter headings as Great Britain in China; The General Scramble; The Chinaman: How He Governed; The "Jesus Religion"; The Outlook for Foreign Trade, &c., &c. A timely book by an acknowledged authority.

Irene Petrie, Missionary to Kashmir, by Mrs. Ashley Carus-Wilson (Hodder & Stoughton, 6s.) is the record of missionary work by one whose services in that field, great as they were, are less deeply stamped on the minds of her friends than her personal gifts and graces. "Her story," says her biographer, "is worth telling if only to unfold the secret of an unfailing delight in life."

Dr. Johnson's Table-Talk, in Messrs. Gay & Bird's "Bibelots," is chiefly comprised, not of his table-talk, but of short extracts from his Lives of the Poets, Rambles, &c. Rasselas does not seem to be quoted; and of Johnson's talk only a poor idea is conveyed in the section devoted to anecdotes.

Fiction.

Sons of the Morning. By Eden Phillpotts.
(Methuen. 6s.)

WE have ere now frankly expressed our conviction that Mr. Phillpotts is a writer of exceptional gifts. We have also noted his tendency towards "mere excitement." Sons of the Morning is a novel which bears out both our encomium and our disparagement. It is finely written, it has some of the qualities of a stately nature poem, but its function is "mere excitement." At first the book seems to offer an interesting problem in human affairs. Honor Endicott loves two men of contrasting temperaments at the same time and in the same way. We are accustomed to the situation when the person whose affections are divided is a man; but a woman of this sort of versatility is a little uncommon and, in Devonian scenery with pious rustics babbling around her, more than a little piquant. One asks whether the heroine's dual passion will make her a genius or a mad woman, a social iconoclast or a saint. But Mr. Phillpotts simply cuts the Gordian knot. Shaking prophecies revive at the stroke of Death, but the reader droops.

We have here touched the salient spot of improbability as well of futility in a volume that is by no means deficient in that ingredient. There are in it things far more extraordinary than the death of a husband by a fall; but it may be said with perfect truth that all to sustain conviction in a story it is necessary that all catastrophes of fundamental importance should seem, as well as be, inevitable. Great writers successfully compel the illusion that they are mouthpieces of Reality. Mr. Phillpotts is self-betrayed as the mouthpiece of Mr. Phillpotts. It is so in the conclusion of Lying Prophets; it is so in Sons of the Morning. And yet his cunning is indisputable. He can write lyric prose, and make his beautiful Devon live in a manner that causes one to feel that, whatever their misfortunes, his two lovers were veritable "sons of the morning." It has been said that merely to insert "Marry come up" is a step towards creating the illusion of an historical romance. So, too, does a word like "toad-flax" help to create the illusion of a country romance. Mr. Phillpotts has planted his characters on real soil; the sense of growth and space is over his story, and he can use rightly the names of many wild things besides toad-flax. Strong is he, too, on the side of local colour. His witch is a fine invention, though the machinery of the story would creak less if he had never reverted to "oil of man." His rustics who revolve about Honor as Mr. Hardy's did about Bathsheba (a greater creation) are always amusing. This is the way in which Churdles administers consolation to the father of a still-born babe:

"Beggin' your pardon, theer's a gert lesson to such a trouble, if a body can't be ta stiff-necked to see it. It do teach us worms o' the airth as even God A'mighty have got a pinch of something human in the nature of Un—as I've allus said, for that matter. This here shows how even He can alter His purpose arter a thing be well begun, an' ban't shamed to change His Everlasting Mind now an' again, more'n the wisest of us. Theer's gert comfort in that, if you please."

If Mr. Phillpotts will strive towards organic perfection—perfection of form and mechanism—he may do something great.

A Breaker of Laws. By W. Pett Ridge.
(Harper & Brothers. 6s.)

MR. ALF BATESON was also a breaker of (or rather into) houses, and it was while making investigations preliminary to a "job" that he met the Devonshire domestic servant whom he came to love and to marry. Having married the amiable and pretty Caroline, he kept her in ignorance of his past, tried to reform, failed, and got seven years. Caroline was told that he had been drowned off Woolwich. At the expiry of his term he travelled to Devonshire, and overheard a conversation:

"We shall make a splendid man of him, Caroline," said the elder woman, waving her pince-nez in his direction.

"Yes, miss. I want him——" She stopped and collected her work, and then rose.

"Go on, Caroline."

"I want him," she said quietly, "to be as good as his dear father was."

"Was he good?"

"He," said Caroline proudly, as she assisted her mistress into the drawing-room, "was perfect."

Then Alf changed his purpose, and wrote to his only pal: "I cannot spoil her life by letting her know that I am still alive. . . . Be good to her." All which, despite Mr Ridge's ingenuities of realism, is unnatural, as he must very well know. A writer so talented as Mr. Pett Ridge, so picturesque, so curiously learned in strange human documents, might surely employ himself better than in these exercises of prettiness, at once superficially exact and fundamentally untrue.

Mother-Sister. By Edwin Pugh.
(Hurst & Blackett. 6s.)

MR. EDWIN PUGH would, perhaps, secretly resent any charge of sentimentalism. Nevertheless, a half-hidden yet rank sentimentality is the chief blot on this sinister record of Hooligans. Beneath the veneer of callousness, beneath the grim equanimity affected by this inured observer whom (he would have us believe) no phenomenon of brutalised humanity can shock, there peeps out the pink-and-white sentimentalism of your old-fashioned domestic novelist. The very title of the story gives promise of sentimentality, and that promise is not belied. We do not believe in "Maddie," the girl of fifteen with the heart of gold, who mothered her entire family. Still, the book is clever, sometimes even brilliant. The best part of it is the opening chapter, in which Dan Marmory "wipes up" the street with McCanty, the man who robbed him of his Betsy. Marmory is drawn with skill. As for observation, take away the slang and possibly not much would be left. The slang, however, is prodigious:

"I ain't bin getting on," replied Harvey. "I bin copping out on about the thickest streak o' drive-me-mad as ever I know. Talk about Barney's bull! He never was so busted up as I bin. No tommy. No lotion. No kip. No posh. No nothing. Not even the option. Look at last Monday week. No, I can't tell you about it. It's enough to make a honest pad turn snider, so it is. This is about the roughest bit o' luck I struck. And I reckon if it's come for keeps I'm saying 'Fainitz' soon."

"Why don't you come and join us, Harve?"

"What, me join the blooming Salvation Army?"

"Why not?"

"Jo, I may be down on my socks, but I ain't going to turn myself into no amateur angel to please nobody. Me give up smoking and——"

In places, we fancy that Mr. Pugh falters in his amazing verbal accuracy. Would Ben Bromage have said: "I can bear up without it"? On the whole, Mother-Sister displays Mr. Pugh's limitations as sharply as his abilities.

Cynthia in the West. By Charles Lee.
(Grant Richards. 6s.)

MR. LEE has essayed to depict a small colony of London artists in a Cornish fishing village—Tregurda. The colony and the village are seen mainly through the eyes of Robert Maurice, an author, who goes down to Tregurda on a visit. If the whole book were as good as the opening description of Maurice's drive from the railway station with "Sampy," the aged local philosopher and wit, it would be very good. But the remainder of the novel—that is to say, about nine-tenths of it—is on a lower plane. Mr. Lee has a careful eye for the absurdities of the colony, who dine in evening dress at Tregurda, and discuss art in the terms of Chelsea amateurs. Nervous and fussy Mrs. Wilmington, the only married woman and chief hostess, is well drawn; and the entire colony's chronic fear of looking ridiculous to itself is shown with some humour. Certain of the fishermen's characteristics, too, have been noted with insight and exactness. One remembers the sentence: "All very well for you, Mr. Forester; but, to my mind, the man who goes to sea for pleasure would go to hell for pastime." On the whole, however, the story lacks vigour, lacks imagination, lacks balance. In particular, the author fails with his two principal persons—Forester, the great, quiet genius, and Cynthia, the lively, large-souled creature, who, Mr. Lee would have us believe, was a woman high above women. The episode of Forester and Nellie, the model, is almost ridiculous; and as for the unrivalled Cynthia—well, she talks thus:

"Mr. Maurice," she said, "I have been speaking openly. It is not my habit. You will wonder; we are almost strangers. But I am alone down here; there is nobody I can talk to—nobody I dare talk to. They would misunderstand. I have seen very little of you, but—we women are credited with an instinct that tells us where to trust—I feel that you will not misunderstand. I am very lonely; I need a friend—a comrade. You won't misunderstand, will you?" . . .

"I am honoured, Miss Paget," he said earnestly. "You can trust me; I would never presume."

"I am lonely!" she cried. . . .

We consider that Mr. Lee is likely to succeed much better with Cornish folk than with peerless maids or the artistic temperament. Immediately he begins to manoeuvre with the Bedford Park type he becomes awkward and unsure, and he does not always avoid sheer feeble mawkishness. But he possesses talent, somewhere.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the week's Fiction are not necessarily final.
Reviews of a selection will follow.]

TOMMY AND GRIZEL.

By J. M. BARRIE.

When Mr. Barrie's story began in Scribner's, we recorded with joy the appearance of O. P. Pym, "that vast and rolling figure, who never knew what he was to write about until he dipped grandly." But O. P. Pym is only a speck on the canvas which records the rise and duplicities and fall of our old friend Sentimental Tommy, the gentleness of his sister Elspeth, and the pathetic devotion of Grizel. The first chapter concludes: "'Make yourself at home, Elspeth; he's the kind I can manage. Was there ever a kind I couldna manage?' he whispered, top-heavy with conceit. 'There was Grizel,' said Elspeth; and Tommy frowned." Wherein is a keynote to much that follows in the present work. (Cassell. 6s.)

OLD FIRES AND PROFITABLE GHOSTS.

By A. T. QUILLER-COUCH.

These stories by the author of The Ship of Stars are of revenants, Mr. Quiller-Couch tells us—"persons who, either in spirit or in body, revisit old scenes, return upon old selves or old emotions, or relate a message from a world beyond perception." One of the stories, "Which?" was suggested to "Q." by a passage in Hawthorne's Note-books, where he proposes a story "to be laid within the light of a street lantern; the time, when the lamp is near going out; and the catastrophe to be simultaneous with the last flickering beam." "The Lady of the Ship" is nearly historical, and other stories rest more or less on fact. The book exhibits a side of "Q.'s" art less familiar than that in The Ship of Stars. (Cassell. 6s.)

THE STICKIT MINISTER'S WOOING, AND OTHER GALWAY STORIES. BY S. R. CROCKETT.

Mr. Crockett, also, gives us a sheaf of short stories, with a "Look Behind and Forward." The dedication is: "To the Well-Beloved Memory of R. L. S., to whom, eight years ago, I dedicated the first series of the 'Stickit Minister' stories." (Hodder & Stoughton.)

LORD JIM. BY JOSEPH CONRAD.

This is the story which began in Blackwood's Magazine some months ago as a short study, and has grown into a long book. It relates the history of a young Englishman—sailor and failure and dreamer—in the East, and is told with all Mr. Conrad's precision and romantic fervour. (Blackwood. 6s.)

THE FILBUSTERS. BY CUTCLIFFE HYNE.

"Now, not counting Briggs, who was inscrutable, we five, who considered ourselves in the know, clearly understood that Holsteins were backing the revolution. Of course there is nothing very peculiar in that. Holsteins are the greatest financial house . . ." All who joyed in Captain Kettle, and can survive the cover of this book, will go on. (Hutchinson. 6s.)

A MAN'S WOMAN. BY FRANK NORRIS.

The probable has happened: we have here a novel that opens in the Arctic regions. Readers of Shanghai'd, McTeague, and Blix will follow Mr. Norris anywhere. But in the third chapter we are in Calumet-square, and "the heat had been palpitating through all the City's streets since early morning." We have glanced at the end of the story; it is most quietly effective. (Richards. 6s.)

ROSE ISLAND. BY W. CLARK RUSSELL.

"The Strange Story of a Love Adventure at Sea." What more, what less, can we expect from this veteran salt-water writer? (Arnold. 6s.)

THE WOMAN OF DEATH. BY GUY BOOTHBY.

"'Milord Middlesborough est un bon garçon, mais c'est dommage qu'il trouvé le monde si ennuyant,' said the pretty Countess de Chevallac, as she leant over the parapet of the terrace of Middlesborough's Villa and dropped a rose-leaf into the clear water of the Mediterranean below." For it was the Mediterranean that was below, not the Pacific Ocean, or the Antarctic Sea, but just the Mediterranean. And so she dropped the rose-leaf into that. (Pearson. 6s.)

THE BENNETT TWINS. BY GRACE MARQUERITE HURD.

A bright story of a brother and sister taking the plunge into life in a New York studio. The twins are boy and girl—Donald and Agnes. The motto: "He that will have a cake out of the wheat must needs tarry the grinding." (Macmillan. 6s.)

PALACE TALES. BY H. FIELDING.

In this sheaf of stories Mr. Fielding attempts to "rescue from complete oblivion one phase of life in the Palace, in the times of the Burmese kings." But whereas in his former book, Thibaw's Queen, he allied love with tears, here love makes for laughter. A budget of Eastern sunshine. (Harpers. 6s.)

KING OF THE ROCKS. BY AMBROSE PLATT.

We have before now confessed the bewilderment into which a Prologue to a novel always throws us. Why ever a Prologue? This novel has three Prologues, or a Prologue in three sections. Let those persevere who will. (Hutchinson. 6s.)

THE WORLD'S GREAT SNARE. BY E. PHILLIPS OPPENHEIM.

This story by a popular author opens with swearing in one valley of the Sierras, and appears to end with kissing in another. There is a Young Man from the East, and the Earl of Wessemmer, and a "Night Cry," and a "Soul Floating into the Sunlight." In fact, there is any quantity of incident and personality and Snare. (Ward, Lock. 3s. 6d.)

JOHN CHARITY. EDITED BY HORACE ANNESLEY VACHELL.

"A Romance of Yesterday, Containing Certain Adventures and Love-passages in Alta California of John Charity, Yeoman of Cranberry-Orcas, in the County of Hampshire, England, as Set Down by Himself." (Murray. 6s.)

THE HOUSE OF GIANTS. BY YORRICK EVERETT.

A story in thirteen chapters, followed by fourteen short stories. The author's method is not gigantesque. On the contrary, "all the stories in this book have been written under stress of a recurrent impulse to try how fiction might 'work' when reduced to its lowest, by which I mean for the moment its shortest, terms, rejecting all superfluous detail, and essaying what was purely indispensable, and to make that tell the story." We observe that one of the stories is concerned with an A. B. C. Girl, about whom there is rarely any superfluous detail. (Ward, Lock. 3s. 6d.)

PLOTTERS OF PARIS. BY EDMUND MITCHELL.

Red-hot melodrama in four hundred pages, by the author of Chickabiddy. One of the chapters describes a Black Mass, to which the hero is taken blindfold. There are many characters and countless incidents. "And Julian Leguillard? I believe that for the present that jackal of revolution yelps in a minor key under another name in the Belgian press." (Hutchinson. 6s.)

BY BEATRICE HERON-MAXWELL AND A WOMAN'S SOUL. FLORENCE EASTWICK.

Last week we noticed a novel which opened with the words: "'After all,' sighed the Marchioness . . . 'we are but slaves of Society.'" And here is a novel that opens with the sentence: "I am going to be a marchioness." Daphne adds that she is marrying the Marquis of Lynmouth with no other aim in view. Much evil comes of it—incompatibility, separation, and tragedy deeper than either. Readable—but what story is not? (Marshall & Sons. 6s.)

BLACKMAIL. BY CHARLES K. MOORE.

"'You are a blackguard!' 'The best equipped blackguard you ever met, unweighted by a single scruple,' said St. John coolly." (Arrowsmith. 3s. 6d.)

THE BAG OF DIAMONDS AND
THREE BITS OF PASTE. BY GEORGE MANVILLE FENN.

The title tells all, and the Preface confirms it: "The four following tales . . . are sent forth with no pretensions to being analyses of life problems or psychical intricacies, but as simple attempts at the mysterious and marvellous—with not much marvel and very little mystery." The reader is in good hands, and, if he likes the menu, he will like the feast. (Chatto. 6s.)

THE ACADEMY.

Editorial and Publishing Offices, 43, Chancery-lane.

The ACADEMY will be sent post-free to every Annual Subscriber in the United Kingdom.

Price for One Issue, Threepence; postage One Halfpenny Price for 52 issues, Thirteen Shillings; postage free.

Foreign Rates for Yearly Subscriptions 20s. including postage.

American Agents for the ACADEMY: Brentano's, 31, Union-square, New York.

Criticism in Verse.

AMONG the collected poems of Thomas Edward Brown are three pieces—two of them of epigrammatic brevity—which make us wish that a reader so original, and a critic so acute, had wedded his literary judgments to verse oftener. Verse is an admirable vehicle for a man's settled feeling toward a great writer. That feeling, indeed, is worth little if it does not make for song. We would not have a mere outpouring of praise; rather should criticism attain its full veracity when it attains its full warmth. It does so in T. E. B.'s "Dante and Ariosto":

If Dante breathes on me his awful breath,
I rise and go; but I am sad as death—
I go; but, turning, who is that I see?
I whisper: "Ariosto, wait for me!"

Is not that charming? Very good, too, is "Boccaccio":

Boccaccio, for you laughed all laughs that are—
The Cynic scoff, the chuckle of the churl,
The laugh that ripples over reefs of pearl,
The broad, the sly, the hugely jocular;
Men call you lewd, and coarse, allege you mar
The music that, withdrawn your ribald skirl,
Were sweet as note of mavis or of merle—
Wherefore they frown, and rate you at the bar.
One thing is proved: To count the sad degrees
Upon the Plague's dim dial, catch the tone
Of a great death that lies upon a land,
Feel nature's ties, yet hold with steadfast hand
The diamond, you are three that stand alone—
You, and Lueretius, and Thucydides.

In our own time the best metrical criticism has been written by Matthew Arnold, Mr. Swinburne, and Mr. Watson. Of these, Mr. Swinburne is the most gorgeous eulogist; he criticises by eulogy, and to distinguish between his brightnesses of praise is often a too difficult task. When we have read these lines on Marlowe, and several like unto it, his tributes begin to puzzle:

"If all the pens that ever poets held
Had fed the feeling of th'ir master thoughts,"
And as with rush of hurtling chariots
The flight of all these spirits were impelled
Toward one great end, thy glory—nay, not then,
Not yet might'st thou be praised enough of men.

Mr. Swinburne's invocation to Sir Philip Sidney leaves on the mind an admirable impression of the genius of—Mr. Swinburne; poor Sidney being literally drowned in their late Victorian melody:

Music bright as the soul of light, for wings an eagle, for notes a dove,
Leaps and shines from the lustrous lines where through thy soul from afar above
Shone and sang till the darkness rang with light whose fire is the fount of love.

Love that led thee alive, and fed thy soul with sorrows and joys and fears,
Love that sped thee, alive and dead, to fame's fair goal with thy peerless peers,
Feeds the flame of thy quenchless name with light that lightens the rayless years.

Nevertheless, when most loyal to his own sumptuous way, Mr. Swinburne can utter finely suggestive poetic criticism. His sonnet on John Ford is an example—an example so splendid that we must quote it entire:

Hew hard the marble from the mountain's heart
Where hardest night holds fast in iron gloom
Gems brighter than an April dawn in bloom,
That his Memnonian likeness thence may start
Revealed, whose hand with high funeral art
Carved night, and chiselled shadow: be the tomb
That speaks him famous graven with signs of doom
Trenched inevitably in lines athwart,
As on some thunder-blasted Titan's brow
His record of rebellion. Not the day
Shall strike forth music from so stern a chord,
Touching his marble: darkness, none knows how,
And stars impenetrable of midnight, may.
So looms the likeness of thy soul, John Ford.

In close criticism Mr. Watson shines brightest among living poet-critics. He has all the needed qualities: imagination, penetration, music, and epigram. His Wordsworth's Grave is a masterpiece in its way. After Mr. Swinburne's bonfire to Marlowe, quoted above, the following comes rather well:

Your Marlowe's page I close, my Shakespeare's ope.
How welcome—after gong and cymbals' din—
The continuity, the long, slow slope,
And vast curves of the gradual violin.

In criticism of Wordsworth Mr. Watson and Matthew Arnold can be compared. But we have no wish to compare them; and the absence from our elbow of Mr. Watson's poem makes this impossible. Nothing more satisfying than Matthew Arnold's lines on Wordsworth can be imagined:

He laid us as we lay at birth
On the cool flowery lap of earth,
Smiles broke from us and we had ease.
Others will teach us how to dare,
And against fear our breast to steel,
Others will strengthen us to bear—
But who, ah! who, will make us feel?
The cloud of mortal destiny,
Others will front it fearlessly—
But who, like him, will put it by?

Mr. Watson's poem should be read as a whole; we can quote here only two of its stanzas, and those not the best:

From Shelley's dazzling glow or thunderous haze,
From Byron's tempest-anger, tempest-mirth,
Men turned to thee and found—not blast or blaze,
Tumult of tottering heavens, but peace on earth.

Nor peace that grows by Lethe, scentless flower,
There in white languors to decline and cease;
But peace, whose names are also rapture, power,
Clear sight, and love: for these are parts of peace.

In his poem "On Exaggerated Deference to Foreign Literary Opinion" Mr. Watson lets himself go for once, and gives us this memorable verse:

More than the froth and flotsam of the Seine,
More than your Hugo-flare against the night,
And more than Weimar's proud elaborate calm,
One flash of Byron's lightning, Wordsworth's light.

Byron was himself a mighty critic in verse; and we are at once reminded that verse-criticism is the most destructive of all, when written by a master. Shadwell can never wriggle from under the heel of Dryden's iron measures. The perfection of Dryden's denunciation would have sealed the doom of a greater poet. You may as well doubt the wind's wail or the sunset's flare as doubt the incompetence that inspired such lines as these:

And pondering which of all his sons was fit
To reign, and wage immortal war with wit,
Cried, "Tis resolved; for nature pleads, that he Should only rule who most resembles me.

Shadwell alone my perfect image bears,
Mature in dulness from his tender years;
Shadwell alone, of all my sons, is he
Who stands confirmed in full stupidity:
The rest to some faint meaning make pretence,
But Shadwell never deviates into sense.
Some beams of wit on other souls may fall,
Strike through, and make a lucid interval;
But Shadwell's genuine night admits no ray,
His rising fogs prevail upon the day."

When those lines were written Shadwell's dulness became as real and immovable as the Wrekin.

But for rollicking destruction that gives joy to the spectator, while not denying hope to the culprit, commend us to Byron—Byron, who learned to deplore his "English Bards and Scottish Reviewers." Do you remember Byron's critical decalogue in "Don Juan"?

If ever I should condescend to prose,
I'll write poetical commandments, which Shall supersede beyond all doubt all those
That went before; in these I shall enrich
My text with many things that no one knows,
And carry precept to the highest pitch:
I'll call the work "Longinus o'er a Bottle,
Or, Every Poet his own Aristotle."

Thou shalt believe in Milton, Dryden, Pope:
Thou shalt not set up Wordsworth, Coleridge, Southey:
Because the first is crazed beyond all hope,
The second drunk, the third so quaint and mouthy;
With Crabbe it may be difficult to cope,
And Campbell's Hippocrene is somewhat drouthy:
Thou shalt not steal from Samuel Rogers, nor Commit—flirtation with the Muse of Moore.

Thou shalt not covet Mr. Sotheby's Muse,
His Pegasus, nor any thing that's his;
Thou shalt not bear false witness like "the Blues"
(There's one, at least, is very fond of this);
Thou shalt not write, in short, but what I choose:
This is true criticism, and you may kiss—
Exactly as you please, or not, the rod,
But if you don't, I'll lay it on, by G—d!

How muscular is he in his own defence:

They accuse me—Mr.—the present writer of
The present poem—of—I know not what—
A tendency to under-rate and scoff
At human power and virtue, and all that;
And this they say in language rather rough.
Good God! I wonder what they would be at!
I say no more than has been said in Dante's
Verse, and by Solomon and by Cervantes;

By Swift by Machiavel, by Rochefoucault,
By Fénelon, by Luther, and by Plato;
By Tillotson, and Wesley, and Ronsseau
Who knew this life was not worth a potatoe
'Tis not their fault nor mine, if this be so—
For my part, I pretend not to be Cato,—
Nor even Diogenes.—We live and die,
But which is best, you know no more than I.

But we will end, as we began, with praise. Next week we shall all be groping for fine things to say about Chaucer. Why not quote Keats and be done? The whole joy of Chaucer is enrolled in these lines: "Written at the End of Chaucer's Tale, 'The Floure and the Leaf'":

This pleasant tale is like a copse:
The honied lines so freshly interlace
To keep the reader in so sweet a place,
So that he here and there full-hearted stops;
And oftentimes he feels the dewy drops
Come cool and suddenly against his face,
And by the wandering melody may trace
Which way the tender-legged linnet hops.
Oh! what a power has white Simplicity.

But for brevity—Leigh Hunt's line:

Chaucer for manners, and close, silent eye.

Things Seen.

"For Better, for Worse."

MINE was the only table in the noisy little Soho restaurant not fully occupied. So the late-comer and his wife, having glanced round the room, sat down facing me.

I take shame to myself for the fact that, try as I would, I could not fix my regard upon my meal, but needs must be furtively taking stock of my vis-à-vis and his wife.

A hard-worked journalist, of the best, the hard-thinking type. No, not a guess; I am all but certain of it. And, oh, but the enduring patience, the seared, worn, inexhaustible kindness in his face was wonderful to look upon!

And then the wife: there was no mistaking her condition; for me at all events. I had met more than one woman so accursed. It was no casual, rare, or isolated lapse that had, so to say, bethumbed and smeared that full, ripely-intelligent face, blurred the fine eyes, and swollen the classic outline into a senseless scrawl. Even liqueurs or neat brandy cannot achieve this at a sitting.

She was acutely conscious, resentfully remorseful, morosely penitent; and she glared in rigid silence at the menu card. He ordered soup for two and "un demi Medoc." Presently the soup supplanted the menu in her fixed regard; but she did not touch it. He half-filled their wine glasses, exactly the same quantity of wine in each, and filled them then from a syphon of soda-water.

No, she would not take fish. A cutlet? Negatived by a blink of her unseeing eyes. He ordered some fish for himself; wearily decorated his plate with fragments thereof; sought to rally his wife, in a whisper; realised the impossible nature of the situation, and beckoned the pay-waiter to him.

"Two soups, one fish, one demi Medoc, the syphon; no, no bread. Yes, that's all. No, there's nothing wrong with the fish, thank you. I—I havn't been able to eat all day. Madame; no, madame is not hungry. No, no; nothing is wrong with the food. I am not complaining. Thank you. Good night!"

I could have beaten the kindly cruel waiter, with his persistent solicitude!

A moment more, and the pair had escaped into the street.

"Not a mouthful," murmured the waiter to a colleague, as he whisked away the fish plate. "That's the fourth day this week!"

And, oh, but the enduring patience, the seared, worn, inexhaustible kindness in the journalist's face, it was wonderful to look upon!

A Gentleman.

SHE was never at a loss in the interests of the family for whom she had toiled, in innumerable capacities, for years. Over the soapsuds, of a Monday morning, in the back-kitchen, she heard and retailed the news. Here was generally of funerals and weddings; theirs of the minor and major movements of home sisters, and brothers gone abroad. One of these last was expected back from the East, after an absence of four years. Elbow-deep in froth, she contrasted his qualities with those of his elder brother in Africa, whom she (secretly) regarded more. "Yes, now," she said, referring to her unacknowledged favourite, "he was a gentleman, Mister John was. When 'e wanted 'is boots cleaned 'e'd come to the top of the stairs and call down, soft-like: 'Mrs. L—, will you be so kind as to clean my boots?' Not but what Mister 'Arry's a gentleman too—but in a different style. When Mister 'Arry wanted 'is boots done, 'e'd just drop 'em over the bannisters and 'oller: 'Eads! I want my boots cleaned!'"

The King and the Play.

THE last performance of the Passion Play has been given, and for ten years Oberammergau will lie unvisited among her encircling hills. Bavarian peasants formed the last audience. They had tramped across the hills, in families, from scattered pious villages, rucksacks upon their backs, devotion in their eyes, and on their faces reverent expectancy. On the following day the village marched in procession to the ancient church at Ettal, there to give thanks for the Divine favour of the Passion Play. Not that the Passion year has been without its sorrows. Death has not overlooked the villagers. Johann Lang, who thrice played the part of Caiaphas, has been taken; also the Centurion, who died of pneumonia, the result of a cold caught during one of the performances; one of the orchestra, from heart disease; and the father of Anna Flunger, who had the honour of being cast for the part of the Virgin Mary.

But the peasants have had their triumphs too. The Play has been performed, not only on successive Sundays, but on most Mondays also, so keen has been the desire of the civilised world to see it, and always has the play been given to a hushed audience—reverent and wondering. So impressed have a number of English Protestants been by the beauty and sincerity of the presentment that they propose to mark their appreciation by presenting a chalice to the Oberammergau church. That will make the peasants unfeignedly happy, if a little amazed. They are a grateful folk, and that quality of gratitude brings me to my point, for their first act after the last performance was to agree to the erection of a drinking fountain to the memory of their friend, inspirer, and king, Ludwig II. of Bohemia—"the mad king," as the world calls him—who spent his fortune on fantastic palaces wherein his own "madness," his religion, and the genius of Wagner are so interwoven that you scarce can tell where one begins and the others end; who so fired the imagination of his peasants that already his life is a saga and he a saint; a monarch who, fourteen years ago, finding this world too narrow a room for his ardent spirit, drowned himself in Starnberg Lake.

It is fitting that the peasants of Oberammergau should honour the memory of their beloved monarch by decreeing that every peasant who toils in from the hills shall find a cup of cold water waiting him. Ludwig must ever be associated with the village. When you leave the great Bavarian plain where Munich lies, and strike into the mountains, one particular landmark so enchains the eye that in time it becomes a sort of obsession—something that you always expect, and are disappointed if you do not find. Scale a mountain, and you will see it; climb a hill, and there it is. It is merely a cross fixed on a high crag of rock, and when you see it you know that there at the base lies Oberammergau. It was Ludwig II., the "mad king," who placed that cross there, and who again and again climbed to the summit to pray at the foot of the cross. Can you wonder these peasants, to whom the sacred symbol means so much, should remember him. How can they forget him when every time they look up to that cross, standing in icy isolation high above their village, they see, with the inner eye, his romantic figure kneeling there!

Strange it is how this mad, dead king dominates that country, not in the great Bavarian plain where Munich lies, but beyond, in the mountain villages where Bavaria lives her simple life—unspoiled. On these mountain roads, over these remote hamlets, his spirit hovers. His trail is over all. Hardly a day passed but I came across it. The peasants, the brown of their bare knees matching their brown, intelligent faces, delight to talk of his midnight rides on the snow-hard roads; of the lights of his white swan sleigh drawing nearer and nearer down the mountain passes; of the great, gilt sledge whirling through the villages, and inside that pale, lonely, enigmatic figure; of the six horses with nodding plumes—come, gone—flashed away into the darkness before they had time to realise that their king was among them.

His trail is over all the Bavarian highlands. Once, when I had climbed a mountain road for many hours, and had reached, as I thought, the limit of civilisation in the shape of a cowherd's hut, I came suddenly upon a palatial building—decorated, sumptuous—the King's House, one of his resting-places on his whirling night journeys. Another time, half way up a pass, in whose giddy deeps lakes lurked, and on whose sides the furs stretched skywards, I stopped at a humble inn with sanded floors and bare tables. "Would I care to see the King's Rooms?" asked the landlady. She led me up the rickety staircase, unlocked a door, and lo! there was the Palace of Versailles in miniature. One room was upholstered in pink, the other in blue, brocade curtains hung from the windows, rare pictures upon the walls, Sèvres china in the cabinet—the King's Rooms—his resting-place for the night when he passed that way, echoing horns announcing the approach of his sledge, with the white plumes nodding upon his six horses. The third time was at Hohenschwangau—that smiling spot, half Bavaria, half an English park. I awoke soon after sunrise, and looking from the window saw Hohenschwangau rising rosy-red, like a fairy palace from her woods. On the other side, on its pinnacle of rock, there sprang into view that marvel of architecture and wanton beauty, where music and madness run riot, the Palace of Neuschwanstein—a monument to his religion, to Wagner, and to the splendour of his unbridled imagination, with its throne room planned acoustically with such cunning, that when he spoke his voice rolled round the walls like a voice baying to the world from the mountains. And on the walls are paintings of the six kings who became saints, and above, among the stars on the roof, soars the King of kings, and Saint of saints! And so once more back to the Passion Play, to that cross on the pinnacle of rock, and the mad king praying there. Far below lies Oberammergau—his Oberammergau—gone back to private life like an ex-Lord Mayor. I go over in memory the day I saw the play. Again the dust-laden carriages in interminable line crawl into the village; again the streets are filled with people from every clime; again, it is 6 o'clock on a Sunday morning, and the church is dark with worshippers; again, two hours later, the theatre is filled with a hushed throng of 6,000 people; again the birds fly across the open stage, and far beyond, over Pilate's house, I see the cattle grazing upon the hills; again the gun fires; again the 6,000 are mute as from either side of the stage grave, gorgeously clad figures advance; again the Passion Play has begun.

All was memorable, and much was profoundly moving. In the first hours one waited uneasily for the note of discord, for the jar of personal vanity, for some theatricality of pose or gesture that, it seemed, must show itself somewhere, some time. But the discord never came. The acting? It was not acting, it was reality! As the drama unfolded itself, I forgot that I was a spectator in a theatre. Fatigue? Yes! Intense fatigue, and when at five o'clock we left the theatre the body cried only for rest from sight and hearing. But later, the next day, driving away through those encircling hills, the Passion Play found its place in the twilight of unforgettable impressions. With me two episodes were clamant: one was the washing of the disciples' feet, and the other blended itself in my mind, without conscious intention, with the last moments of King Ludwig's life. As to the first episode, I never expect to see again such grave beauty of movement and gesture, such poignant feeling as that showed by the disciples when their Master moved slowly from one to the other with towel and basin. Their humble gestures of protest as He approached, struggling with their love that irradiated from their rough faces, brought tears to the eyes. And the Christ, He moved among them like a spirit, like one walking and acting in a dream. It was not acting: it was reality.

The other episode was that last awful cry from the Cross. It rang round the theatre, cutting and bruising as it passed. Eli, Eli, lama sabachthani? We caught our breath. It was old and new—old as death, new as birth—that ultimate cry of human despair. The hills beyond the stage faded away, and I saw for a moment the waters of Starnberg Lake, and the figure of that unhappy king. That cry! his also in that weak moment, when he thought the world had conquered.

Correspondence.

The "Best-Selling."

SIR,—Twelve times a year the Bookman informs its subscribers what are the "best selling" books in the United Kingdom. Concerning this the seeker after enlightenment is confronted with no ordinary problem. Indeed, unless he be gifted above his fellow-men with the power of reading thoughts, he is practically bound to be baffled completely. He may grapple with the task manfully, bringing to bear thereon all the innate doggedness of nature and glorious determination not to be beaten that are his splendid heritage by right of birth, but, alas! all to no purpose. Despite his most strenuous exertions, he must, sooner or later, retire from the unequal contest. Yet, though he be defeated, he will not be disgraced, for to fail in the accomplishment of the impossible is not accounted to a man for his shame.

To go into details. On page 4 of the Bookman for the month of October, in the present year of grace, is a list of works "most in demand during the month." It refers, it should be explained in passing, only to England, and runs as follows:

The Man that Corrupted Hadleyburg. Mark Twain.
Robert Orange. John Oliver Hobbes.
Senator North. Gertrude Atherton.
The Attaché at Peking. A. B. F. Mitford.
The Gateless Barrier. Lucas Malet.
A Courtesy Dame. R. M. Gilchrist.
Meiklejohn's Educational Works.
The Sky Pilot. Ralph Connor.
The Fourth Generation. Sir Walter Besant.
Origin of the Boer War Revealed. C. H. Thomas.
With the Boer Forces. H. C. Hill-gas.
China, the Long-Lived Empire. E. R. Seidmore.

Now, in glancing over the foregoing names, the writer could not help being a little struck by one or two of them. From a pretty wide acquaintance with the literary tastes of both library-subscribers and patrons of the bookshops, it seemed to him that certain volumes in the above list were not included therein by right of popularity. Rather than set his judgment, however, against the weight of learning possessed by the compiler of this list, he sought corroborative evidence of its correctness in another quarter.

This was on page 34 of the Bookman, where is given a second list of the sales of books, "in order of demand," and covers the same period as that of the list already referred to. It differs therefrom, however, in the fact that it is divided into ten districts. By this means, accordingly, readers are enabled to gauge the local popularity of any particular book in list No. 1.

So far, so good. Here was evidently a scheme by which the inquirer might derive some valuable information respecting not only the "best selling-books" in England, but also the particular districts in which they were the most popular of all those offered for sale. It was not until he had directed a little original research into the working of the theory that the writer began to have any doubt whatever as to its efficacy. When he had directed a good deal of original research into the matter, he had a corresponding amount of doubt.

In order that others may judge for themselves, he submits for their consideration these results:—Turning to list No. 1, he selected therefrom a book at random. It happened to be the one entitled The Sky Pilot, by Ralph Connor. As the name was by no means so familiar to him as one included among the fourteen best selling books in England during the month ought to have been, he promptly turned to list No. 2, for the purpose of discovering where the public were clamouring for it to such an extent as to justify its insertion in list No. 1. Or doing so, lo and behold! it was not there at all! That is to say, that this work, which on one page of the Bookman is described as one of the "best selling books of the month," is, on another, giving the best selling books in the ten chief districts in England, not even mentioned.

Other works declared in one place to be among the fourteen best selling ones in England, and omitted altogether from the second list, are Mark Twain's The Man that Corrupted Hadleyburg, Gertrude Atherton's Senator North, R. M. Gilchrist's A Courtesy Dame, and C. H. Thomas's Origin of the Boer War Revealed. To put it in another way: out of the fourteen books given in list No. 1 only five are given in list No. 2. Why?

As another instance of the vagaries of the compiler of this list, the present scribe would mention a personal experience—praying the suffrages of his readers for doing so. A short time ago he wrote—under extenuating circumstances—a certain book. The name is immaterial: suffice it to state that it was a work of transcendent genius. On its publication, therefore, he was greatly pleased to find it included in the Bookman's list of "best selling books" for three months in succession. Nevertheless, the pecuniary results derived by him from this epoch-making volume were infinitely less than those obtained by brothers in guilt whose books had never achieved the distinction of making even a single appearance in the Bookman's list. Again, why?—I am, &c.,

H. W.

Authors' Club.

"The Struggle for Success."

SIR,—In your issue of October 13 appears a notice of The Struggle for Success, by "J. Stodhart-Walker," a member of the medical profession in Edinburgh, the purport of which would lead me to believe that it refers to a book that was published under my name. But as I am neither a member of the medical profession in Edinburgh, nor do I sign myself "J. Stodhart-Walker," I am a little doubtful. My doubt is further emphasised when I read that your author "seems to attach as much importance to the wearing of a 'jemima' as to the greatest of the eternal verities." Now, my point of view is entirely opposite to this: I emphatically emphasise the triviality of the conventions which are concerned with the questions of dress, and say that "the society man or woman taking the whole matter seriously might rouse the laughter of the gods." If, then, your critic is referring to my book, it leaves the matter pretty much on the level of a reviewer attempting to prove that Charles Darwin (to rise to big men), in his Origin of Species, was attacking the principle of evolution, or that Herbert Spencer's First Principles was a defence of the ecclesiastical position.

Your reviewer is quite entitled to his opinions; he is not justified, however low he takes his standard of criticism, to alter facts. It is interesting to me, as a collector of statistics, to observe that all the favourable reviews I have received have dwelt on the backbone of my work—that is, on the chapters on Inhibition and Physical Sanity and Marriage, while those who have viewed me as platitudinous and vague have cooled their souls over the fringe of my study, as it is found, for instance, in my chapter on Conventions.—I am, &c.,

ARCHIBALD STODART-WALKER.

30, Charles-street, St. James's, S.W.

P.S.—Your reviewer says “there is a great deal of shrewd, interesting conversation in this book.” Does that include my chapter on Inhibition? If so, I am sorry for the conversation!

[We regret the mistake in printing Mr. Stodart-Walker's name. For the rest, Mr. Stodart-Walker seems to think he should be his own critic. He is a graduate of Edinburgh and hold an assistant professorship there, so that the protest against our description seems to be quite uncalled for.]

The Abuse of “R.”

SIR,—Mr. MacRitchie's statement that “many English people of excellent education add this phonetic r in certain connexions” will no doubt be read with surprise, if not incredulity, even by some who are unconsciously guilty of the solecism. Nor will they be convinced by the assumed analogous tendencies in German and French. In “daran” r is not intrusive, but radical—cf. Old Eng. dhar, dher; Goth., thar; Old High Ger., dara; Middle High Ger., där, showing that in New High Ger. the r lost in da survives in dar-an, dar-aus, &c. So in the French “a-t-il” the t is the Lat. t persisting before vowels, and a-t-il = habet ille should properly be written at-il. But with their usual topsy-turvydom the grammarians have perverted all this, calling the t “euphonic,” instead of explaining that it is a survival, lost in the direct form il a(t). In the same way we are taught that a becomes an before a vowel (a man, an ass), the fact being that an becomes a before a consonant. Curious results are nadder, napron, now adder, apron, &c. I have never heard the sound crarb for crab, or kharki for khaki, though I am aware that many Anglo-Indians do say wallar for wallah, ghorar for ghora, &c.—I am, &c.,

A. H. KEANE.

79, Broadhurst-gardens, South Hampstead, N.W.

Our Weekly Competition.

Result of No. 56 (New Series).

LAST week we set the following Competition:

- The two most interesting biographies.
- The two most interesting works of history.
- The two most interesting works of travel.
- The two most interesting religious works.
- The two most interesting novels.
- The two most interesting books for children.

An examination of the lists sent in shows that, in the opinion of our competitors, the following autumn books promise to be the most interesting:

BIOGRAPHY.

- L. Huxley Life and Letters of Huxley Macmillan.
J. Morley Oliver Cromwell Macmillan.

HISTORY.

- Dr. Doyle The Great Boer War Smith, Elder.
J. McCarthy The Four Georges Chatto & Windus.

TRAVEL.

- E. S. Grogan and
A. H. Sharp From the Cape to Cairo... Hurst & Blackett.
H. James A Little Tour in France... Heinemann.

RELIGIOUS.

- Principal Fairbairn... Philosophy of Christian Religion Hodder & Stoughton.
Bullen With Christ at Sea Hodder & Stoughton.

NOVELS.

- J. M. Barrie Tommy and Grizel Cassell.
Mrs. H. Ward Eleanor Smith, Elder.

CHILDREN'S BOOKS.

- A. Lang Grey Fairy Book Longmans.
Author of “Elizabeth and Her April Baby's Book of German Garden” . Tunes Macmillan.

The individual list which most nearly anticipated the above result was drawn up by Mr. Thomas Griffiths, 36, John Street, Rhyll, to whom a cheque for one guinea has been sent. Mr. Griffiths's list is as follows:

- J. Morley Oliver Cromwell.
L. Huxley Life and Letters of Thomas Henry Huxley, F.R.S.
Dr. Doyle History of the Boer War.
J. McCarthy A History of the Four Georges and of William the Fourth.
H. James A Little Tour in France.
E. S. Grogan and A. H. Sharp From the Cape to Cairo.
Principal Fairbairn The Philosophy of the Christian Religion.
Rev. S. Baring-Gould Virgin Saints and Martyrs.
R. S. Hichens Tongues of Conscience.
Mrs. H. Ward Eleanor.
Judge Parry The Story of Don Quixote.
A. Lang The Grey Fairy Book.

Among the most successful are these lists:

- J. Morley Oliver Cromwell.
L. Huxley Thomas Henry Huxley.
Conan Doyle The Great Boer War.
Sir W. Hunter A History of British India.
H. James A Little Tour in France.
E. S. Grogan and A. H. Sharp From the Cape to Cairo.
Prof. E. B. Tyler The Natural History of Religion.
F. T. Bullen With Christ at Sea.
Mrs. H. Ward Eleanor.
Zangwill The Mantle of Elijah.
G. Chesterton Greybeards at Play.
Author of “Elizabeth and Her German Garden” The April Baby's Book of Tunes.
[E. M. S., London.]
Benson Life of Archbishop Benson.
L. Huxley Huxley's Life and Letters.
J. Morley Oliver Cromwell.
A. Michie The Englishman in China in the Victorian Era.
Conan Doyle The Great Boer War.
Winston Churchill Ian Hamilton's March.
W. Walsh The History of the Romeward Movement in the Church of England, 1833-1864.
Principal Fairbairn The Philosophy of the Christian Religion.
Mrs. H. Ward Eleanor.
J. M. Barrie Tommy and Grizel.
A. Lang Grey Fairy Book.
Author of “Elizabeth and Her German Garden” The April Baby's Book of Tunes.
[P. K., London.]

Competition No. 57 (New Series).

The following pleasing little poem appeared in the Westminster Gazette of Thursday:

A WOMAN TO A MAN.

When you grieve, and let it show,
And may tell me nothing more,
You have told me, o'er and o'er,
All a woman needs to know.
When I show you that I care
(Meet your eyes, and touch your hand),
I have made you understand
All a woman may, or dare.
So, the ears of Friendship heard!
So, 'twas seen of Friendship's eyes!
You are sad, I sympathise,
All without a single word.

It will be observed that the poem is the address of a woman to a man. We offer a prize of One Guinea for the best poem of the same metre and length in which the man replies.

RULES.

Answers, addressed “Literary Competition, THE ACADEMY, 43, Chancery-lane, W.C.,” must reach us not later than the first post of Wednesday, October 24. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found on the second page of Wrapper, or it cannot enter into competition. Competitors sending more than one attempt at solution must accompany each attempt with a separate coupon; otherwise the first only will be considered. We cannot consider anonymous answers.

MUDIE'S LIBRARY

(LIMITED).

SUBSCRIPTIONS for 3 Months, 6 Months, and 12 Months

CAN BE ENTERED AT ANY DATE.

THE BEST and MOST POPULAR BOOKS
of the SEASON ARE NOW in CIRCULATION.

Prospectuses of Terms free on application.

BOOK SALE DEPARTMENT.

Many Thousand Surplus Copies of Books always ON SALE
(Second Hand). Also a large Selection of

BOOKS IN LEATHER BINDINGS

SUITABLE FOR

BIRTHDAY AND WEDDING PRESENTS.

30 to 34, NEW OXFORD STREET;

241, Brompton Road, S.W.; 49, Queen Victoria Street, E.C., LONDON;

And at 10-12, Barton Arcade, MANCHESTER.

An American Transport in the Crimean War.

By Capt. CODMAN.

In this work Capt. Codman relates his experiences of an American Chartered Transport in the Crimean War.....
The Crimean War is the connecting link between old and modern methods of warfare.

Frontispiece.

198 pp.

Price 3s. 6d.

London :

SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, HAMILTON & CO.

Selections from Alexander & Shephard's Publications.

WORKS BY DR. MACLAREN.

Crown 8vo, cloth boards, price 5s. each, post free.
THE BEATITUDES, and other Sermons.
"An excellent exposition of the Beatitudes.....full of thought and knowledge and power."

British Weekly.
CHRIST'S "MUSTS," and other Sermons.

"Felicitous exposition, rugged, intense eloquence, and beautiful illustration."—Word and Work.

THE UNCHANGING CHRIST, and other
Sermons.

"Distinguished by the finest scholarship and most exquisite literary finish."—Christian Leader.

THE GOD of the AMEN, and other
Sermons.

"The several sermons contained in this volume are replete with a keen spiritual insight, combined with an aptness of illustration and beauty of diction which cannot fail to both impress and charm the reader."
Methodist Times.

THE HOLY of HOLIES. A Series of Sermons on the 14th, 15th, and 16th Chapters of the Gospel by John.

"No British preacher has unfolded this portion of Scripture in a more scholarly style."
North British Daily Mail.

London : ALEXANDER & SHEPHEARD, LTD., 21 and 22, Farnival Street, Holborn, W.C.

PORTRAIT SUPPLEMENTS

TO

"THE ACADEMY,"

Consisting of Thirty-seven Portraits of Old and New Celebrities in Literature, may still be obtained, singly, or in complete sets for 3s. 6d., on application to the Office, 43, Chancery Lane, W.C.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK,

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London, W.C.

CURRENT ACCOUNTS

2% on the minimum monthly balances, when not drawn below £100. 2%

DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS

2 1/2% on Deposits, repayable on demand. 2 1/2%

STOCKS AND SHARES.

Stocks and Shares Purchased and Sold for Customers.

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free.

FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

Telephone, No. 5, Holborn.
Telegraphic Address, "BIRKBECK, LONDON."

CATALOGUES.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE,

IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN BOOKS,

4, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, 20, South Frederick St.
Edinburgh, and 7, Broad Street, Oxford.

CATALOGUES post free on application.

BAEDEKER'S & BADDELEY'S

TOURISTS' GUIDE BOOKS.

New fully detailed CATALOGUE sent post free on application.

DULAU & CO., 37, SOHO SQUARE, LONDON, W.

TABOOED SCIENTIFIC WORKS.—The Manager of the University Press, Limited, begs to inform the Medical Profession, Clergymen, and Teachers that the Scientific Works indicated at a recent trial and burnt by order of the Court—viz, Dr. Huxley's "STOICIES in the PSYCHOLOGY of SEX," Professor Staff-Edin's

"PSYCHOPATHIA SEXUALIS," Dr. Ch. Ferri's "THE SEXUAL INSTINCT," and G. Mortimer's "CHAPTERS on HUMAN LOVE," in the future, cannot be stocked by Booksellers in Great Britain, and will only be supplied direct from Leipzig and Paris.—THE UNIVERSITY PRESS, Limited, 2, Broad Street Buildings, London, E.C.

LIVERPOOL LITERARY LYCEUM.

Established 1758.

The Committee require the services of a LIBRARIAN, who must be a man of good education and well versed in the administrative work of a Library. Salary £200.—Applications, marked "Librarian," to be sent in on or before November 8th, to Colonel JAMES GIFFEY, V.D., 24, Chapel Street, Liverpool.

ASSISTANT SCHOOLMISTRESS.—Miss

LOUISA BROUGH can RECOMMEND University
Graduates, Trained and Certificated High School Teachers,
Foreign Teachers, Kindergarten Teachers, &c.—CENTRAL REGISTRY FOR TEACHERS, 25, Craven Street, Charing Cross, W.C.

BOOKS WANTED.—Gardner's History, 2
vols., 1863.—Roman's Rye, 2 vols., 1857.—Jesse's Richard III.,
1862.—Lorna Doone, 3 vols. Presentation Copies of Browning, Dickens, Thackeray, and any notable Authors. Rare Books supplied. State wants.—Baker's Great Bookshop, Birmingham.

LITERARY RESEARCH.—A Gentleman, experienced in Literary Work, and who has access to the British Museum Reading Room, is open to arrange with Author or any person requiring assistance in Literary Research, or in seeing Work through the Press. Translations undertaken from French, Italian, or Spanish.—Apply, by letter, to D. C. DALLAS, 151, Strand, London, W.C.

TYPE-WRITING promptly and accurately done. 10d. per 1,000 words. Samples and references.
Multi-Copies.—Address, Miss MESSER, 18, Mortimer Crescent, N.W.

TYPE-WRITER.—AUTHORS' MSS.
COPIED with accuracy and despatch. Carbon Duplicates. Circulars. Examination Papers, &c.—Miss E. TIGAR, 23, Maitland Park Villa, Haverstock Hill, N.W.—Established 1884.

A CHARMING GIFT BOOK!

6s., claret roan, gilt, Illustrated.

LONDON IN THE TIME OF THE DIAMOND JUBILEE.

London: Simpkin, Marshall & Co. Llangollen: Darlington & Co.

DARLINGTON'S HANDBOOKS.

Edited by RALPH DARLINGTON, F.R.G.S. Maps by BARTHOLOMEW.

Fcap. 8vo. ONE SHILLING EACH. Illustrated.

THE VALE of LLANGOLLEN.—With Special Contributions from His Excellency E. J.
PHELPS, late American Minister; Professor JOHN RUSKIN, LL.D.; ROBERT BROWNING,
A. W. KINGLAKE, and Sir THEODORE MARTIN, K.C.B.

BOURNEMOUTH and NEW FOREST.

THE NORFOLK BROADS.

BRECON and its BEACONS.

ROSS, TINTERN, and CHEPSTOW.

BRISTOL, BATH, WELLS, and WESTON-SUPER-MARE.

BRIGHTON, EASTBOURNE, HASTINGS, and ST. LEONARDS.

LLANDUDNO, RHYL, BANGOR, PENMAENMAWR, &

LLANFAIRFECHAN, ANGLESEY, and CARNARVON.

ABERYSTWYTH, BARMOUTH, MACHYNLLETH, and ABERDOVEY.

CONWAY, COLWYN BAY, BETTWS-Y-COED, SNOWDON, & PESTINOOG.

BARMOUTH, DOLGELLY, HARLECH, CRICCIETH, and PWLLHELL.

MALVERN, HEREFORD, WORCESTER, GLOUCESTER, & CHELTENHAM.

LLANDRINDOD WELLS and the SPAS of MID-WALES.

1s.—THE HOTELS of the WORLD. A Handbook to the leading hotels throughout the world.

"What would not the intelligent tourist in Paris or Rome give for such a guide-book as this, which teaches so much that is outside the usual scope of such volumes!"—The Times.

"The best Handbook to London ever issued."—Liverpool Daily Post.

THIRD EDITION, REVISED, 6s.—60 Illustrations, 24 Maps and Plans.

LONDON AND ENVIRONS

By E. C. COOK and E. T. COOK, M.A.

With Index of 4,500 References to all Streets and Places of Interest.

Llangollen: DARLINGTON & CO.

London: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, HAMILTON, KENT, & Co., Ltd., The Railway Bookstalls, and all Booksellers.

The Academy

A Weekly Review of Literature and Life.

No. 1486. Established 1869.

27 October, 1900.

Price Threepence.

[Registered as a Newspaper.]

The Literary Week.

IN the height of the season we could often fill an entire number of the ACADEMY with reviews of the novels published in the preceding week. Such a measure is happily out of the question; but next week we shall endeavour to meet the situation by issuing a special Fiction Supplement.

THE Chaucer window unveiled on Thursday in the collegiate church of St. Saviour's, Southwark, by Mr. Alfred Austin, is not a large window, as many people may suppose who have not seen it. It is a single-light lancet window in the north aisle of the nave, and is uniform in size and style with the adjacent window dedicated to Bunyan, and with the windows in the opposite aisle commemorating Philip Massinger, John Fletcher, Francis Beaumont, and Edgar Alleyn. Shakespeare and Spenser share a larger window between them. Appropriately, the Chaucer window is very near to the tomb of John Gower. In the course of his address the Poet Laureate remarked that "every great poet experienced and passed through three stages: in the first he was either excessively belauded or excessively depreciated; in the second he was neglected if he had previously been over-estimated, or belauded if he had been under-estimated; and in the third and last stage he came into smooth water after being either in the trough or on the crest of the wave. Then he reached a haven of tranquil and assured fame, such as has now for a long time been the assured lot of Chaucer." We wonder which of these stages Mr. Austin considers he has reached himself.

Two interesting items of literary news were announced at the end of last week. One was that Mr. Maccoll, who has been editor of the Athenæum since 1869, retires with the new year from that position. Mr. Maccoll has well earned his leisure by over thirty-one years of devotion to the journal he has conducted so ably. We are glad to learn that he will continue to contribute to the Athenæum on his own subjects. He is succeeded by Mr. Vernon Rendall, who has acted as assistant-editor for some years.

THE secret of the other item of literary news had been well kept. During the past twelve months, while the eyes of the political world have been fixed on Lord Rosebery, awaiting, or fearing, the moment when he would see fit to reveal himself, the author of Pitt has been quietly correcting a study of Napoleon. The volume, which contains 350 pages, deals mainly with Napoleon's residence at St. Helena, and it is said that the noble author has written the work "in order to lay a sort of literary ghost that has been haunting him for some time." Mr. Arthur Humphreys, who is the director of Messrs. Hatchard's, will publish the book. Lord Rosebery is a frequent visitor to Messrs. Hatchard's establishment.

MR. STEPHEN PHILLIPS has been interviewed by the Pall Mall Gazette apropos of his play "Herod," which is to be produced at Her Majesty's Theatre next Wednesday. The interviewer having beguiled Mr. Phillips (what a luxurious creature the modern interviewer is!) into the "palm-garden of the Carlton," and having found a "cosy corner, with cigarettes and coffee to help us out with our talk," certainly succeeded in making the author of "Herod" talk. Among other things Mr. Stephen Phillips said:

I should be inclined to describe "Herod" as an attempt to paint in dramatic verse with an Eastern background the most tremendous love-story in the world. I say this advisedly. It is no case here of a boy-and-girl passion as in "Romeo and Juliet" or "Paolo and Francesca"; nor even of the infatuation of a middle-aged man for a somewhat colourless maiden as in "Othello"; but of the clash of two natures equally intense and of barbaric emotion.

Throughout the play I hope to make perpetually felt the throb of that world-struggle between Mark Antony and Cæsar Augustus which involved the fate of Herod, and with him that of Judæa itself.

There is also a motive which, so far as I know, is new, and which in itself is foundation enough for a separate play—the constant contrast between Herod's public success and his domestic miseries.

THE Monthly Review, we gather, will make a feature of a poem of several pages in each issue. The first number, it will be remembered, contained Mr. Newbolt's fine poem, "The Nile." The second number contains a poem of five pages by Mr. Laurence Binyon, called "The Indian Prince."

MR. ROBERT BUCHANAN's condition, at the moment of going to press, remains very serious. He has really been ill for many months. Early in the summer he was suffering from influenza and inflammation of the lungs, and, when improvement took place, he was able to leave his house at Clapham Common and proceed on a holiday to France. About three months ago he was able to resume work, and also to cycle. A fortnight ago he rode to Clapham from a place where he was staying, and then he seemed to be almost himself again, and talked brightly and hopefully. That condition was maintained until last Friday, when he had a stroke of paralysis, which has affected the whole of one side of his body.

WE were expecting it, and, lo! it has come to the birth—the organ which is to be the particular mouthpiece of the Imperial spirit. The Imperial and Colonial Magazine is its name—an illustrated monthly:

Naturally [says the Prospectus] much space will be given to all the Colonies and Settlements in both hemispheres, their historic evolution, present condition, and future prospects. Topics of Military and Naval importance will here, too, of necessity, find a place. On all such topics it is our purpose and desire to present monthly to our readers articles signed by names that are eminent in their various departments, and written by men who will speak not only from theory, but out of the practical knowledge which comes from experience. Of such will be the bulk of the Imperial and Colonial Magazine.

The editor veils his identity under a nom-de-guerre. The sub-editor is Mr. E. F. Benson, whose brother opens the book with a poem "To Her Majesty."

THERE is an article on Byron, man, poet, and letter-writer, in the new Edinburgh Review. The writer speaks of him as the "founder and precursor of modern realism in poetry," and makes a good point when he says of a stanza in "Don Juan": "A versified paraphrase, it may be said, of sober history, yet withal very different from the most animated prose, which must be kept at a lower temperature of intense expression." As an instance of Byron's felicitous realism in quiet description, we are referred to the stanzas describing the return of Lambro to his Greek island:

He saw his white walls shining in the sun,
His garden trees all shadowy and green;
He heard his rivulet's light bubbling run,
The distant dog-bark; and perceived between
The umbrage of the wood so cool and dun
The moving figures and the sparkling sheen
Of arms (in the East all arm)—and various dyes
Of colour'd garbs, as bright as butterflies.

And further on a group of Grecian girls,
The first and tallest her white kerchief waving,
Were strung together like a row of pearls;
Link'd hand in hand, and dancing; each too having Down her white neck long floating auburn curls—
(The least of which would set ten poets raving);
Their leader sang—and bounded to her song,
With choral step and voice, the virgin throng.

And here, assembled cross-legg'd round their trays,
Small social parties just begun to dine;
Pilaus and meats of all sorts met the gaze,
And flasks of Samian and of Chian wine,
And sherbet cooling in the porous vase;
Above them their dessert grew on its vine,
The orange and pomegranate nodding o'er,
Dropp'd in their laps, scarce pluck'd, their mellow store.

That the revival of Byron's poetry is opportune we are very sure, and the Edinburgh writer hopes that the reading of his poetry may act as a tonic on the literary nerves of the rising generation.

For, as Mr. Swinburne has generously acknowledged, with the emphatic concurrence of Matthew Arnold, his poems have "the excellence of sincerity and strength." Now, one tendency of latter-day verse has been toward that over-delicacy of fibre which has been termed decadence, toward the preference of correct metrical harmonies over distinct and incisive expression, toward vague indications of meaning. In this form the melody prevails over the matter; the style inclines to become precious and garnished with verbal artifice. Some recent French poets, indeed, in their anxiety to correct the troublesome lucidity of their mother-tongue, have set up the school of symbolism, which deals in half-veiled metaphor and sufficiently obscure allusion, relying upon subtly suggestive phrases for evoking associations. For ephemeral infirmities of this kind the straightforward virility of Byron's best work may serve as an antidote.

THE death of Mr. Charles Dudley Warner removes a popular and typical figure from American literature. Mr. Warner, who has died in his seventy-second year, had been one of the editors of Harper's Magazine since 1884, and a large contributor to its pages. He edited the "American Men of Letters" series, collaborated with Mark Twain on a novel called The Golden Age, and was an enthusiastic traveller and writer of travel sketches. His reputation was made thirty years ago by his book called My Summer in a Garden.

In our Correspondence column will be found a warm plea for Thackeray as a force and as a companion. That he is both to very many is shown by the pilgrimage of the Urban Club to the Charterhouse last Saturday and the dinner at Anderton's Hotel, at which Sir J. Crichton Browne presided. The Club was received in the historic hall of the Charterhouse by Dr. Haig Brown, formerly head of the School—which is now removed to Godalming—and he recalled the fact that in the year of Thackeray's death he had sat next to him at the banquet on Founder's Day. The Rev. Henry Le Bas read passages from Thackeray's works referring to the spot.

THAT curious little paper, the Eagle and the Serpent, which ordinarily confines itself pretty much to the teachings of Nietzsche, seems inclined to enlarge its scope. This month it draws its readers' attention to the maxims of Sebastian-Reche Nicholas Chamfort (1741-1794) whose sayings will often bear comparison with the best of Rochefoucauld. From the selection given we take the following specimens of Chamfort's wit and wisdom:

Intelligent people make many blunders because they never believe the world as stupid as it is.

Love pleases more than marriage for the reason that romance is more interesting than history.

You run the risk of being disgusted if you pry into the processes of cookery, government, or justice.

A man in deep mourning is asked: "Good God! whom have you lost?" "I?" says he, "I have lost nothing, I am a widower."

Milton after the restoration of Charles II. was on the way to securing again a lucrative office which he had lost. His wife urged him. He replied: "You are a woman, and you want a coach; as for me, I want to live and die an honest man."

A bright woman told me once that when choosing a sweetheart a woman pays more regard to what other women say about the man of her choice than to her own opinion of him.

When a man has been tormented and fatigued by his sensitiveness, he learns that he must live from day to day, forget all that is possible, and efface his life from memory as it passes.

MISS MARIE CORELLI has deserved well of the public and of Shakespearean students by drawing attention to the extraordinary project of placing a bust of the late Lady Martin (Helen Faucit) in the chancel of Stratford-on-Avon church, opposite the bust of Shakespeare. Miss Corelli states that Sir Theodore Martin has promised to give £500 towards the restoration fund now being collected for Holy Trinity Church on condition that he is allowed to place a bust of his late wife in the very spot sacred to the memory of Shakespeare. We prefer to hope, with the Morning Post, to which paper Miss Corelli addressed her letter, that some misconception exists. It is as difficult to believe that Sir Theodore Martin has intended this intrusion as to believe that the public will tolerate it. Miss Corelli, however, says explicitly that the Bishop of Worcester has given his permission for an act which the Morning Post frankly calls a "desecration," and this in spite of the determined opposition of the vicar of Stratford-on-Avon.

SINCE the above was written we learn that the vicar of Holy Trinity Church, Stratford-on-Avon, has been offered an immediate payment of £900, the whole of the debt on the church, provided the bust of the late Lady Martin (Miss Helen Faucit) is placed in any part of the church other than the Shakespeare chancel.

THE Pilot has a striking article in which the writer declares his agreement with Ouida's diagnosis of "The Disease of Modernity" in her Critical Essays. Here is a live coal from the blaze:

Ouida is vehement and eloquent; therefore not to be trusted, says the sceptic again. Well, the facts are more eloquent still, and Ouida gives them in melancholy abundance. The truth is, that we Liberals have made a huge mistake. We put down the ancien régime, and put up the capitalist, neither pure nor simple, but certainly our master. The Bourbons have gone out, the Rothschilds have come in, and we cry, foolishly enough, "Le roi est mort." It is about time we took a fresh observation of the phenomena. The Kingdom of Heaven is not here; but, as Ouida proves, the world has grown to be one gigantic railway-station plastered with lying advertisements. Capital glories in being cosmopolitan; it has no heart and no country; it values ideals and antiquities for what they will fetch in the market. It spans the Tiber and the Grand Canal with cast-iron bridges; it sets the jerry-builder to rear his unsightly barracks in front of St. Peter's; it shrieks with delight when trams thunder down the ringing grooves of Change through the Piazza del Duomo at Florence, and knock to pieces whatever comes in their way. It has laid waste the architectural beauty of old cities from one end of Europe to the other, working on a single pattern of dead and dull uniformity, which is not mere decadence but dissolution—the murder of that visible beauty which was a compensation to millions for the poverty they had to endure. They must endure it still, although the beauty is gone and the colour taken out of their lives.

The writer's conclusion is that the disease of modernity is real, that it is a spreading plague, and that it is nothing less than Mammon, "the meanest of all false gods."

On the title-page of the Anglo-Saxon Review appears the inscription: "Edited by Lady Randolph Spencer Churchill (Mrs. George Cornwallis-West)." It is understood, however, that the present admirable number has been arranged by Mr. W. Earl Hodgson, who himself contributes a short story called "Aunt Maisie's Indiscretion." A "miracle play," in three acts, by Maurice Maeterlinck, may be considered by some as the gem. "Sister Beatrice" it is called, and it is the poetical setting of a familiar mediæval legend. But Mr. A. Bernard Miall, its translator, warns us that the play is really a libretto, that he has been compelled to alter the metre, and that in any case readers may miss in "Sister Beatrice" the atmosphere and glamour of the Maeterlinckian drama, inasmuch as it is partly absent in the French. Externally the play looks Maeterlinckian enough, but we cannot attempt its exposition here. Mr. Edward Garnett's article on Tolstoi and Turgenev is well worth perusal. In "Three Seeresses" Mr. Andrew Lang prattles pleasingly and cogently about Mrs. Piper, Mdle. Hélène Smith, and Jeanne d'Arc.

WE have not seen a better pocket reprint than the Oxford Miniature Edition of The Early Poems of Alfred Lord Tennyson. In appearance, if not in construction, it is a "dumpy twelve," but not too dumpy. The type is almost large, and the binding has been done with the precision so necessary to a volume of 990 pages that can be slipped into the waistcoat pocket. The volume includes all the short early poems, and "The Princess," "In Memoriam," and "Maud."

THE New York Critic is of opinion that the palm for work on Shakespeare done in this century must be awarded to Dr. Horace Howard Furness and his "New Variorum Edition." In a very interesting article on Furness and his work we are given an extract from a private letter written by Dr. Furness, with no thought of publication, but illuminating the whole subject of his life-work in a delightful manner. Dr. Furness says:

As for the time when I began to work over Shakespeare and study him with zeal, it began in '62 or '63, when I made a mighty variorum "Hamlet," cutting out the notes of five or six editions besides the Variorum of 1821, and pasting them on a page with a little rivulet of text. 'Twas a ponderous book of quarto size, and eight or nine inches thick—and I took great delight in burning it some years ago. But the work revealed to me that it was high time to begin a new Variorum, that we might start afresh. We were constantly threshing old straw. . . . I think I tried five or six different shapes before I settled down on the present one, with varying faced type. To avoid the imputation that I was self-seeking in attaching my puny name to "the greatest in all literature," I resolved that I would be the merest drudge, simply arranging and codifying the notes of others, and would utter no faintest chirp of my own. But, as you know, my resolution did not hold out, and now ever since I edited "Othello" I gabble like a tinker. . . .

DR. FURNESS's edition is, of course, lineally descended from the old "Variorum" of 1821, which is in twenty-one octavo volumes, and embodies practically all Shakespearean textual criticism up to that date. In 1863-66 came the great Cambridge edition, edited by Mr. W. Aldis Wright—an epoch-making work. Dr. Furness's Variorum is, however, a more ambitious work. The Cambridge Edition, while it gives the readings of the old editions [we are quoting Dr. Furness himself], omits to note the adoption or rejection of them by the various editors, whereby an important element in estimating these readings is wanting; however uncouth a reading may seem at first sight, it ceases to be the "sophistication" of a printer when we learn that men so judicious as Capell or Dyce had pronounced in its favour; and in disputed passages it is of great interest to see at a glance on which side lies the weight of authority. Moreover, by this same defect in the plan of the Cambridge edition, credit is not always given to that editor who, from among the ancient readings, first adopted the text since generally received; and, indeed, the Cambridge editors themselves suffer from this omission, when it happens, as it sometimes does, that their own excellent selection is passed over uncredited.

Dr. Furness has worked ab initio; he has availed himself of no eyes but his own in collating the folios and quartos. Mr. W. J. Rolfe, the writer of the Critic article, points out very justly that "none but those who have done this kind of work can know how difficult it is to be invariably accurate in it. I have found mistakes in my own collation of modern English texts after comparing them line by line, word by word, letter by letter, and point by point, at least three times. I have had occasion, at one time and another, to examine and verify all the accessible collations of certain authors—Gray, Scott, Tennyson, Wordsworth, and others—and have detected many errors and defects in all of them. The transcripts of title-pages of early quartos, extracts from ancient registers and documents, &c., in editions and biographies of Shakespeare and commentaries on his works are seldom accurate."

ARROS of the Ruskin tablet in Hunter-street, mentioned in these columns last week, it may be interesting to note that the Society of Arts has now placed more than thirty tablets on houses associated with distinguished men and women. Among these are the following literary commemorations:

Joanna Baillie, Bolton House, Windmill-hill, Hampstead.
Elizabeth Barrett Browning, 15, Wimpole-street.
Robert Browning, 19, Warwick-crescent, Paddington.
Edmund Burke, 37, Gerrard street, Soho.
Lord Byron, 16, Holles-street.

[The house was pulled down in 1889. In May, 1900, Messrs. John Lewis & Son, silk mercers, erected on the front of the new house (now in their occupation) a fresh memorial, consisting of a bronze relief bust of Byron placed in an architectural frame of Portland stone.]

Madame D'Arblay (Fanny Burney), 11, Bolton-street, Piccadilly.

Charles Dickens, Furnival's-inn.

[The whole of Furnival's-inn was pulled down in 1898.]

John Dryden, 13, Gerrard-street.
 Edward Gibbon, 7, Bentinck-street.
 John Keats, Lawnbank, Hampstead.
 Samuel Johnson, 17, Gough-square, Fleet-street.
 John Ruskin, 54, Hunter-street, Brunswick-square.
 Richard Brinsley Sheridan, 14, Savile-row.
 Wm. Makepeace Thackeray, Kensington Palace-green.

MRS. PAGET TOYNBEE, having undertaken to prepare for the Clarendon Press a new edition of the Letters of Horace Walpole, would be greatly obliged if owners of original letters, whether already printed or not, would kindly communicate with her, in order that the new edition may be made as complete and correct as possible. Many of the letters as hitherto printed are either fragmentary or disfigured by misreadings, and it is desirable that they should be corrected by collation with the originals. Mrs. Toynbee has already succeeded in collecting from various sources nearly two hundred letters which are not included in current editions; and it is probable that there are many others in private hands which she has not yet been able to trace. Communications should be addressed to Mrs. Paget Toynbee, Dorney Wood, Burnham, Bucks.

THE voting for statues in the new Hall of Fame at New York has produced some interesting results. Washington heads the list, and is followed by Abraham Lincoln with one vote less. After these come Daniel Webster, Benjamin Franklin, Ulysses S. Grant, John Marshall, Thomas Jefferson, Emerson, Longfellow, Robert Fulton, Washington Irving, and Jonathan Edwards. Lower still: Peabody, Hawthorne, Cooper, Henry Ward Beecher, Channing, and Elias Howe. Statesmen and rulers have seven representatives; authors and editors, four; and painters, one.

Bibliographical.

THE book which first attracted me to the late Charles Dudley Warner was his My Summer in a Garden, a little work published in this country by Messrs. Sampson Low. In this I found passages which struck me as genuinely humorous—quite American in their flavour, and yet with a kind of remote suggestion of the very English Charles Lamb. After that I read Warner's Back Log Studies (reprinted so recently as last year); and, later still, the small volume of essays called As We Were Saying (1891). As a matter of fact, these are but a tithe of the books by Warner which have been circulated in this country. To confine oneself to the past two decades only, one finds Warner credited with such works as Captain John Smith and My Winter on the Nile (1881), Washington Irving (1882), A Roundabout Journey (1883), Their Pilgrimage (1887), On Horseback (1888), A Little Journey in the World (1889), Our American Italy (1891), In the Levant (1892), As We Go (1893), The Golden House—a novel (1894), The Relation of Literature to Life and The People for Whom Shakespeare Wrote (1897), and That Fortune—a novel (1899)—a tolerably large and varied list, testifying to considerable acquirements and much industry.

In his Notes for a Bibliography of Edward FitzGerald Col. Prideaux wrote: "I trust I may, without impertinence, express a hope that cheap editions of the lesser works of FitzGerald may, within a short time, be issued to rank on one's shelves with the 'Golden Treasury' edition of the 'Rubāiyāt.' A reprint of 'Euphranor,' with the appendix to the second edition of 'Polonius,' the introduction to Crabbe's 'Tales of the Halls,' and the memoirs of Bernard Barton and the younger Crabbe, would make a capital beginning." Well, Messrs. Macmillan have issued this week just such a collection of FitzGerald's Miscellanies as Col. Prideaux sketched out, and I have good reason for thinking that it is mainly to his suggestion that we owe the pretty little book. "The Spanish and Greek plays," he went on to say, "might follow in due course." Let us hope that this suggestion, also, may bear fruit.

Meanwhile, I am glad to note that Col. Prideaux's Bibliography of Coleridge is (to quote the prospectus) "on the eve of publication." It is based upon the late Mr. R. H. Shepherd's work, which Col. Prideaux has revised, corrected, and enlarged. It will be issued in French grey wrappers, uniformly with the bibliographies of Ruskin, Dickens, Thackeray, Carlyle, Tennyson, and Mr. Swinburne. Mr. Frank Hollings, of Great Turnstile, Holborn, will be the publisher.

At a time when so many people are reading the Memoirs and Correspondence of Coventry Patmore, it may not be uninteresting to give a brief illustration of the low estimation in which The Angel in the House was held by at least a section of the literary world in the late 'sixties. In Horse and Foot; or, Pilgrims to Parnassus (1868), the late Richard Crawley passed in review all the English poets of the day, arriving, towards the close, at Patmore, of whom, on his third page, he had parenthetically said that he "drones the last, last muse to sleep." Only four more lines does the satirist accord to the poet:

Now Patmore—but you need no ridicule!
 Vanquished, I bow to the superior fool;
 Outcapped, out-jingled, from his works I quote,
 And Patmore leads out Patmore in a note.

In the note are quotations from the Angel, which certainly exhibit vividly the tendency of its writer to indulge in ultra-simplicity—i.e., to drop into bathos.

Mr. Clifford Harrison, I see, has issued another volume of verse, called Echoes. His first publication, I fancy, was In Hours of Leisure, some dozen years ago. In 1895 came On the Common Chords—a book of lyrics; and in 1896 The Lute of Apollo—an essay on music. To 1897 belongs his Notes on the Margins—essays, and to 1898 his Readers and Reading, a subject on which he is admittedly an authority. No doubt Mr. Harrison inherits his interest in, and capacity for, music from his father, the famous operatic tenor; while it is possible that the histrionic power discernible in his recitations was transmitted to him from his grandmother, Mrs. Clifford, to whose ability and celebrity as an actress Mr. Harrison has borne testimony in his Stray Records (1892).

Mr. E. C. Stedman's American Anthology will, of course, be welcome. A good book of that sort is very much wanted, and Mr. Stedman has already shown in his Poets of America (1885) his firm grasp of the subject. His volume on the Victorian Poets (1887) is perhaps less widely known in this country than it deserves, while his work on The Nature and Elements of Poetry (1892) has probably had still fewer readers. His own Poems—collected three years ago—should be in every well-appointed library.

Messrs. Downey announce an edition of Smedley's Frank Fairleigh, in large demy 8vo, and with Cruikshank's illustrations, at twenty-five shillings net. Last year they issued two editions of the same book—one at sixpence, and the other (with the Cruikshank drawings) at half a guinea net. Last year, also, Messrs. Routledge issued the story in a two-shilling form. Frank Fairleigh has always been a favourite with publishers. Between 1891 and 1896 there were at least four reprints of it, by Messrs. Routledge, Ward & Lock, Warne, and Walter Scott.

By the way, Messrs. Downey's announcement of a new edition of Surtees's Jorrocks's Jaunts and Jollities (with Alken's plates) reminds me that editions of the text were published early in the 'nineties at the price of only a shilling or two.

I understand that the new edition of The Roman Rye, which Messrs. Ward & Lock have in contemplation, will have an introduction from the pen of Mr. Watts-Dunton, who, it will be remembered, wrote an introduction to the same publishers' recent edition of Lavengro.

THE BOOKWORM.

Reviews.

Mr. Morley's "Cromwell."

Oliver Cromwell. By the Right Hon. John Morley. (Macmillan.)

WHEN a statesman writes the life of a many-sided leader of men, it is to be expected that he will view him chiefly as a statesman. That is the case with Mr. John Morley and Oliver Cromwell. Cromwell was a zealot for religion, a popular leader, a ruler, and, above all (as Mr. Morley says), a great captain. From all these sides he may be, and has been, viewed, which explains and largely justifies the many biographies of the man. But it is as statesman that Mr. Morley views him, and as party-leader. What he fastens on most eagerly is the emergencies which offer diverging lines of policy, dear to the soul of the party-statesman. His military career is not dwelt upon with detail; many important events are related with extreme generality; but the policy of the Puritan leader is discussed with judicial care. Judicial, indeed, is the very word for Mr. Morley's book. There is no attempt at picturesque or striking narration. He deprecates, indeed, the endeavour of any but a Carlyle to clothe with poetry the prosaic facts of history. His style, we think, has not improved with political oratory and party cares. More finished and artistic English has been his in the work of his earlier days, before politics claimed him for their own.

It is not, for the reasons we have already mentioned, a full and exhaustive life of Cromwell; but it is a study of Cromwell the politician, done with excellent temper, balance, and dispassionate judgment. More than most biographies of the man, it engages our assent as strictly fair. Neither political prepossessions nor religious bias, not even biographical enthusiasm, the lues Boswelliana, can deflect the agate-edge of Mr. Morley's scientifically poised judgment one section of a hair's breadth. He appears, in fact, neither to love nor hate Cromwell. One would say the great Puritan was to him a scientific problem in human nature applied to politics—a very eminent and subtle example, but no more. It is a rare attitude, and the results are valuable.

At the outset Mr. Morley's peculiar gifts are not called forth, for the issues before Cromwell were plain, admitting of no doubt in him, and presenting no problems to his biographer. Resistance to Charles's wooden reliance on outworn precedents of unconstitutional rule was a straight matter, and cost Cromwell no thought. "I will consult my people's interest, but not my people's conceptions of their interest," said Charles. "The people's wishes must be reckoned with," said the Parliament, and Cromwell among the most thorough. Upon that issue, practically, the Civil War began. Thenceforth Cromwell's plain and unswerving course was to see that the Civil War was conducted to a successful result for the popular side. The remarkable thing is how the minority gradually gained complete control of that war and its resulting policy, in the face of a hostile and distrustful majority. For Cromwell and his Independents were in a hopeless minority, not alone of the Parliament, but of the nation. The Presbyterians held a crushing majority, both in and out of Parliament. Yet despite this fact, Cromwell first organised a troop of horse in consonance with his own ideas, and from his own adherents; then procured the organisation of the whole division of the Eastern Counties upon that model, and officered by his Independent adherents; and, finally, caused the whole army to be reorganised upon this same model, and officered from his trusty Independents. This was done in the teeth of an inimical majority, who distrusted his aims, and were bitterly opposed to the obvious power which it would throw into the hands of their enemies. Yet the majority seemed fascinated and overawed by Cromwell and his resolute minority. They even suffered him to propose the "self-denying ordinance" by which members of the House were excluded from command, thereby preventing themselves from having any influence over the new army. And they suffered it so to be arranged that a place was evidently left for Cromwell to slip into, in defiance of that ordinance. Mr. Morley confesses that the leaving open of the lieutenant-generalship amounted to nothing else, despite Cromwell's attitude of indifference and unconcern. And at the last moment he was, of course, called to fill the vacant place—which every one must have seen was left vacant for him. It is true that the conspicuous success of his men and his measures, while others were failing, constituted a powerful compulsion towards the adoption of his system throughout the army. But the yielding of the majority to a scheme so obviously devised, and calculated to strip them of all control over the army—a scheme which they feared and fought against, and to which they finally yielded in a manner only to be called panic-stricken—can only be explained in one way. The Independents were organised—superbly organised—and the Presbyterians were not. Organisation is the invariable means by which a resolute minority overawes and overpowers a numerically powerful majority. Again and again has the bold device been practised. And it may generally be said that revolutions (contrary to the usual notion) are made by organised minorities. With Cromwell's victory at Naseby began another state of things. The triumphant Puritans had to settle what they were to do with their victory. What form of government were they going to set up? Was it to be Charles on new terms? Was it to be Presbyterian or Independent (which meant the power of the army)? Were the Scots, who had aided in the triumph, to share in the settlement? If it were to be Charles, on what terms, or with what party would he come to terms? This was the state of things which made Charles believe himself not only safe, but arbiter of the situation.

Then, for the first time, Cromwell became a political leader, with the necessity of choosing a party course. The army had become a political party, and Cromwell was its recognised chief. The facts of his action are undisputed. He negotiated with the King, and the King paltered with him, as he paltered with all leaders, and all parties. The army made extreme Radical demands (to use modern terms), including the abolition of the King; and Cromwell, with his lieutenant, Ireton, opposed their demands. Yet, ultimately he "sought the Lord" with an assemblage of army representatives, and sighfully and tearfully, beating his breast, confessed that he had sinned by communing with the evil thing, pledging himself to the army "platform," as we should now call it. Was he a hypocrite? Had he throughout a settled policy, a definite eye to his own advancement, by Charles, or failing Charles, by the army? Mr. Morley does not believe either. He thinks (and his view is probable) that Cromwell had no foresight of the issue; that he was honestly perplexed, honestly desirous of arranging matters with the least wrench to former institutions, would Charles have conceded the results of the revolution. Failing that, he was swept away by the army. With the experience of the politician, Mr. Morley protests against the notion that a party-leader is master of his party. Cromwell was no ideally far-sighted man—the practical heads of great practical movements seldom are—he was a shrewd and decided waiter upon Providence, thinks Mr. Morley. And he quotes Cromwell's own letters and speeches, quotes them very convincingly, to support this view. When the Puritan captain had reluctantly adopted the army's conviction that kings and lords must disappear, he still shrank from initiating action to that end. "God," he says, "can do it without necessitating us to a thing which is scandalous, and therefore let those that are of that mind wait upon God for such a way where the thing may be done without sin and without scandal too." Now God, practically, was Cromwell's name, for the flowing tide; and the flowing tide, in the state of things then existing, meant the collective will and action of the army. Vox exercitus vox Dei became his virtual principle. Inexorably swift in action when he saw whither circumstance and the overbalance of forces pointed, he was slow and troubled while the hour was in labour of its issue.

So it was after the defeat of the Scots at Dunbar, during the events which led up to the expulsion from the Commons of the Presbyterian majority, who were still negotiating with Charles. He lingered in the North till all was completed; not out of craft, but because he was loth to lend his arm to an act which he yet thought inevitable. Once it was done, he returned and took a leading part in the trial of Charles, which was its logical result. So it was throughout his career. He honourably wished to make the best of the existing parliamentary machinery; but he saw the distresses of the country, and instead of attributing them to circumstances, and the inevitably slow working of any constituent body, believed with soldierly impatience that they might be remedied by a more willing set of men, with an active brain to supervise them. This led him by logical steps to the violent dissolution of Parliament, to the inevitable consequence of assuming supreme control, and to the summoning of one Parliament after another, each of which broke in his hands. Mr. Morley believes he was urged on by violent men like Harrison. But in the famous dissolution of the Long Parliament, at any rate, we find Harrison urging caution, and Cromwell over-riding his warning. This short-sightedness speaks little for his political judgment. He kept the realm from anarchy, let it be granted him. But he aimed at more than that. He aimed at reconstituting the Government, and basing it permanently on Puritan ideals. In this he failed. He did not do as much as was effected by Napoleon I., much of whose work lived after him. He so mishandled matters that he became a leader without a party, a king almost without supporters, save the army which he had fascinated by his victories—and even there violent enemies arose against him. Only the establishment of heredity could have given permanence to his work; and not that without a strong inheritor. For his was the rule of a minority, and a minority which had ceased to be homogeneous. It was a process of whittling down. United Parliament gave place to Presbyterians, Presbyterians to Independents, Independents to Cromwell. With his removal, the point of the inverted pyramid broke, and it over-topped.

A strong ruler, but not a far-sighted statesman, it is not as statesman that Mr. Morley finds his chief praise. Cromwell, he thinks, was before all a great captain. As a statesman, he was not more than what he called himself (setting aside his foreign policy), "a good constable set to keep the peace of the parish."

It was by his military genius [says Mr. Morley], by the might of the legions that he created and controlled, and led to victory upon victory; it was at Marston and Naseby, at Preston and Worcester, in Ireland and at Dunbar, that Cromwell set his deep mark on the destinies of England as she was, and of that vaster dominion into which the English realm was in the course of time to be transformed. . . . In speed and vigour, in dash and in prudence, in force of shock and quick steadiness of recovery; in sieges, marches, long wasting campaigns, pitched engagements; as commander of horse, as tactician, and as strategist, the modern expert ranks Cromwell among the foremost masters of the rough art of war in every branch. . . . It was his armed right hand that crushed the absolutist pretensions alike of crown and mitre, and then forced the three kingdoms into the mould of a single state. It was at those decisive moments, when the trembling balance hung on fortune in the battlefield, that the unconquerable captain turned the scale. . . . This is still what, in a single sentence, defines the true place of Cromwell in history. Along with that paramount claim he performed the service of keeping a provisional form of peace, and delivering the nation from the anarchy in which both order and freedom would have been submerged. He made what some of the best of his contemporaries thought dire mistakes; he forsook many principles in his choice of means . . . ; and many of his difficulties were of his own creation. Yet watchfulness, self-effacement, versatility, and resource, for the time and on the surface repaired all, and as "constable of the parish" his persistency was unflinching and unmatched. In the harder task of laying the foundations of a deeper order that might be expected to stand after his own imperious control was withdrawn he was beaten.

This, we think, is a fair and equitable summary of the claims which may rightfully be made for a great and much-disputed Englishman. Fortune was in some things against him. He believed that "what we gain in a free way is better than twice as much in a forced." Yet by fate's irony he appears to posterity as the incarnation of the strong hand. For, no less than Napoleon, he was "head of the army."

The Breath of Old England.

Froissart in Britain. By Henry Newbolt. (Nisbet & Co. 6s.)

FROISSART, most gallant of chroniclers, is the very breath of old England, though he were none of her sons by birth. He was born in a fortunate hour and under a fortunate star, this Fleming of Valenciennes, who came to England as a follower of his countrywoman, Philippa of Hainault, the young Queen to young Edward of England. Froissart was fortunate no less in the translator who has rendered him for the England he loved so well. Lord Berners's version is English of the sweetest and cleanest antiquity, which shames the epithet "hoar" tagged by custom to that noun, for it is all fresh, sound, and green as young oak, now lisping with a confiding felicity which moves joyous laughter, now sent home like well-timbered arrows; every word has the sap in it: it is young English of the best period of young English, admirably right to render this Froissart we call "ancient," with the dew of time on his speech. Fortunate is Froissart, again, that the author of Admirals All and Drake's Drum should have been inspired to make this selection from Berners's translation.

Mr. Newbolt's title shows that his idea has been to confine himself to those parts of Froissart which deal with England, so that the French wars are excluded, with Cressy, Poitiers, and the Black Prince. That is a great exclusion, yet abundance remains. For in England he includes Scotland and Ireland. His selection is very well done. In a few flashing pages we have before us (Wales excepted) the whole panorama of English rule in the Middle Ages—a splendid, wild, strange, half-familiar scene, with the unlike likeness of a sleeping vision. We find here, too, events, historically hackneyed to us, suddenly coming to life and taking on new aspects. We know all about Wat Tyler, and Walworth, and Richard II. Do we? Read here—you rub your eyes, and doubt. Did we not understand, from our not too accurate school histories, that Richard, being summoned to conference by the insurgents, Wat Tyler laid hold of his bridle, whereon Walworth struck him down, and Richard rode forward with the well-known words; upon which they followed him a certain distance, and dispersed upon a body of men-at-arms coming up? It is not so simple as that in Froissart; nor, perhaps, in the histories of our better-catered-for successors. There were two meetings. Richard left the Tower to meet the main body, while Wat Tyler broke into it with a remnant and murdered the Archbishop of Canterbury, as we know. The Tyler was thus absent from the King's encounter with the principal force, which is delightfully naïf in Froissart:

So the King entered in among them, and said to them sweetly, "Ah, ye good people, I am your King; what lack ye? what will ye say?" Then such as heard him said: "We will that ye make us free for ever, ourselves, our heirs, and our lands, and that we be called no more bond, nor so reputed."

The King agreed to their demands, and promised to give his agreement in writing, so they would disperse.

These words appeased well the common people, such as were simple and good plain men, that were come thither and wist not why. They said: "It was well said, we desire not better." . . . And when they had received the writing they departed, and returned into their own countries; but the great venom remained still behind, for Wat Tyler, Jack Straw, and John Ball said, for all that these people were thus appeased, yet they would not depart so.

The King went from the conference at Mile End to see his mother in the Royal, and, after hearing Mass in Westminster, rode back with but forty horse, till at Smithfield he happened upon the residue of the rebels, to the number of twenty thousand. Wat the Tyler had assembled them there to urge the sack of London, before their confederates from the North and Midlands should arrive to share it with them. Seeing Richard, the Tyler bade his men wait while he spoke with him, and upon a sign slay all except the King, whom, being young, they might lead with them. Follows a picturesque narrative:

Therewith he spurred his horse and came to the King, so near him that his horse's head touched the croup of the King's horse; and the first word that he said was this: "Sir King, seest thou all yonder people?" "Yea, truly," said the King: "wherefore sayest thou?" "Because," said he, "they be all at my commandment, and have sworn to me faith and truth, to do all that I will have them." "In a good time!" said the King, "I will well that it be so." Then Wat Tyler said, as he that nothing demanded but riot: "What, believest thou, King, that these people, and as many as be in London, . . . that they will depart from thee thus without having thy letters?" "No," said the King, "ye shall have them; they be ordained for you, and shall be delivered every one, each after other." . . . With those words Wat Tyler cast his eyes on a squire that was there with the King, bearing the King's sword, and Wat Tyler hated greatly the same squire, for the same squire had displeased him before, for words between them. "What," said Tyler, "art thou there? Give me thy dagger." "Nay," said the squire, "that will I not do; wherefore should I give it thee?" The King beheld the squire, and said: "Give it him; let him have it." And so the squire took it him sore against his will. And when this Wat Tyler had it, he began to play therewith, and turned it in his hand, and said again to the squire: "Give me also that sword." "Nay," said the squire, "it is the King's sword; thou art not worthy to have it, for thou art but a knave; and if there were no more here but thou and I thou durst not speak those words for as much gold in quantity as all yonder church of St. Paul." "By my faith," said Wat Tyler, "I shall never eat meat till I have thy head"; and with these words the Mayor of London came to the King with a twelve horse, well armed under their coats, and so he brake the press and saw and heard how Wat Tyler demeaned himself, and said to him: "Ha! thou knave, how art thou so hardy in the King's presence to speak such words? It is too much for thee so to do." Then the King began to chafe, and said to the Mayor: "Set hands on him." And while the King said so, Tyler said to the Mayor: "A God's name, what have I said to displease thee?" "Yes, truly," quoth the Mayor, "thou false, stinking knave; shalt thou speak thus in the presence of the King, my natural lord? I wish never to live, without thou shalt dearly buy it." And with these words the Mayor drew out his sword and struck Tyler so great a stroke on the head that he fell down at the feet of his horse; and as soon as he was fallen they environed him all about, whereby he was not seen of his company. Then a squire of the King's alighted, called John Standish, and he drew out his sword and put it into Wat Tyler's belly; and so he died.

Pictures of hard hitting and single combat, mutual courtesy and emulous defiance, make the battle scenes of Froissart. And when Scots and English had done fighting, he assures us, whichever gained the victory, they were so well content with one another that at parting they would say, "God thank you!" It is a delightful little touch.

The Poetry of the "Unspeakable."

A History of Ottoman Poetry. By E. J. W. Gibb. Vol. I. (Luzac & Co.)

THIS is the first attempt in English—it may almost be said in the West—to produce a history of Turkish poetry. Von Hammer's great work, as Mr. Gibb points out, is less a history than a dictionary of Turkish poets. This first volume of the work shows erudition and thoroughness: it is not brilliant nor very attractive in style; it is, in fact, a little verbose and heavy; but it is clear and perspicuously arranged. On the whole, judging from the first volume, it deserves to be what it will doubtless become—the standard English authority on the subject. Mr. Gibb's translations, otherwise good, are marred by a profusion of the strangest archaisms and coinages. Of the Turkish poets in this first volume, but a few possess such force of genius as can recommend itself in English guise. The earliest of these is Sultan Valed, a mystical poet, of whom we may take a brief specimen. Valed tells a legend, how God said to Moses that He was ill, and Moses had not come nigh Him. Moses asks His meaning, and God replied that a saint of His has been ill upon earth:

How is it thou never hast gone to see him there?
Never asked his plight, nor said, "How dost thou fare?"
That I'm other than My saint, O deem not thou!
Whoso seeth him, he hath seen Me likewise;
Whoso asks for him hath asked for Me likewise.
See thou Me in him, and him in Me thou'lt see;
Ask of Me from him, and ask of him from Me!

Valed seems to us a purely intellectual poet, but one whose insight justifies his reputation. For the highest honours of poetry he needs the addition of that ardour which he conspicuously lacks. He is, so to speak, a half-Dante, or, rather, a half-Wordsworth, with the imaginative and emotional sides excised. But as a gnomic poet, let us rate him not meanly.

Then, however, comes a dreary sequence. Romance rumbling like a hay-waggon, ingeniously contorted ghazels and rubais, a hymn on the Prophet's nativity which is how different from that Nativity hymn of Milton, Burhân and Ashiq, Ahmedî and Suleymân—let them all pass by. Let us come to a true poet—Sheykhî, author of the romance, Khusrev and Shirin. Take the passage describing Khusrev's discovery of Shirin bathing. We have been fain to alter some words and lines marred by Mr. Gibb's worst afflictations of diction and awkwardnesses of expression, that so beautiful a passage might not lose more than was inevitable:

Advancing softly, sudden did he sight
That Moon within the water shining bright.
And what a Moon! the world-illumining sun
More splendid were if 'neath her shade he won.
From mid the feunt effulgence flasheth forth;
The fount laves her, she laves in light the earth.
Her violet locks spread o'er her roses were,
As she combed out her hyacinthine hair.
Her body made the pond a treasure-cist,
O'er which her coiled locks seemed to twine and twist.
Her hand had pushed those writhing snakes away,
As saying: "Hence! a charm here holdeth sway!"
For, raving wildly when it saw her ear,
She'd bound the water with her curling hair;
As frenzied 'twere and furious of spright,
She had enchained and fettered it outright.
So showed her crystal frame with spray bestrewn.
As through a pearl-gemmed veil of reed the moon.

When shone that Moon before the Prince's gaze,
The Prince became the sun—with fire ablaze.

For chase or pastime all his force was o'er,
He bit upon his finger, wildered sore.
Unwitting of his gaze, the jasmine-breast,
(For o'er her narciss did her jacinth rest),

When passed the murky cloud from her sun-face,
That beauty looked, and saw there full of grace
A paradise-bird an eagle-wing upon,
A Cypress become flagstaff for the sun.
That Fount of Radiance for her shame and fright
Did tremble like the moon on water bright.
Nor other help could find that Moon most fair
Than round her she should cast her flowing hair.
She wrapped her in her loosened hair straightway,
She veiled with the darksome night the day.

Even in its extravagances this description has strong affinity to the luxuriant Elizabethan writers. Perhaps it is this which incited Mr. Gibb to such horrors as "the sugar-dulce Shirin," and "did lave amene." So does he deal with the zealot-poet, Nesimi, who was flayed alive for over-bold proclamation of the Sufi mysteries. And truly his language reads blasphemously to the uninitiate. He applies the language of the Ottoman Bible—the Koran—to the Beloved, without stint or measure:

O censor, cast thy rosary and praying-rug afar from thee,
And gaze on yonder curl and mole, and see what snare and grain are they.

And, again:

Curl and cheek of thine stand there, the Lord ascended on the Throne;
Thou whose eye-brow is the Kaaba-niche, whose eye the preacher here.

Bare the Secret of thine ambergris-diffusing locks is laid,
Come is God's own Spirit, abrogate are cress and monkish gear.

Gabriel hath revealed the Scripture on the tablet of thy Form,
Thou whose beauty is the Word of God; a wondrous thing is here!

O Nesimi, since thy rival is thy love, to wit, is God,
One are wrath and grace, and one likewise thy rival and thy dear.

Such style is not unique, for a Persian poet has said, "The lifting of her eyebrow is my Lord." Through the strangeness of Turkish theological forms one can feel a fierce blast of ardour, altogether poetic. These three—Valed, Sheykhi, and Nesimi—in their different ways bear to us the stamp of power, and give us hope that subsequent volumes will disclose a richer record than we can truthfully say is exhibited in these early periods of dulness or artifice. But it is a curious and novel literature, worth Mr. Gibb's searching and painstaking history.

The Antarctic Night.

Through the First Antarctic Night, 1898-99: a Narrative of the Voyage of the "Belgica." By Frederick A. Cook. Illustrated. (Heinemann.)

AMONG the numerous expeditions that in these later years are flocking to the great spaces of the unknown South, the spirited little boatload of adventurers who, under the auspices of the Belgian Sovereign, sailed out of Antwerp harbour in August, 1897, might possibly have escaped notice but for the happy fortune that at the last moment provided them, in the person of the American Dr. Cook, with a capable chronicler. "Stylish" we thank "£600 a Year" for that word most fittingly describes the doctor's literary manner. His narrative is of the kind that it were better to read by two or three parallel lines at a time lest you should be tempted to analyse pedantically the 'structure' of his periods. Words must be accepted as meaning solely what in the immediate context he uses them to signify, lest, haunted by a sense of etymology, you accuse him of tautology or confusion of metaphors. You must like long words best, and brace yourself to smile upon such pleasantry as an allusion to sea-sickness as the worship of Neptune. One other fault we have to find with Dr. Cook before we proceed to the story of the voyage. Explorers are, of necessity, cut off for the time being from the happiness of family life and the society of women; but the surgeon's recurring complaints on this hardship are in a key that, it is to be hoped, does less than justice to the rest of the party. The dull, blatant vulgarity of pages 251, 252, for instance, is either hateful evidence of the degraded taste of the general public for which the book is confessedly written, or it is the sign of an astonishing indiscretion on the part of an author who at the same time—such is his sense of delicacy—must veil an allusion to the human leg in a foreign language. (Yes, indeed: les jambes!) Let us do Dr. Cook, on the other hand, the justice to add that he has an eye for colour effects, and that in his descriptions of the wonderful antarctic night he is often vivid and happy.

For it is precisely the Night that the Belgica was the first to explore. She penetrated roughly a degree and a half further than Captain Cook, in 1774—to 71° 36'; whereas Weddell, in 1823, reached 74° 15'; Ross, 78° 9' 5", in 1842; and the Southern Cross, in February of this year, 78° 50' S. The boat was a stout "bark"—so Dr. Cook spells it—not specially built for the expedition, 110 feet by 26 feet, drawing 15 feet of water. She was furnished with auxiliary steam, which gave her seven knots at her swiftest. She was no greyhound, but she proved an excellent bulldog. She was well found with canned victuals, and carried 2,000 pounds of tonite, reputed more efficacious than dynamite for the destruction of ice, if she should be "embraced by the Frost King." The commandant was Adrien de Gertache; the captain, Georges Lecointe—Belgians both. So was the magnetician, Emile Danco, who died. Henryk Arctowski, geologist, oceanographer and meteorologist, was a Russian; the naturalist was a Roumanian; the engineers and foremast hands, Belgians and Norwegians. East and west of a new channel in the Palmer Archipelago it is claimed, among the general results of the voyage, that the explorers succeeded in charting about 500 miles of what they suppose to be a great continental mass underlying the perennial ice-cap of the Pole. The new waterway they called Belgica Strait; and the country to the east of it, which probably connects with Grahamland, Danco-land, after their ill-fated magnetician. M. Lecointe's observations indicate the magnetic pole about 200 miles east of its previously assigned position, which seems to accord with the determination of the Newnes Expedition—116° E, 73° 20' S. Of this latter no mention is made.

On May 16, the ship being now fast in the pack—in latitude 71° 34' 30", longitude 89° 10'—Lecointe announced that what Dr. Cook calls "the fair-haired goddess of light" would rise no more for seventy days. At ten o'clock on the following morning the purple twilight curve settled over the south-west, edged with an indescribable blending of orange, red, and gold, and at eleven o'clock this curve was met by a zone of rose which gradually ascended over the north-east, above the sun. The ice, which had been gray, was lighted up by a lively flash of pink, which was relieved by long river-like leads of open water having a glewing surface of dark violet. These, however, were the surface colours towards the sun. In the opposite direction there was an entirely different effect. The snow had spread evenly over it a delicate shade of green, while the waters were a very dark purple-blue. A few minutes before twelve a great distorted, ill-defined semi-globular mass of fire rose over the north, edged along the line of sharp hummocks, and then sank beneath the ice. It was an image of the sun lifted above its actual position by the refractive character of the air through which its light passed to our eyes.

Soon even this delusion failed them, and day by day the observers were tantalised by the suggestion of a dawn that faded into night. The moon itself shone sulkily, as if she thought the sun should better have stood to his business :

A strange rectangular block of fire appeared in the east-south-east. Its size was that of a small tabular iceberg, but it had a dull crimson glow which made the scene at once weird and fascinating. Its base rested on the horizon and it seemed to rise, brighten, and move northerly. The sky here was a purple, thinly veiled by a light smoky haze caused by icy crystals in the lower stratus of atmosphere, but there was not another speck of redness on this side of the heavens except the orange bow usually seen over the twilight zone. We watched this with considerable awe and amazement for ten minutes before we could determine its meaning. It passed through several stages of forms, finally it separated, and we discovered that it was the moon.

The effect of such abnormal conditions was marked in the health of the men. The "kylbolla" and "fiskabolla" became extremely distasteful. The meat of penguins and seals was not palatable. There showed itself a general tendency to anæmia and sluggishness of the digestive organs; the heart became unsteady. The discomforts of a temperature that generated snow in the most improbable places, as in the nape of a man's neck and at the back of his pillow, became intolerable. More than one of the crew showed signs of insanity at last; one did clean lose his wits. Danco died. They sank him with a weight at his heels. Being quite modern explorers, they had no "sky-pilot" aboard (there was more need of land-pilots, Dr. Cook rather inately interjects); the Commandant, therefore, made on the occasion "some appropriate remarks"; and they were haunted thenceforth by the notion of their comrade floating feet downwards beneath the keel.

The return of the sun is, of course, qualified as a "pyrotechnic display" :

At about half-past eleven a few stratus clouds spread over the rose, and under these there was a play in colours too complex for my powers of description. The clouds were at first violet, but they quickly caught the train of colours which was spread over the sky beyond. There were spaces of gold, orange, blue, green, and a hundred harmonious blends, with an occasional strip like a band of polished silver to set the colours in bold relief. Precisely at twelve o'clock a fiery cloud separated, disclosing a bit of the upper rim of the sun. . . . Looking towards the sun the fields of snow had a velvety aspect in pink. In the opposite direction the pack was noticeably flushed with a soft lavender light. The whole scene changed colour with every direction taken by the eye, and everywhere the ice seemed veiled by a gauzy atmosphere in which the colour appeared to rest. . . . A few minutes after twelve the light was extinguished, a smoky veil of violet was drawn over the dim outline of the ice, and quickly the stars again twinkled in the gobelin blue of the sky as they had done without being outshone for nearly seventeen hundred hours.

To win out of the berth in which for so many months they had lain was not easy. Every iloe but their own cracked, severed; but theirs, though the circumference diminished to some seven miles, still fenced the vessel straitly. They tempted the sun with dug ditches; it availed nothing. They laid in ambush the redoubtable tonite; it did so meanly wheeze itself into inanity that one sarcastic spirit suggested that to serve as kitchen fuel was its true vocation. Finally, they dug and sawed themselves a channel to the nearest "lead."

This is the point at which the interest of the narrative really ends. The return journey was simple. We are not interested in Dr. Cook's emotions when he again heard the frou-frou of petticoats, nor do we share his regret that he has not the poetic power to express it. It may be added that the appendix, comprising the general observations of his superior officers, is good business-like work, that contrasts very favourably with his own discursive story. As a photographer, on the other hand, his diligence was matched by his success.

Sun-Clocks.

The Book of Sun-Dials. By the late Mrs. Alfred Gatty. Enlarged and Re-edited by H. K. K. Eden and Eleanor Lloyd. (Bell & Sons. 31s. 6d. net.)

THIS volume, originally written by Mrs. Alfred Gatty, is now re-issued, greatly enlarged and carefully re-edited, by her daughter, Mrs. Eden, and her former assistant, Miss Eleanor Lloyd. We have nothing but gratitude for such an obvious labour of love. A handsome book, and a monumental piece of specialism! What it does not tell you about dials is not worth noting. You have the dials of all ages and countries, dial-mottoes, and even a special chapter by means of which the private enthusiast can make his own dials. While you are reading it, dials become the chief object of life; you feel that the everlasting hills were created chiefly to carve dials on; that, in fact (to adapt Shakespeare)—

All the world's a Dial,

And all the men and women merely gnomons.

Alas! it may be feared that nowadays not many know even that the gnomon is the metal erection which serves to cast the shadow on the dial-plate—so completely has this old time-measurer fallen into the portion of tinder-boxes and outworn "Charlies." Yet, as stage-coaches have suffered a beatific revival, as falconry has again its votaries, so a half-aesthetic, half-antiquarian cult of the dial is announcing itself in shy corners, appropriate to its peaceful, old-world associations.

There is much to be said for it. Undoubtedly it is a far more poetic way of noting time than your mere mechanic clock, or engine-turned watch. We take the heavens into our confidence; the sun himself becomes our muezzin, our watchman to call the hours. The poets have recognised the charms of the sun-dial, while scarce any (Pope, perhaps, and Suckling) have condescended to the watch. The compilers have not been mindless of this side of their subject, and show a pretty faculty for "dropping into verse," like Mr. Wegg. They quote Rossetti:

Stands it not by the door,

Love's Hour—. . . ?

Its eyes invisible

Watch till the dial's thin-thrown shade

Be born—yea, till the journeying line be laid

Upon the point that wakes the spell.

A charming image, worthy of the mediæval-minded poet. And again:

Round the sun-dial

The reluctant hours of day,

Heartless, hopeless of their way,

Rest and call.

Even Plautus has his reference to the dial—indeed, one of the earliest specimens of dial was found at Herculaneum, made in the shape of a ham!

To us a sun-dial is a geometrical, unornamental thing enough. But the best of the old dials—particularly from the Renaissance time—were decorative and handsome objects; and some survive to show this. The finest, according to the authors, are Scottish. But of the great English dial-makers, the first was (of course) a German! His name was Kratzer, he lived under Henry VIII., was painted by Holbein, and his fine portrait from the Louvre is the frontispiece of this book. One of his dials stood in the churchyard wall of St. Mary's, Oxford; and the inscription survives, though not the dial. It gives Kratzer's biography in little; mentions that his stonecutter was English; and concludes with the glorious swagger, in most doggish Latin: "Ambo viri semper Germano more bibebant, et poterant potus sugere quicquid erat." Which is to say: "Both men drank ever in the German fashion, and could soak all the liquor that was going." No doubt the boast was true; and no doubt he made good sun-dials. One, made for Corpus Christi, Oxford, Robert Hegge, a scholar of that college, not only sketched for us, but has left its praises in veritable dithyrambs, a paean on a sun-dial.

The dial given to Cowper by the Rev. J. Johnson has strayed into literature, by reason of the following letter from the poet, which we somewhat abbreviate. It begins, "My dearest Johnny":

It was only the day before yesterday that, while we walked after dinner in the orchard, Mrs. Unwin between Sam and me, hearing the Hall clock, I observed a great difference between that and ours, and began immediately to lament, as I had often done, that there was not a sun-dial in all Weston to ascertain the true time for me. My complaint was long, and lasted till, having turned into the grass-walk, we reached the new building at the end of it, where we sat awhile and reposed ourselves. In a few minutes we returned by the way we came, when what, think you, was my astonishment to see what I had not seen before, though I had passed close by it—a smart sun-dial mounted on a smart stone pedestal! I assure you it seemed the effect of conjuration. I stopped short and exclaimed, "Why, here is a sun-dial, and upon our ground! How is this? Tell me, Sam, how came it here? Do you know anything about it?" At first I really thought (that is, as soon as I could think at all) that this factotum of mine, Sam Roberts, having often heard me deplore the want of one, had given orders for the supply of that want himself, without my knowledge, and was half-pleased and half-offended. But he soon exculpated himself by imputing the fact to you.

Burns continues the chain, for he was taught dialling, along with mensuration, by his village schoolmaster—a frequent practice with the better-class village schoolmaster of those days. But let us close our literary associations with a delightfully unliterary letter, written by an old Yorkshire dialler to excuse his delay in fixing a dial, during the early part of this century. It runs Dogberry very close for sonorous misuse of language:

DEAR SIR,—Ever since I have imbraced every applicable opportunity possible for a completion, and yet after all defeated! if I could possess you (but I have treated you so) we will let alone fixing a time, the model will take two or three days yet to finish it, you need not be afraid of any preposterous executions, though I could like somewhat handsome with regard to its perspicuous situation, and a little towards a melioration of my conduct towards you. I have for the present resolved it the most extant job I have on hand, . . . but cannot with any propriety fix a day yet.

We cannot part from our subject without some reference to the dial-mottoes of which this book contains an exhaustive collection. Charles Lamb found them more affecting than epitaphs. We can scarce agree with him. They ring the changes on a few well-worn themes; yet many are terse and striking, some with a quaint pithiness. Of these are Nil sine nobis, "Nothing exists without us [the sunbeams]"; Nil sine celesti radio, "Nothing exists without some heavenly ray"; and Non horas numero nisi serenas, "I number only hours serene," which turns to favour the chief drawback of the sun-dial. A weightier motto is Non regnisi regar, "I rule not save I be ruled," referring to the governing dial's government by the sun, which is, as the authors observe, an enforcement of Thomas A'Kempis's profound maxim: "No man ruleth safely but he that is willing to be ruled." A pithy saying is, "Now is yesterday's to-morrow." "Tak' tint of time ere time be tint" [heed of time ere time be lost] is a thrifty Scots counsel of the present day.

The longer mottoes are mostly weak and unquotable. Let us not forget the one jocose instance. Dean Cotton, of Bangor, had a cross old gardener, who bade folk, "Go about your business." After the man's death, the Dean engraved his advice round the sun-dial, after the "Bil Stumps" fashion, thus: "Goa bou tyo urb ns in ess." It passed very well for a Welsh axiom. With which ray of jest we may end a necessarily desultory notice of a very complete and interesting book, destined to be the standard authority on its subject.

An Australian Poet.

In the Days when the World was Wide. By Henry Lawson. (Sydney: Angus & Robertson; London: The Australian Book Company.)

ONE imagines that Mr. Henry Lawson has surely, some time and by some one, been called an Australian Kipling. He has just the superficial resemblances which court such superficial comparisons. He has not the magic of touch which ever and again lifts Mr. Kipling's best ballads into the region of absolute poetry, such as the allusion to the "spicy garlic smells" and the "tinkly temple bells" of Burmah. He has not the gift to create the same astonishingly literary effects out of vilely unliterary language: to make a debased speech give up strange reminiscences of buried fragrance. He has nothing, in fact, of the great artist that is in Kipling. His steed is on the levels; it is no winged horse, like that amazing khaki-coloured steed of the "uncrowned laureate." But it has bone, sinew, and "go." These ballads (for such they mostly are) abound in spirit and manhood, in the colour and smell of Australian soil. They deserve the popularity which they have won in Australia, and which we trust this edition will now give them in England. That colony has, indeed, travelled far since Charles Lamb noticed the first-fruits of her verse. Mr. Lawson (it will be surmised from what we have said) is at his best in those poems where his rough, customary English has a dramatic effect and justification; and these are in the majority. Where he tries natural description and lyric sentiment, the lack of charm becomes patent. It is unfortunate that his best poems are too long to quote entire. But take a sample of the sturdy vigour in his steerage poem, "For'ard":

We are shabby, rough, 'n' dirty, an' our feelin's out of tune,
An' it's hard on fellers for'ard that was used to go saloon;
There's a broken swell among us—he is barracked, he is chaffed,
An' I wish at times, poor devil, for his own sake he was aft;

For they'd understand him, aft
(He will miss the bath-rooms aft).

Spite of all there's no denyin' that there's finer feelin's aft.

I want to breathe the mornin' breeze that blows against the boat,

For there's a swellin' in my heart—a tightness in my throat—

We are for'ard when there's trouble! We are for'ard when there's graft!

But the men who never battle always seem to travel aft;

With their dressin'-cases, aft,

With their swell pyjamas, aft—

Yes! the idle and the careless, they have ease and comfort aft.

Mr. Lawson has humour, too, and can blend it with hinted sentiment, as is done excellently in the Watty verses. In one swinging poem, "The Star of Australasia," Mr. Lawson prophesies the waking of Australia to warlike heroism—a prophecy in fair way of fulfilment. We have given a most imperfect notion of Mr. Lawson's range. Almost every side of the roving settler's life is touched, always with vividness, picturesqueness, and a brave, open-air feeling. The book gives a better idea of Australia as it was till lately than volumes of prosaic description. For Mr. Lawson has lived the life he sings; and the vignette shows him on the tramp. He is a right-spirited poet, and should make a mark among his like in England.

Other New Books.

REFLECTED LIGHTS FROM "THE FACE OF THE DEEP."

ED. BY W. M. L. JAY.

To arrange the wild beauty of Christina Rossetti's free, fanciful meditations on the Apocalypse of St. John in a scheme of orderly parterres was a well-inspired thought. The tangled luxuriance of the original book has, indeed, a charm which does not survive the treatment; but for the practical purposes of spiritual reading no doubt the gathering of her thoughts under the headings of Love, Faith, Humility, Obedience, Penitence, the Cross, and the like, will render them more generally useful. A curiously unmodern vein characterises the book—a very primitive attitude towards the evangelical truths seasoned with a grain or two of the demure wit characteristic of the school of Assisi. "Ignorance by virtue of goodwill takes rank as a part of obedience. . . . Childlike souls know much that they understand not. . . . Knowledge and wisdom are quite distinct, though not necessarily sundered. . . . In the same sense that some see and yet see not, hear and yet hear not, so some may be said to know without knowing." Here is an unfamiliar note: "Ignorance is often a safeguard and a privilege. It is better to avoid doubts than to reject them. To study a difficulty is often to incur one." With one more quotation, we have done:

[Thy trouble] is a surface scourge: kiss the rod, and thou shalt abide as the profound sea whose surface is lashed and ploughed by the winds, but whose depths repose in unbroken calm.

(Alas for shallow persons who are all surface!)

The book is prettily bound, and contains some pictures that, though agreeable to the eye, are too modern in spirit for the text they illustrate. (S.P.C.K.)

WILLIAM CONYNGHAM
PLUNKET.BY FREDERICK DOUGLAS
HOW.

This memoir of the late Archbishop of Dublin reveals, to a world that knew him mainly as a truculent and fanatical enthusiast, the picture of a very engaging gentleman. To him the Disestablished Church was no mere importation from England, but the Church of Patrick and Bridget and Kolumbkil; the dominant hierarchy of Rome an intrusive foreign tyranny—sinister, rapacious, oppressive. He did sincerely believe that he could undertake no task more worthy of a patriot and a philanthropist than to loosen here and there those grievous fetters. His convictions brought him face to face once, as he sat alone in a carriage from which the doors had been removed, with an angry, dangerous mob. He showed up very well. Sitting in doubt whether the next moment he might not be in rough hands, he wrote down in his note-book an account of the circumstances which had brought him into the predicament, with an expression of gratitude to the psalmist who had taught him to say: "The very abjects gathered themselves together against me, making mouths at me and ceased not." For he liked words. "You are such a quiddity," he writes; "A change," he says, "sometimes sprigs you up"; to the mother whom he worshipped he subscribes himself exuberantly, "Your most affectionate estissimus." The appeal from "the Reformed Church of Spain" was delightful to him. There was a touch of romance in the situation; and it was a fine opportunity of asserting the autonomy of the Irish Church, as against Canterbury and the E.C.U. The consecration of Cabrera, said Père Hyacinthe to him, grasping his hand after the ceremony, "marks an era in the history of the Christian Church." And his hearer, at least, believed it. He was the enfant terrible of the Anglican Church. If he had not been that he would have liked, he said, to be a landscape-gardener. (Isbister. 16s.)

ENGLAND, EGYPT, AND THE SUDAN.

BY H. D. TRAILL.

The great tragi-comedy of modern Egypt, which began with the establishment of the Khedivate by that ruthless Albanian, Mehemet Ali, and his descendants, was closed by the final struggle between East and West at Omdurman, with its epilogue of the death of the Khalifa not far from Obeid. That chapter of modern history is now closed, and its record is to be found scattered over many volumes by many hands. As a whole, the great drama was non-existent until Mr. H. D. Traill was well-inspired to place it between two covers, and at such brief length that even the idlest man may find time to read it. As long as Oriental rulers do not graft the vices of the West upon those of the East they do well after their fashion; but Ismail Pasha was tempted to be Parisian, and so paved the way for Arabi, the Mahdi, and the Khalifa, and incidentally brought about his own exile. We are now able to see that the drama unfolded itself in due course, and marched steadily towards the inevitable, and the little episodes which once seemed to be the plot itself are reduced to their proper dimensions. In Mr. Traill's book the whole scheme is unfolded for us in order, with due regard to the importance of events, and the history is very excellently done. Being by Mr. Traill it is, of course, well written, and told with a due regard for its dramatic essentials. Three plans and a map illustrate the course of events, and an index—an absolute necessity in a work of this kind—gives the volume the dignity of a book of reference. (Archibald Constable & Co. 12s.)

THE SUCCESSORS OF DRAKE.

BY JULIAN S. CORBETT.

Mr. Corbett's present volume is the sequel to his Drake and the Tudor Navy, and continues the account of the war with Spain, which lasted from the death of Drake, in 1596, to the death of Elizabeth. This is a period too often ignored in our histories; but, as Mr. Corbett points out, the defeat of the Armada had by no means finally established England's position at sea, and the campaigns which followed were vital to her future. The period was one of splendid failure, for England attempted to make use of the maritime supremacy she had won, and failed because an efficient army was wanting to continue hostilities after the point beyond which naval action alone cannot advance. This volume must be read in connexion with Mr. Corbett's two previous volumes on the Tudor navy. Some of his conclusions may be open to doubt; but he supplies much food for thought, and has written a painstaking and comprehensive study of the naval history of the time. The volume is well illustrated by photographs of the Earl of Essex, and of Lords Dorset, Nottingham, and Mountjoy, and by process reproductions of portraits of Sir Walter Raleigh and Lord Cumberland, and of charts and pictures of warlike operations. The maps are excellent, and the index is gratifying and full. The book is one which all students of naval matters should read. (Longmans, Green & Co. 21s.)

PIKE AND PERCH.
BY WILLIAM SENIOR ("RED SPINNER") AND OTHERS.

This, the latest and ninth volume of the "Fur, Feather and Fin" series, is written by hands as accustomed to the pen as to the rod. The names of "Red Spinner" and "John Bickerdyke" are familiar to those who never made a cast in their lives, and to whom a paternoster certainly does not suggest anything connected with angling. Mr. Senior deals with the pike wherever he is to be found, in river, lake, and pond, and discovers as many practical facts about him, drawn from shrewd experience, as should serve to make the budding pike-fisher turn at once to sort out and prepare his winter tackle. With the pike of fancy Mr. Senior deals kindly; the monsters of 170 lbs. and upwards, the giants of tradition, he dismisses with a shrug and a smile; in local history, which is tradition glorified, the pike assumes proportions more proper to the shark. But it is not to be wondered at that fish should grow enormously round the inn fire o' nights; there is something in the unsteady light and the heavy shadows that makes things loom big. Mr. Senior devotes an interesting chapter to the "Ancient Art of Trolling." It is unsportsmanlike to troll nowadays, except in waters where pike are regarded as mere vermin; it is certainly the most destructive and wanton form of sport, the gorged hooks making it impossible to return undersized fish.

"John Bickerdyke," himself the author of the latest work on pike-fishing, deals with perch in this volume, and there is a chapter on "Pike in Trout Waters," by Mr. W. H. Pope. The methods of cooking the two fish are treated by Mr. Shand, who does not fail to mention that that glorious receipt of Izaak Walton's for preparing a pike for the table, which is "too good for any but anglers or very honest men." (Longmans. 5s.)

We have received, in the "Masters of Medicine" series, Thomas Sydenham, by Joseph Frank Payne (Unwin, 5s.), the fullest biography yet written of this famous seventeenth-century physician, whom Dr. John Brown called "the prince of practical physicians, whose character is as beautiful and genuinely English as his name." Sydenham was a prolific medical writer, yet placed little faith in books as helps to the profession. Asked by Sir Richard Blackmore, when a young man, what books he should study, Sydenham replied: "Read Don Quixote; it is a very good book; I read it myself still," his meaning being: reading books will never make a doctor.

Prince Demidoff's Hunting Trips in the Caucasus was such a capital record of eager sport that no Nimrod need hesitate to read his new book, After Wild Sheep in the Altai and Mongolia (Rowland Ward, 21s.). Three years ago Prince Denndoff saw in Mr. Ward's shop-window in Piccadilly some splendid heads of wild sheep which, he ascertained, had been secured by Major Cumberland on the Altai Mountains. He at once decided to start for the same spot. As companion he secured Mr. St. George Littledale, and neither sportsman's wife would hear of being left behind. The narrative is excellent reading.

Messrs. Longmans issue this week The Forward Policy and its Results: Thirty-five Years' Work Amongst the Tribes on our North-Western Frontier (15s. net), by Richard Isaac Bruce, C.I.E. Mr. Bruce says he is more at home in the saddle than at the desk, but he has produced a record of his absorbing labours in connexion with the management of the tribes of our North and North-Western Frontiers of India. The principles advocated by Lord Roberts and Lord Elgin have Mr. Bruce's warm support.

The Prolongation of Life (3s. 6d.) is the title of a little book by R. E. Dudgeon, M.D., issued by Messrs. Chatto & Windus. It gives useful yet moderate advice on Exercise, Clothing, Bathing, Food, Drink, Tobacco, Eyes, and Beards. The author does not approve the last-named appendages.

"Get the writings of John Woolman by heart," said Charles Lamb. We doubt whether many people have taken his advice, but Messrs. Headley Bros., of Bishopsgate, have just issued an excellent illustrated edition of Woolman's Journal, and his Word of Remembrance and Caution to the Rich. The introduction written in 1871 by the poet Whittier is used, and there are an Appendix, Bibliography, &c.

In the "Little Library" series we have from Messrs. Methuen The Early Poems of Alfred Lord Tennyson, with notes and an introduction by Mr. J. Churton Collins; and Maud, and Other Poems, edited by Elizabeth Wordsworth. These volumes are extremely neat, and usefully equipped; but we could wish the notes anywhere but at the foot of the page.

Fiction.

Petersburg Tales. By Olive Garnett.
(Heinemann. 6s.)

It is probable that Miss Garnett has enjoyed exceptional facilities for becoming acquainted with the Russian character. If not, so much the more to be admired is the living picture of middle-class Russian society which is presented in one of these tales, "The Case of Vetrova." About these characters there is no suggestion of second-hand observation. And to present the different types by the portrayal of their diverse attitudes towards the tragedy of the girl revolutionary burned to death in prison under conditions that leave room for wide and sinister conjecture, is an ambitious and spirited design. Also it is carried out with ability. That the story nevertheless does drag is due to the fact that Vetrova herself is left too shadowy. We do not even learn precisely what happened to her, and—which is more serious—we never are brought near enough to realise her personality. Imagine The Ring and the Book without Pompilia's story! Far the best constructed of these four stories, the most effectually wrought, is "The Secret of the Universe." This is the title of a wild excursion into the domain that guards its secret between Matter and Mind. The grey figure of the simple-hearted megalomaniac, its author, and the ample form of his tearful wife (with her back hair twisted into the semblance of a teapot handle), are convincing. Charming is the outline of Blanche, bent on defending the amiable Koko from the obsession of these innocent horse-leeches. By his good offices the absurd book is at last produced. Not a copy sold; and Barry was set to work upon his autobiography, which, being written in Russian, must be translated:

We all pegged away again in the afternoon, and for days after that. . . . I don't remember the details now, only that from the day Barry became Professor of Law in St. Petersburg he strode on till the closing chapters, a tragic figure, through oppression and chicanery; down a vista of arrests, imprisonments, exile, sufferings, in an atmosphere vibrating with indignation and revolt. We, of course, very soon revolted against the word "indignation," we had so soon exhausted the available equivalents. The "anger mingled with contempt" supplied by the dictionary didn't go very far. All the good and intelligent people whom Barry had met had necessarily been indignant about something, and this was the one prominent fact which he seemed to remember about them. . . . The chapters on the Polish exiles whom Barry met in Siberia—the best chapters—were also the most painful, and, strange to record, reduced us oftenest to hysterical laughter. We might laugh; it was well we did. The book gained on us; and, as we proceeded, the figure of the unconscious hero—of this noble old man—stood out clearer and clearer. Childlike vanity was writ large over the pages, but his essential character shone through the gloom like a vein of gold in a dark place. Such apostrophes, coming as a climax to a burst of indignation, as "Nicholas I., I abominate you! Alexander II., I defy you! Alexander III., I despise you!" would reduce us to that feebleness in which the pen falls from nerveless fingers, and one leans back, in inward vision, between laughter and tears.

This long quotation shows Miss Garnett in her most personal vein. She is stiffer sometimes. Like all clever writers of the rising generation she shows tendencies that we propose for the future to call Jacobean. "Out of It," for instance, is a mere essay in the manner; and as such it is clever. The substance of the tale, however, is too slender to sustain accidents so elaborate, and our admiration is quite unimpassioned. Having mentioned by name three of the stories, we dare not omit all allusion to "Roukoff." It is an excellent piece of work: it almost "comes off." Pedantry we abominate; but there occur little solecisms that we cannot but resent in pages that furnish so many and quite remarkable evidences of an excellent talent.

Tongues of Conscience. By Robert Hichens.
(Methuen.)

MR. HICHENS, it is common knowledge, has a tasteful style, an eye for landscape, and a pretty wit; but the fact remains that in nothing he has written, so far as his writing remains in our memory, is there any evidence that his mind is set apart from the habit of thought prevalent among the educated and intelligent of his contemporaries. That is superficial and materialistic, if you analyse it, to the last. But such as it is it should produce itself in literature. It should not, that is to say, play with notions that are alien to its temper. Above all, it should not start boldly with a præternatural manifestation, and then neither stand boldly by it nor adequately explain it away. That is what, in "How Love came to Professor Guildea," Mr. Hichens rather flagrantly does. There you have a materialistic man of science subject to the obsession of a degraded spirit. The suffering of the man under this humiliating persecution is rather poignantly indicated. The story laid hold upon us as we read it, for it was told with a nicety of circumstance that convinced. Particularly that parrot offering its crest to the caress of the unseen finger—mimicking the lovesick endearments of the unseen, loathed visitant—is final evidence that the obsession had an external cause. Yet when the man succumbs to the horror—dies—we are told simply that the victim died from failure of the heart. Of course there follows a suggestion that that was but a shallow view of the case; but this is not enough, unless the author can convince us that he has in view another, and a mystical, hypothesis. And that the glimpse of the figure huddled on the Park bench opposite singularly fails to do. The same fault we find in "The Lady and the Beggar," and "The Cry of the Child." They are "shockers" of the præternatural. So is "Sea Change." About all these, as about most of Mr. Hichens's more serious work, there is an air of insincerity. It is as though, behind the mask, we could divine always his smile of inappropriate sanity. We like him so much better in his merry moments.

Men of Marlowe's. By Mrs. Henry Dudeney.
(John Long.)

MRS. DUDENEY, with a recklessness similar to Mr. Hichens's, seems to take it for granted that, believing so little, we are at liberty to pretend anything. As to which the most obvious comment is that, granting the principle, to act upon it, and to cut himself free from the fetters of law and fact, suggests in the author not fecundity but poverty of imagination. "Beyond the Grey Gate" is the story that for the moment we have particularly in mind. The crazy fancy of the cooped-up cockney clerk, who from a suburban ramble returns to his shrewish wife with a picturesque babble of green fields and rustic lovers and a blooming dairymaid, is convincing as it stands. The fruitless voyage of verification is touching; but to make it bite it is deemed necessary, after the man's death, to renew the search, and to discover an aged man with reminiscences all too pat:

"Ah! there was a gate on the common—hereabouts, as near as I can mind. . . . There was a copse—Shannonses Copse, I think they called it; but my memory ain't what it was. You went over a stile. That was a rare place for coertin'"—he grinned, showing a toothless cavern, and he spluttered with merry memories as he rocked on the spade.

He goes on further to particularise. Upon such coincidences it is hardly enough to comment "Odd, wasn't it? But then the world is odd." These stories of the Men of Marlowe's Inn are not, however, invariably open to a similar objection. They are gruesome studies, rather, of the effect that the atmosphere of the London Inns has, if not upon the actual dwellers therein, at any rate upon the imaginative minds of those who contemplate it from the brighter focus of family life in the suburbs or the convenient flat: and for what they are we joyfully proclaim that they are very good.

The Bountiful Lady. By Thomas Cobb.
(Grant Richards.)

IT is still very doubtful whether any but children know anything worth knowing about children. Advanced students of the Child, like Lewis Carroll and Mr. Kenneth Grahame, may, perhaps, have got as far as that realisation of ignorance which is the first step towards knowledge; but beyond this who has passed? The present is said to be an age of children's books. It would be more correct to say that it is an age of children's books for adults. Try to imagine the Child, with his barbarian simplicity appreciating the fine aroma of The Golden Age. You cannot. No respectable child would sniff at it. And the popularity of Alice is due immensely more to parents than to offspring. We admit that thousands of children have enjoyed Alice; but millions have enjoyed Jessica's First Prayer. It needs a clever infant to grasp the subtleties of Alice; and though all children are profound, few are clever. Without laying claim to any shadow of exact scholarship, we assert that children, in the pullulating mass, want neither cleverness, nor fancy, nor imagination in their literature. What they do want is something solid, stolid, and slabby—something akin to a beefsteak and fried potatoes at a Strand restaurant.

We venture to think that The Bountiful Lady will please parents better than children. It is a delightful little novel, and Mr. Cobb has used much cleverness in throwing the glamour of a fairy-tale over his story without departing from the strict factual realism of a Flaubert. But we consider that children only desire the glamour of a fairy-tale in a fairy-tale. We believe that they would have preferred Mr. Cobb to relate how Mary Brown, the street-urchin, was run over and taken into a nice home full of dolls and sweets and footmen, plainly and straightforwardly, without any circumlocutory fancy.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the week's Fiction are not necessarily final.
Reviews of a selection will follow.]

THE FLAME OF LIFE. BY GABRIELE D'ANNUNZIO.

This is a translation, by the talented authoress of Via Lucis, of another of the "Romances of the Pomegranate" series by the ineffable D'Annunzio. Il Fuoco has flamed of late, for other than literary reasons, through Continental drawing-rooms and in Continental newspapers. This is how one of the characters, "Paris Eglano, the erotic poet, a fair, beardless youth, who had a handsome and voracious red mouth," talks: "In an hour's time Venice will offer some Nero-like lover hidden in some gondola-cabin the Dienysian spectacle of a city that has been set on fire by its own delirium." (Heinemann. 6s.)

IN THE PALACE OF THE KING. BY F. MARION CRAWFORD.

Mr. Crawford is the wanderer of fiction. Those who have read all his many admirable novels should have an intimate acquaintance with the polite social life of many countries. In this volume he takes us to Spain, and offers a love story of old Madrid. "Two young girls sat in a high, though very narrow, room of the old Moorish palace to which King Philip the Second had brought his court when he finally made Madrid his capital." (Macmillan. 6s.)

THE JOURNAL OF A JEALOUS WOMAN. BY PERCY WHITE.

By the author of The West End and Mr. Bailey Martin, which is another way of saying that this is a smart and lively tale of modern life, with just sufficient seriousness in the background to lighten the comedy. (Nisbet. 6s.)

THE EAGLE'S HEART.

BY HAMLIN GARLAND.

Mr. Garland gives us, not for the first time, a closely studied picture of Far West life. The background is always convincing. "It was good to face the West again. The wild heart of the youth flung off all doubt, all regret. . . . The first mirage filled his heart with a rush of memories of wild rides, and the grease-wood recalled a hundred odorous camp-fires. He was getting home." (Heinemann. 6s.)

LORD LINLITHGOW.

BY MORLEY ROBERTS.

Mr. Roberts has produced a political novel in a political hour. We make the acquaintance of Lord Linlithgow just after he has resigned the Premiership, when the Conservatives are paralysed, and the Radicals a rabble. "And look at Europe!" Mrs. Redway laughed, "I decline to look at Europe." There is some very attractive womankind in the story, which is brisk and pointed. (Arnold. 6s.)

THE MARRIAGE OF TRUE MINDS. BY THEOPHILA NORTH.

"To All 'Knights of the Holy Ghost,' whether their Panoply be Silence or Song," this story is dedicated. It is described by its title, and by its quotation of Shakespeare's Sonnet CXVI.

Love is not love
Which alters when it alteration finds,
Or bends with the remover to remove:
*Oh, no! it is an ever fixed mark,
That looks on tempests and is never shaken.*

The story will satisfy sticklers for a happy ending. (Richards. 6s.)

CLARE MONRO.

BY HANNAH LYNCH.

A very short novel by the author of The Autobiography of a Child. It is the story of a mother and daughter, and is pathetic and tragic. (Milne. 2s. 6d.)

THE MONK WINS.

BY E. H. COOPER.

By the author of Mr. Blake of Newmarket. The present story opens at Ascot. "The Monk" is a two-year old which, on page 5, wins the New Stakes. The owner of "The Monk" is Margaret, who has £40,000 a year. She is the heroine of this novel of sport and society by a promising writer, who does not trouble his head with problems. (Duckworth. 6s.)

P'D CROWNS RESIGN.

BY J. MACLAREN COBHAM.

A light-hearted romance. Time: present. Place: Scotland. The daughter of Colonel Herries Hay, and the Crown Prince of Beotia meet and love in the Highlands. The end is unusual. (John Long. 6s.)

PARSON PETER.

BY ARTHUR H. NORWAY.

By the author of Highways and Byways in Devon and Cornwall. It opens on a spring afternoon a hundred years ago. "Parson Peter! Time was when his name—ay, and his features too—were familiar to every fisherman from Portland to the Start." (Murray. 6s.)

LONG LIVE THE KING.

BY GUY BOOTHBY.

With pictures. Mr. Boothby's —th (we do not know the exact number, but a new novel by Mr. Boothby also reached us last week) work of fiction finds him in the Zenda vein. On page 6 we read: "To enter upon my story proper, it is only fit that I should commence with a brief description of the life of my poor father. Maximilian the Second, King of Pannonia, as all the world is aware, was a monarch foredoomed to trouble from his cradle"—and so on. (Ward, Lock. 5s.)

KATE CAMERON OF BRUX.

BY J. E. MUDDOCK.

An historical novel by the author of In the King's Favour, also an historical novel which, we notice in an advertisement, has been described by the ACADEMY as a "good historical novel." The present work is "a story of wild doings and strange people based upon legends and traditions current in the locality in which the scenes are laid." That locality, need we say, is Scotland: period, fourteenth century. "He touched her under the chin: 'By Saint Agnes, but you are a pretty wench.'" (Digby, Long. 6s.)

THE SOUL OF THE COUNTESS.

BY JESSIE L. WESTON.

A collection of six graceful stories, on mediæval models. To each story is prefixed a prelude in verse. (Nutt. 3s. 6d.)

THE ADVENTURES OF A JOURNALIST.

BY H. CADETT.

He was "a tall, odd-looking young man, clean shaven and keen of face," attached to the Evening Orb, and his adventures, having arranged themselves nicely into eleven chapters, are here set forth. He dies at the end of the last adventure. (Sands. 3s. 6d.)

A TRAITOR IN LONDON.

BY FERGUS HUME.

All the names from Roberts to Rhodes, from Chamberlain to Kruger, all the war talk that has filled the daily papers for the past year, are to be found again in these pages plus the "element of romance" seen through the eyes of the author of The Mystery of a Hansom Cab. The twenty-fifth chapter is called "Besieged," the twenty-sixth "In Captivity," and the last "Calm after Storm." (Long. 6s.)

VERITY.

BY SIDNEY PICKERING.

"A reddening winter sun—the December sun of 1815—was sending long level beams across the fields by the waterside." A long, thorough tale of domestic and country life. (Arnold. 6s.)

WE have also received: A Tragedy of Three, by T. T. Dahle. (Hurst & Blackett.)—Saronia, by R. Short, a romance of Ancient Ephesus. (Stock. 6s.)—Mrs. Frederick Graham, by Alice A. Clowes. (Swan Sonnenschein. 2s. 6d.)—Robert Kane, by C. H. Malcolm. (Simpkin. 3s. 6d.)—Jenny of the Villa, by Mrs. C. H. Radford. (Arnold. 6s.)—Haggith Shy, Quakeress, by Mark Ashton. (Hutchinson. 6s.)—The Malice of Grace Wentworth, by R. H. Heppenstall. Prologue: Murder; Chapter LXII.: Forgiveness. Peace on Earth. (Long. 6s.)—As Luck Would Have It, by William Westall, a good story of social life, with a validity-of-marriage and transfer-of-estates plot, and a well-chosen motto from Defoe. (Chatto & Windus. 6s.)—The Vaulted Chamber, by Harry A. Spurr, in which a rascal priest of the Russian Church pursues a princess with his attentions. (Digby, Long. 6s.)—By an Unseen Hand, by Edwin Hughes, a readable railway romance of "The Ragged Thirteen," a secret society whose reign of terror is described and dissipated in fourteen chapters. (Arrowsmith. 3s. 6d.)—The Heart of Babylon, a story of Methodist life: "Something fell—a hand on the pulpit ledge, a book on the floor below, an electric touch—and there and then a revival broke out." (Marshall & Co. 6s.)—A Romance of the Unseen, by M. E. Winchester. (Digby, Long. 6s.)—The Scarlet Judges, by Eliza F. Pollard, a tale of the Inquisition in the Netherlands. (Partridge. 6s.)—The Black Pilgrim, by Michael Czajkowski, a Polish writer not yet familiarised to English readers. The translation is done by Mr. S. C. de Soissons, who says: "Wild, unbridled violence of action and feeling, sympathetic but improbable fancy, are the features of this and the author's other romances." (Digby, Long. 6s.)

THE ACADEMY.

Editorial and Publishing Offices, 43, Chancery-lane.

The ACADEMY will be sent post-free to every Annual Subscriber in the United Kingdom.

Price for One Issue, Threepence; postage One Halfpenny Price for 52 issues, Thirteen Shillings; postage free.

Foreign Rates for Yearly Subscriptions 20s. including postage.

American Agents for the ACADEMY: Brentano's, 31, Union-square, New York.

Milton in the Market Place.*

"MILTON, a name to resound for ages." And yet the appearance of a study of Milton amid the multitude of books that are now racing against Christmas is something of a surprise—a goodly surprise. Thus it should be. Thus in the literary market-place should Milton's ghost come wandering by, leaving the air full of great suggestions, and diverting men's gaze from the meteors of November to the planets of all time. Do we sufficiently exalt, and remember, and attend on Milton as our supreme literary man? With Shakespeare we have here nothing to do. Shakespeare is not our master, because it is impossible that we should be his pupils. The mere approach to Shakespeare, in that character, becomes ludicrous as it becomes actual. The declivities are too steep that lead to his transcending and incomprehensible genius. It is lesson enough that this man has taken an intellectual seat to which none can follow him, and that his cloud-belted genius sheds on us light and warmth with the unsolicited graciousness of the sun itself. We are not loth to dwell on this empyrean separation of Shakespeare from all our other writers. In the catalogue they go together, but even this convenience would be abandoned if at all times, and in all casual moods, we could realise the greatness of Shakespeare. Prof. Raleigh is awake to the need of a sleepless homage, and not his least interesting page is the one in which he pays it:

We have to widen our conception of human nature in order to think of him as a man. How hard a thing it is to conceive of Shakespeare as a human spirit, embodied and conditioned, whose affections, though higher mounted than ours, yet, when they stooped, stooped with the like wing, is witnessed by all biographies of Shakespeare, and by many thousands of the volumes of criticism and commentary that have been written on his works. One writer is content to botanise with him—to study plant lore, that is, with a theatrical manager, in his hard-earned leisure, for teacher. Another must read the Bible with him, although, when all is said, Shakespeare's study was but little on the Bible. Others elect to keep him to music, astronomy, law, hunting, hawking, fishing. He is a good companion out of doors, and some would fain keep him there, to make a country gentleman of him. . . . They hardly know what to make of his "undervalued book"; but they know that he was a great man, and to have bought a wood-fell or a quarter of mutton from him, that would have been something! Only the poet-critics attempt to see life, however brokenly, through Shakespeare's eyes, to let their enjoyment keep attendance upon his. And from their grasp, too, he escapes by sheer excess.

Milton does not thus elude or dispart men's intelligence. His achievement, glorious though it is, does not baffle the human mind. We are not kept dumb and distant; we can draw near and pay a personal homage. His genius, indeed, is less mysterious and more explicable than we may be apt to think. Many smaller men are harder to understand. Prof. Raleigh makes a point of this:

It is essential for the understanding of Milton that we should take account of the rare simplicity of his character. No subtleties; no tricks of the dramatic intellect, which dresses itself in a hundred masquerading costumes and peeps out of a thousand spy-holes; no development, one might almost say, only training, and that self-imposed. There is but one Milton, and he is throughout one and the same, in his life, in his prose, and in his verse; from those early days, when we find him, an uncouth swain,

With eager thought warbling his Doric lay.

to the last days when, amid a swarm of disasters, he approved himself like Samson, and earned for himself the loftiest epitaph in the language, his own:

Nothing is here for tears, nothing to wail
Or knock the breast; no weakness, no contempt,
Dispraise or blame; nothing but well and fair,
And what may quiet us in a death so noble.

Not only was Milton's literary life single, but his mind climbed no spiritual heights that abash the common man. He did not so much as set a foot within that "misty mid-region" in which Maeterlinck walks to-day; and with the mystics of a time nearer his own—with Vaughan, for instance—he had no real companionship. The geography of Paradise Lost can be taught definitely to children. "There is no metaphysic, nothing spiritual, nothing mysterious, except in name, throughout the whole poem. The so-called spiritual beings are as definitely embodied as man." In a word, Milton stands first of our poets in virtue of his having clothed with their utmost majesty certain conceptions which, though spiritual in kind, have always been, and always must be, "bodied forth" to the multitude in material expressions. He described Heaven, and Hell. But he pictured them not as Dante did, by first imagining them in detail, and then applying ordinary words to that which no longer seemed extraordinary; he pictured them with all those circumstances of remoteness, vastness, and dreadfulness by which they awe and allure the soul. He did not cut down mysteries to the height of language, however exquisite, but boldly sought to make language compass things unattempted yet in prose or rhyme. Not metaphysical things were these, but things which tradition had rendered almost material, while conferring on them incalculable force and majesty. So that, in effect, it was Milton's task to visualise the highest of definite conceptions in the noblest garment of poetry that could be woven from the English language. This, ultimately, he did, making it his express and holy mission. He acquired a command over English words, and over the harmonies of which they were capable, that no other poet has acquired; and with these he developed a lofty discretion, or intuition, which made him master also of the teeming ideas and images which his theme naturally suggested; until, in the fulness of power, he could express and attune and build. Thus, Milton is the greatest poetic workman whose work we can watch and understand. He is dealing with themes of permanent interest in language, of permanent dignity. Had he been less than Milton the result must have been flat beyond report, or ludicrous beyond pity. But his splendour of diction; his harmonies, ever varying, ever triumphant; and his lofty and sanctified choice of ideas, carried him through a task which transcended—as he himself well knew—ought that had been enterprised by poet or historian in any age. Every writer should steep his mind in Milton's poetry; as Prof. Raleigh says, "there is nothing to put beside him." Open his poems where you will—what perfected speech, running, as it were, on wheels of music—what golden noise!

Where were ye Nymphs when the remorseless deep
Closed over the head of your loved Lycidas?
For neither were ye playing on the steep
Where your old bards, the famous Druids, lie,
Nor on the shaggy top of Mona high,
Nor yet where Deva spreads her wizard stream:
Ay me! I fondly dream
Had ye been there; for what could that have done?

* Milton. By Prof. Walter Raleigh. (Arnold. 6s.)

What could the Muse herself that Orpheus bore,
The Muse herself for her enchanting son,
Whom universal Nature did lament,
When, by the rout, that made the hideous roar,
His gory visage down the stream was sent,
Down the swift Hebrus to the Lesbian shore?

We snatch these lines from the description of Rome in "Paradise Regained":

Thence to the gates east round thine eye, and see
What conflux issuing forth, or entering in,
Pretors, proconsuls to their provinces
Hasting, or on return, in robes of state;
Lictors and rods, the ensigns of their power,
Legions and cohorts, turms of horse and wings;
Or embassies from regions far remote
In various habits on the Appian road,
Or on th' Emilian, some from farthest south,
Syene, and where the shadow both way falls,
Meroe, Nilotic isle, and, more to west,
The realm of Bocchus to the Blaekmoor sea;
From th' Asian kings, and Parthian among these,
From India and the golden Chersonese,
And utmost Indian, Trapobane,
Dusk faces with silken turbants wreath'd.

But quoting Milton is not the work of a weekly paper. The point we wish to insist on is this, that it is the business of every young writer to learn from Milton what our language can do, and of every young critic to learn from Milton what our language has done. We have no doubt that even the novelist of to-day, in common with the historian, the essayist, and the poet, has everything to gain from keeping a chamber of his mind sacred to Milton and reverberant with his music. What Prof. Raleigh calls the besetting sin of the Romantics—the employment of irrelevant and excessive detail—would surely be somewhat purged away by even a lip loyalty to the master of English Classicism. Nor would this be the only vice to wither away in contact with Milton's altar flame. The power to prolong, and balance, and undulate a sentence would be acquired by reminiscence, and the young writer would not need the poet's explicit disapproval of the staccato style, so useful as a spurt, so wearying as a pace. On this point Prof. Raleigh has a passage which we cannot pass.

The clink of the rhyming couplet was not more displeasing to Milton's ear than the continued emphatic bark of a series of short sentences. Accustomed as he was to the heavy-armed processional manner of scholarly Renaissance prose, he felt it an indignity to "lie at the mercy of a coy, flurting style; to be girded with frumps and curial gibes, by one who makes sentences by the statute, as if all above three inches long were confiscate." Later on, in the Apology, he returns to this grievance, and describes how his adversary "sobs me out half a dozen phthisical mottoes, whenever he had them, hopping short in the measure of convulsion fits; in which labour the agony of his wit having escaped narrowly, instead of well-sized periods, he greets us with a quantity of thumb-ring posies."

The density of Milton's prose and poetic styles should come as a revelation to many of our writers who think that to be musical they must be diffuse. They may learn that it is the hardest stone that takes, and deserves, the best polish, when they see Milton's heavy wains of meaning moving without creak or jolt. Here, also, Prof. Raleigh has wise words for this generation:

Eclecticism and the severe castigation of style are dangerous disciplines for any but a rich temperament; from others they produce only what is exquisite and thin and vapid. The "stylist" of the modern world is generally an interesting invalid; his complexion would lose all its transparency if it were exposed to the weather; his weak voice would never make itself heard in the hubbub of the bazaar. Sunbeams cannot be extracted from cucumbers, nor can the great manner in literature emanate from a chill self-culture.

When Milton resolved to "strictly meditate the thankless Muse" he did not mean, by this, to acquire a style, but to acquire ideas and the style suitable for their expression.

Things Seen.

France and Those.

OUTSIDE the House of the South African Republic at the Paris Exhibition a crowd, gesticulating and chattering, was gathered, and the steps were hidden by the eager movement, inwards and outwards, of Boer sympathisers. I entered. Half the house was neglected; in the other half an excited crowd surrounded an ill-done marble bust of Ex-President Kruger, embowered in laurel leaves. You could only see the ex-President's face; the rest was all greenery and faded flowers. He looked like an elephant in a jungle where a national picnic has been held; for paper—bits and scraps—was everywhere, pinned on to the laurel leaves, gummed to the walls, stuck like bulbs into the flower-pots, and scattered on the floor, untidy as autumn leaves. And on every piece of paper was scribbled ribald or insulting remarks against Us, Our Queen, Our Generals, Our Colonial Secretary, etcetera, etcetera. More, the whitewashed, wooden pillars that supported the South African Republic were scribbled, high as the hand could reach, with messages to Us. Some were in verse, some in elegant prose, some in prose unacademic, some in the cryptic slang of the Boulevards. All were hostile to Us. Some provoked pity, some laughter; some aroused the feeling with which one confronts the vagaries of a vulgar child; some flushed the face of the Anglo-Saxon and made him grip his stick. That condition had become mine when I was dug between the third and fourth ribs with the end of a pen-holder. I turned; my eyes travelled along the instrument of peace till they reached an outstretched arm, and, roaming up a magenta blouse, rested at last upon a homely, cajoling face. It belonged to a young woman, one of three seated behind a red-baize-covered table, on which were spread three tomes, the size of family Bibles, in process of being filled with signatures. "Témoignage de sympathie pour les Boers," said the young woman, again offering me the pen-holder. Well, I retired; I executed a strategic retreat. On the steps an incident happened that restored me. He was an old Frenchman, distinguished and courteous, and he had seen the whole incident. He advanced towards me; he raised his hat. He did not speak, but his manner had so exquisite a touch of apology and sympathy that the indignity of the past minutes faded into nothing. "That is not France," I said, waving towards the ribald and insulting scribbings. "That is not France," he cried. "Ah! we of the older generation have memories. We are not swayed by every wind that blows. We do not seek our opinions on the Boulevards. We do not have a fresh hysteria with every moon, and bare our souls at the bidding of the loudest screamer. I"—he breathed heavily—"I have seen the German flag floating over St. Dennis; I—I have seen the German troops camped in the Champs Elysées. I speak for France, not for—those."

The Way.

THE midday train rattled on its dusty way, from Portsmouth to London, through the pleasant county of Sussex. A bright May sun poured in at the windows. I and a girl with a large basket, who sat in the opposite corner, were the only occupants of the carriage.

At Horsham the door opened to admit a little woman laden with pillows and parcels, which were hastily thrown down while she helped in another woman,—bigger than herself, with a fat unhealthy face, and a red flower in her bonnet,—who, with a good deal of grumbling ceremony, settled herself, full length on the seat in front of me. The girl quickly shrank into her corner, to give the newcomer more room for her feet; and put her basket down on the floor, apparently heedless of the strictures passed upon it.

"Baskets like that are too big to have in the carriage, taking up people's places—ought to go in the luggage van. How this train do shake! Put the cushion at my back, Bessie—lower down, can't you? No—I don't want nothing over my feet. Leave me alone—do."

The girl turned back from the window; looked at the flushed, irritable face of the invalid, and the almost tearful anxiety of her friend. Then—hesitating—she stooped over her basket, and uncovered a disorder of spring flowers. With a scarcely perceptible movement of her foot, she pushed them towards the newcomers. There they lay in the dusty sunshine—the whole carriage was filled with their glow and fragrance.

I glanced at the stout woman; her eyes were fixed on the flowers, the complaints ceased, and her face was almost peaceful.

"Those primroses are pretty, arn't they, Bessie?—and the bluebells,—remind me of the little wood at the back of the farm, when we was children. It was blue with them in May, wasn't it?—and we used to go out to pick them Sundays. . . . No, thank you, dear, don't trouble about me,—the pillow's quite comfortable."

There was a long silence. The flowers began to droop a little in the hot sun, but the girl did not cover them over.

When we reached Victoria, the little woman turned, to gather up the shawls and cushions, after her companion had left the carriage. "Thank you, my dear," she said to the girl,—“my sister is going up to the hospital, for a dreadful bad operation, and you have helped her on the way.”

My Book.

The Story of an Author's Vanity.

It was my first book, my only book, my ewe lamb; but it was not a "work," not an "important publication," like Mr. Lecky's Map of Life. The reviewers did not welcome it either eagerly or seriously. Nobody gave it three columns, or even one column and a turn. It was merely included in that section which begins: "We have also received the following"—and here and there complimentary remarks were made on the cover, the end papers, and the title-page, which were all extremely pretty. But the inside was mine, and when my publisher informed me that the volume had been sent to the Book Section of the Paris Exhibition, as an example of his "choicest publications," I determined that, come what might, I would visit Paris and see it. Just think! Somewhere in that mighty place, where sixty millions of souls were expected; somewhere, under a glass case, gazed at by a maximum of one hundred and twenty millions of eyes, was my book, my ewe lamb. It was thrilling.

I could only spare one day—going and returning by the night boat. I began foolishly, without studying map, or plan, or guide. Anglo-Saxon arrogance prompted me to cast myself at the doors, and find my way, by instinct and by questions, to the Book Section. It was raining as I entered the great gate at the Place de la Concorde, and, throwing an approving eye on the horticultural exhibits, sought shelter in the Palace of Fine Arts. I would see the pictures. Was not the whole day before me, in which to find my book? Two hours later I emerged from the pictures haunted by a French work, the size of the wall of a house, too horrible for description, where famished men and women were tearing at, and feeding upon, the dying bodies of other famished men and women. I looked around. The day was still young: to my right bubbled the Seine, palaces upon her banks: before me, white and wide, stretched the noble Pont Alexandre III., and beyond, bright even under a leaden sky, the stucco, pretentious palaces of Various Industries stretched like a bodyguard of stage soldiers towards the sombre dome that covers Napoleon's tomb. Across the Seine, around and beyond the Eiffel Tower, like a city seen from a train, clustered a heterogeneous mass of domes, spires, and minarets. And somewhere in this splendid confusion, in some cloistral corner, protected by a glass case, gazed at by a percentage of one hundred and twenty million eyes, was my book. I did not hurry towards it. Such a rare enterprise must be approached calmly. The fine perceptions of the infrequent author forbade me to show even to myself the eager vanity that I felt. So I crossed the river, and turned into the Street of Nations, where I roamed through the houses of Spain, Germany, and Austria, but not Great Britain, for on the door was posted this notice: "Closed in wet weather." Dear England!

Then I lunched, and later asked the way to the Book Section. It was near the Swiss Village, I was told, hard by the Chateau d'Eau. The Naval and Military Exhibits beguiled me for fifteen minutes; but, although I turned my face resolutely from Commercial Navigation, and Forests Hunting and Fishing, the Optical Palace beat me. I stayed there half-an-hour, and I also succumbed to Guatemala. In Civil Engineering I again asked my way, and, alas! was wrongly directed, for at four o'clock I found myself in the midst of Agriculture and Foods. Still three full hours remained, and, if I denied myself dinner, I could count upon four in which to find the Book Section. Again I asked my way, and was told to retrace my steps. At Andalusia in the Time of the Moors I met a countryman who informed me, in the tone of a man who tells you that it is fine for the time of the year, that he had passed through the Book Section an hour before. "Books are not much in my line," he said, adding wearily, "I guess I've seen all I want to see." He was now going out by the École Militaire gate, and as the Book Section was on the way (I am quoting him) he would very willingly show it to me. I accepted his offer gladly, but by some mischance I missed him in Mines and Metals, and never saw him again. It was now half-past five, and I began to grow a little anxious. I felt like a parent who, having promised to visit his little son at school, cannot find the town where it is situated. Somehow I had never lost faith that the Book Section was adjacent to the Swiss Village. I made that my aim. An assistant in the department where they were manufacturing Savon de Congo, to whom I applied, knew the village well: he had taken his grandfather there to see the imitation glaciers. I must cross the Champ de Mars, and go right through Means of Transport till I came to Corea; then straight on, leaving Chemical Industries on my left, till I came to Sweden. The Swiss Village was just beyond Sweden. He had not himself seen the Book Section, but no doubt the information I had already gathered on that point was correct. It was not likely, he said, with a sympathetic smile, that the Paris Exhibition would be without a Book Section. An assistant from the Electricity for Cooking Purposes stall, who had stood by during the discussion, concurred.

It is a salutary exercise to look back upon a critical period, and try to fix the moment when success or failure trembled in the balance. When I recall that day whereon I failed to find my little book, a failure which robbed me of what would certainly have been one of the most pleasurable incidents of my life, I reflect, I assert, that the success or failure of the enterprise quivered in the balance at the moment that I left the Savon de Congo stall. Still I do not wholly blame myself. It was by sheer ill-luck that ten minutes later I lost my way in the department devoted to Drain Pipes. Even then the day might have been won had I been firm enough to cut across the Champ de Mars, and make for Corea, as the Savon de Congo assistant had suggested. But I was beguiled—you must remember I was very tired—by one of those delightful moving staircases. You step on to a piece of cocoanut matting, and are carried easily and gracefully—somewhere—you do not know whither, but you are very conscious that it is without effort on your part. I was carried into a high gallery and gently landed into a section devoted to the Limbs of Man in wax, on which were indicated, with unflinching realism, the various wounds that peace and war inflict upon the body. Accompanying each wound was a model in wax of the surgeon's hands showing the method of first aid to the injured. That section was my Tugela. I stayed there half an hour, and for another quarter of an hour my wanton eyes feasted themselves on a series of exquisite bathrooms. From this contemplation I was aroused to the sense of my folly by the sound of shouting. Hastening downstairs, every fibre of my being strained at last to the accomplishment of the enterprise which had called me to the Exhibition, I made my way by Shetland Wool, through an audience who were watching a troop of Spanish dancers, and so out into the Champ de Mars. What was this? The whole enormous place was filled with a dense crowd of shouting, excited people. Bands were playing, flags were waving, and down the centre marched a great procession of triumphal cars on which nymphs shivered. Following came arbours of vine leaves, and capering figures of rotound men, with jolly red faces, accompanied by fair Bacchantes from the second row of the ballet. It was the fête of the Vine Industry. In a glance I saw all that it meant to me. Till the procession had passed and returned it was impossible to cross the Champ de Mars, and across the Champ de Mars was the Swiss Village and—and the Book Section. I tried. I pushed here, I wheedled there. I doubled in my tracks, only to be stopped by a cordon of police. The procession gathered volume, more bands played, the crowd increased, surrounded me. I could not move backwards or forwards. I could have cried. Not till seven o'clock was the way clear. That left me a bare two hours to return to my hotel, pack, have dinner, and catch the nine o'clock train. I determined to forego my dinner and make one more attempt. I crossed the Champ de Mars, ran like a hare through Agriculture and Foods, and saw, and saw, in the distance something that must have been intended to represent a mountain, and nearer at hand, a little to the right, tall glass cases that looked as if they contained books. They were being covered with brown holland wrappers. I ran towards them. An official raised his hand. "Monsieur is too late," he said.

I caught the train at the Gare du Nord with five minutes to spare. A talkative countryman sat opposite. He tried me on several topics, but failed in all. As we were leaving Amiens he spoke again: "I suppose the Exhibition is very fine? I haven't seen it myself. I only passed through Paris." Then, observing that I carried a copy of the Review of Reviews, and no doubt thereby inferring that I was a bookish person, he said: "I'm told there's a very fine collection of books there."

Correspondence.

Criticism in Verse.

SIR,—I was rather surprised to find that in your most interesting article, "Criticism in Verse," in this week's ACADEMY, all mention of Mrs. Browning's poetic judgments was omitted. Surely no better reviewing was ever done either in prose or verse than is contained in the four lines from "Cowper's Grave":

- O poets, from a maniac's tongue was poured the deathless singing!
- O Christians, at your cross of hope a hopeless hand was clinging!
- O men, this man in brotherhood your weary paths beguiling.
- Groomed indly while he taught you peace, and died while ye were smiling!

And I think, too, that Elizabeth Barrett's "Pomegranate" reference to her future husband, in "Lady Geraldine's Courtship," was "warm and veracious" criticism.

What an interesting article might be written on the "Great Epitaphs"! Some of them might, perhaps, be considered too laudatory to pass as penetrating literary criticism, but many—such as Cowper's on Dr. Johnson—were undeniably voicing the verdict of posterity.—I am, &c. H. G. H.

October 22, 1900.

The "Young Men" and Thackeray.

SIR.—In your issue of October 20 "The Bookworm" writes: "What do the young men think of Thackeray?" and, conscious of the inevitable immaturity of their reflections or criticism, blandly adds: "To be sure, it does not matter, but one's curiosity is mildly stimulated." &c.

Now, sir, I contend that this statement evinces an amazing disregard for the true interests of literature and has the smack of an après moi le déluge. Whence are the readers of Thackeray to foregather in the future if they are not numbered among the "young men" of the present day? "The Bookworm," very mindful of the limitations of youth, forgetful apparently of its striving, has, I think, confessed here, not to a serious regard for the fate and future of our nineteenth century literature, but to a "mild curiosity" concerning it that is provocative of just resentment. For the matter, surely, does not end with Thackeray. I take it that if a "young man" can so much as read Thackeray with delight, he is more than half-way on the road to all that is best in modern English literature. Strange as the hypothesis must appear to "The Bookworm," there yet may be two or three gathered together in the name and reality of literature: there may, indeed, be many "young men" who are not sworn to Henty, Hope, and Haggard.

Perhaps it is very wrongful on my part to thrust Mr. Anthony Hope between the upper and nether millstones of juvenile adventure and sensational improbabilities, for even to our dull eyes his pages are luminous with a deft polish; but the very fact that he bears in the minds of some of us an affinity to les autres more than alliterative is significant of what we think of Thackeray. What do we think of Thackeray? To be sure, it does not matter, except, haply, to ourselves, yet it may satisfy the mild curiosity of "The Bookworm" to know that with wholehearted admiration we think of him as the writer of the finest historical novel in the language, Henry Esmond; as the inimitable showman of Vanity Fair; as the artist who has the portrait of Colonel Newcome to his credit; and, finally, we revere him as introducing to us men and women who we feel will prove our lifelong friends.—I am, &c.,

CECIL F. SILVER.

Abbot's Walk, The Forbury, Reading.

Browniana.

SIR,—To one who sat under and revered "Toby" Brown in old Clifton days it seems strange to have arrived at the time when papers and magazines are full of his name and fame—fame which one always knew must surely come to him sooner or later. He was a great man. He was an inimitable man. He was a glory of Clifton, and no other public school is likely to boast a similar character. He had a wonderful vocabulary for verbally flaying delinquent pupils, and I would I could recollect all the marvellous epithets he hurled at their heads. We feared but revelled in him; and how he would make the form laugh by breaking into a bit of character-acting or by finding some apt comparison for an offending victim!

There used to be at one time a small knot of boys who invariably "passed" the question. "Ah!" said Brown one day, "here we come to the yellow bullocks among the mangold wurzels. There they sit all the day long and chew and chew, and ye can't get anything out of them!"

A few of his remarks I have preserved, but one requires to have known the speaker to fully appreciate them:

"It is like talking to an old rag doll: one can almost see the sawdust oozing out."

Of certain boys whispering: "The murmur of ancient dames."

"It is a perfect bog down here. Immediately you get off if you feel yourself in contact with an intellect instead of with a slimy patch of bog. I feel the boozy, nasty, piggy slime."

"We must consider L—, C—, and A— to be the Gadarene demons: directly you tackle them a demon comes out."

"A lot of stupid old women, and F— is the supreme old granny of the lot: he goes off into an ecstasy of idiocy. And I don't like old women, they seem to be such stuffy old things."

"We must consider him a large vegetable marrow, and leave him to trail on walls with the snails and slugs."

The school had re-assembled after the holidays, and the first day during form-hour strange noises were audible outside. Of course we all knew that they came from the neighbouring Zoo, but Brown must needs send one of the Sixth to discover the source. Naturally he re-appeared saying he could find nothing. "Very well," said Brown. "I was only afraid it was some unfortunate boy shut up all the holidays in the hot-water pipes!"

With such a master in the chair, with his fund of ready humour and extraordinary wealth of language, our school hours were anything but dull, and those who sat under him are never likely to forget him.—I am, &c.,

The Croft, Seal, Sevenoaks. E. J. ENTHOVEN.

Lowell as an Actor.

SIR,—Mr. Stillman's letter in your issue of October 13 reminds me that in my copy of the first edition of The Biglow Papers Cambridge, 1848 a former owner of the book has inserted a MS. playbill of a theatrical performance which came off during Lowell's residence in Italy in 1851-2. Very little seems to have been recorded concerning this visit. If I remember rightly, only one epistle in verse, addressed from Rome, will be found in his "Letters"; and Mr. Edward Everett Hale, in his interesting book on Lowell and His Friends, does not even mention it. It was a happy period of Lowell's life, passed, chiefly in the society of his friend Story, before the great shadow had fallen on him. The right upper corner of the playbill is, unfortunately, torn, and the name of the palazzo is indistinct, but I think I have deciphered it correctly.—I am, &c.,

W. F. PRIDEAUX.

THEATRICAL.—PALAZZO CINO.

February 20, 1852.

A Selection from

THE MIDSUMMER NIGHT'S DREAM

in five acts.

with overture and incidental music by Mendelssohn.

THESEUS	Mr. Hemans.
PHILOSTRATE Haylar.
BOTTOM J. R. Lowell.
QUIN Black.
FLUTE Crawford.
SNOUT S. Wood.
SNUG Story.
HIPPOLYTA	Mrs. Crawford.
OBERON	Miss Loring.
TITANIA	Mrs. Story.
PUCK	Miss Wodehouse.

Peasblossom, Cobweb, Moth, Mustardseed.

In Act 2nd chorus, "Ye Spotted Snakes," composed by Francis Boott, Esq.

The wood scene in Act 2nd by Douglas Harvey, Esq.

Hendiadys.

SIR,—I note on page 209 of the ACADEMY for October 13 reference to the passage in Mr. Knight's novel, A Son of Austerity: "At the border of the clayfield was a hearse and a single carriage." Surely as one of the objects is to be regarded as "single," or distinct from the other, and as, moreover, in the following sentence, the vehicles are referred to as "two carriages," the sentence cannot be put in the same category as the excellent example of hendiadys quoted from Mr. Kipling's The Recessional.

I observe that a writer in the Daily Express, possibly following in the wake of Mr. Knight, treats us to the following sentence: "There is on order countless grande vicesse luggage vans, brake vans, goods wagons of every kind, and 'armour-clad' gunpowder vehicles." May we rightfully regard this also as an instance of hendiadys?

In the same issue another hendiadys appears somewhat less apparent in the statement: "This irregularity of hours leaves but little time for study, on which depends our future prospects of success."—I am, &c.,

NEVILLE JONES.

Craps.

SIR,—In a recent ACADEMY there was a quotation from "Mr. Dooley" on the negro question, in which the word "craps" played a very important part. My husband and I have done our best to find out its meaning, but without success. Will you kindly enlighten us, and, perhaps, some other of your readers?—I am, &c.,

Mrs. C. BOULNOIS.

Apple Blossom in Brittany.

SIR,—The above is the title of one of the most charming stories from the mind of the late Ernest Dowson. It appeared in the third volume of The Yellow Book, a series that may be sought after as much in the future as The Germ is in the present time. Oddly enough, three strange young men have already passed away who were among its contributors—Ernest Dowson, Hubert Crackanthorpe, and Aubrey Beardsley. Anyone turning to page 93 of the "third" Yellow for the first or second time will find this "Apple Blossom in Brittany" full of a quiet and growing charm, and in laying down the volume will likely be reminded more of Walter Pater than anyone. It was written in 1894, in his twenty-seventh year.—I am, &c.,

T. EDWARDS-JONES.

The Author of "The Coming Democracy."

SIR,—Might I draw your attention to the omission of the name of Mr. George Harwood from your list of newly-elected Members of Parliament who have some connexion with literature? The name of Mr. George Harwood is already favourably known to a select circle of readers as the author of Disestablishment: or, a Defence of the Principle of a National Church, From Within, and The Coming Democracy, all published by Macmillans.

The late Lord Randolph Churchill often referred to the help which he got from reading Harwood's Coming Democracy.—I am, &c.,

LEVI NUTTER.

"Only a Little One."

SIR,—You say: "Mr. Cobb is in danger of admittance to the 'prolific set.' He published a book a fortnight ago."

While pleading guilty, I should like to urge in extenuation that The Bountiful Lady was "only a little one" for little people . . . a Dumpy Book, in fact. My last novel, Scruples, was published as long ago as March.—I am, &c.,

THOMAS COBB.

Vowel Sounds.

SIR,—Mr. A. H. Keane is singularly indulgent to the phonetic failings of his countrymen, whose cruelty to vowel sounds often excites the compassion of pundits of other races. Can Mr. Keane have forgotten the English pronunciation of Allahabad—four flat English a's in place of Illāhābād?

Again, is the French “a-t-il” the true analogy to the English abuse of r? Is not the best French counterpart the euphonic z? How about the “J'ai z' un coquin de frère” of the old song? That exactly fills the hiatus similarly supplied by our colloquial r—an usage for which there is more to be said than Mr. MacRitchie's purism would willingly allow. He cannot have forgotten that the golden youth of the Directoire adopted “ce z si commode, si liant, si séduisant, qui faisait tout le charme du langage de l'ancien Arlequin.”—I am, &c.,

I. C. S.

Dr. Pusey's Life.

SIR,—In the review of Dr. Pusey's Life in this week's ACADEMY the author of the book is spoken of as “he.” I believe it to be quite an open secret that Miss Trench, daughter of the late Archbishop Trench, is really the authoress.—I am, &c.,

G. WEEKLEY.

Our Weekly Competition.

Result of No. 57 (New Series).

LAST week we quoted the following poem from the Westminster Gazette:

A WOMAN TO A MAN.

When you grieve, and let it show,
And may tell me nothing more,
You have told me, o'er and o'er,
All a woman needs to know.
When I show you that I care
(Meet your eyes and touch your hand),
I have made you understand
All a woman may, or dare.
So, the ears of Friendship heard!
So, 'twas seen of Friendship's eyes!
You are sad, I sympathise,
All without a single word.

We offered a prize of One Guinea for the best poetical answer to the above. The competition has elicited much careful effort. On the whole, the prize is due, and is awarded, to Miss Mary Innes, la, Promenade-terrace, Cheltenham, for the following:

A MAN TO A WOMAN.

You can thrive on touch or sign,
You can lightly feed on air;
But you cannot know nor care
How your heart has troubled mine.
When you lay your shrinking hand
So discreetly in my own,
Men, you think, are hewn in stone,
And should mutely understand,
Silent speech of meeting eyes
Moves me deeper than you know;
Where the fire of love's aglow
Your pale dream of friendship dies.

Other poems are:

True—Convention has decreed
(Nay—'tis writ in Woman's heart)
She must play a passive part
Till her swain begins to plead—
Must be wooed before she's won;
Now that I have spoken sweet,
You may cease to be discreet,
For, Dan Cupid's task is done.
Now, Love's silent lore, I wis,
All the language of your eyes
May be spoken lover-wise,
And translated in a kiss?

[F. B. D., Torquay.]

When you deem I grieve, and so
Make advances void of shame,
Can I really be to blame
If I wish you'd kindly go.
When you show me that you care,
Roll your eyes, and press my hand,
You have made me understand
Sympathy is but a snare.
Spite your sentiment absurd
Still one privilege I prize
Though you e'en must sympathise
'Tis without a single word.

[F. W. S., London.]

When I grieve and let it show,
And I tell you nothing more;
In your heart's confessing core,
Know you all you wish to know?
When I prove I trust your care,
Seek your eyes and press your hand,
Do you ever understand
All a man would ask, nor dare?
So, have ears, Love, silent, heard?
So, Love seen, with inward eyes?
Can you feel and recognise
All, nor say a single word?

[E. E., Hornsey.]

Though I may not tell my woe,
Though you may not speak a word,
Still it seems that I have heard
All a man has need to know.
When the melting in your eyes
Shows your kindly woman heart,
Sorrow then must needs depart,
All because you sympathise.
Seems the burden less to bear,
Seems the sky a fairer blue,
This dull world a brighter hue,
All because I know you care.

[E. W. H., Manchester.]

When the world is wondrous bright,
And the sweet birds sing their songs,
I know now to whom belongs
The praises for the precious light.
And when sudden shadows fall,
And the night, with hideous face,
Grimly grins on my disgrace,
I know now who comforts all.
You it is who sing the songs,
You it is who charm the night,
You turn darkness into light,
And to you the praise belongs.

[L. F., Manchester.]

More a man may dare or say
Than a woman, well I wot;
This is her assigned lot,
He must challenge—yea or nay!
True, the grief I scorn to show
To my fellows in the street,
Is revealed, when thee I meet,
By a wistful glance of woe.
Friendship? Ay, and far above;
Silence were a coward's part
To this man who reads thy heart—
Tell me, dearest, is this Love?

[R. F. McC., Whitby.]

Competition No. 58 (New Series).

IN consequence of the multitude of new novels, we shall issue next week a special Fiction Supplement. In this connexion we ask our readers to compile a list of the twelve best novels published this year up to October 27. To the competitor whose list most nearly agrees with the general opinion, as ascertained by an examination of all the lists, we will send a cheque for One Guinea.

RULES.

Answers, addressed “Literary Competition, THE ACADEMY, 43, Chancery-lane, W.C.,” must reach us not later than the first post of Wednesday, October 31. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found on the second page of Wrapper, or it cannot enter into competition. Competitors sending more than one attempt at solution must accompany each attempt with a separate coupon; otherwise the first only will be considered. We cannot consider anonymous answers.

The Academy

A Weekly Review of Literature and Life.

No. 1487. Established 1869.

3 November, 1900.

Price Threepence.

[Registered as a Newspaper.]

The Literary Week.

WE feel that we owe an apology to our readers for the preponderance of reviews of novels and articles relating to fiction in this issue. It is our first special attempt to grapple with the enormous number of new novels that harry us without cessation through the year. We receive, on an average, twenty a week in the season, and the production increases every year. The inference is that a vast number of people read novels and nothing else. That is not an encouraging thought; but, while regretting it, we think it only fair occasionally to devote a considerable portion of our space to the most prolific, and certainly the most remunerative, department of modern book production.

To London at large, at least we hope so, the last evening of October was significant, being the eve of the Borough Elections. The little world of literary folk put by, for a few hours, the thought of the elections to consider an event that had no parallel in their experience. That was the production of a new tragedy—"Herod"—by a poet—Mr. Stephen Phillips—with all the lavish accessories, historic and scenic aids, that the brain of a distinguished actor-manager—Mr. Tree—could devise. It was said once on a time: "All I need is four boards and a passion." What would the teeming-brained, full-bodied, nimble-witted Elizabethans have thought, could they have sat in the pit last Wednesday night and seen the splendour of the palace of Herod at Jerusalem, with the shifting, perfectly-drilled crowds, the gorgeous dresses, the landscape, with the palace, lightening and darkening with the changes of the Eastern day; the episodes, so slight yet meaning so much, that recreated the life of Jerusalem thirty years before the birth of Christ—seen the splendid pagan figure of Herod, such garments, such a make-up, swearing to recreate the cold flesh of Mariamne into the living woman again. What would they have thought could they have seen their thoughts encircled in such a setting.

"HEROD" is to be published soon, when we shall criticise, at leisure, its literary quality. Here we can say that Mr. Stephen Phillips has shown himself to be an adept in construction; shown, too, a dramatic instinct rare indeed in conjunction with the poet's thought. Through the three acts the interest of the play never flagged, and two of the "curtains" are remarkable—that at the end of the second act when Herod, not knowing that Mariamne is lying dead within, advances up the steps to the open door of her house, shouting to her to share his triumph in the honours that Caesar has just showered upon him; and that awful scene at the close when Herod stands, not hearing the roll-call of further honour that Caesar has conferred upon him, for he is rigid, like a figure of bronze, the distracted brain at rest, brain and body caught and bound in a cataleptic trance. So he stands, pitiful, but still a king, in the midst of his court. And on that picture the curtain falls.

It is a good play—a good brisk, acting play—sufficiently faithful to history to be credible, touched here and there—and those touches thrill—with the portent of the event that thirty years later was to dominate the world. Other plays, other dramas have been equally as good in construction and interest, but the significance of Wednesday evening, the note of the play, was that through the episodes of the tragedy, the kaleidoscope of the pageant, the dancing and the music, there fell on the ear lines and passages of meaning and of beauty—in a word, poetry came soothingly across the foot-lights. And what a relief it was to sit in a modern theatre and hear things said that the mind wanted to remember. May the literary drama prosper! May other managers follow Mr. Tree's brave example!

LORD ROSEBERY, in his book on Napoleon, speaks more than once of his hero's admiration of Richardson's Clarissa Harlowe. This reminds us of Hazlitt's quaint reason, printed in a footnote to one of his "Table Talk Essays" in the London Magazine for 1821 (a year in which it needed a bold man to admire Napoleon—in print). "During the peace of Amiens," Hazlitt wrote, "a young English officer, of the name of Lovelace, was presented at Buonaparte's levée. Instead of the usual question, 'Where have you served, sir?' the First Consul immediately addressed him, 'I perceive your name, sir, is the same as that of the hero of Richardson's romance!' Here was a Consul. The young man's uncle, who was called Lovelace, told me this anecdote while we were stopping together at Calais. I had also been thinking that his was the same name as that of the hero of Richardson's romance. This is one of my reasons for liking Buonaparte."

SIR THEODORE MARTIN has replied to Miss Corelli in the Morning Post. His letter is not very effective, for it is mainly directed against Miss Corelli's detailed statements, not against her real position. Miss Corelli may be wrong in saying that the inhabitants of Stratford resent the placing of the Helen Faucit monument in the chancel of Stratford-on-Avon Church. Sir Theodore Martin says he ascertained their feelings, which were "favourable." It doesn't matter a jot; this is a national matter, and the nation is not "favourable." The vicar, too, seems to have encouraged Sir Theodore's scheme; not "resisted it to the utmost of his power." Again it does not matter. Vicars do these things. Miss Corelli seems to have neglected an opportunity to speak privately to Sir Theodore Martin on the subject, and to have concealed her warlike intentions under effusive expressions of respect. This, again, matters to Sir Theodore Martin, but to no one else.

THERE remains the fact that a large monument is about to be placed in the Shakespeare chancel. As a proposal, and as a precedent, this is objectionable. Miss Corelli telegraphs to us from Stratford-on-Avon as follows:

Will you kindly point out that the size of space required by Sir Theodore Martin for the effigy of his wife is seven feet high by three feet wide, an absolutely monstrous measurement. If put up will destroy whole view of chancel, and extinguish the Shakespeare monument, besides necessitating the mutilating of two old brasses.

Miss Corelli's statement is rather strong; but her case is stronger.

THE Love Letters of Victor Hugo (1820-1822) have been promised for some time, and now a first instalment appears in Harper's Magazine. They are out-and-out love letters: they are about nothing but love. From a child Victor Hugo had loved Adèle Foucher. He tells us:

I see myself again, a child in years, a merry schoolboy, playing, running, shouting, laughing, with my brothers in the long green alley in the wild garden of that home in which I passed my early life. We dwelt in the old Nunnery which lifts its head over the dark dome of Val de Grâce.

Even when they confessed their love they were still children. M. Paul Mourice, who edits the Letters, relates the story charmingly:

Adèle, bolder and more curious than Victor (being a girl), wanted to find out what was the meaning of all his silent admiration. She said: "I am sure you have secrets. Have you not one secret, greater than all?" Victor acknowledged that he had secrets, and that one of them was greater than all the rest. "Just like me!" cried Adèle. "Well, come now, tell me your greatest secret, and I will tell you mine!"

"My great secret," Victor replied, "is that I love you."

"And my great secret is that I love you," said Adèle, like an echo.

The course of true love ran no smoother with these than with others. Their troubles were from within and without, as this passage shows:

You accuse me vaguely of certain things. You say I seem embarrassed when I am with you. It is true. I am so, but it is because I would so gladly be always alone with you, and am annoyed by the inquisitive glances of people around me. You add that "I seem to feel ennui when with you." If you think me a liar it would be useless to tell you over again that my only happy moments are those that I am able to spend with you.

And yet, my Adèle, in connexion with these ideas, it may be right to tell you that the time may be at hand when I shall have to give up this last and only pleasure. Your parents look upon me with dislike, and assuredly they have good reason to complain of me. I acknowledge the wrongs I have committed against them, or, rather, the one wrong I have done them, for there is only one, and that is, I have loved you. You must feel that I cannot continue to visit in a house whose master and mistress do not like to see me. I write you this with tears falling from my eyes, and I blush like a conceited fool as I am.

Whatever may happen, accept my inviolable promise to have no other wife but you, and to become your husband as soon as it may be in my power. Burn all my other letters, but keep this one.

A hard father had to be placated, and Hugo hurled his genius against the obstacle, extorting admiration before he won consent: indeed, Hugo was fain to find satisfaction in signing his letters to Adèle "Your Faithful Husband" long before the title became his in reality.

A VERY scurvy trick seems to have been played on the proprietor of a new boys' paper called Boys of the Empire, of which the first number lies before us. The proprietor, Mr. Andrew Melrose, registered the paper last April. Since then an elaborate and costly scheme of correspondence and advertisement and a great deal of money have been brought to the enterprise. A month ago, a half-penny paper, bearing the same title, was rushed out by another firm, and succeeded in gaining a large circulation owing to Mr. Melrose's advertising. As the law stands at present, he has no redress, and we therefore have pleasure in making the distinction between the papers known by emphasising the fact that Mr. Melrose's paper is a penny weekly, and has a green cover. The contents strike us as thoroughly wholesome, discreetly blending sensation with useful matter.

UNDER the heading "The Shrinking of the World" the New York Saturday Review discusses the effect on literature of the shrinkage of the world caused by the rapidity of communication and the exploration and occupation of almost every new land under the sun. The subject is an interesting one, and it might be useful to show by instances how closely literature has followed the axe and the plow during recent years. It is a curious reflection that in the Elizabethan age the opening up of new lands and seas brought an exultant sense of the world's bigness; in the Victorian age the same cause produces an opposite effect on the mind.

THERE is a good deal to be said for a criticism on the Dictionary of National Biography which Mr. Havelock Ellis makes in the November Argosy. While warmly praising the great work, he complains that descriptions of the personal appearance of notable men are much to seek, and that in 50 per cent. of the biographies of the most eminent men such descriptions are not to be found at all. The scientific value and general interest of such particulars are great. Is there not a story of Thackeray anxiously seeking in an American library a book which would tell him what kind of breeches George Washington wore?

THE international edition of Hans Andersen's Fairy Tales is before us. Mr. Heinemann has done handsomely by it, and we rejoice to see that the pictures by Hans Tegner are all brilliant wood engravings, full of that thoroughness of human skill which children appreciate without knowing it. We said children, but the edition is for us all; and it is for the grown-ups that Mr. Gosse discourses of Andersen in his Introduction. The striking thing in his relation is that these tales, which have showered happiness into a million nurseries, were shrugged at by their author. He thought that his five-act dramas and his novels were his real work, and that by them he would live. Yet even Mr. Gosse has not read Andersen's novel, The Two Baronesses. Another interesting thing is that the Tales were not only accounted small beer by their author, but the Danish public—an entity realised only by Mr. Gosse—were shocked, scandalised by these smaatting. Until they appeared Danish literature had always behaved itself with propriety; it had used a literary diction, and said fine things in a fine way. Never had it permitted children or uneducated people to talk at the Muses' table: the naïvetés of the vulgar had never been quoted. "Conceive," says Mr. Gosse, in illustrative excuse for this stupidity, "what Johnson and Burke would have thought of Alice's Adventures in Wonderland, and you have a parallel to the effect of 'Little Claus and Big Claus' upon academic Denmark." And then Mr. Gosse waxes critical and classificatory, expounding the difference between "The Tinder Box" and "Little Ida's Flowers," and telling us why children like Andersen's stories.

A VERY creditable Catalogue of Books on the Fine Arts—creditable to the Librarian and the Free Library—comes from Newcastle-on-Tyne. It is compiled by Mr. T. A. Onions, B.A. If the hundreds of books—classified on the Dewey Decimal System—which it mentions are studied as they should be by the men and women of Newcastle, we have no doubt that the public taste will soon compel the removal of the monster statues of Lords Stowell and Eldon which disfigure the porch of the Newcastle Free Library and intimidate visitors from London. If so, Mr. Onions will not have laboured in vain. But, seriously, the catalogue is excellent, and one need not be a Novocastrian to covet it.

THERE is an interesting article on "The Real 'Diana of the Crossways'" in the November Temple Bar. We say interesting, but we doubt whether the writer was well advised in retelling the squalid story of Mrs. Norton's wrongs, even when that story is set off by the picture of her own worth, beauty, and wit. The salient paragraph in the article is this:

The parallel between the two lives [Diana's and Mrs. Norton's] is unmistakable, but the necessity for that preliminary caution to read Diana of the Crossways as fiction is equally apparent. The novelist adapts, and whatever does not suit his purpose is rejected. There is, however, one point on which the reader should be put beyond any risk of misconception. The plot, if plot it can be called, of Mr. Meredith's brilliant and fascinating story hinges upon Diana's betrayal of the Cabinet secret confided to her by her young statesman lover. This appears to be a gratuitous blot on the character of the heroine of the book which most readers will feel that no tears of pity can ever wash out. It is founded on a story that Mrs. Norton betrayed to Barnes, editor of the Times, the secret, confided to her by Sidney Herbert, one of her ardent admirers, that Sir Robert Peel and his Cabinet had resolved upon a repeal of the Corn Laws. The secret certainly did leak out, and caused a serious Government crisis; but the story that Mrs. Norton was the culprit appears to have no foundation whatever.

We confess that this reasoning puzzles us. We are to read Mr. Meredith's novel as fiction, and yet we are to be shocked because in one particular it is not fact.

THERE are some pleasing reminiscences of literary men in Sir Wemyss Reid's article on "London After Forty Years," in the Anglo-Saxon Review. Sitting in Hyde Park on a sunny August morning Sir Wemyss Reid says:

As I sit here this morning I see once more the tall, manly figure of Thackeray, as he walks with rapid step along the path by the Row, homeward-bound to his new house in Kensington. The West End of forty years ago belonged to him in a peculiar sense; and it is a joy, not to be easily parted with, to know that I have seen him treading its streets. And in Kensington Gardens I caught my last glimpse of Charles Dickens as a living man. It was only a week or two before his death, and he was strolling down one of the paths under the trees; his companion was a girl of tender years and manifestly humble circumstances, to whom the Master was talking with that animation of mood and manner which never failed him to the last. There is a seat here in Hyde Park that is always associated in my mind with the great name of Carlyle: for more than once I have seen the author of Sartor Resartus resting upon it, with sombre face and downcast eye, while the faithful William Allingham, like some silent watch-dog, sat humbly at the other end of the bench, awaiting the great man's pleasure and keeping off all intruders.

WHILE Sir Wemyss Reid is recalling the men and things of forty years ago, Sir George M. Smith writes very delightfully on "The Early Forties" in the Cornhill. He takes us back to the time when the business of Smith, Elder & Co. was carried on at 65, Cornhill, and when its publishing operations were not only secondary, but were for years indifferently managed. At twenty he was entrusted with the management of this publishing branch, and allowed a capital of £1,500, which he was to use according to his own discretion. His first transactions were with "Orion" Horne, whose New Spirit of the Age, in two volumes, he accepted and published with infinite solicitude. Afterwards Horne—one of the most eccentric half-geniuses who ever wrote—offered him an extraordinary novel written to sustain the proposition, which was so ridiculed by Dr. Johnson, that every man and every woman had a natural affinity for some other man or woman. Horne's treatment of the theme was rather coarse, and in other ways "impossible."

SIR GEORGE SMITH's stories of Leigh Hunt, with whom he soon entered into extensive business operations, are amusing. On one occasion he paid Hunt £200 in bank-notes:

Two days afterwards Leigh Hunt came in a state of great agitation to tell me that his wife had burned them. He had thrown the envelope with the bank-notes carelessly down, and his wife had flung it into the fire. Leigh Hunt's agitation while on his way to bring this news had not prevented him from purchasing on the road a little statuette of Psyche, which he carried, without any paper round it, in his hand. I told him I thought something might be done in the matter. I sent to the bankers and got the numbers of the notes, and then in company with Leigh Hunt went off to the Bank of England. I explained our business, and we were shown into a room where three old gentlemen were sitting at tables. They kept us waiting some time, and Leigh Hunt, who had meantime been staring all round the room, at last got up, walked up to one of the staid officials, and addressing him said, in wondering tones: "And this is the Bank of England! And do you sit here all day, and never see the green woods and the trees and flowers and the charming country?" Then in tones of remonstrance he demanded: "Are you contented with such a life?" All this time he was holding the little naked Psyche in one hand, and with his long hair and flashing eyes made a surprising figure. I fancy I can still see the astonished faces of the three officials: they would have made a most delightful picture. I said: "Come away, Mr. Hunt, these gentlemen are very busy." I succeeded in carrying Leigh Hunt off, and, after entering into certain formalities, we were told that the value of the notes would be paid in twelve months. I gave Leigh Hunt the money at once, and he went away rejoicing.

Two unpublished epitaphs by Sydney Smith were given in last week's Pilot, to which paper they are contributed by Lord Halifax. The first is on Pitt, and was written at some time in the 'thirties when a statue of that statesman was placed in Hanover-square:

To the Right Honourable William Pitt
Whose errors in foreign policy
And lavish expenditure of our Resources at home
Have laid the foundation of National Bankruptcy
And scattered the seeds of Revolution
This Monument was erected
(amid few only of the wise and good)
By many weak men, who mistook his eloquence for wisdom
And his insolence for magnanimity,
By many unworthy men whom he had ennobled
And by many base men, whom he had enriched at the Public expense
But to Englishmen
This Statue raised from such motives
Has not been erected in vain
They learn from it those dreadful abuses
Which exist under the mockery
Of a free Representation
And feel the deep necessity
Of a great and efficient Reform.

These lines amused Lady Georgiana Grey, who one evening repeated them to their author. She was then thirty-two or thirty-three years of age. Next morning she received a copy of the epitaph written out by Sydney Smith, and below it an epitaph on herself which ran as follows:

To Lady Georgiana Grey, aged 92,
This monument was erected.
She was remarkable among many other qualities
For that tenacious memory
With which she recollected
The compositions of her friends.
But in the course of a long life
She could not have remembered
Anything so agreeable and interesting
As her friends will remember of her.

Sydney Smith's allowance of ninety-two years to Lady Georgiana has proved insufficient. As Lord Halifax points out, she died on September 13 last, in her hundredth year.

A CONSERVE of M.A.P. in red and gold is In the Days of My Youth (Pearson). Mr. T. P. O'Connor personally shepherds his blithe crew of successful men and women, each of whom undertakes to tell us of his or her rise in life. There are actors and actresses (these are given the first place), musicians, authors, artists, politicians, and "general" people like Mr. Maskelyne. As a museum of suavities and pseudo-confidences the book is mighty pretty reading. Mr. F. Frankfort Moore, we are pleased to know, is making lots of money out of his novels. Enough to "purchase a waterproof in view of the inevitable rainy day—not one of the heavy, substantial ones, to be sure, but still one that will make my household independent of that literary umbrella, the Royal Literary Fund." And he concludes, with a thump on his thigh: "The author who sneers at the literary agent is a fool; the publisher who sneers at the literary agent is —; but now no publisher sneers at anyone—no, not even at an author." Goodness, no! Madame Grand thinks the lesson of the literary life is to ignore the critics, and "express ourselves." Charming!

SLEEP hovers on our eyelids whenever we read a sentence after this pattern:

When we survey the really illimitable field of human knowledge, the vast accumulation of works already printed, and the ever-increasing flood of new books poured out by the modern press, the first feeling which is apt to arise in the mind is one of dismay, if not of despair.

This is the first sentence of A Book for All Readers, Designed as an Aid to the Collection, Use, and Preservation of Books and the Formation of Public and Private Libraries, by Ainsworth Rand Spofford (Putnam's Sons). Mr. Spofford discourses quite usefully about Book-buying, the Enemies of Books, the Art of Reading, the Qualifications of Librarians, Catalogues, &c., &c. We have no doubt that his work will serve some excellent purpose.

Bibliographical.

THE statement that Sir Lewis Morris's new volume of verse may possibly be his last will affect different people in different ways. There are those to whom Sir Lewis is antipathetic; the number of his admirers seems to have decreased somewhat largely since the days of the Epic of Hades, in which, you remember, the final judgment was that it was "a Hades of an Epic." Last year a Selection from the Poems for the use of schools was published. In 1898 there had been an edition of the Works; in 1897 a Selection from them, for general consumption; in 1897, also, Sir Lewis's Ode on the Diamond Jubilee; in 1896 a volume of Idylls and Lyrics, as well as an edition of the Works, in eight volumes; in 1891 Songs without Notes (as if that were possible); in 1893 the Marriage Ode on the Duke and Duchess of York; in 1891 a new edition of the Epic; in 1890, The Vision of Saints, Fidelibus; and so forth. Sir Lewis's Songs of Britain date back to 1887; republished now, they might fit in with the patriotic fever. In 1886 came Gycia, a tragedy in five acts. But I will not pursue the subject further.

Dr. A. W. Ward's election to the Mastership of Peterhouse, Cambridge, must have been peculiarly gratifying to him, for of that college he was once a student, and afterwards a fellow (1861), assistant lecturer, and honorary fellow (1891). To lovers of literature he is interesting as an editor of Pope's Poetical Works (1869), as the author of monographs on Chaucer and Dickens (1880 and 1882), in the "English Men of Letters" series, as the editor of specimens of the Old English Drama (Marlowe, Greene, &c., 1897), as the editor of the Poems of John Byrom (1894-5), and as the writer of a monograph on Sir Henry Wotton (1897). Last year he published a new and revised edition of his History of English Dramatic Literature to the Death of Queen Anne, which is crammed full of learning, but not so conspicuous for value as criticism. Perhaps no one man ought to take up a subject so very considerable in extent.

The edition of Crashaw's English Poems just issued by Mr. J. R. Tutin, of Great Fencote, Yorks., consists of two volumes, bound in one. Of these, the second, Carmen des Nostro, was originally brought out by Mr. Tutin some time ago, through the agency of Messrs. W. Andrews & Co. The first part of the present publication includes The Delights of the Muses, and Steps to the Temple, and I mention it here because I find that the editorial introduction embraces what is virtually a bibliography of Crashaw, though Mr. Tutin modestly describes it as a "Guide to the Study" of the poet. The "Guide" has some excellent features, and should be of great utility and value to future students of Crashaw's life and works. I observe that Mr. Tutin duly records the appearance in the Academy (November 20, 1897) of Mr. Francis Thompson's critical-essay on Crashaw.

Mr. A. R. Spofford's Book for All Readers (Putnam's) has a chapter on Bibliography, giving a sketch of the literature of that subject, from the Bibliotheca Universalis of Conrad Gesner (1545) to works of the present day. The account of American Bibliography is especially full and welcome. I detect only one error in the references to English books on books. Messrs. Cassell's Dictionary of English Literature is described as written by "W. H. D. Adams," and published in 1880. It really appeared in 1878, and the author has no "H." in his initials.

I have great sympathy with that firm of publishers, hitherto unknown to me, which proposes to issue the "Complete" Works of certain authors (beginning with Keats), and, moreover, to issue them at a reasonable price—one shilling net per volume. In this way we are to have all the verse and prose of Keats for five shillings. Hitherto it has been obtainable only in a high-priced edition, supervised by Mr. Forman. I understand, further, that the page of text in this Library is to be comparatively small, but neat, the type being also neat, though perhaps smallish. It is well (save in livres de luxe) that a book should, above all, be handy. The main point, however, is "completeness"—a virtue rarely arrived at in the case of most low-priced editions of the classics.

Talking of "completeness," I see it stated that Mr. Herbert Gatfield has compiled a "complete" list of printed plays, and that it is available for consultation in the British Museum Reading Room. I believe I am correct in saying that what Mr. Gatfield has compiled is a list of the plays included in various editions of the acted dramas, such as Cumberland's, Duncombe's, Webster's, Lacy's, Dicks's, and so forth. A complete list of English printed plays, including those issued by their authors in volume form, would run to very much greater length than does Mr. Gatfield's nevertheless very useful compilation.

One of the treasures of a modern dramatic or theatrical library is a copy of the pamphlet called The Fashionable Tragedian (Henry Irving), and written in the long ago (the late 'seventies, I think) by Messrs. William Archer and R. W. Lowe. A leading feature of this brochure was the cleverness of the pictorial caricatures of Mr. Irving in his various parts. These drawings, it is understood, were the work of the new editor of the Pall Mall Magazine—Mr. G. R. Halkett.

The introduction which Mr. Watts-Dunton is writing for Messrs. Ward & Lock's edition of The Romany Rye will, I believe, consist to a large degree of protests against the view of Borrow as a man which was put forward in a newspaper not long ago by Mr. Augustus Jessop.

THE BOOKWORM.

Reviews.

Coventry Patmore.

Memoirs and Correspondence of Coventry Patmore. By Basil Champneys. 2 vols. (Bell & Sons.)

MR. CHAMPNEYS has apparently aimed at a Boswellian minuteness and completeness in this biography; and certainly he has succeeded in giving a remarkably full account of a man whose outwardly uneventful life would seem to leave little scope for the biographer. Its two volumes equal in bulk the biography of Lord Tennyson. Yet the recluse Tennyson was almost a man of the world compared to Coventry Patmore. The literature of Tennyson's day revolved round him, a constant succession of more or less eminent men were his friends at all periods of his life, and help to diversify his biography with extraneous interest. Whereas Patmore, after mingling in the literary stream during his youth, withdrew from it, and gradually disused most of the illustrious friendships formed during those earlier days, becoming an intellectual contemplative beyond even the wont of poets. His life, therefore, like his poetry, was exceptionally household and inward. "That milk-soup, domestic bliss," as he has called it, never to him lost its flavour. Mr. Champneys's endeavour, accordingly, has been to make up for the paucity of incident by giving as close a picture as possible of the man, especially in those domestic relations which so remarkably formed the basis of his work. He has certainly done it beyond what could have been looked for. Moreover he has, with the aid of unpublished fragments, no less than of letters, enabled the reader to form an estimate of Patmore's views and teachings such as could scarcely have been suggested by anyone without those advantages of long and close friendship which he possessed. Yet it may be a question whether he has not used this minute method with too scrupulous detail. One is inclined to think that the central figure is at times perplexed by the copiousness of accessories. We are given even the medical certificates by which the poet obtained leave of absence and of retirement from the Museum. Subordinate sketches, equally studious in their subsidiary degree, are supplied not only of Coventry Patmore's father, but of his first two wives, his dead son, and two dead daughters. The book becomes something like a monograph on the extinct portion of the Patmore family in three generations. So, also, there seems an unnecessary scrupulosity in printing the smallest and most casual scraps of his domestic correspondence, where they do not seem to increase our knowledge of his character. One cannot, in fact, always see the wood for the trees. This, however, will serve by way of professional critical grumble. For the rest, too much was a better error than too little; and Mr. Champneys's care has evidently been great and anxious.

Coventry Patmore came of a literary father in easy circumstances, and was predestined to literature from his childhood. He had the advantage (as he always esteemed it) of reading the great writers in volumes where his father had noted the best passages, with a trained taste. This, he considered, taught him early to relish only what was fastidiously perfect in literature, the finest flower of the mind. Certainly, in later years he was a martinet as to literary perfection. Yet it may be doubted whether such a method might not have been dangerous to a mind less robust, whether the result would not have been literary epicurism, that dilettante attitude which he hated as the gates of Hades. He had his fit of science—a serious fit, which left deep traces on his mind and work—and his fit of art; but returned at last to his first love, poetry. His father has left an idealised sketch of the boy in those days, over-done and sentimental after a quite Early Victorian fashion, yet worth quoting in default of better. Here is a portion (the whole, though interesting, is too long for insertion):

Observe the youth who is seated in the deep recess of yonder window, withdrawn and apart from all the brilliant company—unknowing, for the moment, of anything but his own thoughts, and unknowing even of them but as faint and vague echoes and reflections of those feelings which make up the sum of a boy-poet's life and soul. See! his lithe, fragile form is bending over a book, that is spread open on his knees, his head drooping towards it like a plucked flower. The pale face is resting on the clasped hand, over which, and all round the small, exquisitely modelled head, fall heavy waves of auburn hair, concealing all but one pale cheek—pale and cold as marble, but smooth and soft as a girl's. . . . The boy-poet has fallen upon some passage of his (just at present) sole idol in the temple of poetry, Milton.

Much more interesting is Coventry Patmore's own account of his boyish visit to Leigh Hunt, being then seventeen or eighteen:

"Arriving at his house, a very small one in a small square somewhere in the extreme West, . . . I was . . . asked to sit down until he came to me. This he did after I had waited in the little parlour at least two hours, when the door was opened and a most picturesque gentleman, with hair flowing nearly, or quite, to his shoulders, a beautiful velvet coat, and a Vandyke collar of lace about a foot deep, appeared, rubbing his hands and smiling ethereally, and saying, without a word of preface or notice of my having waited so long, 'This is a beautiful world, Mr. Patmore.' I was so struck by this remark that it has eclipsed all memory of what occurred during the remainder of my visit."

"Skimpole!" one inevitably exclaims. That the poet of the Angel fell in love early is a foregone conclusion. Sixteen is the age here recorded, and the lady a Miss Gore. We have an impression that he assigned a yet earlier age—but without mentioning any name. He affirmed that it was a quite true passion; and no doubt it inspired the exquisite passage on precocious love in the Victories of Love. He once thought of taking orders, and all his life was ecclesiastically minded. His first poems were published at twenty-one, and the best of them were written at about sixteen or seventeen. Part of the volume was padding, written against time to supply the printers with copy, as he used to relate; and this through his father's pressure on him to publish. Such of these poems as he has retained are ruthlessly retrenched and revised. No one was a finer and sterner critic of his own work; and the alterations, both in these and the Angel, are well worth a poet's study. The book won him golden opinions, among others from Sir Edward Bulwer Lytton, a fair amount of notice in the Press, but was not a trade success. The collapse of his father's affairs soon after threw him on journalism and his own resources. Luckily for him, he attracted the notice of Monckton Milnes, and "Cool of the Evening," never cool to good poets, got him an assistant-librarianship in the British Museum. This was his mainstay during his younger years. He held it from 1846 to 1865, when he retired; and during this time he published all the parts of the Angel, married and lost his first wife, married his second, and entered the Roman Catholic Church. During this period he formed most of his literary friendships, including those with Tennyson, and, somewhat later, with the Pre-Raphaelites. His acquaintance with Tennyson and others, no less than his great sureness of literary judgment, seems to have made him something of an authority with the young Pre-Raphaelite band. Except with Holman Hunt and F. G. Stephens, the friendship slackened in later years, and noticeably so with Rossetti. With Tennyson his friendship was broken after his first wife's death, through a misunderstanding partly owing to the loss of a letter; and on his side there was much bitterness. Of Rossetti, Mr. Champneys says he never heard him speak bitterly. Mr. Champneys must have been fortunate. It is doubtful, in any case, if so masterful a personality as his could long have co-existed with other masterful personalities. But in those early years all accounts agree as to his brilliant talk and fascinating character. "He is very tall and slender," says one person, "and talked splendidly to us for four hours." There are an interesting series of extracts from the Pre-Raphaelite Diaries, which show how early he formed many of the principles which characterised him in later life. On the necessity of keeping a poem throughout (for example) on a perfectly satisfactory level of excellence, he never failed to insist, as he did to Rossetti and his friends. A poem of fine passages he could not away with. "When," he wrote, "will people recognise the difference between an ounce of diamond dust and a diamond which weighs an ounce?"

The important event to him of this time was his marriage to his first wife, Emily Andrewes. A woman of noble and spiritual personality, the glimpses of her in this book are most winning. Her letters are no ordinary woman's letters. When she believed herself dying, she urged him to marry again, in terms of touching self-abnegation. She quoted the Scriptural permission, saying: "You cannot be faithful to God and unfaithful to me." Her influence is all through The Angel in the House, the heroine of which was partly (but only partly) modelled on her. That poem made Coventry Patmore's name. Vilified or neglected at first, an article in the Edinburgh Review seems to have set it under way; and though critical fashion has shifted in regard to it, the sale, on the whole, has been wonderfully steady. Tennyson, Carlyle, Ruskin, Browning, all praised it in letters which are here given. "I do not say that it will be now or soon," said Browning, "but, some time or other, this will be the most popular poem that was ever written." The poet used to quote this utterance proudly, as an example of successful prophecy.

The death of his first wife was a mortal stroke to Coventry Patmore, and altered the whole attitude of his life. He went to Rome, married his second wife, a Catholic, and himself became a convert to Roman Catholicism. From that time he retired to the country, without change in his life save that from house to house; and his career is a record of domesticity, study, and meditation, broken by rare intervals of strikingly rapid composition. The last part of The Angel in the House was published in 1863; and it was not till 1868 that he began the writing of his last and greatest poems, The Unknown Eros. By that time he was out of fashion: the rapid world had almost forgotten his existence, and the book fell flat. Yet by some private judges its power was seen; and it is now steadily asserting its position. This is not the place for a judgment of his poetry. We will only say that the odes of The Unknown Eros are decidedly his greatest work, the work by which he should be judged and chiefly known: stately, subtle, fervid, poignant, of classic weight and mastery almost throughout. Yet The Angel in the House does not deserve the distaste still often exhibited for it. It lends itself to easy ridicule. There is an Early Victorian domesticity about it which detracts from its present vitality. But its best poetry is admirable. The Preludes and end-pieces, which the average reader probably skips to "get on with the story," are its finest portion; exquisite lyrics of a finished purity and still rapture, which he truly asserted to contain the substance of The Unknown Eros.

He lived to bury his second wife and two children, marry again, and produce three books of prose, which are, in effect, a masterly commentary on the spiritual philosophy of his poems. He died at Lynton, in November, 1896. Of his appearance and conversation in those later days Mr. Champneys gives a detailed description, which all who knew him will recognise. He was a striking figure; of great height, increased in appearance by his extreme gauntness; large-boned, with imposing forehead and powerful nose; the skin of his face was somewhat flaccid and innumerable wrinkled, the eyelids had a pendulous droop, under which gleamed a scimitar-like line of steel-blue eye. But, under emotion, the lid would suddenly widen, and the eye darken in a remarkable manner. Let Mr. Champneys continue the picture:

He had become subject to a sort of chronic bronchial affection, which made his laugh more harsh, and generally caused it to be followed by a dry cough. This gave a new acquaintance an impression of more sardonic humour than was really characteristic of him. . . . While talking, he would now stand with his back to the fire, his coat-tails under his arms, always resuming his position with a kind of shake of adjustment; then lean far back into his low, cane-backed chair, his legs stretched in front of him, his long hands sometimes grasping the elbows, at others employed in eager demonstration; and, when deeply interested in the talk, he would lean forwards towards his companion, holding him with an eye as fascinating as the Ancient Mariner's.

His private talk was of striking depth and impressiveness. It was often broken by long silence, during which he puffed his cigarette contemplatively; then he would drop some more than usually pregnant saying, which started a fresh conversation. The average of his letters here given are not likely to give him fame with the Lambs and Cowpers; but when they touch on his favourite topics they become striking and often memorable. But the unpublished fragments of prose and verse which Mr. Champneys gives are admirable and treasurable: for them alone the book would be worth publishing. On his speculative opinions, exemplified in them and other portions of the second volume, we cannot here touch. The final impression we get from the book is that of a man strong-willed, masterful, tender towards his own, unbending towards his enemies, with a practical ability rare in modern poets, sensitive to offence, yet generous towards his friends, of an extraordinary intensity and concentration of nature, narrowing his life upon one great purpose—the exploration of the significance of Love, in all its range from human to divine. And that, expressed in lofty poetry, and prose which few will read at first hand, was the life-achievement of Coventry Patmore.

A Devil of a Muddle.

The History of the Devil and the Idea of Evil. By Dr. Paul Carus. (Kegan Paul.)

DR. PAUL CARUS is the editor of the Chicago Monist, a journal which apparently occupies itself with the dissemination of Monism. This faith, or philosophy, teaches, we gather from his preface, that "the religious ideas of the present time are symbols. Taken in their literal meaning, they are untenable; but understood in their symbolical nature, they are seeds from which a purer conception of the truth will grow." As for its views on the subject in hand, they are difficult to apprehend. God, whom the author elsewhere speaks of as "both transcendent and immanent"—that is, both above and in nature—is said to "encompass" both good and evil; and we are further told, "the Devil is the most indispensable and faithful helpmate of God," and that, "to speak mystically even the existence of the Devil is filled with the presence of God." When people talk of speaking mystically they generally mean that there is much more in their utterances than meets the eye, but that they are not quite sure what it is; but this is one step further on the road to vagueness. In the robust faith of the Luciferans, according to the ardent Catholics who discovered, and perhaps invented, it, He whom we call God is the Devil, and he whom we call the Devil is God; but to the Monist the two names apparently mean pretty much the same thing. Philosophic, no doubt, but confusing.

So much for the standpoint of the author. Turning to the book itself, we are at first sight struck by the pains and expense lavished on it by the publishers. The vignettes and fleurons, printed in pale-green ink, are, in most instances, worthy of all praise, though one or two are not improved by the text being printed over them. The illustrations apart from the text are clearly reproduced, but are very unequal in value. The boldly executed plates from Picart lose nothing at all by reduction; but the same can hardly be said of the objects in the Musée Guimet, here copied, we may guess, not from the exhibits themselves, but from the coarse woodcuts printed for popular use in the little catalogue distributed to visitors. Of the others, the frescoes from the Campo Santo at Pisa are given on too small a scale to be intelligible, while the huge canvases of Schnorr von Carolsfeld positively gain by compression. In this, as in other respects, the author seems hardly to have understood his limitations. The most interesting, as well as the most novel, illustrations to be found in the book are those of the "Ghost Dance" of the American Indians, although some of the old German prints here reproduced are also worthy of notice.

As to the text, Dr. Carus seems to have proceeded on the principle that that which comes handiest must be best. His aim, in dealing with the devils of antiquity, is evidently to collect what he can from earlier summarisers; but he is neither very happy in his guides, nor well up-to-date. Brugsch is not now the authority on the Egyptian religion that he once was, nor is the Turin Papyrus (apparently quoted because it has appeared in an American edition) the most typical recension of the Book of the Dead. Wiedemann, who has made Egyptian religion his special study, is never mentioned, and Lenormant's Histoire de l'Orient is quoted in preference to M. Maspero's, which has quite superseded it. We may excuse Dr. Carus for quoting Mr. Virey's admittedly faulty translation of the inscriptions of Rekhmara, because Mr. Newberry's excellent work on that tomb is only just beginning to appear, but his friends at the Musée Guimet might have told him that in their Bibliothèque de Vulgarisation is to be found a memoir by M. Menant on the Yezidis or Devil-worshippers of Kurdistan, giving a very different account of their tenets from that of the "German traveller" whom he quotes at second hand. Even in his one reference to that mine of devil-lore, the Pistis Sophia, he must needs quote from the faulty translation of Mr. Mead rather than from the accurate French of M. Amélineau, or the scholarly English of the late C. W. King. In nearly every instance he has hit, as if by instinct, on the wrong authority. As for his omissions, it may be enough to mention that he says no word of the devil-worshipping scare got up by certain priests and anti-Semites in Paris a few years ago, although it led to the publication of three periodicals and about fifty books.

Is any further proof wanted that Dr. Carus is unfitted for the task that he has here set himself? No one who has looked into the religious beliefs of primitive folk can fail to notice that in the beginning they attribute neither benevolence nor malevolence to their deities, and are content with the dogma that they are stronger than man. Yet Dr. Carus does not fail to lay down that "Demonolatry, or Devil-worship, is the first stage in the evolution of religion." So, too, it is common knowledge that the Sumerians (or Accadians) were settled in Mesopotamia at least 6,000 years before Christ, and were fighting there with the Semites under the kings before Sargon, who ruled over both Sumerians and Semites in 3800 B.C. Yet Dr. Carus goes out of his way to state that the Accadians lived in Mesopotamia "about the year 3000 B.C., long before the rise of the Semitic nations." Again, the merest tyro in Egyptology could have told him that the Hyksos, or shepherds, were finally expelled from Egypt by the conquering Eighteenth Dynasty. But Dr. Carus fatuously describes Seti, or Sety I., as "the second king of the Nineteenth Dynasty, the shepherd kings." After this, it seems superfluous to point out that Seb, or Kēb, the "great Cackler," or god of the Earth, although he sometimes takes the shape of his sacred animal the goose, never wears a crocodile's head, and that his name is in no way suggestive of Set, as Dr. Carus avers. Neither is it the case that the inscription Nama sebesio, sometimes found on Mithraic groups, means "the sacred fluid," or anything like it; that the title of Inquisitor was used for the first time in 1163; nor that the "Pleroma" of the Gnostics had anything to do with "fulfilment of the Gnostic ideal," it being merely the word used by both heretic and orthodox in the Apostolic age for the "fulness," or complex of the different persons, of the Godhead. Dr. Carus and his proof-reader must share between them the blame for minor mistakes—such as rapōrapas for raprapōras, Odlin for Odin, le Scoope for the le Scoope of the Ingoldsby Legends, and the like.

On the whole, therefore, it will be seen that although Dr. Carus has hit upon an interesting subject, his book adds nothing to the knowledge already at anyone's disposal in the scholarly and careful compilations of M. Jules Baissac, M. Albert Réville, or his own countryman, Mr. Moncreux Conway. On the other hand, he has increased our admiration of Robert Louis Stevenson, and his appreciation of certain qualities of the American character. To call a friend of his the great "Americo-Parisienne sculptor" would be entirely in Dr. Carus's vein.

A Dream of Fair Women.

The Women of the Renaissance: a Study of Feminism. By R. de Maulde la Clavière. Translated by George Herbert Ely. (Sonnenschein. 10s. 6d.)

M. MAULDE has juggled very prettily with a vast subject. We say "juggled" because the women of the Renaissance, including her who from her litter dictated the Heptameron, were fathomless, and he who writes concerning them may not hope to develop conclusions; he can but make a spectacle of them. Our author frankly confesses as much, but it would be unfair to charge with futility a volume full of an erudition worn with the grace of a Jusserand—a volume large enough to be well-nigh inexhaustible, and so daintily petticoated that the "Lazy Minstrel" might tune his lyre anew to a hundred texts therefrom.

The original—Les Femmes de la Renaissance—appeared in 1898, and contains a number of footnotes, most of which are omitted by Mr. Ely on the curious ground that they make reference to "authorities unknown or inaccessible to the English reader." On the other hand, the translator furnishes an index, many useful notes of his own, and translations of Latin and Italian citations occurring in the work. Mr. Ely is a scholar, and his version reads admirably on the whole. If we were to name a fault, we should mention an undue preference for free as opposed to literal renderings. Two instances will serve for illustration. A phrase like "amateurs de femmes" has a delicate sub-satirical flavour which is missed in "gallants." Again, when M. Maulde, addressing his "dear ghosts," adds: "Le temps actuel est bien masculin, votre spiritualisme n'y apparaît que fort discrètement," Mr. Ely renders the latter half of the sentence: "Your spiritualism pays us but angel visits now," and once more extinguishes the ironic gleam of the original. No one can hope to enunciate a perfect theory of translation; but we incline to the belief that the insidious virtue whose praise is sounded in such phrases as "It reads like an English masterpiece" and "It does not read like a translation," is cultivated far too religiously by many interpreters.

But to return to M. Maulde. Two facts are brought out by him very clearly: first, the unlovely formalism of Renaissance marriages; secondly, the extraordinary influence of platonism on the social life of the time. The mariage de convenance is, of course, the natural safeguard of aristocracy; it maintains the chasm between class and mass. Against its cheerlessness men fortified themselves with concubines, women with "platonic" friendships. Francis I. regarded a mistressless man as a ninny, and wives were capable of a philosophical humility which is almost incredible. Nifo's wife endeavoured to cure him of a fit of studious abstraction by deliberately bringing to him "a young lady . . . of whom she knew her husband was enamoured."

Women, in whose honour reposes that of their offspring, have on many occasions found platonism a useful word. But the light literature which the Renaissance made and read is hardly companionable with it. For then the class of literature of which Boccaccio's stories are perhaps the highest type were favourite reading, and the "impeccable" Margaret, as M. Maulde rather oddly calls her, was diverting the world with her lubricious cordeliers.

Intellectual demi-vierges must have been common enough, and the painful continence exploited here and there in the Heptameron could scarcely in loco have awakened anything but mirth. M. Maulde's attitude to the author of that work is curiously sentimental. He speaks of "her profound yearning to blot out and pardon the sins of the world." Dear, dear!

Platonism, we are forced to understand, could regale its votaries with the love that Adonis denied the mother of the blind god, so long as they did not make such love the be-all and end-all of their intercourse; and no doubt on these terms platonism could flourish exceedingly. Yet one must not forget Michelangelo and the Marchioness of Pescara. Why did he love her? "For her beauty? No. For her wit? No. He loved her because he loved her. . . . He asked nothing of her." He was fifty-one when he fell in love, and the lady was thirty-six; yet he did not see her till twelve years later. Even when she was dead it was her hand, not her brow, he dared to kiss.

A less poetical but quite genuine platonism may be born of disgust, and one feels that an unwashed Renaissance beauty may have exerted an unknown power of sobering adoration. We read that "some discriminating women preferred dry methods to water—powders, pastes, scraping of the skin, which enabled them to say 'that they did not wash their hands.'" Preachers of the sixteenth century in France thus protested against what modern euphemism would call the habit of cleanliness. Cries one: "O fatal laying, prolific in elements of death." Cries another, a Franciscan friar: "Ye women who stew yourselves, I summon you all to the stewpots of Hell!" But "laying," fatal or otherwise, gained in popularity: perhaps the fact that it was made a social function at which gentlemen could present themselves contributed thereto.

It is pleasant to reflect that the Renaissance women remained "almost always young"; for they had the courage of despair when it came to fighting decay. "They had their teeth drawn, their skin scraped till it bled; they reduced their colour by dint of gulping down sand or cinders. They were héroïnes de la charité."

It is now time to close a fascinating volume, upon which it has only been possible to touch very lightly. In these days of new women, the Renaissance women preach from the grave. Behind the bars of marriage they played handsomely at the game of life. Their colouring was not all rouge, nor their laughter but the tinkling of cymbals. They had grace and gave grace; they were royally sentimental; they were women of the cult of youth.

Gusto.

The Men of the Merchant Service. By Frank T. Bullen. (Smith, Elder.)

HAZLITT said: "There is a gusto in Pope's compliments, in Dryden's satires, and Prior's tales; and among prose writers Boccaccio and Rabelais had the most of it. We will only mention one other work which appears to us to be full of gusto, and that is the 'Beggar's Opera.' If it is not, we are altogether mistaken in our notions on this delicate subject." We, also, are mistaken in our notions if Hazlitt would not have sanctioned the addition to his list of "Mr. Bullen, the sea writer." This book is full of gusto. It is not that Mr. Bullen seems to have sailed all seas in all ships, so that he can fetch a crucial instance to every second page, and can casually remember a deck-washing row on board "that ill-fated ship, sunk the other day by the ironclad Sanspareil, the East Lothian"; no, it is not that he has been to sea, and can remember, and can write; but it is that he can write himself back into the very smell of harbours, and find the solemn breadths of sea on the paper under his pen. This nearness of approach to a subject, this wedding of the savour of the word to the savour of the thing, is gusto. Mr. Bullen has it, and gusto is the literary quality of this book. To show this need be our only and sufficient aim. We could not, in a short space, convey any idea of the variety of special information—all so human and related—that Mr. Bullen gives about the training, duties, and character of masters, mates, second and third mates, carpenters, bosuns, sail-makers, apprentices, and seamen. Almost every chapter is doubled, to embrace sailing and steam. A fascinating chapter deals with "The Master's Qualities." First of these—absolutely first—is the ability to command, and it is found in very varying degrees. You shall find a man "of stately figure and with a voice like a thunder-peal" who is unable to gain the respect of a crew. But another man, who seldom raises his voice during a long voyage, and is a mere placid figure on the bridge, will be felt in every corner of the ship. Mr. Bullen describes such a captain, an elderly, prosaic-looking figure, who used to come on deck shortly after daybreak every morning, with a moth-eaten Bombay-made dressing-gown flung over his pyjamas, a mangy old fez upon his head, and his bare feet thrust into sloppy slippers. Thus attired, he would pace rapidly up and down the poop for the space of half an hour, taking his constitutional—a most mirth-provoking figure. Yet no one ever laughed, either behind his back, on deck, or in the privacy of the fo'c's'le. When he spoke it was in a velvet voice, but the man spoken to invariably took an attitude of profound respect on the instant.

That was a man after Mr. Bullen's heart, but he does not refuse his admiration to any type of thorough sailor. Such are sketched in rapid phrase again and again in these pages. Putting the highest value on training, Mr. Bullen is of opinion that the best type of sailor is born, not made; and he exults to tell us how such men by sheer instinct, by a humouring as of women with their babes, can neutralise the inherent faults of an unhandy ship; and how steersmen must be born to it to feel all that a wheel-spoke can convey through the hand in the darkness. Mr. Bullen's chapter on the ship's carpenter is an idyll of human skill and resource; it makes the reader proud of men he has never seen. There is gusto even in the chapter on cooks, who as a class are nothing, but as individuals are good and bad in all keys and combinations. He recalls the cook of the Wonga Wonga, an effervescing nigger, who out of an unutterable confusion of pastry and poultry and all culinary chaos would construct a dinner for five hundred people, "declaiming Shakespeare on the slightest provocation." Another cook, a little hump-backed Yankee, is presented in the act of butchering sheep in rough weather. But that is a bit of low life that we can skip. For the nobility of seamanship you should read Mr. Bullen's chapter on "The Mate's Work in a Sailing Ship," particularly the description of an old mate who infected a whole crew with zest when the captain had ordered him to shorten all the standing rigging—a highly technical operation. His face, radiant with interest, was noted by the men: "'Looks as if he'd got something extry-special on hand this mornin'. More nigger-driving,' &c. But it was only the orthodox growl. They did not look displeased. The next minute the mate was among them, his orders flying like hail, and in half an hour the look of the vessel was entirely changed." Or let the reader turn to the story of the taciturn master who had no appearance of the sailor about him, but who in a long night manoeuvred his ship with consummate skill through the Sunda Straits by utilising every favourable catspaw and calculating current and coast-line. But we only prick a book that is bulged with sea-craft, and resembles the perfect sailor whose every hair is a rope yarn and every drop of his blood Stockholm tar.

Other New Books.

SHAKESPEARE'S GREENWOOD.

By GEORGE MORLEY.

"Ay! now are we in Arden," and, unlike Touchstone, we would not be in a "better place." Mr. Morley gossips pleasantly of Warwickshire, of its customs and superstitions, its folk-lore, its birds, and its trees. He devotes chapters to some of the lesser literary lights whose connexion with the county has been somewhat overshadowed by Shakespeare's; to George Eliot and the "Cheverels of Cheverel Manor"; to Dr. Samuel Parr, the aged scholar who was a link between Johnson and Landor; to the triad of minor poets—Shenstone and Iago and Somerville—who gave Warwickshire its share in the poetical renaissance of the eighteenth century. But he is most attractive when dealing with Warwickshire dialect. The isolated enclosure of tilth and woodland in the very heart of manufacturing England, which is Arden, has preserved a wealth of home-spun vocabulary which even Shakespeare, though he drew freely upon it, did not exhaust. Mr. Morley garners some delightful phrases. "Adone, ye lil mummock, ye moither me above a bit," cries a Warwickshire mother to her troublesome child. The shepherd leaves you with the apology: "Well, I mun shog on a bit. I were up at four, ye know, an' I can welly do wi' a shive o' summat to et an a tot o' tay." Like all dialects, Warwickshire is strong in terms of vituperation. A "hedgehog" is an "urchin" whom his father will "lace," "warm," "leather," or "thrape" soundly. A loose "wench" is a "faggot" or "doxy" ("Heigh! the doxy over the dale!"); a slattern is a "slummock." Flowers, too, have their delightful by-names. "Hey," says a more kindly mother, "thee hev gotten a dandy bunch o' smell smocks, my gel. Where didst raggie to get thoy?" "Smell smocks" are cuckoo flowers, and "Keck" is henlock or cow parsley, and "cows and calves" are wild arums, and "naked ladies" are leafless meadow saffron. (Nutt. 5s.)

FROM THE CAPE TO CAIRO.

By EWART S. GROGAN AND ARTHUR H. SHARP.

"I must say I envy you," writes Mr. Cecil Rhodes in the letter addressed to Mr. Grogan prefixed to this volume, "for you have done that which has been for centuries the ambition of every explorer—namely, to walk through Africa from south to north. The amusement of the whole thing is that a youth from Cambridge during his vacation should have succeeded in doing that which the ponderous explorers of the world have failed to accomplish." And, indeed, the tramp was a remarkable one. Undertaken, no doubt, with some idea of record breaking, but mainly for the sake of big game-shooting, its result can hardly fail to stimulate that great scheme, now no longer a mere wild imagination, which proposes the trans-continental connexion, by steam and telegraph, of the Cape with Cairo.

As a narrative of sport and travel the book should take a high place. It is well written, though not so well written as to make the reader pause to consider where fact is aided unduly by art. The pages are packed with a spirit of incorrigible, though perfectly sane, youthfulness, which makes light of dangers and goes for its mark with healthy and humorous perseverance. The traveller in the interior must accept the fact that all natives are horn liars; from that point he may arrive at some approximation of the truth. The description of the journey through a country devastated by cannibals is crowded with horrors, most reticently stated, which give a ghastly hint of what civilisation has to face.

We do not dwell upon the hunting episodes, because the book has that greater value to which we have referred. Mr. Grogan concludes with a chapter on "Native Questions," which summarises, with marked lucidity and entire freedom from sentimentality, the attitude which should be adopted by a colonising power. It is to such practical men as the authors of this volume that native administration should be entrusted; "but the means to be employed are not those of the missionary." Those are the concluding words. (Hurst & Blackett. 21s. net.)

ROMAN ART.

By FRANZ WICKHOFF.

This splendidly illustrated volume, translated and edited by Mrs. S. A. Strong, LL.D., has a critical importance which such works occasionally lack. It is a translation of the essay contributed five years ago by Prof. Wickhoff to a reproduction of the MS. known as the "Wiener Genesis." This study of the evolution of style in Roman art between Augustus and Constantine has been something of an epoch-making work in the literature of its subject, and it is well that it should be brought prominently before English scholars. Prof. Wickhoff aims at reversing the verdict which sets down the Roman painting and sculpture of the Empire as merely an offshoot of imported Hellenism. "Graecia capta ferum victorem cepit" is, in this direction, at best a half truth. The conquest of Greece doubtless brought a wave of Hellenistic influence into the Roman world during the later period of the Republic. But even under Augustus this mingled with a sturdy element of native Etruscan or at least Italian origin, and after Augustus this element largely broke free and found its own, distinctly non-Hellenic, modes of expression. Such is the thesis which Prof. Wickhoff expounds with all the strength given by an admirable equipment, both in archaeology and aesthetics. His proofs are taken from various sources, largely from the arches of Titus and Trajan and the wall-paintings of Pompeii; and he traces the distinctive Roman style right through the Middle Ages, to which the "Wiener Genesis" belongs, until it played its part in the new artistic renaissance of the Trecento. The value of the work is much increased by Mrs. Strong's collection of about a hundred plates and text illustrations, which appeal alike to the scholar and to the lover of beautiful picture-books. (Heinemann. 36s. net.)

THE MAKING OF RELIGION.

By ANDREW LANG.

When the first edition of this book appeared it gave rise to a good deal of criticism. This came both from psychologists and from anthropologists, the latter especially demurring to the position taken up by Mr. Lang with regard to the origin of the belief in gods. This, said Mr. Lang, does not necessarily presuppose an already existing belief in spirits, out of which it could be developed. He held, on the contrary, that primitive man arrived at the notion of a god by some process of reasoning not very definitely stated, and that this notion was in many cases subsequently modified and degraded under the influence of a belief, later in its development, in spirits. He has already replied in part to his critics in the preface to the revised edition of his Myth, Ritual and Religion. In a similar preface to the present volume he touches upon a few additional points; and, in particular, attempts to state a little more exactly the kind of thinking which he conceives to have led primitive man to his god. This is what he now "thinks probable in so obscure a field":

As soon as man had the idea of "making" things, he might conjecture as to a Maker of things which he himself had not made, and could not make. He would regard this unknown Maker as a "magnified non-natural man." These speculations appear to me to need less reflection than the long and complicated processes of thought by which Mr. Tylor believes, and probably believes with justice, the theory of "spirits" to have been evolved. This conception of a magnified non-natural man, who is a Maker, being given, his Power would be recognised, and fancy would clothe one who had made such useful things with certain other moral attributes, as of Fatherhood, goodness, and regard for the ethics of his children, these ethics having been developed naturally in the evolution of social life. In all this there is nothing "mystical," nor anything, as far as I can see, beyond the limited mental powers of any beings that deserve to be called human.

Like everything that Mr. Lang writes, this preface is a delightful and urbane piece of work. Whether it will convert any anthropologists is another matter. (Longmans.)

THE VENETIAN REPUBLIC. BY W. CAREW HAZLITT.

This is Mr. Hazlitt's third essay at writing the history of Venice. A short book, comparatively, of 1853 was enlarged in 1860 into a work which has been a standard treatise ever since. But forty years, during which the accumulation of material and monographs has been uninterrupted, have naturally rendered it somewhat obsolete. In these two goodly volumes it is brought up to date and much enlarged, the narrative being carried onwards to the expiration of Venetian Independence in 1797. A volume and a half are devoted to the annals of the Republic; the remaining half volume contains an elaborate study of Venetian civilisation during the period of the city's greatness. We cannot, of course, attempt to criticise so detailed a work in the space at our command. Mr. Hazlitt has devoted vast industry and no inconsiderable learning to it, and though he does not impress us as one of the masters of historic style, yet his easy pages, full of narrative, colour, and picturesque episodes, do not make bad reading. It would, indeed, be difficult to write an uninteresting book about Venice. The thoroughly scientific historian would, we think, in a work of this magnitude, cite his authorities more frequently and critically than does Mr. Hazlitt. And we miss the discussion of sources in a preface, or, better still, at the beginning of each chapter, which is rapidly becoming imperative in such a work. The Venetian Bibliografia of Cicogna was published in 1847. Even were that not so, a selected and critical bibliography would still be desirable as a guide to the student, and also as some indication of the writer's attitude towards his material and of the kind of treatment of it which may be expected in his book. (Black. 42s. net.)

THE STORY OF THE CHINESE CRISIS. BY ALEXIS KRAUSSE.

Unstinted praise can be awarded to this excellent little handbook on the crisis through which China is now passing. Mr. Krausse is well known as an authority on the Far East, and in the present volume he has boiled down his knowledge into a little book of some two hundred pages, which contain all that the ordinary newspaper reader needs in order to understand what is going on in China at present. A slight sketch of Chinese history, sufficient for the purpose in hand, opens the book, and then Mr.

Krausse devotes chapters to the "Advent of the Powers," the "Struggle for the Empire," the "Brewing of the Trouble," and the "Fall of Peking," and finally, turning towards the future, discusses the outlook. For those who desire to know more of the great problem he adds an excellent bibliography of modern books on China, and the index at the end is adequate. Altogether The Story of the Chinese Crisis is an example of the best kind of book-making. (Cassell. 3s. 6d.)

Those who possess no book printed in the "golden type" designed by William Morris for the Kelmscott Press will do well to obtain Messrs. Longmans' half-crown reprint of the paper on "Architecture and History of Westminster Abbey," read by Morris on July 1, 1884, before the Society for the Protection of Ancient Buildings. They will find Morris talking much in Ruskin's style about "the mania for monuments," and our being "a laughing-stock among nations" for having permitted these "pieces of undertaker's upholstery" to blemish the Abbey.

An interesting and sometimes most uncanny book is the Rev. John Gregerson Campbell's Superstitions of the Highlands and Islands of Scotland (MacLehose). These have been collected by the author entirely from oral sources, a circumstance which enormously increases the value of his book. The contents are arranged under such headings as "The Fairies," "Tutelary Beings," "The Urisk, the Blue Men, and the Mermaid," "Premonitions and Divinations," &c., and the book should explain Miss Fiona Macleod to many readers." Here is a curious tale: "The Fairies were building a bridge across Loch Rannoch, between Cannaghouran and Innis-droighinn, when a passer-by wished them Godspeed. Instantly the work was stopped, and was never resumed."

Are you an amateur scientist? If so, you may like to know of Mr. George Hies's book on Flame, Electricity and the Camera (Grant Richards, 7s. 6d.), in which he traces man's progress from his first kindling of fire to the wireless telegraph and the photography of colour. The treatment is discursive and popular, and should appeal to many a boy and many a boy's father.

To the "Westminster Biographies" are added two monographs: Adam Duncan, by Mr. H. W. Wilson, who endeavours to give flesh and bone to the rather shadowy figure of this gallant admiral; and John Wesley, by Mr. Frank Banfield.

The title given by Mr. Richard Brinsley Sheridan (a descendant of the dramatist) to his book on the Philippine problem is The Filipino Martyrs: A Story of the Crime of February 4, 1899. The writer's opinions are thus revealed in advance, but Mr. Sheridan is careful to tell us that he formed them on the spot and without any bias against the United States Government, whose work in Cuba he applauds. But after a short time in Manila he was convinced that the Filipinos had been grossly misrepresented; and in this book of two hundred pages, dedicated to the citizens of America, Mr. Sheridan pleads warmly for the Filipinos as a refined and civilised race worthy of self-government, and now suffering intolerable wrongs.

Books on the House of Commons generally justify themselves, for the House will bear a deal of exploration. In Our House of Commons: Its Realities and Romance, Mr. Alfred Kinnear, the war correspondent, gives us fifty-four short chapters on Parliamentary life, dividing them into two sections: the "Serious Side" and the "Light Side." In the "Serious Side" we observe that the cost of a seat in Parliament to a member is put at £5 a day; in the "Light Side" we are regaled with a chapter on "The M.P.'s Wife," who is said to be "the most ambitious of all women." By the way, Mr. Kinnear says "Mr. Balfour is never angry." No doubt Mr. Kinnear was in South Africa when Mr. Balfour—got angry.

Fiction Supplement.

MR. MURRAY'S LIST.

The Latest 6s. Novels.

THE HEART'S HIGHWAY.

Just published.

By MARY E. WILKINS.

"..... Miss Wilkins is to be congratulated on a striking success."

Athenæum.

THE WORLDLINGS.

By LEONARD MERRICK.

[Just published.]

"..... Mr. Merrick's rare gifts of social realism and moral insight convert conventionalities into fascinations, and extract from vulgar villainy materials for the development of a strong character, and a subtle conscience. The truthfulness and fineness of his talent have never been more powerfully displayed."

Saturday Review.

JOHN CHARITY.

Just published.

By HORACE ANNESLEY VACHELL.

"It is a most picturesque story."—Athenæum.

PARSON PETER.

By ARTHUR H. NORWAY.

[Just published.]

A GENTLEMAN.

Just published.

By the Hon. Mrs. WALTER FORBES.

A VIZIER'S DAUGHTER.

By LILLIAS HAMILTON, M.D.

[Ready immediately.]

A PRINCESS OF ARCADY.

Ready immediately.

By ARTHUR HENRY.

ON the WING of OCCASIONS.

By JOEL CILANDLER HARRIS ("Uncle Remus").

[Ready immediately.]

The New Half-Crown Short Novels.

THE COMPLEAT BACHELOR.

By OLIVER ONIONS.

"'The Compleat Bachelor' my Baronite finds just delicious."

Baron de B.-W. in Punch.

"One of the brightest, cheeriest, and jolliest books written for a long time past..... This is a book which you should beg, borrow, or—get out of the circulating library. Don't miss it."—Illustrated Mail.

A GIFT FROM THE GRAVE.

By EDITH WHARTON.

".....A writer of exceptional delicacy and power..... Mrs. Wharton is very much more than a cunning fashioner or verbal mosaic. She has, added to the modern passion for perfection of form, the older qualities that touch the heart."—The Times.

MONICA GREY.

By the Honourable Lady HELY HUTCHINSON.

AN ENGLISHWOMAN'S LOVE-LETTERS.

Small crown 8vo, 5s. net.

It is obviously necessary that these letters should be anonymous, but the publisher, without holding himself in any way responsible for their authorship, confidently hopes that their special characteristics will be considered fully to justify their publication.

[Ready next week.]

THE LIFE OF PARIS.

By RICHARD WHITEING.

Author of "No. 5, John Street," &c. Large crown 8vo, 6s.

CONTENTS: I. The Government Machine—II. Parisian Pastimes—III. Artistic Paris—IV. Life on the Boulevard—V. Fashionable Paris. [Ready immediately.]

CHRISTMAS IN FRENCH CANADA.

By LOUIS FRECHETTE. With Illustrations by Frederick Simpson Coburn. Large crown 8vo, 6s.

This volume, by an author whose name is familiar to everyone acquainted with the best Canadian literature of to-day, affords a charming insight into some of the old Christmas customs and traditions of the Dominion.

[Just published.]

JOHN MURRAY, Albemarle Street.

MACMILLAN & CO.'S LIST.

LIFE AND LETTERS OF

THOMAS HENRY HUXLEY.

By His Son, LEONARD HUXLEY.

With Portraits and Illustrations. In 2 vols, 8vo, 30s. net.

OLIVER CROMWELL.

By JOHN MORLEY.

With Portrait, 8vo, 10s. net. Illustrated Edition, extra crown 8vo, 14s. net.

ALFRED RUSSEL WALLACE'S NEW BOOK.

Studies Scientific and Social.

By ALFRED R. WALLACE, LL.D., D.C.L., F.R.S.

In 2 vols., Illustrated, extra crown 8vo, 18s.

THE LATEST 6s. NOVELS.

MAURICE HEWLETT

RICHARD YEA-AND-NAY.

MARION CRAWFORD

IN THE PALACE OF THE KING.

EGERTON CASTLE.

MARSHFIELD THE OBSERVER.

SECOND IMPRESSION.

ROSA N. CAREY.

RUE WITH A DIFFERENCE.

CHARLOTTE M. YONGE.

MODERN BROODS.

WEIR MITCHELL.

DR. NORTH AND HIS FRIENDS.

THE LEATHERSTOCKING NOVELS OF J. FENIMORE COOPER.

Crown 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d.; cloth extra, gilt edges, 3s. 6d. each.

THE LAST of the MOHICANS. With a General Introduction by MOWBRAY MORRIS, and 25 Illustrations by H. M. Brock.

THE DEERSLAYER. With 40 Illustrations by H. M. Brock.

MRS. HENRY WOOD'S NOVELS The

New and Cheaper Editions, each Story in 1 vol., crown 8vo, red cloth, price 2s. 6d., or in green cloth, price 2s., may be obtained at all book-sellers, where a Complete List of the Thirty-seven Stories may be seen.

By EDWARD FITZGERALD.

MISCELLANIES (including EUPHRANOR

OLONIUS, &c.). By EDWARD FITZGERALD. Pott 8vo, 2s. 6d. net. Golden Treasury Series.

TWO NEW BOOKS FOR THE YOUNG.

THE TALE OF THE LITTLE TWIN DRAGONS.

With Coloured Illustrations by S. Rosamond Phipps. Demy 8vo, picture boards, 6s.

By Mrs. MOLESWORTH.

THE HOUSE THAT GREW. Illustrated by Alice

B. Woodward. Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d.

MACMILLAN & CO., Limited, London.

NEW POPULAR FICTION.The Puppet Show.

By MARIAN BOWER.

6s.

"The story is a good modern novel of society, written in a lively manner. The character drawing is clever, and Miss Bower's 'puppets' dance with more individual life than those of many of her contemporaries."—Spectator.

"Her characters are fresh and interesting; her style is pleasant; and her situations are well presented."—World.

The Catacombs of Paris.

By E. BERTHET.

The first edition of this novel being now nearly exhausted, a second is in the press.

6s.

The Academy says: "This is a stirring story of the period preceding the French Revolution, with the special interest which attaches to subterranean doings."

A NEW ROMANTIC NOVEL.

Messrs. ARCHIBALD CONSTABLE & CO. beg to announce that they will publish on Wednesday, Nov. 7th,

The Pride of England.

By MARCUS REED.

6s.

The Shadow of Quong Lung.

By Dr. C. W. DOYLE.

3s. 6d.

"Remarkable ability is shown both in the conception and in the telling of these tales of Chinatown. The author knows the country and the people 'right through,' and has reproduced the atmosphere with remarkable faithfulness. The stories are full of interest and exciting situations."—The Bookman.

BY ORDER OF THE COMPANY.

By MARY JOHNSTON. 6s.

THE OLD DOMINION.

By MARY JOHNSTON. 6s.

JANICE MEREDITH.

By PAUL LEICESTER FORD. 6s.

SUNNINGWELL.

By F. WARRE CORNISH. 6s.

FATE THE FIDDLER.

By HERBERT C. MACILWAINE. 6s.

DINKINBAR.

By HERBERT C. MACILWAINE. 6s.

The Mind of Tennyson.His Thoughts on God, Freedom, and Immortality

By E. HERSHEY SNEATH, Ph.D.

Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

"Admirably sums up for us Tennyson's philosophic ideas and the creed he had ultimately arrived at. Since Mr. Stopford Brooke's comprehensive survey of Tennyson, nothing so excellent has been written on the poet's ideas."

Spectator.A History of Education.

By THOMAS DAVIDSON.

Author of "Aristotle and the Ancient Educational Ideals," &c.

Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

Oliver Cromwell.

By THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

Author of "The Rough Riders."

Fully Illustrated. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

"We can recommend the English Cromwellian to read Mr. Roosevelt for himself, for he will find some vigorous thoughts from a new point of view, and he will also find the book illustrated by some excellent views and portraits of the leaders of the time." Mr. FREDERIC HARRISON, in the Speaker.

ARCHIBALD CONSTABLE & CO., Ltd., 2, Whitehall Gardens, S.W.

SMITH, ELDER & CO.'S LIST.Mrs. Humphry Ward's*NEW NOVEL

AT ALL LIBRARIES AND BOOKSELLERS.

With Illustrations by Albert Sterner.

Crown 8vo, 6s.

ELEANOR.

By MRS. HUMPHRY WARD,

Author of "Robert Elsmere," "Marcella,"
"Sir George Tressady," &c.

NEW NOVEL BY KATHARINE TYNAN.

On NOVEMBER 15. Crown 8vo, 6s.

A DAUGHTER OF THE FIELDS.

By KATHARINE TYNAN.

Author of "The Dear Irish Girl," "She Walks in Beauty," &c.

NEW SIX-SHILLING NOVELS.

AT ALL LIBRARIES AND BOOKSELLERS.

JUST PUBLISHED.—Crown 8vo, 6s.

LOVE IN A MIST.

By OLIVE BIRRELL.

Author of "The Ambition of Judith," "Anthony Langayde," &c.

THE BRASS BOTTLE. By F. Anstey,

Author of "Vice-Versa," "The Giant's Robe," "A Fallen Idol," &c.
With a Frontispiece. Crown 8vo, 6s.

FIRST IMPRESSION NEARLY EXHAUSTED.SECOND IMPRESSION IN THE PRESS.

Spectator.—"In his logical conduct of an absurd proposition, in his fantastic handling of the supernatural, in his brisk dialogue and effective characterisation, Mr. Anstey has once more shown himself to be an artist and a humourist of uncommon and enviable merit."

PUNCH.—"For weirdness of conception, for skilful treatment, and for abounding humour, Mr. Anstey's last, my Barometre avers, is a worthy companion of his first ('Vice-Versa')."

THE MAN - TRAP By Sir William

MAGNAY, Bart., Author of "The Pride of Life," "The Heiress of the Season," &c. Crown 8vo, 6s.

THE ISLE of UNREST. By Henry Seton

MERFMAN, Author of "The Sowers," "In Kedar's Tent," "Roden's Corner," &c. With 6 Full-Page Illustrations. Crown 8vo, 6s.

SECOND IMPRESSION EXHAUSTED.THIRD IMPRESSION READY IMMEDIATELY.

TIMES.—"Capital reading, absorbing reading.....An exciting story with 'thrills' at every third page."

GUARDIAN.—"Altogether charming, serious yet gay, wholesome and manly, fresh and full of interesting incident."

THE MARBLE FACE. By G. Colmore,

Author of "A Daughter of Music," "The Strange Story of Hester Wynne," &c.

FIRST IMPRESSION EXHAUSTED.SECOND IMPRESSION READY IMMEDIATELY.

LITERATURE.—"A sustained work of much vividness and power.....The lady of the marble face is admirably drawn."

DAILY TELEGRAPH.—"It says no little for the author's ability to hold the attention of his reader that our interest in the weird tragedy is never slackened."

Messrs. SMITH, ELDER & CO. will be happy to send a Copy of their CATALOGUE post free on application.

London: SMITH, ELDER & CO., 15, Waterloo Place, S.W.

Fiction Supplement.

SATURDAY: 3 NOVEMBER, 1900.

Some Novels of 1900.

As a complement to the list of the best novels published up to the end of October which our readers have decided for themselves, and which is given, with the voting, in the right-hand column of this page, we have drawn up another and an independent list. In settling this list our endeavour has been to ignore utterly all the noises of the market-place, all rumours of vast circulations, and all influences extraneous to literary art. We have considered every novel issued between New Year's Day and the end of last month, and drawn from that formidable array the dozen which seem to us to possess the most genuine intrinsic merit. Such an occasion as the present gives to the expert an opportunity of usefully correcting the wilder deviations of public opinion—that opinion which after much turning always approaches a true standard at last—and of calling attention to fine work that may have gained less than adequate notice. Our list is as follows (we should premise that it excludes short stories, and that the books are placed alphabetically according to author's names):

The Increasing Purpose, by James Lane Allen.
Tommy and Grizel, by J. M. Barrie.
Lord Jim, by Joseph Conrad.
The Courtship Dame, by R. Murray Gilchrist.
The Cardinal's Snuff-Box, by Henry Harland.
Robert Orange, by John Oliver Hobbes.
Quisante, by Anthony Hope.
A Master of Craft, by W. W. Jacobs.
Sons of the Morning, by Eden Phillpotts.
Love and Mr. Lewisham, by H. G. Wells.
A Gift from the Grave, by Edith Wharton.
The West End, by Percy White.

Apart from the absence of certain notorious names, two points will at once occur to the reader in regard to this list: first, that there are only two ladies among the authors, both American, and second, that the large majority of the books have been published during the latter half of the year. Mrs. Humphry Ward's Eleanor, we may remark, was not issued till November. Both peculiarities are probably due to mere accident. Going a little deeper, we perceive, happily, a sign of the extinction of the effete historical novel. We have several times remarked upon the decadence of the historical novel, and attributed it to a natural exhaustion of the form which Scott invented. Until the historical novelist can contrive not to imitate someone who imitated someone who imitated Scott—until he can bring a vigorous, original, and reviving imagination to the reconstitution of the past—it is quite well that the cult of the temps jadis should languish; and until then it decidedly will languish. An augury full of hope for the future of English fiction lies in the instinctive recognition by the best writers of this truth. The best writers show an ever-increasing tendency to write of that which they personally know—and know to the roots. In England, at any rate, we do not, elaborately or otherwise, “get up” our subjects. Not one of the twelve novels selected can fairly be termed a rifacimento. Each springs from an observation neither artificial nor hasty, and of the greater part it may be said that they are the fruit of life-long specialising. The practice of confining one's self to a particular environment may ultimately prove to have disadvantages, but meanwhile its advantages are striking. Whatever the theory of the matter, with Mr. Hardy in Dorset, Mr. Barrie in Kirriemuir, Mr. Phillpotts on Dartmoor, Mr.

Gilchrist on the Peak, Mr. Jacobs on Thames-side, Mr. Morrison in Essex, and Mr. Conrad on the Southern wave, we are indubitably getting results.

Another important and pleasing characteristic of the best fiction of the year is an increased fastidiousness in the matter of verbal precision, verbal dignity, and verbal beauty. All of the twelve writers seek these three qualities, without which fine style is never attained. With few exceptions they are stylists in the strict sense of Flaubert, constantly and consciously striving after effects of exactitude and beauty. In this respect, if in no other, English fiction shows a decided advance since “the palmy days, when Ruskin alone obeyed the axiom that literature is an art of words.”

And, besides this renaissance of style, there is to be noticed, also, a revival of humour. Ten years ago fiction was almost consistently devoid of humour. Now—well, now we have Mr. Jacobs, a humorist pure and simple, to reinforce Mr. Anstey. We have, further, Mr. Barrie, who is a humorist and something else; and we have writers like Mr. Phillpotts, and Mr. H. G. Wells, who are capable of producing the real thing in no mean quantities. In Mr. Harland and Mr. Percy White we possess wits of distinction. A general survey of the first ten months of the year proves, in fine, that, though we may not be living in the spacious times of fecund and prodigal genius, yet have we no cause to be ashamed of the imaginative literature of our period, since it is marked by efficiency, sincerity, an ample creative force, and humour.

OUR PLÉBISCITE.

Last week our usual Competition took the form of a request for the names of the twelve best novels published during the first ten months of the year. An examination of all the lists sent in has resulted in the following selection of novels which in the united judgment of the competitors are entitled to be considered the “twelve best” published in 1900 up to last Saturday.

TITLE.	NUMBER OF VOTES.
Quisante	44
Tommy and Grizel	41
Robert Orange	11
The Isle of Unrest	32
The Farringtons	29
The Increasing Purpose	29
A Master of Craft	25
Senator North	23
Sons of the Morning	21
The Gateless Barrier	20
The Master Christian	19
Sophia	19

The twelve novels which our readers considered to come next in merit are as follows:

TITLE.	NUMBER OF VOTES.
The Cardinal's Snuff-Box	18
Love and Mr. Lewisham	16
By Order of the Company	14
The Soft Side	11
Voices of the Night	10
The Fourth Generation	9
The Man Who Corrupted Hadleyburg	9
The West End	9
The Lane that Has No Turning	8
A Gift from the Grave	8
The Brass Bottle	8
The Infidel	7
Red Pottage	7

We observe, by the way, that our contemporary, the Onlooker, has adopted a new method of criticism—not so new, however, but that it has been employed ere now in the ACADEMY. For the last two weeks people of note have been asked to contribute lists of books which they have lately enjoyed reading. Among novels we notice the following selections:

The Duchess of Sutherland: The Gateless Barrier, Robert Orange, The Courtesy Dame, Senator North, A Gift from the Grave.

Mrs. Meynell: A Gift from the Grave, The Greater Inclination.

John Oliver Hobbes: Fuoco.

Mr. W. L. Courtney: The Gateless Barrier, Sons of the Morning, Jezebel, Senator North, The Isle of Unrest, Quisanté.

A Novelist on the Novel.

MANY highly interesting opinions have been pronounced regarding the deterioration of the novel—that vivid morning star of literature—and some there be who deny deterioration altogether.

It is mostly a matter of point of view, like nearly every other question under the sun. If one means by the modern novel that of the last half-century, then I think those who deny its deterioration are in the right of it. If, however, modern, in this connexion, means produced during the last half decade, then to me the deterioration is something that cannot be disproved, however one may deny or, more justifiably, excuse it. And I claim some concern in the last half-decade, by token that it was during this period that my own literary firstborn was delivered to, and unobtrusively buried by, the British public.

In connexion with the novel, I protest that the 'nineties, while possibly by no means the richest, have been psychologically the most interesting, the most vivid and pregnant, years of the century. Remember that Robert Louis Stevenson gave us of his ripest and finest work during the early 'nineties. He left us before the back of the decade was broken. At this distance, even, one can scarce record the fact without a catching of the breath. But, speaking of the decade, who shall say how much beside died and was lost, or appeared to be lost, with its middle year.

"A generation ago such a book would have been hailed as a masterpiece; would have gone through edition after edition. To-day the number of good books is larger than ever, and, splendid achievement though it be, cannot receive all its due." So I read in Vanity Fair, December 14, 1899; and, the book named being my own, I sympathised, appreciated keenly the reviewer's standpoint, and reviled my fortune because that the early 'nineties had seen me adrift in the Pacific, instead of at the publishers' doors in great little London Town.

Since mentioning the name of a magician in fiction who is no more, I have introduced my insignificant, if not modest, self. I am free and at large, therefore, among small potatoes, or even among matters not over odorous. My theory about the art of fiction is identical with the theory of that doctor in Charles Reade's Hard Cash: "Th' great Chronothairmaal Therey o' Medicine; th' Unity, Periodicity, an' Remittency of all disease." I believe with pious optimism in the "Periodicity an' Remittency" of deterioration in the fictional art. And when Rudyard ceases from Imperialising, khaki has returned to the dust from which I am informed it derived its name, and we are a little advanced in the next decade, I look hopefully for a recrudescence of the upward trend of the early 'nineties; with something added, of course (we do move, you know), and, doubtless, with the inevitable switch down again a few years later.

Never mind the quality of the book I am about to name; but just reflect, if you please, upon the manner in which men and maidens talked of The Story of an African Farm in the early 'nineties. My point has little or nothing to do with that book, or with any other particular book, but with the attitude adopted towards it by the huge throng of men and women in the street.

But, you say, the same men and maidens in the street now discuss with equal fervour the "novel of the century"; the hundred-thousandth copy of Miss Corelli's mistress-piece. Precisely! But from how totally different a standpoint! They discuss its story—I beg pardon if I have inadvertently used too trivial a word. They discuss its moral purpose, its bearing upon religious sects, and so forth and so on, in a highly improving vein. They do not pretend to be concerned with its literary style (I write with bated breath) or with the writing within its covers, quâ writing, at all.

In the early 'nineties it was vastly different. Mamma in the suburbs discussed with her charming daughters, and with callers, the "atmosphere" of Miss D. E. Cadent's latest production. Papa, carrying home the fish for dinner in a mat basket, discussed on the tops of 'buses not the morality merely, but the literary style, the writing, the purely artistic merits and demerits, of the latest jewel from Vigo-street. You have your doubts, knowing Papa and Mamma intimately, as you do? Let us take a stroll down Fleet-street of the mid-decade, or, to be exact, of '93. Observe:

"This is a book which is a portentous sign of our time." The wildness, the fierceness, the animality that underlie the soft, smooth, surface of woman's pretty and subdued face—this is the theme to which—"&c.—T. P. O'Connor, M.P., in the Weekly Sun. "Singularity artistic in its brilliant suggestiveness."—Daily News, leading organ of Nonconformity. "A rich, passionate temperament vibrates through every line."—Eminently respectable, even Radical, Daily Chronicle. "These lovely sketches are informed by such throbbing feeling, such insight into complex woman, that we with all speed and warmth advise our readers—"&c.—Literary World, published by the proprietors of the Christian World. "A work of genius."—Speaker.

The book these lines were written in praise of ran through many editions, and was one of many treated in the same way. And that was not ages back, or in another country; but in the year of grace '93, and in this London of the six-shilling blood-and-khaki. It was the first volume in a series to which the title of "Keynotes" (what an archaic flavour the word has!) was given. Consider it, ye readers of newspapers in this year 1900!

I mentioned the matter the other day to a good friend of mine, who is a typical man in the street. "Why, yes," he said; "of course, we have our crazes; I suppose all peoples do; like heat waves. I guess that was a pretty nasty, drivelling sort of a period. There's not much trace of it now, anyway." Yes. Strong words those—nasty and drivelling. Not ill-fitting, perhaps; but consider the bearing upon my "periodicity" theory. Think what you will about the quality of the fictional art of that period. Many of its chosen subjects were beyond all doubt unpleasant, just as their treatment was frequently hysterical and sometimes offensive. But there can be no question about the wide, deep, and general interest displayed in it as art; the keen, earnest striving betrayed in it toward art; and the importunate demand made by it for the placing of literary and artistic standards above those of popularity and entertainment. And the man in the street met and obeyed the demand. At worst, he said he did. He no longer gave open vent to the Philistine cry for amusement, neat. He sought what he believed to be artistic merit. He asked for bread, and was given a sour sweetmeat? Possibly; but there was the striving. The avowed aim, however widely missed, was high.

Yes, relatively speaking, the aim was high. I scorn the inexpensive sneer, and affirm that in those sage-green booklets, with all their sticky unpleasantness, there was distinct striving after literary style. Nay; they had some good writing, with a genuine feeling for language, in them. The book themselves—oh, yes! One is glad to be quit of them. But the spirit abroad among us which made for that enthusiastic striving; that was finer than the gross, stodgy Boothby-cum-Corelli-cum-Khaki debauch of the decade's end.

That low man goes on adding one to one

His hundred's son hit:

This high man, aiming at a million,
Misses an unit.

For to-day, consider the caterers for the fictional debauch above-named; they toil not neither do they spin (in literature, at all events); yet I say unto you that Meredith and Hardy in all their glory are not arrayed like one of these. Neither are the dear and great dead of this decade.

But I hold to the "Periodicity an' Remittency" theory. The striving doubtless continues. Its recognition and reward is the thing intermittent. But, God save you merry gentlemen of the pen, it will come again!

A. J. DAWSON.

New Novels.

Eleanor. By Mrs. Humphry Ward. (Smith, Elder. 6s.)

AGAIN Mrs. Ward has put the whole strength of her sympathy and knowledge into a story of men and women chastened and ennobled by love. They suffer by the way, as all must who seek the best by the road of self-renunciation, to find in the end that they have what they gave. Again, behind the human and natural episodes of the story, the muffled pendulum of her thought swings from Roman Catholicism to Agnosticism, from Indifference to New England Puritanism; again we note the fairness with which she reveals the opinions and temperament of her characters; again we feel her unexpressed agreement with that pregnant saying that religion has its sources elsewhere than in history, and with that truth enunciated by the Buddha—"the mind is everything; what you think you become." Her characters find the food they need. What is theirs comes to them. Eleanor turns to the Cross for refuge, Manisty turns from the insincerity that made him think he had grasped the symbol, and Lucy Foster, the girl from New England, remaining her own sweet, strong self, influences both, to their lasting good.

The background is Italy. The story passes entirely in Italy, mainly at a villa a few miles from Rome, at the time of the terrible disaster at Adowa. There Manisty, a too gifted and magnificent youth to be wholly convincing, has retired, in dudgeon, from the beginnings of a brilliant political career in England. In plain words, he is sulking, and using his feverish leisure in writing a book on Italy. His sympathies are all with the Past and the Vatican. He is building up a figure, typical, representative, "of the New Italy, small, insolent, venal—insulting and despoiling the old Italy, venerable, beautiful, and defenceless." His cousin, Eleanor, is his amanuensis, and companion to her aunt. She adores him with a concentration and a consistency commoner in fiction than in life, and he—well, in the dim future, when life has ceased to be adventurous, he may reward her. The knell of Eleanor's bliss is sounded with the advent of Lucy Foster on a visit to the villa. Manisty treats her appearance first with anger, then with indifference, then with "the indulgence of the politician and man of affairs towards the little backwoods girl who was setting him to rights," and then—. The working out of the theme is done with great skill, and with a sympathy and intuition of the innermost feelings of these two attractive women that gives the story a rare intellectual and emotional interest.

In the early pages it is difficult to accept Manisty with patience. Egoistical, vain, overbearing, he is a figure that most men would heartily resent, but the impasto is intentional, and if the reader suffers at the beginning

Manisty reaps the sowing of his self-indulgence, and emerges a man. Here is the early Manisty. He has been explaining to Lucy that a book, "a rather Liberal book," protesting "against the way in which the Jesuits are ruining Catholic University education in Germany," has been placed upon the Index:

"He has asked your opinion?" said Lucy, pursuing the subject.

"Yes. I told him the book was excellent—and his condemnation certain."

Lucy bit her lip.

"Who did it?"

"The Jesuits—probably."

"And you defend them?"

"Of course!—They're the only gentlemen in Europe who thoroughly understand their own business."

"What a business!" said Lucy, breathing quick—"To rush on every little bit of truth they see and stamp it out!"

"Like any other dangerous firework—your simile is excellent."

"Dangerous!" She threw back her head.—"To the blind and the cripples."

"Who are the larger half of mankind. Precisely."

She hesitated, then could not restrain herself.

"But you're not concerned?"

"I? Oh dear no. I can be trusted with fireworks. Besides, I'm not a Catholic."

"Is that fair?—to stand outside slavery—and praise it?"

"Why not?—if it suits my purpose?"

The later Manisty develops, through experiences that are quite natural and convincing, into something fine and capable. In a word, he "finds himself," through suffering, to an awakening with clear eyes. And the same thing happens, though by a different road, to Father Benecke, the admirably drawn priest who is excommunicated, cast adrift, scorned on account of his book:

With the final act of defiance, obscurely carried out, conditioned he knew not how, there had arrived for him a marvelous liberation of soul. Even at sixty-five he felt himself tragically new-born—naked and feeble indeed, but still with unknown possibilities of growth and new life before him. His book, instead of being revised, must be re-written. No need now to tremble for a phrase! Let the truth be told. He plunged into his old studies again, and the world of thought met him with a friendlier and franker welcome. On all sides there was a rush and sparkle of new light. How far he must follow and submit his trembling soul did not know. But for the moment there was an extraordinary though painful exhilaration—the excitement of leading-strings withdrawn and walls thrown down.

It is this quality, this correspondence of the characters with the world-movement of hidden spiritual things, the progress of the individual through self-renunciation towards the best, that gives this love story—for Eleanor is essentially a love story—its value. The winning of love, or the loss of love, is not the end, but the way, and love found with pain and sorrow is shown to be the companion, the guide, that leads to the things that are not seen.

Quisanté. By Anthony Hope.
(Methuen. 6s.)

THIS is the most serious work that Anthony Hope has done. It is to be classed with The God in the Car rather than with The Prisoner of Zenda; but the primal conception is far more elusive, and the reader receives no such aid—of doubtful legitimacy in the field of art—as comes from an obvious connexion with a familiar figure of the contemporary world. Nevertheless, Quisanté, as the author conceived him, is truly here; while the woman ridiculing his attitudes and braggadocio, dreading and hating in him the dulness of perception that left him at the mercy of the temptation to do the thing which it is the note of an outsider to see no harm in, yet captured by the magnificence of his moments, is a splendid success. Here are sentences from the letter that Lady May wrote to the man who throughout had been in her confidence and now, Alexander Quisante being dead, wanted her to become his wife:

You can love people and then forget them and love somebody else; or love somebody else without forgetting. Love is simple and gentle, and, I suppose, gives way. Alexander doesn't give way. I shall hurt you now, I'm afraid, but I must say it. After him there can be no other man for me. I think I'm sorry I ever married him, for I could have loved somebody else and yet looked on at him. . . . I write very sadly; for I didn't love him. And now I can love nobody. I shall never quite know what that means. Or is it possible that I loved him without knowing it, and hated him sometimes just because of that? I mean, felt so terribly those times when he was—well, what you know he was sometimes. I find no answer to that. It never was what I thought love meant, what they tell you it means. But if love can mean sinking yourself in another person, living in and through him, meaning him when you say life, then I did love him.

We have chosen these fragments rather for the sake of conveying an impression of the situation, than as an especially striking example of what is to be found in the pages of Quisante. Sometimes they are brilliant; few of them are dull, and not one is irrelevant. The author maintains to the last his grip of the situation and the persons.

Old Fires and Profitable Ghosts. By A. T. Quiller-Couch.
(Cassell. 6s.)

"Q" is an artist; not a great artist, but always a real artist. He is a critic of admirable discernment, in whom the imitative instinct is bewilderingly puissant. It is characteristic of him that he could set to work upon the unfinished St. Ives and so carry it through that, from his own place, the author might have pronounced upon this complement of his unfinished story: "This is true, if inferior, I."

In these stories, as ever, Stevenson lords it: "The Lady of the Ship," "Frozen Margit," "The Adventure of a Small Free-Trader," "The Mystery of Joseph Laquedem" (not these alone)—well, they would easily pass muster as authentic R. L. S. But though the trail of Vailima is over it all, other modern influences, too, may be noted, even by the least critical, in the work of this so generous appraiser of his contemporaries. Nothing, for instance, could show less likeness to Mr. Kipling's manner than "The Mystery of Joseph Laquedem," yet that story could hardly be read without a running reference to "The Finest Story in the World," "Once Aboard the Lugger"—not, it must be confessed, a convincing tale—touches the ports of Wessex and Thrums; and "A Pair of Heads" suggests an author whom in this connexion it would be (to him) flattery to name: for "Q" does admirably, as they say, come off. His treatment of the preternatural is, indeed, perfectly adroit. His story is told through the proper mouthpiece—comes from the lips of one who may well have believed it, and who, besides, was quite incapable of inventing it.

Apart from the rest stands the story, the vision, entitled "Oceanus," as the most memorable thing that, to our knowledge, Mr. Quiller-Couch has invented. The narrator, tormented by the insoluble problem of the cruelty that seems to rule in Nature, comes riding to a great arena that is fenced about with carved stone. Within, every anguish is presented. He penetrates; witnesses all cruelties in act:

"I will see no more!" I cried, and turned towards the great purple canopy. High over it the sun broke yellow on the climbing tiers of seats. "Harry! someone is watching behind those curtains! Is it HE?"

Harry bent his head.

"But this is as I believed! This is Nero, and ten times worse than Nero! Why did you bring me here?" I flung my hands towards the purple throne, and, finding myself close to a fellow who scattered sawdust with both hands, made a spring to tear his mask away. But Harry stretched out an arm.

"That will not help you," he said. "The man has no face."

"No face!"

"He once had a face, but it has perished. His was as the face of these sufferers. Look at them."

I looked from cage to cage, and now saw that indeed all these sufferers—men and women—had but one face: the same wrung brow, the same wistful eyes, the same lips bitten in anguish. I knew the face. We all know it.

"His own Son! O devil rather than God!" I fell on my knees in the gushing water and covered my eyes.

"Stand up, listen and look!" said Harry's voice.

"What can I see? He hides behind the curtain."

"And the curtain?"

"It shakes continually."

"That is His sob. Listen! What of the water?"

"It runs from the throne and about the floor. It washes off the blood."

"That water is His tears. It flows hence down the hill, and washes all the shores of earth."

Once, from the floor of his cage, a monkey caught up a fragment of a mirror, and glared at it; at first vaguely, then with attention. And for the space of a flash of lightning he knew: "I am I." The man who imagined this parable of blood and water is no mere "sedulous ape."

Joan Brotherhood. By Bernard Capes.
(Pearson. 6s.)

MR. CAPES's literary faculty is in excess of his creative power, and the result is that he invites criticism which, if this excess did not trouble us, would pass him by scatheless. We find delicacy, insight, power over words, and other good things on every page of this story; yet the story leaves us rather cold. We have here not a creation, but a postulate. All through you are conscious that a theme has been selected as an exercise, and that you are privileged to see it worked out. But you are not convinced by the story, or warmed by the characters. If the story holds you, it is because you are attracted by the intellectuality of its telling; and because there are thrown up a great number of delicate side-issues, reflections, paradoxes, and penetrative remarks, which are clever in themselves, and may be useful in other connexions. No; Mr. Capes begins at the wrong end. He is all for ideas and their effective exploitation. His characters are brought into existence not to live their own lives, but to assist him to literary ends. For this reason Mr. Capes should take a credible thesis from without; say, stick to the historical vein which he worked with so much success—though in a too phrase-laden style—in his Comte de la Muette and Our Lady of Darkness. When, as in this case, he tries to make a story of his own; when we are to depend on him for both base and superstructure, or for both body and garment, the result is not satisfactory. Frankly, we do not believe in Joan Brotherhood, the sea-foundling and stage-struck girl; or in her lover, the spineless, but voluble, Latimer, who is alternately swayed by Joan and a truculent evangelical named Wilson who for his zeal to the Lord is ready to throw Joan down a well that Latimer may be saved for the saving of sinners. These and several other characters are too often talking for Mr. Capes. They are his deputies to the reader; and there is curious similarity between the comment and the dialogue throughout the story, which develops, not like an organic thing, but like a tessellated design, phrase by phrase. The phrases are not so weird and dominant as some of Mr. Capes's earlier stories, yet they are sufficiently numerous and punctual to seem to MESSRS. WM. BLACKWOOD & SONS' LIST OF NOVELS.

By JOSEPH CONRAD.

LORD JIM: a Tale. By Joseph Conrad, Author of "The Nigger of the Narcissus," "An Outcast of the Islands," "Tales of Unrest," &c. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"The wind blows in your face, and you are filled with a sense of breadth, of space, of palpitating real life which is refreshing. 'Lord Jim' is a strong, sincere, and efficient piece of work, a human document if ever there was one, and we congratulate Mr. Conrad upon a notable book."—Daily Chronicle.

"Told with all Mr. Conrad's precision and romantic fervour."—Telegraph.

By SIR HERBERT MAXWELL, Bart.

THE CHEVALIER of the SPLENDID CREST. By the Right Hon. Sir HERBERT MAXWELL, Bart., M.P., Author of "A Duke of Britain," &c. &c. Third Edition. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"A pleasant change from the average novel of to-day.... We can cordially recommend the novel to all who do not want to read about golf or baccarat, Wagner or Masterlinck, suburban or slum life."—Spectator.

By HAMILTON DRUMMOND.

A KING'S PAWN: a Romance. By Hamilton Drummond. Author of "A Man of his Age," "For the Religion," &c. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"An historical romance of the time of Henry of Bourbon.... Mr. Drummond has not only a sense of the picturesque, but a style much above the common."—Outlook.

By JANE JONES.

THE PRISON-HOUSE: a Romance. By Jane Jones. Second Impression. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"One of the most powerful novels of the season."—Punch.

By B. PAUL NEUMAN.

THE UTMOST FARTHING. By B. Paul Neuman, Author of "The Interpreter's House," "The Supplanter," "A Villain of Parts," Crown 8vo, 6s.

"This clever and decidedly original story.... A narrative of remarkable dramatic quality."—Daily Chronicle.

By J. STORER CLOUSTON.

THE LUNATIC at LARGE. Third Impression. Crown 8vo, 6s.

By GRAHAM TRAVERS.

MONA MACLEAN. MEDICAL STUDENT. Fifteenth and Cheaper Edition. Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d.

WINDYHAUGH. Fourth Edition. Crown 8vo, 6s.

FELLOW TRAVELLERS. Fourth Edition. Crown 8vo, 6s.

By BEATRICE HARRADEN.

THE FOWLER. Third Edition. Crown 8vo, 6s.

IN VARYING MOODS: Short Stories. Thirteenth Edition. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

HILDA STRAFFORD, and THE REMITTANCE MAN. Eleventh Edition. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

SHIPS that PASS in the NIGHT. Twentieth Edition. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

By BERNARD CAPES.

FROM DOOR to DOOR. Crown 8vo, 6s.

OUR LADY of DARKNESS. Crown 8vo, 6s.

THE ADVENTURES of the COMTE de la MUETTE during the REIGN of TERROR. Crown 8vo, 6s.

By W. E. W. COLLINS.

THE DON and the UNDERGRADUATE: a Tale of St. Hilary's College, Oxford. Crown 8vo, 6s.

A SCHOLAR of his COLLEGE. Crown 8vo, 6s. [Immediately.]

By NEIL MUNRO.

JOHN SPLENDID. Sixth Edition. Crown 8vo, 6s.

THE LOST PIBROCH. Fourth Edition. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

By ZACK.

ON TRIAL. Second Edition. Crown 8vo, 6s.

LIFE is LIFE. Second Edition. Crown 8vo, 6s.

By SYDNEY GRIER.

IN FURTHEST IND. Post 8vo, 6s.

HIS EXCELLENCY'S ENGLISH GOVERNESS. Second Edition. Crown 8vo, 6s.

AN UNCROWNED KING. Second Edition. Crown 8vo, 6s.

PEACE with HONOUR. Second Edition. Crown 8vo, 6s.

A CROWNED QUEEN. Crown 8vo, 6s.

LIKE ANOTHER HELEN. Second Edition. Crown 8vo, 6s.

THE KINGS of the EAST. Crown 8vo, 6s.

WILLIAM BLACKWOOD & SONS, Edinburgh and London.

HURST & BLACKETT'S NEW BOOKS.

NOW READY. In 1 vol., crown 8vo. Fully illustrated by Drawings by A. D. McCormick (from Sketches made by E. S. Grogan), Original Drawings by E. S. Grogan, Photographs and Photogravure Portraits of the Authors, Maps, &c.

PRICE ONE GUINEA NET.

FROM THE CAPE TO CAIRO,

The First Traverse of Africa from South to North.

By EWART S. GROGAN and ARTHUR H. SHARP.

With Introductory Letter from the Right Hon. Cecil Rhodes.

"A notable and attractive addition to the great library of African travel." Morning Post.

"Mr. Grogan captivates his readers from the very beginning of his story. The volume abounds in good practical sense and shrewd observation. Its illustrations, of which there are about a hundred and twenty, are admirable." Daily News.

"A book that deserves the heartiest reception from all who like bright and vividly written and magnificently illustrated accounts of travel and adventure. The authors have seen much that is new and strange in these little-known regions of Central Africa, and they record it with admirable judgment and effect."—Daily Express.

THE BOOK OF THE MOMENT.

In 1 vol., crown 8vo, with Map, price 6s.

THE RENASCENCE of SOUTH AFRICA.

By ARCHIBALD R. COLQUHOUN, Author of "China in Transformation," formerly Administrator of Mashonaland, South Africa.

NEW AND INTERESTING BOOK OF TRAVEL.

In 1 vol., demy 8vo, with 90 Illustrations, after Drawings and Photographs by the Author, price 12s. net.

AMONG the WOMEN of the SAHARA.

By Madame JEAN POMMEROL. Translated by Mrs. ARTHUR BELL (N. PAVERS), Author of "The Elementary History of Art," &c.

A SPLENDID BOOK ON SPORT IN INDIA.

Now ready, in 1 vol., demy 8vo, with 59 Illustrations and 3 Maps, 16s. net.

WILD SPORTS of BURMA and ASSAM.

By Colonel POLLOCK (late Staff Corps) and W. S. THOM (Assistant Superintendent of Police, Burma).

NEW AND POPULAR NOVELS.

A SUFFOLK COURTSHIP.

By M. BETHAM EDWARDS,

Author of "The Lord of the Harvest," "A Storm-rent Sky," &c.

In 1 vol., crown 8vo, price 6s. [In the press.]

A TRAGEDY OF THREE.

By T. T. DAHLE.

1 vol., crown 8vo, price 6s.

MOTHER-SISTER.

By EDWIN PUGH,

Author of "Tony Drum," "The Man of Straw," &c.

In 1 vol., crown 8vo, 6s.

THE DISHONOUR of FRANK SCOTT.

By M. HAMILTON,

Author of "A Self-denying Ordinance," "Macleod of the Camerons," &c.

In 1 vol., crown 8vo, 6s.

THE SILENT GATE: a Voyage into Prison.

By TIGHE HOPKINS,

Author of "An Idler in Old France," "The Dungeons of Old Paris," &c.

In 1 vol., crown 8vo, 6s.

THE WORLD'S SLOW STAIN.

By HAROLD VALLINGS,

Author of "The Transgression of Terence Cheney," "A Month of Madness," &c.

In 1 vol., crown 8vo, 6s.

A DAUGHTER OF WITCHES: a Romance.

By JOANNA WOOD,

Author of "The Untempered Wind," "Judith Moore," &c.

In 1 vol., crown 8vo, 6s.

ON ALIEN SHORES.

By LESLIE KEITH,

Author of "The Mischief Maker," "Lisbeth," &c.

In 1 vol., crown 8vo, 6s.

HURST & BLACKETT, LIMITED, 13, Great Marlborough Street.

pass like telegraph posts seen from a railway carriage window. The wires seem to rise, the phrase passes, and then the wires slope down to be jerked up by another phrase. So that even Mr. Capes's successes in this kind come to be looked for, and the reader's pleasure is less in the phrase than in its punctual arrival. "Crowdie writhed. His face was like wet veal." Now, in its place, that is quite good; but its place is at the bottom of page 243, and by that time the reader—relieved of any very compelling interest in the story—is inclined to say: "There goes another," or "What, ho!—she bumps." And yet it is an ungrateful task to criticise Mr. Capes like this, seeing that, if he did not write so well, or conceive so intellectually, we could give him the praise which—using another standard—falls to less clever and important writers.

Cunning Murrell. By Arthur Morrison.
(Methuen. 6s.)

THERE is a hard, clear polish in Mr. Morrison's writing that is seen at its best in this book. The style is also kept up to a high level. Between the first page and the last we have not detected a slovenly or careless passage, and scarcely anything that could be called a purple patch. Yet, at the end, we rather doubt if the proper manner be wedded to the matter. In this novel Mr. Morrison has left the Jago and its mean streets for what was in 1854—the date of the story—the secluded fishing agricultural village of Hadleigh. His theme is rural superstition. Cunning Murrell is a professor of white magic, master of the devil, and witchfinder, and round his "curis and powerful arts" all the interest centres. A few yokels and their womenkind, a simple, one-legged old tar, a blacksmith, various smugglers, and one or two Revenue officers form the dramatis personæ. Very little stress is laid on plot or story, Mr. Morrison relying chiefly for his interest on the sayings and doings of his village clowns. That is why we think a less nervous and direct style would have answered better. What was needed to present them attractively was an abundant and sunny humour, a love of whim and foible, and it well may be a gentle and kindly satire. We would fain reduce fault-finding to a minimum in the case of work so strong and conscientious, but the story in our opinion loses attractiveness from a lack of these qualities in Mr. Morrison. His picture is too stern and harsh. The superstition, too, is a little overdone. In a dedicatory letter the author informs us that Cunning Murrell was an historical character who left behind him an "amazing heap of documents." Well, that does not matter one bit. The Murrell of Mr. Morrison's imagination is not the quack who was dealing in potions and spells during the early days of the Crimean War. The test we apply is not "historical," but whether he is an authentic, credible character who falls naturally into his place in the little world of the novel. One cannot write absolutely on the point. All that we can say is that one reader, very willing and anxious to be pleased, has not been able to obtain this impression. A possible explanation is that village superstition is dragged too violently into the foreground, whereas it rather lurks in the background of country life.

Without being in any case extraordinary, the characters are all etched in with Mr. Morrison's incisive cleverness. Any one of the scenes wherein the mother wit of Murrell is pitched against that of the various people who try to get the better of him is worth quoting; indeed, the dialogue throughout does infinite credit to the accurate observation, and still more to the self-restraint, of a writer who never is tempted into exaggeration. In the squalor, bitterness, and gross superstition of the Barlams, the alleged sufferers from the witchcraft of an innocent old woman, Mr. Morrison finds opportunity for displaying those qualities that make his tales of mean streets at once so striking and so repellent. As a contrast he has drawn for us Roboshobery Dove—the name is too good to have been wasted on so conventional a figure. Much as we like the old sailor, man-of-war's man, and ex-smuggler, who "fit the French so high! so high! Damme!" he is not much more than a lay figure. The women are nearly all done better than the men, and are without exception extremely miserable or very unamiable.

The Brass Bottle. By F. Anstey.
(Smith, Elder & Co. 6s.)

MR. ANSTEY, after too long a silence, has mixed another of those compounds of ancient magic and latter-day middle-class life of which the best example is Vice Versa. In the new book, Horace Ventimore, an architect of slender income, becomes possessed of a brass jar from which, when the lid is at last removed, emerges a Jinnee of the kind made familiar by the Arabian Nights Entertainments. This Jinnee, in gratitude to his rescuer, heaps upon Horace Ventimore a series of embarrassing gifts, which threaten the complete ruin of all his prospects, both professional and amatory; but, of course, are diverted in time into beneficial channels.

Mr. Anstey tells the story with his usual matter-of-fact precision; but it lacks spontaneity. The machinery creaks a little, and we are asked to believe rather too much. Leander Tweddle's vicissitudes with his tinted Venus, Mr. Bultitude's adventures in his son's shape, were not incredible. Granted the magic at the back of them they seemed possible and undetectable by the neighbours. But Ventimore's Jinnee builds a huge Oriental palace for a client in Hampshire in a single night, transforms Ventimore's lodgings into halls of Arabian splendour with the same celerity, and sends him presents by a train of camels. These things are not acceptable to us for the reason that they would have excited public attention and remark, and would have led to difficulties ignored by the author.

Here and there we have laughed a good deal as we read, but the total effect of the story is not what it might be. Some of the Jinnee's proverbs are amusing. Thus: "He that adventureth upon matrimony is like unto one who thrusteth his hand into a sack containing many thousands of serpents and one eel. Yet, if Fate so decree, he may draw forth the eel."

The Soul of the Countess, and Other Stories, with Verse Preludes. By Jessie L. Weston.
(David Nutt. 3s. 6d.)

THESE stories are full of "nice" feeling. They have a touch of poetry and are written in good English, the archaic alliterations of which are not offensive. A young reader, to whom the ideas and motives were not trite, might well find in them a considerable charm. But to readers acquainted with many and better fanciful tales there is nothing here really fresh, nothing bearing that stamp of individual personality which alone, at this stage of the world's literary development, can give value to work in this branch.

The first story challenges comparison with one in the too little known volume called The Necklace of Princess Fiorimonde, and to compare the two is a lesson in story-telling. "The Heart of Princess Joan" is not by any means the best story in its group, but it has firmness of outline, wealth of incident, a gradual heightening of interest, and genuine pathos. Compared with it "The Soul of the Countess" lacks depth, variety, and climax.

"Our Lady of the Forest," again, bears a superficial resemblance to one of Mr. Maurice Hewlett's Little Novels of Italy, and the contrast in resemblance is curious. Mr. Hewlett's irony may irritate and offend even while it charms, but at least the impression remains; while Miss Weston's irreproachable little miracle legend, with a daintiness and purity of its own that ought to make a gem of it, leaves no impression at all. So with "The Archbishop that was a Saint." Andersen would have made that story complete, naïve, and also classical in a couple of pages; Dr. Garnett would have touched it with a sly and mischievous humour delightful to the few and incomprehensible to the many: Miss Weston manages just to miss the vital something. In the writing of legends and fairy tales there is no middle path: there are but the best and the bad; and these are not of the best.

Clare Monro: the Story of a Mother and Daughter.
By Hannah Lynch. (John Milne. 2s. 6d.)

IN her new volume Miss Lynch has dealt in the dimensions of a sketch with a subject large enough to furnish forth the old-fashioned three volumes. Only the method of Ibsen, who gathers together in a few poignant scenes of the present the whole background of a group of lives, could render interesting in less than two hundred small pages the history of this mother and daughter. As it is, there has not been room to make persons of them, and they remain puppets—the puppets of melodrama. They are attitudes, not characters. The necessity of compressing too big a story has destroyed gradation; everything is sudden, violent, pitched a note or two above the key of nature, so that modern English ladies say: "Had I known," and: "Ah, this can never be." The total absence of humour—amazing in the work of a writer so well endowed with the quality—heightens the effect of falsetto; and there are occasional slips and awkwardnesses of style which might perhaps pass unnoticed but for the challenge of the publisher's injudicious quotation, from some unnamed critic, of a declaration that "her work is recognised as that of the first living exponent of English classic style." Praise so exaggerated sets human perversity seeking to pick holes, and the search is soon successful. "To feel so alive to his dulness" is not precisely a classic form of expression; nor is it permissible in English to divide a pronoun from its antecedent noun, as is done on page 22, by two full stops and an intervening sentence with no fewer than seven other nouns in it. In short, Clare Monro is not, and probably was never meant to be, written in a classic style at all. It was, however, probably meant to be a tragedy, and it does but succeed in being a melodrama. Miss Lynch, whose standing is really a high one, has done and should do better things.

The Novel of Domesticity.

Rue with a Difference. By Rosa Nouchette Carey.
(Macmillan & Co. 6s.)

IT may be said concerning some novels that their titles are an absolute disclosure of them. The remark applies to nearly all Miss Carey's. For thirty-two years she has been sending forth amiable and blameless romances of an austere etiquette, with titles like Wee Wife, Not Like other Girls, and Queenie's Whim. We may say that we have read these books, but, had we not done so, we should still have known them; and now here is Rue with a Difference—a romance with even less romance in it. The scene is laid in a cathedral town (doubtless Winchester disguised), and canons and deans abound. Here the phrase "the dear dean" is used seriously. After Valerie (heroine) has betrothed herself to the hero, who saved her from the falling bough of a snow-laden tree, she says, "in a relieved tone": "I am glad the Dean approved." And, when the same lady makes an afternoon call, this speech is recorded of her hostess: "A thousand pardons for keeping you waiting, Mrs. Thurston. I have been indisposed, and keeping my room late, and I was still engaged with my toilette when your name was brought to me." The point is, not that the hostess should have so spoken, but that Miss Carey should have set the words down. The book is full of nothings—mild, inoffensive, inexpressibly tedious. It is so negligible that in the very act of perusal you scarcely know whether you are reading it or not. Yet it, too, is in the scheme of things; it inculcates truth—narrow, shallow, fractional, but still truth of a sort. Because of its narcotic sobriety, its calm dignity, its perfect lack of humour, its profound and splendid ignorance, its loyalty to an exhausted convention, it deserves, and it shall have, respect.

Path and Goal. By Ada Cambridge.
(Methuen & Co. 6s.)

MISS CAMBRIDGE also begins in a cathedral town, but she at once shows a wider and a worldlier view. She laughs openly at curates—"the Dundreary-whiskered young man with the severe dog-collar and the dangling gold cross"—and she has a perception that district visitors may be absurd in their romanticism. Path and Goal is an example of the "powerful" domestic novel. It may start in Wakeminster, but it ends—and ends tragically—on the high seas. While the final storm is done fairly well, the catastrophe itself seems unconvincing and unnecessary; it is merely the result of a firm intention to be "powerful." Miss Cambridge is seldom original. Her characters have been invented for her by predecessors in the art. There is the girl with "the rich voice, rolling, organ-like, at the back of the throat"; and the girl "whose beautifully dressed head and marble neck, white as the pearls encircling it [how long will this obviously silly mis-statement about flesh persist?] rose, Clytie-like, from the bank of flowers. . ."; and the "unassuming brown-haired, grey-eyed girl, in a washed muslin frock." Of course the last is the heroine. The name of the hero is Adrian. Despite a heavy touch and a constantly recurring conventionality, the book is quite readable. At the back of it is a little genuine creative force, a little real passion.

Monica Grey. By Lady Hely-Hutchinson.
(John Murray. 2s. 6d. net.)

IN an exhortatory and somewhat pietistic preface Lady Hely-Hutchinson remarks, apropos of the South African War, that God "will not disdain the offering of a nation's sorrowing womanhood"; and she urges her "sister women" not to murmur if their place—"their very own allotted place"—is "not in the showy fighting line." We have failed to perceive the connexion between this and Monica's history. The principal situation in Monica Grey recalls Balzac's Lily in the Valley, being that of a pure and noble married woman passionately in love with a man not her husband. There is a great deal of debating-society talk in the book, and twice the perfect Monica is made to express herself on the subject of fallen women. The second time she spoke thus:

"Have you forgotten who it was who said, 'She loved much because much was forgiven her,' and to whom He said it?" I asked her, in my turn.

"I have not forgotten," Monica said wistfully; "but I never have quite understood. I really have doubted, in all reverence, whether our Lord was not too tender with such women. Could His spotless purity fathom the depths into which depravity and loss of self-respect may drag a human being? Could He know how low that woman had fallen? Could He understand how well-deserved her shame and misery were?"

Such sentiments, "in all reverence," scarcely showed the perfect Monica in her best light, and one is not quite grieved for her awful predicament with that lame darling, Ronald Lindsay. Lady Hely-Hutchinson solves the difficulty by killing both lovers. It was a clumsy, feeble-forcible expedient, and, with the vibrating vox humana stop full on the whole time, the latter half of the book scarcely escapes being maudlin. The author has lofty, if limited, ideals, and doubtless Monica Grey is a sincere expression of them. But it is the novel of an amateur from end to end.

The Dissemblers. By Thomas Cobb.
(John Lane. 6s.)

IN The Dissemblers Mr. Cobb has constructed an amusing intrigue on the basis of a most ordinary domestic situation. Penelope, a modern independent orphan, quarrelled with her Aunt Esther (a dark, vindictive woman, separated from her husband) and left Esther's house for Paris. The aunt thought Pen had eloped with a certain impecunious Jack, and she sent two men in pursuit. One of these men was Leslie Munro, the world-famous novelist of an Empire's life, and the other was an ass named Cusack. One went to Dover, the other to Folkestone, and each thought he was the sole emissary. Munro overtook Penelope at Dover (she was not eloping—merely escaping to friends in Latetia), and he persuaded her to return. Cusack, having done Folkestone, was inspired to proceed to Dover, where he saw Munro with Penelope, and, misapprehending the case, punched him in the mouth. The punching was not irremediable, and might have been remedied, had not the whole thing got itself in the papers, and had not Penelope's legal guardian arrived on a sudden from India. The guardian insisted on instant marriage between Munro and Penelope, as the one means of hushing scandal. To appease him, the pair consented to a temporary and purely formal engagement, which was to be broken off when it had served its purpose. Then Jack, rich at last, intervenes, and more trouble ensues. The point is that Munro and Penelope were actually in love, though "dissemblers." On the last page they kiss. And all this springs from a quarrel between aunt and niece. The quickly moving tale is told with admirable skill. Of course it has neither height nor depth of passion, but in many ways it is the best, the neatest book that fertile Mr. Cobb has yet produced. It is continually funny, not in phrase, but in its predicaments. The Dover-Folkestone scenes are delightful.

The Conscience of Coralie. By F. Frankfort Moore.
(C. A. Pearson, Ltd. 6s.)

MR. FRANKFORT MOORE has returned to his old vein, the vein of I Forbid the Banns and A Gray Eye or So; and we are glad. Coralie Randal, owner of the conscience, was the yearning and earnest daughter of an American millionaire. She came over to England to study British society, and the Irish Question in particular, under the wing of Lady Glasnamara. On arrival she was as raw as a milkmaid, and Rosamund, Lady Glasnamara's daughter, soon discovered the fact:

"We are not made in the same mould," the American girl remarked, but not until a considerable space had elapsed. "I could not read an account of bloodshed; I am a member of the Brotherly Love Society of Nokomis. Our aim is to make war and bloodshed impossible."

"I hope your aims will be realised," said the English girl. "Where is Nokomis?"

"It's in Hebron County," replied Coralie. "Hiram Dewey is the president of the Brotherly Love Society."

"And who is Hiram Dewey?"

"What, you never heard of Hiram Dewey, the orator? Carpenter G. Harker says he is the greatest orator that has lived since Demosthenes."

"And who is Carpenter G. Harker?"

"Ah, now I see that you have been in jest all along; and I thought you in earnest. Every one must have heard of Carpenter G. Harker, the Father of Personality."

The author unrolls, as it were, the whole panorama of English life before the eyes of this girl (who was not a fool), and duly provides her with a lover. Her conscience nearly drives her back to America; but the lover, after a ride of fourteen miles within the hour, stops Coralie in the nick of time, and the novel ends. It is very witty and amusing; quite as good, we think, as anything that Mr. Moore has accomplished: and to say that is to say something. After his deviations into the eighteenth century and elsewhere, Mr. Moore proves that he has lost none of his faculty for imperturbably and smilingly stripping modern shams of their pageantry.

The Worldlings. By Leonard Merrick.
(John Murray. 6s.)

MR. MERRICK'S aim is always "to tell a story"; and that, after all, should be the sole aim of the novelist. He finds an interesting sequence of events (which implies that he finds at least one interesting character), and then he proceeds to relate, as simply as possible. There is no decoration, no overlying, no pause for the performance of feats for the gallery. This is right. Some novelists are called artists because they do the very tricks which Mr. Merrick is artist enough to leave alone. The Worldlings begins in South Africa, where Maurice Blake, a failure, learns of the death of a friend who had been living with a mistress. The dead man is the son of a baronet with twenty thousand a year, and Rosa, the mistress, suggests that Blake should personate him. After resisting the temptation, Maurice yields, and promises to give Rosa a quarter of all receipts, and to introduce her into society. Behold him next the centre of a luxurious English domesticity. He marries, and adores his wife. Now it is that Blake (called Jardine), out of respect for his wife, declines to fulfil the second part of his engagement with Rosa. Complications ensue, and at length Blake confesses everything to the aged baronet. He is about to retire again into obscurity, when the loyalty of the woman he loves saves him from the consequence of his crime. We have put the outline of the plot baldly. In a sense the novel, too, is bald; but it is also good—quiet, unassuming, severe, dignified. The characterisation of the four principal persons is done with genuine skill. While missing both brilliance and extreme power, The Worldlings is still, within its limits, a quite satisfactory piece of art.

Edmund Fulleston; or, the Family Evil Genius.
By B. B. West. (Longmans. 6s.)

SOMEWHAT old-fashioned, and perhaps a little tedious in places, this is nevertheless a sound and strong novel of social life, and by no means without originality. It relates the history of the two ruling families, the Campbells and the Mitchells, of that ancient ecclesiastical city, Halesherston, and shows how the entire clan was ruined by Edmund Fulleston, a connexion by marriage, and how Fulleston erected his own proud edifice on the debris of their fall. The character of Fulleston, the mild, stuttering, flattering insinuator, is drawn with real effectiveness, and, indeed, the portraits of all the various members of the Campbell-Mitchell fraternity have an unusual vitality. Mr. West employs a plain, straightforward method, almost wholly dispensing with dialogue, and he has certainly compassed a diverting and valuable study of domestic and municipal life. We have read the book with zest. The chief fault of the story lies in the pattern-like regularity of the results of Fulleston's intercourse with the different chiefs of the clan. The nomenclature of the characters and their residences, too, is a blot on the book. Mr. West belongs to the same small school of novelists as that ingenious and clever, but insufficiently appreciated, writer, Mr. Thomas Pinkerton, the author of Dead Oppressors. To those who know Mr. Pinkerton's work this will be a recommendation.

SOME NOTABLE BOOKS

FOR READERS OF NOVELS.

TWENTY-SECOND THOUSAND IN THE PRESS.

SENATOR NORTH. By Gertrude Atherton, Author of "Patience Sparhawk," "American Wives and English Husbands," &c. Cr. 8vo, 6s.

"Brilliant and interesting."—Spectator.
"A great and notable success."—Daily Telegraph.
"A great novel."—Forty Four.
"A strong work."—Outlook.
"A distinguished work."—Academy.

THIRTY-SECOND THOUSAND IN THE PRESS.

THE CARDINAL'S SNUFF-BOX. By Henry Harland,

Author of "Comedies and Errors," "Grey Roses," &c. Crown 8vo, 6s.
"Dainty and delicious."—Pall Mall Gazette.
"Every page of it is interesting."—Morning Post.
"A book among a thousand."—Times.
"A work of art."—World.
"A charming romance."—Spectator.

THE DISSEMBLERS. By Thomas Cobb, Author of

"Scruples," "The Judgment of Helen," "Mr. Passingham," &c. [Just published.

LOVE of COMRADES: a Romance. By Frank

MATHEW, Author of "Defender of the Faith," "One Queen Triumphant," &c. [Just published.

FOR LOVERS OF GARDENS.

SEVEN GARDENS and a PALACE. By E. V. B.,

Author of "Days and Hours in a Garden." With numerous illustrations by F. L. E. Friggs and Arthur Gifford. Crown 8vo, 5s. net. [Third Edition.
"One of the most charming books which have been published for many a long day."—Country Life.

THE CHRONICLE of a CORNISH GARDEN. By

HARRY ROBERTS. With 7 illustrations of an Ideal Garden by F. L. E. Friggs. [Just published.

MISCELLANEOUS.

AMERICANS. Large Cartoons. By C. D. Gibson.

In form with "The Education of Mr. Pipp," "Pictures of People," &c. Large folio, 18 by 12 inches, price 20s.

THE CHURCH of the FATHERS. By John Henry

NEWMAN (afterwards Cardinal). Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

THE FILIPINO MARTYRS: the Story of the Crime of February 4th, 1899. By an Eye-Witness, RICHARD BEINSLEY SHERIDAN. With a New Map and 3 illustrations. Crown 8vo, 5s.

WORLDLY WAYS and BYWAYS. By An Idler

(ELIOT GREGORY). Crown 8vo, 6s.

THE MYSTERY of GODLINESS: a Poem. By

P. B. McNEV-OUTTS, Author of "The Revelation of St. Love the Divine," "The Alhambra, and other Poems," &c. Folt 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

VOLUME VI. NOW READY.

THE ANGLO-SAXON REVIEW.

A QUARTERLY MISCELLANY.

Edited by Lady RANDOLPH SPENCER CHURCHILL

(Mrs. GEORGE CORNWALLIS-WEST).

Bound in leather, with a Design in Gold from an Historic Binding.

Price 21s. net per quarter.

CONTENTS.

ON the BINDING. CYRIL DAVENPORT.

LONDON—AFTER FORTY YEARS. Sir WENESS REID.

A STUDY in DESPAIR. HUGH CLIFORD.

COMET-LORE. E. V. HAWARD.

CONCERNING some PORTRAITS of EMMA, LADY HAMILTON. Lord

RONALD SUTHERLAND GOWER.

MAILBOROUGH and WELLINGTON. Judge O'CONNOR MORRIS.

THREE SEERESSES (1886-1900, 142-143). ANDREW LANG.

"THE BLUIDY ADVOCATE MACKENZIE." FRANCIS WATT.

SISTER BEATRICE: a Miracle Play. In Three Acts. MAURICE MARFELINGK.

Done into English by A. BERNARD MIDDLE.

SHELLEY'S VIEWS on ART. RICHARD GARNETT, C.B.

A FRENCH GOVERNESS. EDITH SIEDEL.

TOLSTOY and TURGENIEFF. EDWARD GARNETT.

THE QUEEN'S CHRONICLER. STEPHEN GWYNNE.

AUNT MAISIE'S INDISCRETION. W. EARL HODGSON.

THE SALON in ENGLAND. GEORGE WHALE.

POSTPONED. R. B. CUNNINGHAME GRAHAM.

"THE GARDEN of LOVE." A Painting by Rubens in the Prado. MAX

BEERBOHM.

SIR HARRY PARKES in CHINA. S. LANE-POOLE.

IMPRESSIONS and OPINIONS.

ILLUSTRATIONS.

FRANÇOISE D'AUBIGNÉ, Marquise de Maitenon. FERDINAND ELLÉ.

LADY HAMILTON. TISBEIN.

LADY HAMILTON: Cameo and Miniature.

THE LORD ADVOCATE MACKENZIE. KNELLER.

LÉON TOLSTOY. J. E. RÉPINE.

IVAN TURGENIEFF. J. E. RÉPINE.

Mr. JOHN LANE will send his Illustrated Autumn Lists, post free, on receipt of a post card.

JOHN LANE, Publisher, Vigo Street, London, W.

HARPER & BROTHERS'

NEW FICTION.

AN ANONYMOUS SATIRE ON MODERN SOCIAL LIFE.

Slaves of Society.

A Comedy in Covers.

By THE MAN WHO HEARD SOMETHING.

Crown 8vo, cloth decorated, 6s.

[Now ready.

"The tale is clever in its delineation of character, ingeniously constructed, and sparkling in its dialogue, painting the fashionable people of the moment in vivid, graceful lines, and no one will read it without a keen and hearty enjoyment."—Scotsman.

Chloris of the Island.

By H. B. MARRIOTT WATSON,

Author of "The Adventurers," "The Rebel," "The Princess Xenia."

Crown 8vo, illustrated, 6s.

[Ready Nov. 1.

The Inner Shrine.

By Mrs. ALFRED SIDGWICK

(Mrs. ANDREW DEAN),

Author of "The Grasshoppers," "Mrs. Finch, Brassey."

Crown 8vo, 6s.

[Just published.

A Breaker of Laws.

W. PETT RIDGE'S

LATEST STUDY OF THE COCKNEY CHARACTER AND

"MEAN STREET" LIFE.

Cloth, 6s.

"The tone of the book is excellent throughout: it is the life of the slums caught at its happiest moments and admirably reproduced, not the least of its merits being that, though true, it is never distasteful."—Daily News.

SECOND EDITION.

Love and Mr. Lewisham.

By H. G. WELLS,

Author of "The Wheels of Chance," "The Time Machine."

Second Edition. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

"It will be considered by many the most fascinating piece of work Mr. Wells has done."—Daily Telegraph.

"Mr. Wells's brilliant success... We can think of few books with anything like the amount of entertainment to the square inch."—Pall Mall Gazette.

"Wonderfully well done; the descriptive pages are charming, the dialogue real and bright."—Daily Chronicle.

Whilomville Stories.

By the Late STEPHEN CRANE,

Author of "The Red Badge of Courage," "The Open Boat."

Crown 8vo, with numerous illustrations by Peter Newell, cloth, 5s.

[Ready Nov. 8.

Palace Tales.

By H. Y. FIELDING.

Tales of Burma and the Burmese, and of Life in the Old Palace at Mandalay.

Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

HARPER & BROTHERS, 45, Albemarle Street, W.

A Furnace of Earth. By Hallie Erminie Rives.
(Grant Richards. 3s. 6d.)

MISS (OR MRS.) RIVES writes in a manner to suggest that she is a relative of Amélie Rives, author of that hectic novel The Quick and the Dead. She has, however, none of the latter's imaginative power. A Furnace of Earth is a love story of a most violent and hysterical kind—an orgy of flamboyant emotions and bizarre adverbs.

"I love you!—you!—you!" he said, stammering and hoarsely. "I love you!"

The tumbling passion of the utterance pierced through her like a spear of desperate gladness. Every nerve reached and quivered, tendril-like. His deep breathing, toned with the dripping lap of the shingle, seemed to throb through her. She lay quiet, breathless, her lashes drooped, her very skin tense under the lasting burn of his lips.

"Margaret! Ardee, dear! Look at me!"

Her eyes flowed into his. From a flushed blur under cloud-pale eyelids, they had turned to violet balls, shot through with a trembling light. The look she gave him melted over him in a rage of love.

(It is all like that.) Strange to say, after such a scene, Margaret leaves her Daunt inexplicably; she meets him again finally in a hospital, where Daunt is planted after a railway accident. Then, "she was bathed in a wave of violent trembling." Margaret had "beautiful white ideals." Her history is obscure owing partly to the author's affected method of narrative, and partly to the continual superlative stridency which at last robs every phrase of any definite meaning. Here and there is disclosed a certain faint cleverness.

The Novel of Adventure.

The Isle of Unrest. By Henry Seton Merriman. Illustrated.
(Smith, Elder. 6s.)

THE genteel form of Hooliganism known as vendetta is an ancient theme, and your fiction-weaving optimist has been long aware that hereditary enemies of opposite sexes may fall in love with each other in no half-hearted manner. But Mr. Merriman knows how to brush up old properties; he is a practised man of the world who can write with a feeling for romance while preserving a well-bred air as who should say, "I sympathise, but I retain my self-possession."

The period of his story is 1870, a circumstance which permits of the introduction of a portrait of Napoleon the Third which glooms with saturnine majesty, the result of the painter's scarcely covert enthusiasm, upon which a sidelight is thrown by the rather cheap epigram that a republic is "a community wherein every man is not only equal to, but better than, his neighbour."

Of epigram of a kind there is, indeed, no dearth in Mr. Merriman's pages. As a rule they are flashes from the Obvious. "Nothing is so unsightly in death as a deceased fashion" is one. "Even the very poor may be charitable: they can think kindly of the rich" is another. One may be grateful; for, when the Obvious has emerged from the chrysalis of verbosity (where it is generally lodged) into the empyrean of epigram, it makes a passably pretty butterfly.

In fine, Mr. Merriman has produced a readable story, not the least agreeable feature of which is the demonstration that the patriotism of a bad man is as fine a quality as that of anyone else.

The Footsteps of a Throne. By Max Pemberton.
(Methuen. 6s.)

MR. PEMBERTON possesses no small share of the courageous versatility which distinguishes the journeyman in letters. He has no hesitation in painting Frenchmen, Italians,

Russians, or English milords. In his latest novel we have an English milord, and perhaps the most beautiful Russian princess in the whole world. The former was an idler: "all that the East had to show he had seen." Such a sentence, which some may pass as a mere façon de parler, is nevertheless instructive. No writer of depth would say that anyone had seen "all that the East had to show."

Mr. Pemberton's princess (she is that in a double sense) will easily cause the average reader to believe in her existence. Her emotions are exhibited at a height where niceties of temperament are readily overlooked. She is spied on by a treacherous friend; she is loved by and loves a titled Englishman, and a libertine Russian officer desires her for himself. Given a whole story at 212 degrees Fahr., and the average reader is heated beyond the critical point.

One need not grudge the book its simple triumph; it is respectably written, clean and honest in sentiment, and its gentle efforts to be sinister increase our belief in its author's good nature. Nevertheless there is no harm in being educated, and so we suggest that whoever visits Moscow for the first time in Mr. Pemberton's pages should visit it again in those of Mr. Arthur Symons.

A King's Pawn. By Hamilton Drummond.
(Blackwood. 6s.)

THE shadow of the mighty Dumas falls over the venturesome novelist who endeavours to reproduce Henry of Navarre; and out of that shadow Mr. Drummond's narrative—founded on a bereaved Spanish mother's assiduous revengefulness—does not wholly emerge. We miss in his pages the subtlety of the king who was wary to the point of timorousness and gay to the verge of heroism—the king who had yet to win Ivry. Mr. Drummond's Béarnais is a fiery, but astute, adventurer, far from the intrigues of the Louvre, who dashes incognito into Spanish Navarre, and out again at the expense of one pawn, the squire of the supposed narrator. The devotion of this character carries with it a veritable thrill of romance. A hero of sixty-five is a novelty to be grateful for.

For the rest we have writing like this: "Up from the undulating slope of the broad valley, broad almost as a plain, was thrust a huge spur of rock. It was as if Nature in her travail flung up an arm to heaven, and, dying, held it there frozen into stone." Excellent; but such phrases would come better from Mr. Drummond himself than from a fighting survival of the sixteenth century. Mr. Drummond should note that his most convincing effect is obtained at pp. 100 et seq., where an illustration is given of the seamiest side of the feudal system. After all, there is nothing like realism, and Mr. Drummond has it in him to be a romantic realist. Heaven speed him in that adventure; but he must first train his characters to talk less like a book.

John Charity: a Romance of Yesterday. Edited by Horace Annesley Vachell. (Murray. 6s.)

"YESTERDAY" is the later 'thirties, before Mexico had ceded Alta California to the United States. Mr. Vachell's hero, an emigrant to California, is made to tell his own story—an artistic mistake, we venture to think, but not one that affects the strenuous vitality of a well-written work. The chief point of interest is Charity's attachment for a Spanish girl, which is the cause of much plot and counterplot. Out of the hurly-burly, whose involutions grow a little wearisome to a critic who looks on at the wings of the theatre, she stands at the last apart, primitive, pathetic, lovable in her affection, heroism, and mistrust. "I had never understood," says Charity, "this daughter of another race, of another day, and she, alas! had never understood me." One suspects that, had this been a real autobiography, the spirit of tragedy would have lent tone to the whole of the book, and that the hapless girl's love-letter would never have been printed.

The author seems to know his Californian Spaniards well: the Governor, the priest, the villain are interesting sketches. Of Don Narciso, the heroine's father, we read: "That he had offered his daughter in exchange for my loyalty seemed to the Don a halfpenny matter, but a slight to a guest curved his backbone into an abject bow." Poet's justice the story provides; and were it not that it was the poets who fastened Prometheus to his rock, we would rather term it devil's justice; but it is germane to the local colour, and it is indisputable that your Romanticist, if he desire to hold the attention, must not, on occasion, shirk the mention of catastrophes from which even a Realist might flinch.

The Filibusters. By Cutcliffe Hyne.
(Hutchinson. 6s.)

IN a double sense is this an "absorbing" romance: it absorbs the reader's interest and his conscience too. Mr. Hyne adds Sacaronduca to the existing states of Central America, and sends his principal filibuster, General Briggs, against ludicrous odds to overturn the government, and establish himself in autocratic presidentship. There is not so much as the tail-end of a moral peeping out of the whole transaction, but it stirs the blood delightfully. That it all comes out of Mr. Hyne's clever head is clear from the resemblance between the characters when they condescend to be playful. When a ruffianly priest meets with verbal opposition, he remarks: "Well, we must hope for the best. We must bring pressure to bear. D'you know, Mr. Birch, we are famous for our, shall we say, pressure up here in the mountains?" When the same priest is cornered, one of his captors remarks: "There's something in the pocket of your cassock which spoils the hang of the cloth, and doesn't do your tailor justice. Permit me? A thousand thanks." And so on.

The frontispiece to the volume depicts the supposed narrator leaping from a precipice into a roaring torrent. Cauls must have run in his family. But there is no quarrelling with the improbabilities of a narrative which has the great merit of being at once rapid and intelligible, witty and exciting. The love element is cleverly managed: in fine, with all its vagaries, the novel is a brilliant tour de force.

The Plunder Ship. By Headon Hill.
(Pearson. 6s.)

MR. HEADON HILL is among those who contribute to the mythical geography of the world. His contribution takes the form of an island containing "the most stupendous mass of gold that the heart of man could conceive," in the form of two gates "big enough for a walled city." Imagine a white sultan of this island and an Oriental hypnotist who keeps "his eyes in chains" by means of the "snaky glitter" of his own, and the particular claim of the volume on popular attention is obvious enough. The sardonic element is less liberal in Mr. Headon Hill's work than in Mr. Cutcliffe Hyne's, the woodenness more obtrusive. In fact, it nearly always is obtrusive when a matter-of-fact nature seeks inspiration in dreamland. It is probable that our author could make a fraudulent company promoter and his tools more interesting by restricting the sphere of their operations to these deluded realms. But his bustling romance will no doubt be devoured by any schoolboy or schoolgirl into whose hands it falls. Such will find no heart to sneer at their Joanna when she cries: "Know, then, that I would rather toy with the deadliest serpent in the jungle than treat you otherwise than as the cast-off menial you will be as soon as Zohrab hears of this."

All Sorts.

In the Palace of the King. By F. Marion Crawford.
(Macmillan.)

MR. CRAWFORD possesses many qualities in which a maker of books must be proficient to achieve success. He has a story to tell, which is more than can be said of every novelist. He tells it excellently; more than this, his heroes and heroines are not merely immaculate, but they are ladies and gentlemen, of whatever period. And yet—and yet—in Mr. Crawford's work there is lacking the force, the conviction, the purpose which go to make a book immortal, which give a book even the semblance of immortality.

In the Palace of the King inevitably recalls some inferior drama acted by clever players. It does not move you. You watch, you listen, and occasionally you yawn—in the love-scenes. Don John of Austria, half-brother of King Philip of Spain, "the man who won glory by land and sea, who won back Granada a second time from the Moors, as bravely as his great-grandfather, Ferdinand, had won it, but less cruelly," is not real. Dolores de Mendoza, who "had the high features, the smooth, white throat, and the finely-modelled ears that were the outward signs of the lordly Gothic race," is not real. Hero and heroine alike, "young soldier" and "beautiful woman," say fine things in their day, act finely when occasion demands. But they leave you cold. Mendoza, the unbending Spanish father who takes the King's sin on his shoulders, who soils his lips to save the King from shame: Inez, Dolores' blind sister, live at times. Mr. Crawford is a close observer of the ways of the blind. He touches such points tenderly, subtly, with a penetration that inspires a hope that the creator of Mr. Isaacs, and the heroine of a book no longer acknowledged—To Leeward—may yet be awakened from that lethargy which comes upon too many writers who "can command assured sales."

The artistic details we have touched upon redeem the whole; they do not make it wholly worthy. Mr. Crawford has done better work; he is capable of better work—sustained and virile. May he accomplish it!

A Sugar Princess. By Albert Ross.
(Chatto. 3s. 6d.)

"To see ourselves as others see us" is hardly so strong an aspiration as to see others as they are. Mr. Ross's story is founded on a morbid old gentleman's desire to test the sincerity of a young relative's affection. He allows it to be supposed that he is dead. But the hero is detected again and again in an honesty that is almost flagrant in its uncomfortable idealism. Virtue above a certain point is apt to evade envy by dulness, but of dulness Mr. Ross cannot be denounced the creator. One is tempted to ask why. The insolent toady of titled folk who represents the American mother in its pages is but a cliché, and the bursting optimism of the dénouement can only be likened to a Christmas pudding. But the pen that drives to such bliss is not that of a tired or disillusioned writer.

The daughter of the sugar millionaire who is nicknamed in the title is extremely unreticent, but she tempts us to an aphorism which should prove serviceable: "In the maidenly all things are maidenly."

The author has visited Hawaii, and his story includes pleasant descriptions of that colony and also of Japan. Respecting the latter country the following specimen of American humour will bear quotation. Mr. Lovejoy had mislaid the "Keating," and the ladies had had a bad night:

"I've got one bite as big as a Mexican dollar," pnt in Mrs. Young. . . . "A Mexican dollar is only worth forty-five cents in American money," remarked her son soothingly. "So you see it's not so bad as it seems."

Neither is the Obvious "as bad as it seems." Indeed, it can be quite pleasant.

The Flower of the Flock. By W. E. Norris.
(Nisbet & Co. 6s.)

MR. NORRIS is one of the little masters of his art; he never fails as greater and more ambitious writers often fail. He knows precisely what he wants to do, and he does it with a deftness, an assurance, and a humorous appreciation which give the reader a satisfaction very real, and, within its limits, very complete. In this book the story is nothing, the manner everything. The plot, such as it is, is of the kind to which even the word threadbare is not applicable; it is stereotyped, set up, apparently, for ever, to the hand of any craftsman. The rich American widow, the handsome, selfish, and delightful captain, worshipped by his family; the financial crash of the captain's father; the unselfish brother; the young girl, poor and attractive, who comes into £100,000 at a critical moment—all are here; even the impecunious and honourable peer is not wanting. Mr. Norris shifts them about, sets them to talk, as people do talk, succeeds in making you believe in them, and then, on the last page or two, leaves everybody perfectly happy. To do all this without giving a moment's weariness is an achievement within the reach of very few. Mr. Norris accomplishes it with perfect ease. He takes you into his confidence, not in the button-holeing, rather in the smoke-room, manner, and while his story is in progress makes little illuminating side remarks which keep you in humorous touch with the narrator. You are assured that he knows his characters, and likes them, and is himself constantly amused by them. The attitude is infectious. They are alive, too, these people, except when Mr. Norris permits himself, for a moment, to be perfectly serious; then, we confess, there is a flash of palpable limelight. But Mr. Norris seldom permits himself to be quite serious; that is a convincing indication of his delightful art.

The Image-Breakers. By Gertrude Dix.
(William Heinemann. 6s.)

IN this novel Miss Dix has somewhat more than fulfilled the promise of The Girl from the Farm. It is a book marked by much finesse and considerable distinction, and decidedly not without strength. We say this at the beginning because The Image-Breakers has left us with a sense of disappointment and of depression. Miss Dix has found her theme among advanced Socialists and Anarchists—those weird, earnest, and seemingly futile people who move darkly in the coulisses of Progress with a capital P. She has drawn her characters, on the whole, with skill; but she herself appears to be too close to them, and the consequence is that her book partakes of the littleness and the sterility of their worse qualities. The acts and ideas of this small crowd of strange ones are not woven into any large design such as every novel should possess. One suspects that Miss Dix, midway in the book, wavered in her purpose, for at a certain point the tale changes from the record of a group to the simple love-story of Leslie Ardent, heroine. We must say here that Miss Dix names her characters badly. To call a girl of Leslie's temperament Ardent is a throw-back to a fashion in nomenclature which ought never to be resuscitated.

We ask ourselves at the end of this novel, upon which so much artistic feeling and technique have been expended: What does it mean? What is its purpose, its central idea? If it is meant to be "a page torn from life," we answer that the theory that a page torn from life will make a good novel is long since exploded. The objection to the book is, not that it depresses, but that it depresses in the wrong way. A novelist has the right to depress us, and some of the greatest novels (witness de Maupassant's Une Vie) are the most depressing. But he has not the right to depress us through inconclusiveness, petty futilities, and the notion that nobody is moving anywhere. If the business of the novelist is not to disclose the "trend," the origin and goal of this part or that part of the "great mundane movement," we should like to know what is the business of the novelist. "Things" may be going to hell—or they may be going to heaven: so long as we know the destination, we can sit tight or wave banners, according to the case, equo animo. But the impression that "things," or any part of them, are fiddling about in space like a rabbit in a field is odious, and the novelist who gives it will arrive at naught. Locomotion: that is what, not being a sponge, the human race instinctively requires.

For the rest, The Image-Breakers contains some beautiful writing.

The Monk Wins. By Edward H. Cooper.
(Duckworth.)

The Monk Wins is rather better than our reminiscence of Mr. Blake of Newmarket, which is not saying much. The atmosphere of the racing-stable does not please us any better in fiction than in real life. The heroine, Margaret Branksome, left heiress to a stud which includes a Derby winner, is rather foolish, rather rowdy, and rather common: altogether unsympathetic and a trifle unreal. Frank Neville, one of the two men she loves, is an unredeemed cad. "His talk is that of a rather inferior tout," said Douglas quietly, "and his manners are those of an affable bookmaker when he is in a good temper, and of a tipsy groom when he is in a bad one." We do not like the sentimentality of the reconciliation between Frank and Margaret (who, after all, did not love him much) when he had been thoroughly exposed; and the heroism of his death is too much in the convention. Nevertheless, Mr. Cooper has vivacity, and he has observation. His interests are not limited by Newmarket, and we should like to try a novel by him on something else—Alpine climbing, for instance; or, say, children. His children are rather good. A little girl tells the gardener: "You mustn't say hollyocks, Caird; you must say hollyoxen"; and a little boy, promised twopence if he behaved perfectly for a whole week, and summoned at the end of that period to pass judgment on himself, thinks it over and candidly remarks: "Gimme a farden."

Haggith Shy: Quakeress. By Mark Ashton.
(Hutchinson. 6s.)

THE career of Haggith Shy begins quietly enough in a sober Quaker household: but a few chapters see it blossom forth into an extravaganza of melodramatic adventures. Impossibility follows hard upon impossibility, but we fully recognise that there are readers to whom, in their craving for excitement, impossibilities are no drawback. The blood of such will run cold at the ingenious cruelties of the villain, with his wife in England and his wife in France, and his complexion which at a critical moment "first turned lead colour, then saffron, and almost as rapidly settled into the whiteness of chalk." And their hearts will beat for the heroine who, dressed as a boy, lives and sees through it all, and finally emerges triumphant and happy, and a faithful member of the "Society of Friends." They may even enjoy the atmosphere created by a plentiful peppering of cheap French phrases over the chapters. But, Lord! what stuff!

Servants of Sin. By John Bloundelle-Burton.
(Methuen. 6s.)

"Plot is no bad thing. A little vulgar and straining, perhaps, yet sufficiently interesting." So says Crébillon the dramatist in Mr. Bloundelle-Burton's quasi-historical fiction of the days of Louis Quinze's minority. The theme is the ignominious love of a ducal roué for his own daughter, and the vengeance which he took when, on what was to have been their wedding-day, he discovered that she had married an Englishman. The case recalls the confession that Casanova makes in his memoirs, to the effect that he ignorantly fell in love with his own daughter, and not only gained her affections but was within an ace of marrying her. The lines of Mr. Blountelle-Burton's plot all meet at Marseilles during the almost unexampled plague which raged there in the early part of the eighteenth century. There the hero "saw a great cauldron of boiling water, with a fire burning fiercely beneath it, and into this cauldron was plunged every coin that changed hands, pincers being used for the purpose."

The story justifies the saying attributed to Cr billon quoted at the beginning of this notice. The plot has human interest, and, if artificial, is at any rate not intricate. The plague-scenes are powerfully drawn; to use a disagreeable but expressive phrase, it is a "full-bodied" romance. The style is, perhaps, a little too rotund, and exhibits a partiality for invertebrate sentences. But take it for all in all Servants of Sin is a good, solid melodrama, instant in its appeal and satisfying in its climax.

The Web of Life. By Robert Herrick.
(Macmillan. 6s.)

"Right or wrong, happiness! for if we make our happiness in this world, we know God. God lives upon our happiness." Here is the keynote of Mr. Herrick's strong story. Here is the principle that animates all the characters. The mind in which are reflected the phases and features of the struggle for happiness in Chicago is well chosen from the ranks of the profession that most of all is in touch with every class. The simple hedonism at the root of every life in these pages shows in some finer, in others grosser. In all there is an eagerness to seize every advantage that may be offered by personal interest or the self-interestedness of another. Miss Hitchcock was one of those rare creatures whose function it would seem to be to offer in their own characters and persons a justification, if such a thing might be, of the whole-souled race after wealth. "It was the right thing to be energetic, upright, respected; it was also nice to spend your money as others did. And it was very, very nice to have the money to spend." "Don't you think it was fine, though," she asks Sommers about R. Gordon Carson, "his making up his mind out there in Sioux Falls that what he wanted was pictures, and the best pictures, and that he'd have Sargent do his portrait?" Here is Carson's account of how the imaginary Sargent came into existence:

"I knew he was a hard customer," Sommers overheard him saying, "and I gave him all the rope he wanted. 'It may be two years before I do anything on your portrait, Mr. Carson,' he said.

"Take five," I told him.

"I shall charge five thousand."

"Make it ten," said I.

"I shall paint your ears."

"And the nose too."

"Well he sent it me inside of a year with his compliments. The fau  struck him, he wrote. It was easy to do; I was a good type, and all that. Well, there it is."

The great railway strike shows up the other side. There are the same selfishness and greed. In Dresser you have a picture of the mercenary agitator. "Bootlicker to the rich," he scornfully dubs Sommers; but does not blame him. "Perhaps," he indiscreetly adds, "if I had had your opportunities——." Precisely, it is "the pie" all the time. "You make me feel," says Sommers, "that the privileged classes are right in getting what they can out of fools—and knaves.

Meanwhile, in an outlying village a woman, thirsty like all the rest for happiness, supports, by the drudgery of elementary teaching, the loathed wreck of the husband she had never loved. The tragedy that ensued we leave to the readers of Mr. Herrick's pages, content if we have indicated the atmosphere in which his creatures very vitally move.

A Gentleman Player. By R. N. Stephens.
(Methuen. 6s.)

MR. STEPHENS presents us with yet another romance of a State mission carried through, in the teeth of persistent and ingenious opposition, by the resource, the address, and the strong arm and flashing rapier of the hero. The ingredients are familiar, the mixing is fairly good, and if you are not critical you are not bored.

So much for the story. But in one respect A Gentleman Player differs from other romances of its class: it introduces Shakespeare—Mr. Shakespeare—as a character. And not only Shakespeare, but Burbage, and Ben Jonson, and the first performance of "Hamlet," and a long midnight talk at the Mermaid Tavern! "What things I have heard said at the Mermaid!" To find a novelist bold enough to make Shakespeare speak, is so uncommon (there was, however, a case last year in America), that we are tempted to quote a passage; especially as any attempt to recapture the old Mermaid raptures is to be prized:

"And we players," said Burbage, with a kind of sigh, "who make dead men remembered, are by the very nature of our craft doomed to be forgot. Who shall know our very names three or four hundred years hence?"

"Why," said Condell, "our names might live by the printing of them in the book of the plays we act in; a printed book will last you a long time."

"Not such books as these thievish printers make of our plays," said Sly, himself a writer of plays.

"Marry, I should not wish long life to their blundering, distorted version of any play I had a hand in making," said Shakespeare.

"But consider," said Condell, "were a decent printing made of all thy plays, Will, all in one book, from the true manuscripts we have at the theatre, and our names put in the book, Dick's name at the head, then ought not our names live for our having acted in thy plays?"

Mr. Burbage smiled amusedly, but said nothing, and Shakespeare answered:

"'Twould be a dead kind of life for them, we think; buried in dusty, unsold volumes in the booksellers' shops in Paul's Churchyard."

"Nay, I would venture something," said Master Heminge, thoughtfully, "that a book of thy plays were sure to be opened."

Mr. Stephens, it appears, intended to put notes to his book verifying some of his statements. The purpose has been partially frustrated, for there are no notes, merely the numerals referring to them. The omission is to be regretted, because the reader will never have the excitement of learning how any further information can be given about this passage: "A March wind was following her [Queen Elizabeth] between the high hedgerows, disturbing two or three tiny twigs that had lain in the frozen path."

The Son of Man.

HUMANITY is God, expressed

In terms of Mind; though not in this Period or that; but manifest

In endless metamorphosis.

In terms of Mind, that apprehends

Nothing unrelative; that knows

Beginnings only by their ends,

And by beginning learns the close;

Only by voidness feeling form,

Only by darkness seeing flame,

Only by silence hearing storm,

And measuring majesty by shame.

Theirs is the vision, who can see

Mind, like the hovering, heavenly Dove,

Brooding o'er deepest anarchy

And orbing laws of life and love.

F. B. MONEY-COUTTS

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the week's Fiction are not necessarily final.
Reviews of a selection will follow.]

THE MANTLE OF ELIJAH.

By I. ZANGWILL.

Mr. Zangwill's new book is a study of modern political life, dealing with problems similar to those which occupy the time of Statesmen to-day. Indeed, it is described in the advertisements as "a portrait gallery of modern types." It opens twenty years ago, before Imperialism had been invented. Part II. brings us to the present day. There is much witty dialogue, and some philosophy. (Heinemann. 6s.)

PECCAVI.

By E. W. HORNING.

This novel has been proclaimed to the world as Mr. Horning's "new départure," and his publisher, in a manifesto advertisement, announces that Peccavi "will be either a great success or a comparative failure." Which is the fate of most novels. Mr. Horning's new departure is that he has forsaken the life he knows for the problem world. The hero of Peccavi is a clergyman who "sins," but, unlike the clergyman in The Scarlet Letter, he begins his expiation at once.

VANITY.

By "RITA."

The lively "Rita" gives as a sub-title to this volume "The Confessions of a Court Modiste," and the story begins: "With grave doubt I regarded it—'Frou-Frou, Court Modiste.' That was all. My new sign. My new signature, ready to be affixed to my new promises in Bond-street." "Rita" has courage and her pen carries a sting. (Fisher Unwin. 6s.)

LOVE OF COMRADES.

By FRANK MATTHEWS.

This is Mr. Matthews's sixth novel. It is a short romance, and might be described as a humble relation of The Forest Lovers. Each chapter heading except the first and last begins with the word "How," and the story is told in the first person by the daughter of Sir Pertinax Talbot. It begins: "Dressed as a man, I rode into the forest . . . Overhead the birds sang to one another, 'Come, look at little Margery Talbot, wearing big boots and a long sword at her side.'" (Lane. 3s. 6d.)

THE INNER SHRINE.

By MRS. ALFRED SIDGWICK.

A bright "woman's" story of modern life. Celia is the heroine. "Her brother's living was worth a hundred and fifty a year, and on this income he had to support his wife and child, her young sister, a servant, and himself." In the end someone says to Celia: "I think you must understand that I have loved you for a long time." Needless to say, they were married. (Harpers. 6s.)

AS A WATCH IN THE NIGHT. By MRS. CAMPBELL PRAED.

A long, mystical, theosophical, occult story opening in a studio in Chelsea and ending thus: "Then may you pass together through those portals to the Higher Life of which you have not now the faintest comprehension. There may you join your strength in lifting those who follow upon your footsteps, and in leading them onward through the Gate of Love Eternal." Clearly Mrs. Praed has not this time sought the popular vote. (Chatto & Windus. 6s.)

THE WAY OUT.

By G. B. BURGIN.

Mr. Burgin has here donned the Bret Harte cap—the good Bret Harte of old mining-camp days. The tale is of sentiment, "fun," tragedy and poker, and the characters answer to such names as Alkali Jack and English Bill. There is no reason why those who like Mr. Burgin's other stories should not like this. (Long. 6s.)

MORRISON'S MACHINE.

By J. S. FLETCHER.

A novel of north-country life, with love interest. The "machine" is the product of Morrison's brain, which his employer tries to secure. (Hutchinson. 6s.)

VILLA RUBEIN.

By JOHN SINJOHN.

Walking along the river wall at Betzen, Edmund Dawney said to Alois Harz: "There's a family at Villa Rubein, that pink house—would you care to know them?" The story passes mainly abroad. Mr. Sinjohn has a clean, nervous style, and an eye for character. (Duckworth. 6s.)

A FOREST OFFICER.

By MRS. FRANK PENNY.

A novel of action. Scene: India. Hero: Jim Burns, Forest Officer. In the eleventh line Mrs. Penny allows the phrase "the proverbial forty winks" to escape from her pen. Jim has an exciting, but what we should consider a horrid, time with the beasts of the jungle and the natives of the hillside. In the end Peggy makes Jim entirely happy. "You are just the girl for a forest officer's wife," said her friend Amy! (Methuen. 6s.)

LOVE IN A MIST.

By OLIVE BIRRELL.

"Unluckily, many hours of solitude had given Lady Mary the trick of talking to herself." So it happened that Keith Hamilton, just returned from India after an absence of thirteen years, overheard her remark: "Not handsome, but distinguished looking." A readable tale of modern life. (Smith, Elder. 6s.)

THE HAPPY LIFE.

By ELIZABETH GODFREY.

By the author of Poor Human Nature. "There are two Master Harpers," says the author, "whose touch upon the strings has power to draw out the complex harmonies which make the music of life. . . . And the names of the two players are Love and Sorrow." A story of modern life—sentiment, music, society, and love. "Does this mean that you love me? If it does, put your arms round my neck and kiss me as you have never kissed me yet." He did. (Grant Richards. 6s.)

"THE S. G."

By JULIAN CROSKEY.

A paper-covered story of Legation-street during the Boxer rebellion, containing incidentally a character study of Sir Robert Hart under a thin disguise. In a note Mr. Croskey, who knows China well, refers to Sir Robert Hart as his former chief. Mr. Croskey is the author of a clever novel called Max, and also of an article in which he announced that, as he could not make a living out of literature, he had taken a situation in a saw-mill. But S. G. and the advertisement of Celestial Shudders (forthcoming) suggest that he has returned to the fold. (Lamley.)

We have also received: Gwynett of Thornhaugh, by F. W. Hayes, being the further adventures of A Kent Squire, with sixteen illustrations by the author (Hutchinson, 6s.); Elmslie's Drag Net, "by E. H. Strain, being certain notes made by him in the fishing village of Aberspennie" (Methuen, 6s.); Let There Be Light! by David Lubin, "the story of a working-man's club, its search for the causes of poverty and social inequality, its discussions, and its plan for the amelioration of existing evils" (Putnam's, 6s.); The Spell of the Snow, by C. Guise Mitford, an emotional love-story of the "Dear heart!" order (Pearson, 6s.); Is There a Better Thing? by Jeremiah Vaughan-Emmett. We like the consecutiveness of these chapter headings: "I. Where the Infinite is Touched Upon"; "II. Which from Flippancy becomes a Little Serious" (Sonnenschein, 6s.); The Luck of Private Foster, a romance of the Boer war, by A. St. John Adcock (Hodder & Stoughton, 6s.); A Napoleon of the Press, by Marie Connor Leighton, which has a very recognisable hero (Hodder & Stoughton, 6s.).

JARROLD & SONS' NEW LIST.

JUST PUBLISHED.

MAURUS JOKAI'S NEW NOVEL.

THE DAY OF WRATH.

Translated by R. NISBET BAIN. With a special Photogravure Portrait of Dr. Maurus Jokai, Author of "Black Diamonds," "A Hungarian Nabob," &c. 6s.

"The Day of Wrath" was written in the darkest hour of Maurus Jokai's life—when his beloved Hungary lay gagged and bleeding under the heel of Austria, and he himself little better than a proscribed rebel under police surveillance—and the outcome of it all was this lurid, terrible, but withal most thrilling story. In it we shall find some of the author's most original comic types, and many episodes of irresistible humour.

FIRST EDITION NOW READY.

THE DAY OF WRATH.

By MAURUS JÓKAI.

Author of "The Poor Photocrats," "The Green Book," &c. 6s. With special Photogravure Portrait of Maurus Jokai.

BY A POPULAR HUNGARIAN AUTHOR.

ST. PETER'S UMBRELLA

By KÁLMÁN MIKSZÁTH.

With an Introduction by R. NISBET BAIN, a Photogravure Portrait of the Author, and Three Illustrations. 6s.

"A fantastic romance, his humour, his skill in the delineation of character, his huge knowledge of the Slovak folklore make 'St. Peter's Umbrella' an unusually fascinating story. Throughout it is lively and amusing, and as the plot develops exciting, while the de nouement is both daring and original." Fall Mall Gazette.

AN EXCITING HISTORICAL ROMANCE OF VIRGINIA.

VIVIAN OF VIRGINIA.

Being the Memoirs of our First Rebellion by John Vivian, of Middle Plantation, Virginia.

By HULBERT FULLER.

With 10 charming Illustrations by Frank T. Merrill. 6s.

FIRST REVIEW.

"How the rebellion arose, and the many exciting incidents that occurred, will be found admirably told. It is as charming as it is simple." Leeds Mercury.

BY MARY H. NORRIS

The Gray House of the Quarries.

By MARY H. NORRIS.

With Etched Frontispiece by Edmund H. Garrett. 6s.

"A chronicle of life among the Dutch-Americans. There are many beautiful and vivid descriptive passages. A tale human and tender and graced by literary art."—Dundee Advertiser.

MISS E. BOYD BAYLY'S NEW STORY.

HONOR GREENLEAF.

By Miss E. BOYD BAYLY.

Author of "Jonathan Merle," "Alfreda Holme," &c. Crown 8vo, cloth elegant, 3s. 6d.

A STORY FROM LIFE.

ON SEA AND PRAIRIE.

The Adventures of a Norfolk Carrier. Told by Himself

By CHARLES G. COLEMAN.

Crown 8vo, cloth elegant, 3s. 6d.

"The story literally leaps from one exciting incident to another, and is alive with human interest."—Eastern Daily Press.

CURTIS YORKE'S NEW NOVEL.

CARPATHIA KNOX.

Author of "Hush," "Dudley," "That Little Girl," "A Romance of Modern London," &c. 6s.

For several winters Curtis Yorke has resided in Spain, and this experience has been turned to account with the author's usual skill. Written in a brisk, fresh style, the story treats of an idle summer through Northern Spain by a quartette composed of a delightful old lady, a girl, and two young men. The manners and customs of Asturias being faithfully and amusingly presented.

FERGUS HUME'S EXCITING NEW NOVEL.

A WOMAN'S BURDEN.

By FERGUS HUME.

Author of "The Mystery of a Hansom Cab," &c. 6s.

BESIDES THE ABOVE LIST OF SIX SHILLING NOVELS, several new Three-and-Sixpenny Novels and a large number of specially attractive books for Young People are in the press. A complete illustrated Catalogue will be sent on receipt of a Post Card.

JARROLD & SONS, 10 and 11, Warwick Lane, E.C.

J. NISBET & CO'S LIST.

STUDIES BY THE WAY.

By the Rt. Hon. Sir EDWARD FRY, F.R.S., &c.

Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

"There is not one of these lucid and yet profound essays that will not repay any cultured reader's perusal."—Scotsman.

"A volume of unusual interest and value."—Globe.

NON SEQUITUR.

By Mrs M. E. COLERIDGE, Author of "The King with Two Faces," &c.

Paintly bound, extra crown 8vo, 6s.

"It is hard in truth to render the due meed of praise to the delicate grace of phrasing, the large suggestiveness, and the happy choice of illustrative fact or quotation which make the reading of these sketches a joy."—Fall Mall Gazette.

FROISSART IN BRITAIN.

By HENRY NEWBOLT.

With 21 Full-Page Illustrations taken from Originals in the British Museum.

Large crown 8vo, 6s.

"A wholly delightful volume for boys of all ages."—Daily Telegraph.

NEW NOVELS.

THE JOURNAL OF

A JEALOUS WOMAN.

By PERCY WHITE, Author of "The West End," &c.

Extra crown 8vo, 6s.

"Mr. White has caught delightfully and painfully the spirit of courteous comedy in which modern tragedy is played."—Daily Chronicle.

THE FLOWER OF THE FLOCK.

By W. E. NORRIS. Extra crown 8vo, 6s.

"An excellent story, very brightly and cleverly told."—Scotsman.

"Mr. Norris has given us a very clever, highly-finished study." Fall Mall Gazette.

A STRONG TEMPERANCE STORY.

WAGES.

By L. T. MEADE. Extra crown 8vo, 6s.

"An impressive story, written with Mrs. Meade's well-known simplicity of style."—Bookman.

J. NISBET & CO., Ltd., 21, Berners Street, London, W.

ELLIOT STOCK'S NEW NOVELS.

In crown 8vo, bound in cloth, gilt lettered, with FRONTISPIECE by the AUTHOR, price 6s.

SARONIA: a Romance of Ancient Ephesus.

By RICHARD SHORT.

In crown 8vo, cloth, price 6s.

CHARLES WAVENDON, and OTHERS. By

CARYL J. BLUNT.

"The story shows considerable literary ability. The author has collected an assembly of characters, and the tale is developed on original lines." Glasgow Herald.

"It is obviously earnest, and is interesting enough to hold the reader throughout."—Churchman.

"A well-conceived story of life in the upper stratum of society some thirty years ago. The author possesses literary power."—Church Bells.

"We consider that such a manly and straightforward book cannot fail to do good."—Leeds Mercury.

In crown 8vo, cloth, gilt lettered, price 5s.

THE STRUGGLE FOR EMPIRE: a Story of the Year 2236. By ROBERT WILLIAM COLE.

"Mr. Cole possesses an unbounded and vigorous imagination, which carries his readers over all obstacles. His story is entertaining." Birmingham Daily Gazette.

In crown 8vo, cloth, price 6s.

MALCOLM ROSS: a Romance. By ALEXANDER

CRAIG, F.S.A., Author of "America and the Americans," &c.

"The scholarly author has given us in 'Malcolm Ross' a clever and very pleasant book, which will receive on its own undoubted merits a very hearty welcome. This very interesting work will enhance the high literary reputation Mr. Craig already enjoys."—Bradford Journal.

"'Malcolm Ross' is a most delightful romance."—Observer.

"Very cordially recommended."—Dundee Advertiser.

NEW STORY FOR CHILDREN.

In crown 8vo, cloth, price 3s. 6d.

JACK and JEANNIE. By E. PERRY.

"A very delightful story, pleasantly written, and very helpful for Temperance and Sunday-school workers. It would make a capital reward book, and is very suitable for the Sunday-school library." Methodist-Sunday-school Record.

"A pleasantly-written story, full of earnest purpose and practical instruction."—Church Family Newspaper.

ELLIOT STOCK, 62, Paternoster Row, London, E.C.

GREENING & CO.'SANNOUNCEMENTS*For the Autumn Season, 1900.*"ENGLISH WRITERS OF TO-DAY" SERIES.*BRET HARTE. A Treatise and a Tribute by T. EDGAR PEMBERTON, with a Portrait of Mr. Bret Harte, and a Bibliography. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.SWINBURNE. A Study by Theodore Wratisslaw, with a Portrait of Mr. A. C. Swinburne, and a Bibliography. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.RUDYARD KIPLING. An Appreciation by G. F. MONKSHOOD. A New Edition, revised and brought up to date, with Portrait of Mr. Kipling, and a Bibliography. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.
[In preparation.]MASTERPIECE LIBRARY.*THE EPICUREAN. A Romance by Thomas Moore. Edited, with an Introduction, by JUSTIN HANNAFORD. Illustrated by Will Smart. Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt edges, 3s. 6d.*Other popular Romances are in preparation for this artistic Series, and will be duly announced.GENERAL LITERATURE.*A VAGABOND in ASIA. A Volume of Travel by EDMUND CANDLER, with Illustrations from Photographs. Crown 8vo, cloth, 7s. 6d.A BOOK of the POSTER. By W. S. Rogers, Profusely Illustrated with Examples of Poster Work by some famous Poster Artists of the day. 4to, cloth, 7s. 6d.CAPT. MAYNE REID. His Life and Adventures by his WIDOW and CHAS. COE, U.S.A., with Portrait and Illustrations. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.NORTHERN LIGHTS and SHADOWS. Stories of Eskimo Life. By R. G. TABER, with some Folk Lore Tales translated from the original Eskimo, and an Autograph Letter from the Marquis of Lorne reproduced in facsimile. Crown 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d.WOMAN. A Scientific Study. Translated from the French, with an Introduction, by the Rev. T. A. SEED. Crown 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d.BALLADS of GHOSTLY SHIRES. By George BARTRAM, Author of "The People of Clopton," "The Whiteheaded Boy," &c. Crown 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d. net.VILLAGE LIFE and FEELING. A Volume of Verse by the Rev. ROBERT ATTERTON. Crown 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d. net.NEBO: the Merchant of Susa. A Drama in Three Acts. By A. J. FERREIRA. Small 8vo, hand-made paper, art cloth, gilt, 2s. 6d. net.FICTION.*THE MODERN ARGONAUTS. A Novel by Eliza ORZESZKO (Author of "An Obscure Apostle"), translated from the original Polish by COUNT C. S. DE SOISSONS. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.A DETACHED PIRATE. A Novel by Helen MILECETE (Author of "A Girl of the North"). Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.FARTHEST SOUTH. A Humorous Story of Adventures at the South Pole. By HAROLD E. GORST. Crown 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d.WHERE the ORANGES GROW. A Humorous Novel by N. A. LEYKEN (the Russian Mark Twain). Translated from the original by COUNT C. S. DE SOISSONS. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.COMMITTED to his CHARGE. A Colonial Romance by the Misses R. and K. M. LIZARS. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.THE TRAGEDY of a PEDIGREE. An Interesting Story by HUGO AMES. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.THE PRETTINESS of FOOLS. A Realistic and Powerful Novel by EDGAR HEWITT. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.HIS GRACE'S GRACE. A Sporting Novel by the Author of "THE HYPOCRITE," "MISS MALEVOLENT," &c. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.A TRIP to PARADOXIA. and other Humours of the Hour. By T. H. S. ESCOTT. New and Cheaper Edition. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.
[In preparation.]THE AFTER-TASTE. A Novel by Compton Reade, Author of "Hard Lines," "Under Which King," &c. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.Complete Catalogue post free on application.London: GREENING & CO, LIMITED, 20, Cecil Court, Charing Cross Road.The Best Value ever offered.*NEWNES' SIXPENNY SERIES

OF

COPYRIGHT
WORKS.*MARCELLA. 312 pages. Mrs. HUMPHRY WARD.DEEDS that WON the EMPIRE. 141 pages.
W. H. FITCHETT ("Venette").STORIES from the DIARY of a DOCTOR.
158 pages. L. T. MEADE and CLIFFORD HAGFAX.ENGLAND'S PERIL. 122 pages. WILLIAM LE QUEUX.THE REPROACH of ANNESLEY. 197 pages.
MAXWELL GRAY.THE SILENCE of DEAN MAITLAND.
121 pages. MAXWELL GRAY.ADVENTURES of SHERLOCK HOLMES.
158 pages. A. CONAN DOYLE.MEMOIRS of SHERLOCK HOLMES.
157 pages. A. CONAN DOYLE.THE SIGN of FOUR. 124 pages. A. CONAN
DOYLE.THE EXPLOITS of BRIGADIER GERARD.
124 pages. A. CONAN DOYLE.THE IMPREGNABLE ROCK of HOLY SCRIPTURE. 120 pages. Late W. E. GLADSTONE.WHAT'S BRED in the BONE. 186 pages.
GRANT ALLEN.JESS: a Story of the Last Boer War.
192 pages. H. RIDER HAGGARD.SHE: a History of Adventure 190 pages.
H. RIDER HAGGARD.ROBERT ELSMERE. 317 pages. Mrs.
HUMPHRY WARD.THE HISTORY of DAVID GRIEVE.
321 pages. Mrs. HUMPHRY WARD.DEPARTMENTAL DITTIES. 126 pages.
RUDYARD KIPLING.SHIPS that PASS in the NIGHT. 128 pages.
BEATRICE HARRADEN.A YANKEE BOY'S SUCCESS. 124 pages.
H. S. MORRISON.FIGHTS for the FLAG. 150 pages. W. H.
FITCHETT.THE HERB MOON. JOHN OLIVER HOBBS.PRICE 6d. EACH; POST FREE, 8d. EACH.GEORGE NEWNES, LIMITED, 7-12, Southampton Street, Strand, London, W.C., or from the leading Booksellers and Newsagents.

THE ACADEMY.

Editorial and Publishing Offices, 43, Chancery-lane.

The ACADEMY will be sent post-free to every Annual Subscriber in the United Kingdom.

Price for One Issue, Threepence; postage One Halfpenny Price for 52 issues, Thirteen Shillings; postage free.

Foreign Rates for Yearly Subscriptions 20s. including postage.

American Agents for the ACADEMY: Brentano's, 31, Union-square, New York.

The Yarning School.

THERE is one kind of novel that always justifies itself, and that is the glorified bedroom yarn. When it is fully glorified it is called The Three Musketeers; when it is imperfectly glorified, it is called The Mystery of a Hansom Cab. But in either case it is the schoolboys' bedroom yarn written out with more or less reference to the facts of life—or shall we say to the labels of life? The schoolboy faculty of beginning a story anywhere and continuing without art or insight, but with reckless invention, does not require a great deal of cultivation to issue in romances which will beguile a railway journey, or even form the stay-at-home pabulum of millions. Not that we under-rate the ease with which this yarning may be developed into an income of a thousand a year. We certainly do not under-rate the faculty itself—the innate genius for telling a story; that is a fine gift. As to its practice, we are aware that the yarn must be glorified by the light of such learning and science as the crowd possesses. But we are also aware that it is precisely the prevalence of shallow learning that multiplies novelists and ensures readers. On the whole, these are fat years for the yarners. Some of them must be doing uncommonly well: and we do not grudge them their success. There is Mr. Richard Marsh: he is prodigious. The tradition current in the receiving department of this office that he publishes a new novel every Tuesday is an exaggeration. We do not believe that, working at top pressure, Mr. Marsh writes one novel a month. But that he comes near to this figure seems to be indicated by the following list (possibly incomplete) of Mr. Marsh's productions in the last eight months:

March 3	Marvels and Mysteries.
May 5	A Second Coming.
June 9	Ada Verulam, Actress.
September 1	The Sen and the Unsen.
October 13	The Chase of the Ruby.
November 1	A Hero of Romance.
Date (?).....	The Goddess: a Demon.

That is pretty good for a year of unexampled depression in the book trade. Mr. Marsh has got into his stride and he throws off a story with an abandon—we might add, an abandonment—that is refreshing. Take his story The Chase of the Ruby. It was published, you observe, on October 13; therefore it opens in South Africa, where Guy Holland has a daylight vision, on the veldt, of the death of a rich uncle. He rushes home in time to hear the will read. And the will says that the whole of the dead man's property is to go to Guy "on condition that he recover from Mary Bewicke, the actress, whom he knows, my ruby signet-ring, which she obtained from me by a trick on the 27th of this last May. . . . In default, my whole estate, without any deduction whatever, to become the absolute property of my other nephew, Horace Burton." This delectable plot probably flashed on Mr. Marsh while his ticket was being punched on the top of a 'bus. But the reader's grasp of the issue is not too lightly assumed:

The reading was followed by silence, broken by a question from Mr. Holland.

"And pray what is the plain English of it all?"

"The will is plain English. You are to obtain a certain ring from a certain lady and deliver it to me within a certain time. If you do so you are your uncle's heir; if you do not Mr. Horace is."

Mr. Marsh is at once on terms with his readers; for him the rest is mechanics, and for them it is excitement. But this is only one type of yarn out of many that Mr. Marsh has studied. In The Goddess: a Demon, he relies on his sub-title to secure immediate attention to certain weird happenings in Imperial-mansions; particularly the goings on of "The Woman who Came Through the Window." The public who will accept the solution of this story will accept anything. It comes off in a house in Pimlico:

How exactly it all happened, even now I find it hard to say. As Lawrence sprang forward, the figure rose to its feet, and in an instant was alive. It opened its arms; from its finger-tips came knives. Stepping forward it gripped Lawrence with its steel-clad hands, with a grip from which there was no escaping. From every part of its frame gleaming blades had sprung; against this cheval-de-frise it pressed him again and again, twirling him round and round, moving him up and down, so that the weapons pierced and hacked back and front. Even from its eyes, mouth, and nostrils had sprung knives. It kept jerking its head backwards and forwards, so that it could stab with them at his face and head. And, all the while, from somewhere came the sound of a woman's laughter—that dreadful sound which I had heard in my dream. . . .

Presently it was still; its movements ceased; it became again inanimate. As if its lust for blood was glutted, it rolled over, lethargically, upon its side, leaving its handiwork exposed—a horrible spectacle. A grin—as it were a smile, born of repletion—was on the creature's face.

Later, the thing was torn to pieces; its anatomy laid bare. Examination showed that its construction had been diabolically ingenious.

This is scrumptious dormitory yarning; but is it anything else? Mr. Marsh, be it understood, has in no way presumed on his public. That we gather from an examination of other examples of the Yarning School's work. Mr. Guy Boothby's A Prince of Swindlers introduces the only kind of detective that has not yet been exploited. Need we say he is the millionaire detective, or, at all events, the detective who resides in a Park-lane mansion, and whose door is beset every day by a long line of carriages containing his wealthy clients? Up to a certain morning London had never heard the name of Klimo. He came to London (to detect) a complete stranger; and yet "within twenty-four hours the whole aspect of the case was changed. The man, woman, or child who had not seen his posters or heard his name was counted an ignorant unworthy of intercourse with human beings." The women doubtless wondered how Klimo would suit their complexions, and the men whether it had a free wheel; but princes, the nobility, and business men rushed with their losses and dirty linen to Belverton-street, Park-lane, next door to Porchester House. We give Mr. Boothby full credit for making Klimo the detective and Carne the swindler one and the same person, and next-door neighbours—with access to each other's houses through a secret door between the two mansions. After this it seems rather a descent to Mr. William Le Queux's Inspector Patterson, who, on finding two people murdered in a weird house at Brompton, refrains from reporting the fact because there is a snake crawling about the house, and he is superstitious about snakes. So he confides in a journalist, and together they go to the house of luxury and death, where a man and woman, forsaken by everyone, sit rigid corpses—the lady smiling in death and reclining upon cushions of yellow silk in a gown of pale mauve trimmed with lace, and the man stretched at her feet on a real Turkey carpet. But there is inspiration in the sudden ringing of a telephone bell in the house, and an unknown guilty voice inquiring from an unknown guilty retreat whether it was all over. That seals the reader's attention.

No account of the Yarning School would be complete without some reference to Mr. Fergus Hume, author of The Mystery of a Hansom Cab, The Silent House in Pimlico, The Bishop's Secret, The Crimson Cryptogram, "Etc., Etc., Etc." Among the "Etc., Etc., Etc." is A Traitor in London, a characteristic importation of the Boer into melodrama. The story ends with a skurry of blood and confusion near Spion Kop. Van Zwieten, the traitor, calls with his last breath to his enemy Wilfred Burton: "Come near."

Quite unsuspecting Wilfred knelt down beside him. In an instant Van Zwieten raised his revolver and shot him through the throat. He fell back with blood pouring from his mouth.

Van Zwieten laughed. "Quits!" he said. Then he fell back dead.

But Wilfred himself has something on his mind, and he says it to Brenda:

"In my breast pocket—look yourself—packet—confusion. I shot Malet."

"You?—oh!" gasped Brenda. "Why?"

Wilfred Burton raised himself up with one last expiring effort. "For England!" he cried. "For England. God bless Eng —" Then he, too, fell back a corpse. Brenda fainted.

In this and several other recent yarns the Boer element is introduced as a new sauce; in Mr. Hume Nisbet's For Right and England we have a Boer setting and Kruger for villain. The story opens in a Transvaal chapel, where Mr. Kruger is preaching; and we read: "Imagine a criminal of the most brutal type, possessed of a purpose, and fired with undying, immovable, implacable faith in that purpose, and you have Kruger as he now faced his besotted congregation." Mr. Nisbet has told us in his preface: "This is a Holy War, and we speak without prejudice."

Mr. G. Manville Fenn is a writer of more dignity, and of more real skill, than any of those we have named; and we gather from the preface of his last story, The Bag of Diamonds, that he sets a very just valuation on the novel that is a glorified bedroom yarn. He says that his story is sent forth "with no pretension to being an analysis of life problems or physical intricacies, but as a simple attempt at the mysterious and marvellous." It is meant to beguile, and it beguiles. Mr. Fenn is most readable.

"Never mind now," said the policeman. "Set it down. Gentlemen, I've got a theory about this here."

He turned on his bull's-eye again, as he spoke.

"A theory," cried Capel impatiently.

"Yes, sir. You see that crooked knife thing?"

"Yes."

"And the mark of the bloody hand on the counterpane, where it's dragged?"

"Yes, we saw that."

"Well; has any one looked under the bed?"

"No."

"Then we shall find him there."

He stepped forward, and raised the heavy valance, directing the light beneath.

"There!" he exclaimed. "What did I say?"

Just here we had to change for Matlock Bath. We do not know whether Guy obtained the ring: what happened to the Goddess; whether Klimo or Carne was uppermost in the end; or what it was that the policeman found under the bed. But thousands know these things, and are satisfied. And it is because these readers are so many that we take note of the crude literary fare which is supplied to them so lavishly. Doubtless, year by year the schoolmaster establishes a higher taste, and the yarning novelist will be forced—by reference to his bank account—to satisfy it.

Things Seen.

The Home Coming.

AT half-past one I found myself a prisoner in Park-lane. There was no escape. The thoroughfare was closed north and south by cordons of cavalry and police, the side streets were impassable, and the gates into the Park, where I had hoped to see the procession, were shut. The vast multitude inside the Park looked like prisoners of war, and as I was borne, like a swimmer on a wave, on the crowd that surged slowly down towards Piccadilly, I caught glimpses through the railings of the red plumes of the cavalry and the grey coats of the Volunteers. Fifty yards from Piccadilly the crowd which encompassed me staggered to a standstill. There I stood, a sea of heads in front of me, waiting patiently till the procession should pass. There for a long hour stood I, buffeted, tickled with peacocks' feathers, rained upon, comforting myself with the thought that I should at least see the heads of the mounted men, if there were any. Then they came, and with them came the sun, and also a hoarse voice crying at my elbow—"Ere you are, a lovely view of the 'eroes for a bob." I stepped upon the frail form, and saw them—saw their brown, laughing faces, and their young lithe figures passing swiftly with a lilt to the music. No emotional veterans these. They smiled, nodded: they wanted to break into a run, I am sure, like boys coming home from school. The bands played, the crowd cheered, handkerchiefs fluttered from windows, and on they went, file upon file, through the little lane that led to St. Paul's Cathedral. The cheers surged, and sank, and surged again, and then came the ambulance waggons carrying the wounded and sick. When the crowd realised what these waggons contained, for a moment the cheers stopped. The silence was more eloquent than the shouts. And then—clearly the ambulance waggons had run short, for at their tail came a char-à-banc, and that, too, was filled with invalids. On the box was seated a stout, middle-aged gentleman in a frock-coat and a shiny silk hat. He fascinated me. What was he doing in that galley? Did that frock-coat conceal the burly form of Mr. Burdett-Coutts, or was it Mr. Conan Doyle? Or did it garb the proprietor of the char-à-banc? I do not know. But I cannot rid him from my mind. When I tell my grandson of that delirious, muddled, chaotic day when the C.I.V. came home, I shall be equal to the occasion I hope, but the dominant incident in my memory will be that frock-coated figure, in the shiny silk hat, on the box of the char-à-banc.

Perhaps it was a stuffed figure after all—emblematic of the City.

The Drinker.

THE autumn sun shone warm on the deck of the Rhine steamer. I lunched—they called it dinner—on deck, and chatted with the brown-bearded man who showed a peep of blue ribbon in his button-hole. He was a Temperance Orator from Glasgow, and his face shone when he spoke of his trip through Germany. "Aye! aye! they drink here," he said, "but they dinna get fou. They ken what they can carry; but in Glasgie—. Here they utilise the gifts of the Lord cannily. Eh, mon, but it's fine." We fraternised; the hours slipped by, and at 7 o'clock we went below to dine. The cabin was empty, save for a German family party finishing their supper on one side of the saloon and an imposing figure on the other. He was a man of huge proportions, with a big, straggling face, and a fine tangled head of hair. Not a spiritual man; not entirely an attractive man, but certainly a man of interest, in spite of his gross habit of body. He had been drinking, so I learned later, all the afternoon. His record since noon had been four pint bottles of champagne, and he was now swilling his fifth bottle of Rhine wine. These are facts—verified facts. The effect of the liquor was merely to make him expansive and genial. He leaned back on the plush seat, rolling to and fro in physical satisfaction, and out of sheer good fellowship compelling conversation with the shy German family sitting opposite. His deep voice, extolling with frank and appreciative gusto the climate and his countrymen, rolled round the cabin. He included the Temperance Orator and myself in his monologue of capacious optimism, and presently, having called for another bottle of Rhine wine, which he finished in two drafts, he rose, took off his hat with a fine air, and ascended, easily and steadily, to the deck. An hour later we, the Temperance Orator and I, also went on deck. At a table near the top of the cabin stairs, a bright swing-lamp above his head, sat the Drinker entertaining the few passengers with vivid descriptions of Rhine legends. His big loose face and his roaming eyes shone with intelligence, the tones of his deep voice had caught the mystery of his subject, and he was just finishing his second bottle of beer. We gazed. "He kens what he can carry," I said; "he uses the Lord's gifts cannily and slowly." The Temperance Orator shook his head sadly. "Maybe! The Lord's mills grind slowly, but they grind exceedin' sma'."

Tinkering a Language.

It is the constant complaint of French pro-consuls that when they go outside the charmed circle of the Mediterranean the only European language they hear spoken is English, and that at every port the natives address them in that tongue, and almost refuse to consider them as European because they cannot speak the language of sailors and merchants. Unwilling to ascribe this state of things to the superior colonising and travelling instinct of the English, many Frenchmen have turned round and denounced the difficulties of their own tongue as the cause of it all. Some feeling of this kind no doubt inspired the Minister of Public Instruction, who, in March, 1898, passed a Bill nominating a Commission to inquire into the eccentricities of the French language, and to recommend, if possible, such changes as would render the study of French easier for school children and foreigners. Last January the Commission, of which M. Gaston Paris was president, began their labours, and on July 31 the result of its inquiries was published by M. Georges Leygues, the Minister of Public Instruction.

Emile Rodhe, a Swedish professor, has published the text of this Circular, La Nouvelle Réforme de l'Orthographe et de la Syntaxe Française (Lund: Librairie Gleerup), with an introduction and a commentary, and complains, with reason, that the Commission has not been as clear and as authoritative as it should have been. It has contented itself with recommendations and with "allowing" certain changes, which do not in reality simplify matters a great deal. He concludes his introduction by remarking that he "hopes soon to see a version at once more simple and more complete, and one which above all will afford masters who have to teach French a surer and more logical guide." But turning to the text of the Circular we find that the Commission was charged to prepare a simplification of the French syntax taught in primary and secondary schools, but that it was given no power to make rules. Therefore it was most careful not to introduce any new rules; no one is obliged to agree to its suggestions or even to read them, except, of course, schoolmasters whose business it is to be up to date in all matters relating to the language. Therefore the Circular, and all that relates to it, is of necessity more or less nebulous and without authority. The Commission, however, discovered that French is an unnecessarily complex language, for they put on record that those who read the elementary grammars are astonished at the number of "complications and subtleties" therein to be found. They therefore decided to do their best to suppress the absurd and irritating rules which enumber elementary education and which serve no useful purpose. Especially were they struck by the irregular plurals, the difficulties of genders, and the crimes of the past participle. Still they would do nothing but recommend, and summed up their labours in the phrase, "no additions, but a great many suppressions."

An appendix to the Circular gives the suggestions of the Commissioners, with examples. And at the very outset it is evident that the Commissioners have, by their recommendations, made confusion worse confounded. The Dictionary of the French Academy of a hundred years ago gives aigle as masculine when it means the bird, and feminine when, as in "Roman Eagles," it means a standard. The new suggestion is that aigle may be masculine or feminine just as you like. And so with other words. Hymne used to be m. a national anthem, and f. a sacred song. Now it is proposed to make it masculine or feminine indifferently. On this point M. Rodhe aptly remarks, that it would be much better to consider hymne as always masculine, for cantique or chant d'église is generally used for what we call a hymn. As for compound words, it cannot be said that the modifications of the Commission tend to simplicity, for these words are grouped by them into ten classes, and the outcome of it all seems to be that you may make your plurals as you like—which, after all, might have been expressed in many fewer words. Then with regard to past participles, a certain number of which are now invariable, the suggestion is that they should be declined at the will of the writer, which seems too much liberty, and a cause of confusion. The tendency should rather be to make more words invariable, and not to reintroduce the complications of gender. So far the recommendations have been merely unwieldy; now they become ungrammatical. On the question of the verb, the Commission says that in phrases such as "Le général avec quelques officiers est sorti du camp," the plural verb, sont sortis, may also be used. This, with all due deference, we hold to be a "howling grammatical"; and almost worse is "Le chat ainsi que le tigre sont des carnivores, ou, est un carnivore." It is not possible to conceive of anyone writing in English: "The general with some officers have quitted the camp," or, "The cat as well as the tiger are carnivorous beasts," and yet this is what the Commission proposes to allow in French. In this case it can hardly be said to have (in its own words) permitted nothing which can injure the French language.

But the past participle has always been the Asses' Bridge of the French student; and the Commissioners remark very sensibly that the rules on the subject grow more complicated every day, and that it is useless to persist in maintaining rules which are stumbling-blocks to learners and of no advantage to the language. Their suggestions are simple and to the point. They propose to make no change in the rules of the past participle after the verb être, but to allow the participle to remain invariable after the verb avoir—e.g., "Les fleurs qu'elles ont cueilli, or cueillies." This is a really useful and sensible reform, and indicates the lines on which similar alterations should be worked. The tendency should be towards simplification, and towards the doing away with all that is unnecessary in the language. But, after all, French can never be simplified as English, in the course of years and by natural selection, has been simplified. Its grace and beauty largely consist in those very points which present difficulties to the learner; and the Commissioners have realised this, for, instead of laying down rules, they have merely given "permissions." After all, French is a literary language, and no tinkering can make it one that will serve as the spoken tongue over the whole world and for every nationality.

Correspondence.

The Disuse of "R" after Vowels.

SIR,—Mr. MacRitchie's letter in the ACADEMY of October 13 on "An Abuse of R"—namely, the abuse of the letters ar to represent the sound of ah—raises the much wider and more important question of the total loss of the sound of r in such words as card, cared, curd, cord, shepherd, as well as its transformation to a fleeting obscure vowel in beard, board, and cured. That this change has taken place in London and in a large part of southern England is undeniable. Dr. Sweet and many other southerners would write these words phonetically somewhat as follows: Kaad, keed, kæd, kæd, shepəd, bijəd, bouəd, kjuəd—all without any trace of r. But this is certainly not the prevalent pronunciation in any other part of the English-speaking world. Originally a mere Cockneyism, it has infected the educated classes of London and the South. Must the whole world follow? Ought they to follow? Need they follow? Will they follow? I think not. It would be a calamity to the language if they universally did so; and still more a calamity if part of them did so and the remainder did not. The right thing to do, in the interest of the language, is to condemn the dropping (or the insertion) of the r as severely as the dropping (or insertion) of the h. Thus, and thus only, can the unity of the language be preserved. The question of "refinement" is entirely one of convention. No sound whatever is either refined or vulgar in itself: it only becomes so through association with the talk of refined or vulgar people, and in its origin this practice was distinctly vulgar.—I am, &c.,

R. J. LLOYD.

SIR,—May I suggest a correction of the statement made by Mr. Keane, in your last issue, as regards the organic character of the t in the French phrase a-t-il? It is true that the weakly accented form habet appeared as at in the eleventh century, but this final t is lost before the twelfth century, and does not reappear again until the fifteenth century. In confirmation of this we have the statement of Théodore de Bèze that one must pronounce parle-t-il, but write parle-il. The sixteenth century t is euphonic, and probably due to analogy with such phrases as dît-il, sait-il. In modern French the use of this t has been extended, and such a phrase as voilà-t-il is not unknown. The interrogative particle ti is daily gaining ground, and is a relic of seventeenth century popular speech—e.g., suis-je-ti for suis-je. (See Darmesteter, De la Création actuelle des mots nouveaux, page 4.)—I am, &c.,

PERCY G. THOMAS.

Rutherglen, West Derby, Liverpool.

"Dialling."

SIR,—In reviewing the new edition of Mrs. Gatty's Book of Sundials you seem to endorse an odd, but very intelligible, blunder. Robert Burns "was taught dialling along with mensuration by his village schoolmaster—a frequent practice with the better-class village schoolmaster of those days." Yes, but that had nothing to do with the making or adjusting of sundials, any more than with making clock-dials, mariners' compasses, or lapidary's dials—none of which industries were ever, surely, taught in village schools.

The "dialling" in question is simply a kind of surveying—surveying with a "miner's dial" or "miner's compass," specially used underground, as in coal pits. It has nothing in the world to do with sundials, as may well be believed! In Yorkshire I believe the art is vernacularly called "dallying," and the man who exercises it a "dallier." The miner's dial is essentially the same instrument as the "circumferentor" of the land surveyor.

D. P.

Another Version.

SIR,—The curious incident of the lady who accepted the picture and refused the frame is possibly a derivation from an actual occurrence of which the story runs more smoothly. Emerson with his daughter were visiting the studio of a painter whom I knew very well in Rome, the late Rollin Tilton, and Tilton offered to Miss Emerson, who accompanied her father, a sketch in its frame. She kept the sketch but sent back the frame, saying that she could not accept a gift of such value.

The allusion to Lowell's visit to Rome in your last issue leads me to offer an explanation of the silence of Lowell at that time on the death of his only son, who is buried in the Protestant cemetery there. It was a terrible blow to Lowell, and for many years it saddened him. He had in his study when I first knew him a little shrine arranged with relics of little Walter, and in one of his letters to me, written from Dresden just before assuming the Professorship at Harvard, he says that he is going to Rome and will "see the grave of little Walter."—I am, &c.,

W. J. STILLMAN.

Our Weekly Competition.

Result of No. 58 (New Series).

LAST week we asked our readers for the titles of the twelve best novels published this year, a prize of One Guinea to go to the sender of the list most nearly approximating to the plébiscite list. The result of the plébiscite is given in our Fiction Supplement, but we repeat it here:

TITLE.	NUMBER OF VOTES.
Quisanté	41
Tommy and Grizel	41
Robert Orange	41
The Isle of Unrest	33
The Farringdons	29
The Increasing Purpose	29
A Master of Craft	25
Senator North	23
Sons of the Morning	21
The Gateless Barrier	20
The Master Christian	19
Sophia	19

The list most nearly resembling the above has been sent by R. W., Fairmead, Worcester Road, Sutton, Surrey—who names ten out of the twelve novels given above. If the owner of these initials will kindly send us her full name a cheque for One Guinea shall be sent. R. W.'s list is as follows:

The Farringdons.	The Isle of Unrest.
The Master Christian.	The Gateless Barrier.
Robert Orange.	Sophia.
Quisanté.	Sons of the Morning.
A Master of Craft.	The Cardinal's Snuff-Box.
Tommy and Grizel.	Love and Mr. Lewisham.

Competition No. 59 (New Series).

A contributor sends us some "Literary Truths." Here are three:

Poetry is practised on old envelopes, and published in art linen. Genius is the depths, and cleverness the shallows, of the Olympian stream. Sheridan's genius, however, was a good deal on the Surface.

It is better to be startlingly staid than staidly startling. There is nothing so mild as an ineffective sensation.

We should not in the ordinary way accept these scintille. Our readers can do better; and we offer a prize of One Guinea for the best triplet of "Literary Truths."

RULES.

Answers, addressed "Literary Competition, THE ACADEMY, 43, Chancery-lane, W.C.," must reach us not later than the first post of Wednesday, November 7. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found on the second page of Wrapper, or it cannot enter into competition. Competitors sending more than one attempt at solution must accompany each attempt with a separate coupon; otherwise the first only will be considered.

The Academy

A Weekly Review of Literature and Life.

No. 1488. Established 1869.

10 November, 1900.

Price Threepence.

[Registered as a Newspaper.]

The Literary Week.

To commemorate the anthropological work of the late Prof. Huxley, the Council of the Anthropological Institute has decided to found a public lecture, which will be called the "Huxley Memorial Lecture," and will be given annually at the opening of the winter session of the Institute. The first Huxley lecture will be delivered by the Right Hon. Lord Avebury on November 13.

IN Huxley's Life and Letters, which we shall review next week, two amusing examples of misprints in the proofs of an article he had written for the Nineteenth Century are given. "You have a reader in your printer's office," Huxley wrote to Mr. Knowles, "who provides me with jokes. Last time he corrected, when my MS. spoke of the pigs as unwilling 'porters' of the devils, into 'porkers.' And this time, when I, writing about the Lord's Prayer, say 'current formula' he has it 'canting formula.'"

THE revival of "Patience" last Wednesday, nearly twenty years after its first performance, reminds us of Mr. W. S. Gilbert's inimitable gifts as a librettist, and emphasises the fact that he stands quite alone in that department of letters. No heir to this Alexander of wit and satire has arisen. And, oddly enough, time has not dulled the edge of the "Patience" humour, although the craze which it satirised has long gone the way of other crazes. The laughter on Wednesday evening was continuous, sometimes hilarious. And since it is interesting to record the degree with which a new audience takes the points of a classic libretto like "Patience," we have noted the passages which provoked the loudest laughter. It was not always produced by Mr. Gilbert's best. The house laughed loudest at:

JANE: "Bah! But yesterday I caught him in her dairy, eating fresh butter with a table-spoon. To-day he is not so well."

BUNTHORNE: "It is called, 'Oh, Hollow! Hollow! Hollow!'"

PATIENCE: "Is it a hunting song?"

JANE: "Red and yellow! Primary colours! Oh, South Kensington!"

BUNTHORNE: "Tell me, girl, do you ever yearn?"

PATIENCE: "I earn my living."

PATIENCE: "Why does he expect me to love him? He's not a relation."

GROSVENOR: "I am called 'Archibald the All-Right'—for I am infallible."

GROSVENOR: "The consequence was he was lost totally, And married a girl in the corps de ballet."

ANGELA: "Not supremely, perhaps, but oh so all-but. Oh, Sophir, are they not quite too all-but?"

SOPHIR: "They are indeed jolly utter."

WE were grieved to notice that in some half-a-dozen cases the performers were allowed to interpolate what are known as "gags." Such were received with the silence they deserved. They included Bunthorne's "gag" to the Colonel, "Go away red man," and his remark to Patience, "If you are fond of touch-and-go jocularly this is the shop for it"; Patience's suggestion that Grosvenor should wear a "paste-board nose," and Bunthorne's inexcusable aside to Jane, so unlike Mr. Gilbert's fine wit, "You're always putting your big foot in it." We suppose it was inevitable that some of the dialogue, no doubt with the author's sanction, should be brought "up to date." Thus "skill of Sir Garnet thrashing a cannibal" becomes "skill of a Roberts fighting a cannibal," not a happy emendation. As Grosvenor is now played by a thin actor it is allowable that he should delete the lines "much stouter than I was." Jane speaks of her charms as "deteriorating" not "decaying," and describes herself not as "massive," but as "good." The "threepenny 'bus young man" becomes "the twopenny tube young man," and the "Waterloo House young man" has emerged into the "Tottenham House young man."

MR. QUILLER-COUCH's new anthology of poetry, called The Oxford Book of English Verse, and published by the Clarendon Press, makes a volume of 883 pages. The scheme of the anthology is simple. The poets are arranged as nearly as possible in order of birth, with such groupings of anonymous pieces as seemed convenient. We shall consider the anthology on another occasion; here we may note some of the poems by living writers that find a place. They include:

Love in the Valley.....	Mr. Meredith.
Phoebus with Admetus	"
Tardy Spring	"
Love's Grave	"
Lucifer in Starlight	"
Chorus from Atalanta	Mr. Swinburne.
Hertha.....	"
Ave Atque Vale	"
Itylus	"
What the Bullet Sang	Mr. Bret Harte.
The Desolate City	Mr. W. S. Blunt.
With Esther	"
A Garden Song	Mr. Austin Dobson.
On a Dead Child	Mr. Robert Bridges.
My Delight and Thy Delight ..	"
England, My England	Mr. W. E. Henley.
"Out of the Night"	"
Ode in May	Mr. William Watson.
He Fell Among Thieves	Mr. H. Newbolt.
"I will arise and go now"	Mr. W. B. Yeats.
"My New-cut Ashler"	Mr. Kipling.
"Recessional"	"
"L'Envoi"	"
By the Margin of the Great Deep	"A. E."
The Poppy	Mr. Francis Thompson.
Renouncement	Mrs. Meynell.
The Lady of the Lambs	"
Ireland	Dora Sigerson.
Sheep and Lambs	Mrs. Hinkson.

We should add that we have instanced only a selection of the poems by living writers

THE title of Prof. Saintsbury's new work is in itself suggestive of a vast task: A History of Criticism and Literary Taste in Europe. The work will be completed in three volumes, of which the first, dealing with Classical and Mediæval Criticism, is before us. Prof. Saintsbury puts the genesis of his work thirty years back when, being "asked to undertake the duty of a critic, he had naturally to overhaul his own acquaintance with the theory and practice of criticism, and to inquire what was the acquaintance of others therewith." Prof. Saintsbury's "naturally" ought to wing its way to the conscience of many a young writer who, when asked to "undertake the duty of a critic," merely buys a new silk hat, overhauls his stock of epigrams, and looks round for a writer on whom he may flesh his U pen.

ATTEMPTS at histories of criticism have been few, and it is in connexion with these that we receive our first shock from that awkwardness which haunts Prof. Saintsbury's style, while it can never dim his penetration or obscure his learning. After mentioning Théry's Histoire des Opinions Littéraires as one of the very few books which are precedents of his own, Prof. Saintsbury says: "But the way in which 'Critique Arabe,' 'Critique Juive,' &c., are knocked off in a page or a paragraph at one end, and the way in which, at the other—though the second edition was published when Mr. Arnold was just going to write, and the first when Coleridge, and Hazlitt, and Lamb had already written—the historian knows of nothing English later than Campbell and Blair, are things a little disquieting." So, to be sure, are the construction and English of this sentence, which, though it may escape a charge of incorrectness, is, we fear, sunk in inelegance. The second volume of this work will deal with the matter from the Renaissance to the "death of eighteenth century Classicism." The third will be an account of Modern Criticism.

TOMPKINS of the Daily Chronicle has passed away, and Mr. Barry Pain, his most intimate friend, has written his obituary in that bottom corner where for years Tompkins's verses have appeared every Saturday morning. We cannot pretend to mingle our tears with Mr. Pain's, because Mr. Pain's tears are so very inconspicuous; and, as for Tompkins, "he wished to go." A good many of us had anticipated him in this desire, and in "the feeling of tedium vite" under which he had latterly suffered. We are glad that no column will be erected over him; as Mr. Pain touchingly remarks, "he had enough of that in his lifetime." Nor can we quarrel with this estimate of Tompkins as a poet: "He had unquestionably punctuality, cheek, and cunning." The last quality was shown in his choice of a dialect; "he could make say rhyme with die and commander with verandah, thus escaping a difficulty which weighs heavily on poets in the more legitimate line of business." We take it that there will be no Works.

WE are chary of mentioning Mr. Kipling in trivial connexions—the thing is so preposterously overdone—but we have just alighted on some interesting remarks which he made to Mr. F. T. Bullen when that writer asked him to contribute an introduction to The Cruise of the "Cachalot". The common wish of new writers to secure the patronage of an old writer has always seemed to us a sorry and ineffectual device, and this is what Mr. Kipling wrote: "Some rather interesting experiences have taught me that the best way of making a man hate me for life is to meddle in any way with his work. . . . If the book is good, it will go, and if not, nothing will make it stir. . . . All the men who want to stick a knife into me would stick it into you as soon as they saw my name prefacing your book. Bitter experience has taught me that that kind of thing doesn't pay. If a book stands by itself, it will stand by itself; but if you use another chap's name to help it to a start, you will get all the whacks that the other chap would have got if he had written the book, in addition to a few whacks on your own merits." That is about the truth. The distinguished preface always arouses our suspicion, particularly, perhaps, when it is a preface by the Lord Bishop of Inkechester.

SIR THEODORE MARTIN has announced his total withdrawal of his project of erecting a monument to his wife (Helen Faucit) in Stratford-on-Avon Church. This ends the matter. That it is an altogether happy ending we will not say; but the pain and heat aroused in the dispute will doubtless leave a lasting conviction that the great association of the chancel of Stratford-on-Avon Church must not be invaded or disturbed.

Blackwood's Muser without Method is in fierco mood this month. He says that the extension of the franchise has done nothing for the House of Commons, which, "except for its lawyers, differs little in temper or cultivation from the House of 1830. . . . The People sends to Westminster the same sort of men as in the old days were nominated by the great landowners"; and the prevailing opinion is "popular only in shape." We are not responsible for, but neither are we opposed to, the Muser's recognition of People as a noun in the singular. This by the way. The Methodless One turns next to literature, in which he says the democracy has won a more showy success. "Yet even here its success is apparent rather than real, and if we revise our definitions we shall find that the people has not yet reached literature with its sacrilegious hand. It has merely achieved a spurious imitation. In the old days, before the advent of a literate democracy, a distinction was made between literature and printed matter; but to-day the old differences are commonly abolished, and explanations are necessary for those who would not confound the works of Homer with the printed legend on a confectioner's bag. We are all men of letters now, and in nine cases out of ten a pair of scissors is more useful than a grey goose-quill." Most of which is sorrowfully true; and we seem to be sinking, not rising.

A CORRESPONDENT writes: "Let me correct the Thackeray story in the second paragraph, second column, of p. 396 of the ACADEMY of November 3, by quoting this from Spofford's Book for All Readers, 1900, p. 205:

Let me add one [question], reported by Mr. Robert Harrison, of the London Library, as asked him by W. M. Thackeray. The distinguished author wanted a book that would tell of General Wolfe, the hero of Quebec. 'I don't want to know about his battles,' said the novelist, 'I can get all that from the histories. I want something that will tell me the colour of the breeches he wore.'

Two other correspondents kindly send the same particulars.

ANOTHER correspondent writes:—"In last week's ACADEMY, in the review of a story, there is a reference to The Necklace of Princess Fiorimonde. Ever since it delighted us as children I have been searching for that book and its author, but hitherto have never succeeded; and I am writing now in the hope that you will inform your readers, who doubtless, some of them, remember what a world of beauty and mystery it opened to them. Its strange, unaccountable charm in our case was the striking contrast it afforded to the fairy tales of Grimm, the book of our devotion hitherto. We wondered vaguely why it was so different, and the doubt with which the book was received by the parental authorities and their verdict, 'queer,' served only to wrap it in a more delightful mystery. It was read to us, by entreaty, however, again and again, and then it went back to Mudie's and we heard it no more. Will you kindly give us the pleasure—or will it be the disappointment?—of reading it again? Only I hope that we may find the instinct of childhood has not misled us, and that the charm of this book which we remember may have power to charm our grown-up selves to-day." Who can help our correspondent?

EVERY reader of FitzGerald's letters has come to love James Spedding and to desire to know more about him. His forehead and his life of Bacon are so amusing under FitzGerald's pen that they do not satisfy the curiosity they arouse. Well, Spedding is figured to us in a pleasant article of reminiscences, by an anonymous writer, in the current Good Words. The writer was a young lady when Spedding was in his prime, and he wrote in Fraser his poem "On the Antiquity of Man, by Uncle James," ending:

So I said it, and think not I said it in jest,
For you'll find it is true to a letter,
That the only thing old people ought to know best
Is that young people ought to know better.

The writer continues:

I remember him escorting me to an archery meeting and talking to me about his great work on Bacon, which I was then reading, and which he had not yet finished; how he said he did not wish ever to be called the advocate of Bacon, how he had approached his subject with a perfectly unbiassed mind, not knowing in which direction the evidence would take him, and how he was led by the evidence he met with to form the estimate he did of Bacon's character. He told me he had tried to be perfectly impartial, and, if possible, to give the benefit of the doubt to the other side. . . . How he enjoyed "Lord Danderey": he told us one day he had just been for the second time to see him. (I wonder which was really the most laughter-provoking, "Lord Danderey" or "Charlie's Aunt"? It is difficult to compare them through this mist of years.) He once gave a prize of a clock for a handicap match at the Toxophilite, and we had an amusing discussion afterwards, as Mr. Spedding declared he could see no reason why he should not himself have competed and carried off his own prize.

Froude is also recalled. "We were talking about novels; Froude said they ought to be amusing and end happily; if he ever wrote one the hero and heroine should be rich and beautiful, and marry, and live happily ever after. Years after he did write a novel, The Two Chiefs of Dunboy, and it was one long tragedy."

"As the evening wore on, the back gardens of Greater London blazed with sporadic—as distinct from sustained—pyrotechny." This sets our mind at ease: the good old custom is kept up in the suburbs, and the good old style in Peterborough Court.

THOSE of our readers who have wisely possessed themselves of Mr. Henley's Lyra Heroica, should send to Mr. Nutt for Notes and Elucidations to Henley's Lyra Heroica, by Mr. W. W. Greg and Mr. L. Cope Cornford. A shilling buys the booklet, which is a graceful and conscientious little undertaking.

AUSTRALIA now publishes every month a Book Lover, in which we find pleasant literary chirpings. The editor believes in the paragraph as a medium for reviews not less than general comment; and the effect is quite good. A portrait of Mrs. Craigie is given on the front page of the number before us. Recently, the editor of the Book Lover sent to a few friends in England an Australian writer's poems, asking them to introduce the collection to English readers. From one of these—"a poet whom Prof. Tucker, of Melbourne University, recently ranked as one of the most prominent young poets of the time"—the following bitter reply was received:

I cannot do anything with or for the books you have sent me. I have no influence with the Editors, and am not, and have not been for a considerable time, writing about books. I was, indeed, never a reviewer, except under the whip of want; nothing short of starvation can induce me to review: it is a hideous calling. There are not six books published in a year that one wants to read; and there is seldom one of these one can write anything about except, as I say, upon compulsion. More notably, too, than in most livelihoods the honest reviewer is the cannibal: he is the ghoul of reputations and kills the author, qui author, for pieces of silver and gold. And the good-tempered medium liar whose motto is "live and let live" is unintentionally more cruel than the prompt tomahawker: he only prolongs the agony. The conditions of advertisement are that the unblushing, insistent hard-swearing of the author's friends, if he has any, is the only introduction to the public, and the sin qui non of continued success in all writing that is not addressed to this new public prepared by Government education. The time Carlyle foreknew is here. Literature "goes like the Iceland geysers in our time—like uncorked soda-water—and will, as I said, soon have done. Only wait; in fifty years [Carlyle wrote this in 1867: he took a large margin]. I should guess, all really serious souls will have quitted that mad province, left it to the roaring populaces, . . . and we of Literature by trade, we shall sink, I perceive, to the rank of street fiddling." The very measure of free education which Carlyle—wise prophet!—did so much to bring about has reduced his limit by nearly a score of years.

We are sometimes a little despondent ourselves, but never like this.

Poet Lore is very much like itself this month. In an article on "The Plastic Word," we read that newly-created man "roamed, an unconscious cosmopolite; there was no perspective of any past in the mental shadows of which lay speechless and pulseless a plasmic concept—no introspection to pierce the infinite, no moral reflex to tuition the conscience." The following definitions are more luscious than lucid:

A sentence is the incarnation of the idea, and words the sinews of its construction, as thought is the pulse of its being; inspiration breathes its spirit into the soul of the structure, the looming temple from the crude material. Letters as characters are the transvariant bits for the infinitudes of combination, as sounds they are the inflective notes of speech. A simple word is a sensate power awakened by inspirit of meaning which as intent convenes from the mystery of infinite relation.

From the rest of the article, which bears the Boston postmark on every page, we learn that Speech is the baptism of the material and the immaterial. Man in the clearance of mental vision caught at angular consonant and rounded vowel wherefrom speech was drawn as remotely as is the note of a violin from the earth-hidden rootlets up through the growth of its native tree.

Old Egypt took grandly to the poets before Moses the Seer of Amen sang the praises of his God and King.

The word is superior to the letters composing it, but the sense is superior to both.

The writer's conclusion is: "So, after all, the lines in Festus are true:

'All rests with him who reads,' &c."

Which seems to put us out of court.

THE "Fellowship of the Three Kings" is a new society that is in process of being formed. The Fellowship has been named from the three kings who followed the star at the fall of the ancient world, and has no doctrines of its own except that there is a spiritual happiness could we but find it. Mr. W. B. Yeats will lecture, and among other papers that will be read at the Public Chapters of the Fellowship are these on "Agnostic Mysticism," "The Rituals of the Egyptians," "Philosophers of Love and Beauty," and "The Symbolism of Wagner's Tristan and Isolde." The secretary is Mr. D. N. Dunlop, 28, Killarney-road, W.

THE new number of the American Bookman has an article called "Four Rather Notable Books of Fiction." Three we know—Mr. A. J. Dawson's African Nights' Entertainment, Mr. Hope's Quisante, and Mr. Eden Phillpott's Sons of the Morning; but the fourth, Mr. Irvin Bacheller's Eben Holden, is unfamiliar. But Eben Holden is apparently being read in America according to our old acquaintance, the compiler of the "Best Selling Books." Again, we remark with astonishment, that "over there" they seem to read nothing but fiction. The six "best selling" books in America during the past month are all novels:

The Reign of Law. Allen.
The Master Christian. Corelli.
To Have and to Hold. Johnston.
Uncleared Bread. Grant.
Eben Holden. Bacheller.
The Redemption of David Corson. Goss.

FROM Mr. J. H. Slater's introduction to the new issue of Book-Prices Current (Stock) we take the following explanation of the recent drop in the value of Stevenson and Kipling first editions:

When a modern, or comparatively modern, book is believed to be unique, or, at any rate, extremely scarce, it will invariably bring a high price, provided it be written by an author of great repute. The fact of the sale is at once reported in the newspapers and elsewhere, and this results in a general search in likely quarters and the discovery of other copies hitherto unsuspected.

Bibliographical.

I HAVE not yet had time to apply any tests to Mr. F. E. Murray's Bibliography of Austin Dobson, and, in truth, it is only after repeated consultations that the value and utility of a book of that sort can be fully estimated. I can only say at present that it would seem as if Mr. Murray had bestowed upon his volume an immense amount of careful labour. He deals with Mr. Dobson's prose as well as with his verse, and he has had, accordingly, a wide field to cover. Whether it was necessary or desirable to go into so much detail as Mr. Murray indulges in is, obviously, a matter for Mr. Murray's consideration only. Every bibliographer is an enthusiast, or he would not be a bibliographer; and Mr. Murray evidently is more enthusiastic than most. I hope he will find sympathisers sufficiently numerous to buy up his whole edition. The only thing I at present miss from the book is a note on the references to Mr. Dobson in current literature, both in prose and in verse. A list of the chief critical discourses on his works would have been acceptable. Mr. Murray quotes, I observe, the ballade which Mr. F. D. Sherman addressed to Mr. Dobson, but I see no allusion to the rondeaux addressed to the poet by J. R. Lowell and E. Nesbit.

On the subject of this Bibliography of Austin Dobson, Mr. W. Davenport Adams says: "I observe that Mr. Murray prefixes to his Bibliography half-a-dozen pages suggested by an article on Mr. Dobson's poetry which I contributed to the Bookman in 1896. In the middle of his third page Mr. Murray begins to 'correct' some 'slight mistakes' which he says he has discovered in my paper. These errors of statement, I find, amount to two, both of minor moment. The others are errors of omission, pardonable (I think) in the case of an essay which did not profess to go into extremely minute particulars. I have never had at my disposal the time necessary for the production of such a book as Mr. Murray's; and, indeed, even if I had possessed the requisite leisure, I should not have devoted it, great as is my admiration of Mr. Dobson's work, to a purpose so remote from the active enjoyment of his writings."

I imagine that Mr. Augustus Hare is not so omnivorous in his reading as he is long-winded in personal narrative. Had he read more widely he could not possibly have admitted into his new volumes so many venerable anecdotes. With these his pages are very thickly strewn. Take, for example, the story of the impudent but well-justified wit who, meeting in the street a pompous person, evidently overcharged with self-esteem, stopped him, and said: "I beg your pardon, sir, but are you anybody in particular?" This ancient jest is attributed by Lord William Lennox to Theodore Hook, and a variant on it is given in the diary of the Rev. J. C. Young. Very interesting is it to try to trace the origin of "good stories," but it is extraordinary how rarely one succeeds in the enterprise.

Mr. Hare, by the way, suggests yet another parent for "that epigram" on "the doctor's eyes," which was recently the subject of inquiry in these columns. According to Mr. Hare, the Rev. Hugh Pearson, in the course of conversation with him, referred to the "capital lines" as the work of Justice Knight Bruce. "Next, please!"

"I note," says a correspondent, "that Mr. Maurice Hewlett has written a romance round the figure of Richard Cœur-de-Lion. Surely it has not been left to a present-day novelist to deal with a subject so full of charming possibilities? Of course I know all about the King Richard of The Talisman, and the mysterious knight in Ivanhoe; but is Mr. Hewlett the first to write a story with Richard as its most conspicuous figure? At first I thought that G. P. R. James had, in his day, laid sacrilegious hands on Richard; but my memory, apparently, has led me astray. It was, seemingly, a formal History of Richard Cœur-de-Lion that James produced."

The announcement that Mr. W. P. Courtney is engaged upon an index to bibliographical literature is indeed interesting. It is now some time since Mr. Courtney came prominently before the public, and I should not be surprised if some people were inclined to confuse him with the other Mr. Courtney—Mr. W. L. Courtney, whose name is so constantly to the fore in the columns of the Daily Telegraph, and appears regularly on the cover of the Fortnightly Review. Mr. W. P. Courtney's promised work will be very welcome. At present he is chiefly known in the book-world as the author of a work on English Whist and English Whist Players—a subject, we should say, not at all in the "line" of his namesake.

"C. K. S.," in the Sphere, has a note on Messrs. Nelson's editions of the works of Dickens and Thackeray, contrasting the firm's recent literary excursions with those which they made in the days of The Schonberg-Gotta Family and "A. L. O. E." There was, however, a time—some twenty-five or thirty years ago—when Messrs. Nelson distinguished themselves very highly by producing handsome English translations of Michelet's works on The Bird, The Sea, and so forth, with all the original illustrations by that delicate draughtsman, H. Giacomelli. They also produced at that period an English version of an unpublished French work from the pen of Mme. Michelet. It will be seen, therefore, that the firm has a literary tradition of which, evidently, it is not unmindful.

An anonymous correspondent (correspondents of this sort always are anonymous) twits me with depriving Dr. Jessopp last week of the second "p" in his name. As my correspondent ought to know, there are such things as printers' errors. Moreover, when a man has two "p's" at the end of his name, he can afford to dispense with one of them occasionally, just as a man whose name ended (say) in "eaux" could afford to do without the "x" now and then, if need be.

THE BOOKWORM.

Reviews.

Lord Rosebery v. Lord Liverpool.

Napoleon: the Last Phase. By Lord Rosebery. (A. L. Humphreys. 7s. 6d.)

IN a certain way this book, with its sharp criticism of England's policy after Waterloo, and its humanely sympathetic attempts to understand the great Foe who then fell into our hands, is a sign of the times. It marks a change in the English character. Ever since Napoleon's day we have been altering; but only quite recently has our alteration—in the respect to which we refer here—been noticeable. Lord Rosebery's monograph is another token of a growing humanity, a willingness to see the other side too, a new power to recognise the claims of the enemy. The Boer War brought to light—with its talk of Pro-Boers and Little Englanders—the presence of this change of feeling in our midst. Had it not been for that war, it might have been hidden for many years to come; but the struggle has brought it out. It is not that patriotism is weaker than it was, or that England is less admirable; but the gospel of live and let live is getting a surer footing in this island, and individual thought is spreading and spreading. The fact that it is no longer sufficient for the Union Jack to be unfurled for every man who calls it his to be satisfied with the conduct of affairs that is going forward beneath it, is proof enough of this spread of reasoning. We are thinking more as units and less as a people. Whether this is good for the material side of national progress remains to be seen; but that it is better for its moral character is hardly to be questioned.

To pursue the subject further would be to digress too much; but we wish now merely to relate to this movement, this awakening, Lord Rosebery's book, which is a plea for Napoleon's right to have been treated differently, and an indictment, in unsparing terms, of England's conduct towards him. Lord Rosebery has long been utterly dissatisfied with England's custodianship of the Man of Destiny; and, in his own words, he has written this book to lay that ghost. Napoleon on St. Helena has haunted him—Napoleon, that gigantic force, imprisoned into inoperativeness for six wretched years. The thought became an obsession, and when the opportunity came Lord Rosebery stilled it. His own opinion, at any rate, is now known; and by its expression Napoleonic literature is the richer. Literary ghosts can rarely have been laid in such works of singular fascination. In so far as it rebukes England this book can appeal only to the minority; but the drama is so skilfully unfolded, and the central figure is so minutely bodied forth, that it is also a book for all. The spectacle of an ex-Prime Minister sitting down with perfect urbanity, but a determination to tell the truth however unpalatable about one of his predecessors, is so rare as to lend a touch of piquancy which, apart from the merits of the work, should attract readers, especially those of a sardonic turn. These will not be disappointed.

But it is time to show some of the quality of Lord Rosebery's history. The chapter on Napoleon and the Democracy is masterly. Lord Rosebery summarises it at the outset in an epigram: "Napoleon was indeed a child of the Revolution, but a child whose one idea was parricide," and then proceeds to prove the point; but we take our quotations from the last chapter of all, in which the character of the Man of Destiny is attempted. This is good:

Scavenger is a coarse word, yet it accurately represents Napoleon's first function as ruler. The volcano of the French Revolution had burned itself out. He had to clear away the cold lava; the rubbish of past destruction; the cinders and the scorie; the fungus of corruption which had overgrown all, and was for the moment the only visible result. What he often said of the Crown of France is absolutely true of its government. "I found it in the gutter, and I picked it up on my sword's point." The gutter government he replaced by a new administrative machine, trim, pervading, and efficient: efficient, that is to say, so long as the engineer was a man of extraordinary energy and genius.

Then he is a scourge. He purges the floor of Europe with fire. As the sword and spirit of the Revolution, though in all the pomp of the purple, he visits the ancient monarchies, and compels them to set their houses in order. True, after his fall they relapse. But it is only for a space, and reform if not revolt is soon busy among them. Had it not been for Napoleon this could not have happened.

In any work on Napoleon in the future Lord Rosebery's sentences must be taken into account. Lord Rosebery brings full justice to the Napoleonic Code. He continues in a noble passage:

One other positive result, which is in truth scarcely less substantial than the Code, may be laid to his account. He has left behind the memory of a period of splendour and dominion, which, even if it does not keep the imagination of his people in a perpetual glow, remains a symbol, as monumental and visible as the tomb in the Invalides, to stimulate the national ambition. The terrible sacrifices which he exacted are forgotten, and, if they be remembered, compare not unfavourably (on paper, at all events) with those entailed by the modern system, even in time of peace; without foreign supremacy or the Empire of the West to be placed to the credit side. And so they may obliterate the eagles and the initials if they will, it avails nothing. France in chill moments of disaster, or even of mere material and commercial well-being, will turn and warm herself at the glories of Napoleon. The atmosphere is still imbued with the light and heat of the imperial era, with the blaze of his victories, and with the lustre of those years when Europe was the anvil for the hammer of France.

And this is the final paragraph of this fascinating work:

Was he a great man? That is a much simpler question, but it involves definitions. If by "great" be intended the combination of moral qualities with those of intellect, great he certainly was not. But that he was great in the sense of being extraordinary and supreme we can have no doubt. If greatness stands for natural power, for predominance, for something human beyond humanity, then Napoleon was assuredly great. Besides that indefinable spark which we call genius, he represents a combination of intellect and energy which has never perhaps been equalled, never, certainly, surpassed. He carried human faculty to the farthest point of which we have accurate knowledge. Alexander is a remote prodigy, too remote for precise comparison. To Caesar the same objection is applicable. Homer and Shakespeare are impersonal names. Besides, we need for comparison men of action and business. Of all these great figures, it may be said that we do not know enough. But Napoleon lived under the modern microscope. Under the fiercest glare of scrutiny he enlarged indefinitely the limits of human conception and human possibility. Till he had lived, no one could realise that there could be so stupendous a combination of military and civil genius, such comprehension of view united to such grasp of detail, such prodigious vitality of body and mind. "He contracts history," said Madame d'Houdetot, "and expands imagination." "He has thrown a doubt," said Lord Dudley, "on all past glory; he has made all future renown impossible." This is hyperbole, but with a substance of truth. No name represents so completely and conspicuously dominion, splendour, and catastrophe. He raised himself by the use, and ruined himself by the abuse, of superhuman faculties. He was wrecked by the extravagance of his own genius. No less powers than those which had effected his rise could have achieved his fall.

Technically, the only real fault of the book, to our mind, is the inadequacy of its opening. There might with so much advantage have been a preamble, or threshold statement, setting forth the purpose of the inquiry and summarising events up to the deportation of "The Man" to his Rock. For a fine book the beginning, as it stands, is too casual. Indeed, the first chapter, dealing with the literature of the exile, might almost have been relegated to an appendix. It is not too late now for Lord Rosebery to amend this fault. A second edition will be demanded directly, and he could prefix a prelude worthy of the history that follows. It must be at his fingers' ends. One other point: Lord Rosebery should look to his "onlys." The misplaced "only" is his pet error. So much for flaws of technique. As to Lord Rosebery's judgments—in one instance only do we think him a little wanting in justice: we think that he has not sufficiently considered what the dread of Napoleon—of Boney—was at the time of his defeat, and how great a strain was placed upon the statesmen responsible for his detention—Lord Liverpool and Lord Bathurst. Lord Rosebery has been in office himself: he knows something of the wear and tear of high position, and we think he might have made a little more allowance for Napoleon's English custodians. He is fully alive to the seriousness of the position. In his own graphic phrase, "Europe [that is to say, England; that is to say, Lord Liverpool and Lord Bathurst] buckled itself to the unprecedented task of gagging and paralysing an intelligence and a force which were too gigantic for the welfare and security of the world." It was a large order, and much may be forgiven the human politicians on whom fell the onus of fulfilling it. For Sir Hudson Lowe, however, we find it difficult to say so much. His unsuitability was too patent.

What the future has in store for Lord Rosebery no one knows. He may project himself again into affairs; a revulsion of feeling against the present Government may bring the ball again to his feet, and he may this time devote his every energy to statecraft. But if not, if he chooses to remain a more or less private gentleman—only occasionally flashing like a brilliant star across the political heavens or lighting up some social gathering by his lambent oratory—we hope with all our heart that he will continue his historical studies. For Lord Rosebery has the true historian's gift. He has patience; he is thorough; he is unsatisfied until every authority has been consulted, every by-way explored; he wants to know the truth. But a man may have all these qualities and yet be inarticulate. Lord Rosebery is mellifluously articulate. And a man may have all these qualities with articulateness added and yet be dull. Lord Rosebery is never dull. He has humour as well as thoroughness, picturesqueness as well as fluency. Better still, he has imaginative sympathy: and by its aid Napoleon's latest biography has been enabled to get more nigh to that lonely Titan than a myriad of his predecessors, who, with all their pains—lacking imaginative sympathy—have but tinkered at his exterior. But his most precious possession of all is, perhaps, temper. Lord Rosebery has the perfect historian's temper. The temper of his Napoleon is superb.

Kid Glove Autobiography.

The Story of My Life. Vols. IV., V., VI. By Augustus J. C. Hare. (Allen. 31s. 6d.)

It can hardly be our fault that Mr. Hare's reminiscences make us think continually of gloves. That his own are of soft and creaseless kid we can never be brought to disbelieve; and that he has spent a considerable portion of his life in drawing them on and off at the right moments will not, we think, be doubted by any dispassionate reader of these volumes. Was ever such a genteel person? As a squire of old ladies Mr. Hare cannot possibly have a rival. He seems to have driven hundreds of miles with them in close carriages, gasping for air and small-talk, and the records of such drives between 1871 and this year of grace fill many a page of his journal. On June 29, 1876, Mr. Hare went down into Kent for Miss Virginia Smith's wedding, "toiling in a cab with Lady Craven over the hot chalky hills." In August of the same year he fell in with the Dowager Duchess of Cleveland at Amptill Station—the Lowther carriage was waiting for both—and "she talked the whole way, but the carriage rumbled so that I could hardly hear a word she said, except that when I remarked, 'What a fine tree!' as we entered the park, she answered rather sharply, 'That was a fine tree.' She spoke, too, of the Lowther boys—'They are having their vacancies.' I like that word vacancies," she said." On November 20, 1877, he "drove with Lady Exeter, Lady Catherine Weyland, and Lady Jane Grimston to St. Albans, and went over the Abbey with Mr. Chapel, the delightfully enthusiastic clerk of the works, who repeatedly exclaimed, 'It is the pride of my life, sir, it is the pride of my life.'" On December 6, at King's Cross, "I met Elizabeth Biddulph, Marie Adeane, Alethea Grenfell, and the Dalryells, and we came down together, a merry party to Hertford, where the Robert Smiths sent to fetch us to their picturesque new house of Goldings." On June 28, 1875: "Luncheon with dear old Lady Grey. Then to Lady Wharndcliffe, who looked very lovely seated beneath a great blue-green vase filled with lilies." September 22, 1887: "I came last night to the Locker-Lampsons, at Cromer, finding Julia, Lady Jersey, Brandling, Lady Kathleen Bligh, and Rollo Russell there. To-day we have been to Blickling, where we found Lady Lothian and Lady Pembroke walking in the radiantly beautiful garden of the grand old house." The book is a chronicle of such things. Half the country houses in England are visited, drawn, and described by Mr. Hare; and their inhabitants are eulogised in every degree of gush possible to the human diaphragm. When Mr. Hare tells us that on Sunday, July 10, 1887, he sat in the afternoon in the garden at Lowther Lodge, "seeing a long diorama of people drop in and have tea," he seems to be compressing the story of his life into a sentence. We say "seems," because, to be just, it is not so; but the seeming is great at the moment.

In face of the above extracts and comments it would be unjust not to remind our readers that, as the topographer of London, Paris, Rome, Northern and Central Italy, and nearly all France, Mr. Hare has done work of unquestionable value. It is only when he deals with society that he is garrulous, and we had almost said insufferable. Even from these gatherings of languid festivity he brings back a vast amount of gossip that is entertaining to-day, and may be thought useful and illuminative to-morrow. Not without force, he quotes in his self-defence Coleridge's remark: "I could inform the dullest author how he might write an interesting book. Let him relate the events of his own life with honesty, not disguising the feelings that accompanied them." This is what Mr. Hare does; and he never disguises the feeling of satisfaction which his social and literary successes gave him when they flashed. He tells us that his Story of Two Noble Lives was "warmly welcomed by the upper classes of society." The empressment which accompanied the invitation of a great lord or lady is carefully recorded. His connexion with the Crown Prince of Sweden, as tutor, is written up for all it is worth; and is there not something absolute about this entry: "March 9, 1881: Met Princess Mary at luncheon at Lady Barrington's, who only presented me by 'Here is Augustus'?"

Here, indeed, is Augustus in more than 2,500 pages. A future generation may see naïveté and personal charm in the portentous budget, but to-day these qualities are hardly likely to be recognised, if they exist. Pepys went to work very differently. He committed his diary to a cypher, and left it in manuscript. Mr. Hare blabs all, and does not wait for time to ripen it. It is probable that he would wait in vain; for his book has none of the qualities of a masterpiece. Small, retail, and obsequious the narrative is; and it is in no wise lifted to a higher plane by Mr. Hare's plentiful emotion when a death or a funeral is described. Here we are on delicate ground; but who made it necessary for us to invade it? Mr. Hare's long and tearful valedictions to his step-mother, to Lady Waterford, to his old nurse, Mary Lea, and to other friends are, though they ought not to be, matter for criticism. Such feelings are sacred; but as written here they are tedious and effeminate. Nor do they gain by chance association (in one's memory of a couple of thousand pages) with passages in which less Christian sentiments are expressed. For example, Mr. Hare tells us that he has had the "small trial" of having to pay another call of £300 on some unfortunate Electric Light shares. "I am not more than very temporarily troubled by such things—it is no use." And yet with an ill-nature which seems to us flagrant, Mr. Hare gives the name of the friend who "involved" him in this piece of finance—adding, "All I have ever made by my writings in fourteen very hard-worked years is gone now through —" [we omit the name].

Not only do ill-natured comments abound, but inaccuracies are far too common. The author of Ships that Pass in the Night will not recognise herself as "Miss Harynden." This is, perhaps, a printer's error, but what are we to say of the statement that "We went also to the attractive old town of Woodbridge, where Percy Fitzgerald lived, who wrote so many capital articles." And for what reason does Mr. Hare transfer that capital "Conscious-as-we-are-of-each-other's-imperfections" story from the Law Courts, with Lord Bowen for its hero, to an obscure bench of Lancashire magistrates?

The elements of this autobiography which are of immediate value are, firstly, the general picture presented (in awful overdose, as we have shown) of English country-house life, and the talk of West End dinner-tables; secondly, the many anecdotes of people of real interest, as Browning, Tennyson, Carlyle, Lord Houghton, Lady Waterford, and others. Many of these, however, are second-hand and trivial enough. Here is one. Browning described how once, in going down to dinner, the lady who fell to his share suddenly said to him: "You are a poet, aren't you?" "Well, people are sometimes kind enough to say that I am." "Oh, don't mind my having mentioned it; you know Lord Byron was a poet!" Many will like to know how Lord Tennyson could be roused to write. One day, when he was unusually depressed, his nurse said to him: "Mr. Tennyson, you ought to be ashamed of yourself for grumbling in this way: you ought to be expressing your gratitude for your recovery from your bad illness by giving us something—by giving it to the world." He went off repentant to his own room, and returned in half an hour with "Crossing the Bar." Of such stories there are many, and we have been unfortunate if we have conveyed the idea that Mr. Hare is not very interesting as well as very provoking. In truth, the book contains hundreds of good things, but is so big that there is room for hundreds of sentimental nothings, daily complacencies, and tutorial sermonising. With a frankness which we admire, Mr. Hare tells us how Mrs. Lecky, wife of Mr. W. E. H. Lecky, behaved to him at dinner. Finding he did not interest her, she talked exclusively to Lord O'Hagan on the other side of her. "Towards the close of dinner she said to me: 'We have been a long time at dinner.' 'To me it has seemed quite endless,' I said. 'Well,' she exclaimed, 'I do not wonder that you were chosen to speak truth to princes.'" All the same, it is evident that Mr. Hare is a first-class raconteur, and we can believe his statement that whenever he retired to his room in a certain great house the Duchesses used to send a servant to fetch him back to tell them stories.

Mr. Hare is sore about the treatment which the first three volumes of his Life received at the hands of reviewers; and in expounding the natural history of criticism, as he sees it, he says that the first review of a book usually sets the fashion for the rest! This is news to us. But we may remark that this article is the first review of Mr. Hare's book that has come under our eye, and that it is intended as our personal opinion, not as a critical fashion block.

Obiter Dicta.

Studies by the Way. By the Right Hon. Sir Edward Fry. (Nisbet. 10s. 6d. net.)

SIR EDWARD FRY'S preface is rather alarming in its humility. He tells us that the papers he prints "make no pretence to add anything to the sum of human knowledge." It has always been his habit to "commit something to paper" on subjects that interested him, and he has found the practice to be one of great mental value. Well, as a rule, we should be inclined to suggest that papers which add nothing, in the widest sense, to the sum of human knowledge, and are only written for the purposes of mental training and discipline, are best left unprinted. At the most, let them live their little day in the magazines and cease to be. But, in the first place, Sir Edward Fry is unjust to himself. If his essays are not creative, they are at least pleasantly epidemic. They display an alert intelligence ranging over a wide field of interest, and touching topic after topic with judicious exposition or valuable comment. Sir Edward Fry's versatility of mind is considerable. A knowledge of pre-historic methods of "conveyancing" or an acute analysis of the "Theory of Punishment" you might expect from him; but he is equally ready to discuss the spiritual value of "The Old Testament," or the possible means of improving "Sermons," to study "The 'Banquet' of Dante," or to discourse on those aspects of country life and travel in the Greek world which appear to have a particular fascination for him. And in the second place, even were the intrinsic value of those jottings less than it is, we should yet welcome them, as we have fortunately occasion to welcome many similar books, for a fresh proof of the continued interest taken by successful English men of affairs in letters; for a pledge of the widened and enlightened outlook upon practical life which letters—literæ humaniores—are the best discipline to secure. It would be a bad look out for the Bar, the Church, the Civil Service, or any other calling, were its leading men to leave the making of books entirely to the professional scribes. And, happily, we see at present no chance of such a relinquishment.

We have found Sir Edward Fry's paper on "Conveyancing" particularly good reading. It opens with an exordium almost lyric in its glorification of the dusky process:

I have spoken of the legal concepts amidst which the conveyancer dwells in his chambers—thoughts, as I have said, of estates tail and remainders and uses and trusts—thoughts that to many men seem most unintelligible and unreal: and yet what a strange power dwells in them! They regulate the succession of estates; and stately mansions and wide parks and noble woods, and all the glory that pertains to such possessions, go to this man or the other according to these musty conceptions; and he who shall venture to run counter to them or neglect them will find in life, or after death (if he then revisit the earth), that those notions are too strong for him; so strongly do the invisible thoughts of men regulate and control the enjoyment of things outward and visible—so much mightier even in this life are the things that are not seen than the things that are seen.

The earliest example of conveyancing mentioned in literature is the purchase by Abraham of the cave of Machpelah, and the minute description of the parcels of land almost suggests that the narrator had a legal record before him: "The field of Ephron, which was in Machpelah, which was before Mamre, the field, and cave which was therein, and all the trees that were in the field, that were in all the borders round about." Sir Edward Fry discusses a conveyance found on an Assyrian tablet of the seventh or eighth century B.C., the conveyances of the Greek temple inscriptions, the wills of Aristotle and Epicurus, the elaborate curses and penalties spiritual invoked in many conveyances upon the breakers of them; and, finally, points out that the foundation-stone of English liberties, the Magna Charter itself, is modelled upon the phraseology of a conveyance of land.

Knowledge of affairs, fresh observation, classical reminiscence, are happily blended in these papers, and that on Sicily closes with a reflection which must express the feeling of many a northern voyager in all these lands of the South:

Sicily is in some sense a land of shadows—a land where the dead are more present to the mind than the living—a land where one feels oneself to be a breathing man visiting, like Daute, or like Hercules, the realms of phantoms. Everywhere you are haunted by the ghosts of great men, or the memories of great events, or of great and departed nations. In the lemon groves of the promontory of Naxos one fancies the sickly Nicias whiling away the winter, while his fleet rides in the bay outside the Greek harbour; at Syracuse we see a whole host of great shades—Nicias again, and Lamachus, slain near the Anapo, and the ghosts of thousands of Athenians perishing in the great harbour and on the cliffs of Epipolæ, and last of all in the quarries, and so vanishing into thin air; and, again, by the shores of Ortygia, we think of Plato and Pindar and Bacchylides and Simonides, the visitors at the court of the stately Hiero; and last, but not least, of St. Paul tarrying for a short space in the harbour, and, perhaps, preaching in some of the squares or streets of the old city. There is yet another figure, as I have already mentioned, who follows one's thoughts through Sicily—the haughty and mystical Empedocles—we remember him on the slopes of Etna, in his native Acragas, and again at Selinus. And even in bright and busy Palermo the dead are more to us than the living. It is of Hamilkar or Marcellus, or Frederick the Second and the brilliant Norman kings, that we think the most. So thoroughly in Sicily do the shadows of the past dominate the living present.

Ripe Prose.

Miscellanies. By Edward FitzGerald. "Golden Treasury" Series. (Macmillan. 2s. 6d.)

THERE are things in this book that it was high time the FitzGerald following knew something about. The Woodbridge recluse remembering his own youth and sympathising with the youth of others, as in "Euphranor"; helping to establish the memory of a good and simple man, as in the memoir of Bernard Barton; striving to persuade people to read more of Crabbe, as in the preface to the Tales of the Hall; half humorously, half sadly, and all wisely commenting on proverbial sagacity, as in the preface to Polonius,—this FitzGerald is a more approachable figure than the FitzGerald behind Omar Khayyam or even the Letters. The FitzGerald who could write this beautiful elegy on his old friend Bernard Barton is too little known:

Lay him gently in the ground,
The good, the genial, and the wise;
While Spring blows forward in the skies
To breathe new verdure o'er the mound
Where the kindly Poet lies.

Gently lay him in his place,
While the still Brethren round him stand;
Th' soul indeed is far away,
But we would reverence the clay
In which so long she made a stay,
Beating through the friendly face,
And holding forth the honest hand—

Thou, that didst so often twine
For other urns the funeral song,
One who has known and lov'd thee long,
Would, ere he mingles with the throng,
Just hang this little wreath on thine.

Farewell, thou spirit kind and true;
Old Friend, for evermore Adieu!

That this side of FitzGerald is so little known is his own fault or misfortune, no doubt; he had that curious temperament which decrees that its possessors shall rarely display their sweetest. But some of his sweetest is in this little book, and we prize it accordingly.

The book is to be prized, too, for its style. FitzGerald wrote a prose of his own, flexible, sure, and very serene. This glimpse of Bernard Barton as picture-lover and picture-buyer could not be improved upon in any respect:

With little critical knowledge of pictures, he was very fond of them, especially such as represented scenery familiar to him—the shady lane, the heath, the corn-field, the village, the sea-shore. And he loved, after coming away from the bank, to sit in his room and watch the twilight steal over his landscapes as over the real face of nature, and then lit up again by fire or candle light. Nor could any itinerant picture-dealer pass Mr. Barton's door without calling to tempt him to a new purchase. And then was B. B. to be seen, just come up from the bank, with broad-brim and spectacles on, examining some picture set before him on a chair in the most advantageous light; the dealer recommending, and Barton wavering, until partly by money, and partly by exchange of some older favourites, with perhaps a snuff-box thrown in to turn the scale, a bargain was concluded—generally to B. B.'s great disadvantage and great content. Then friends were called in to admire; and letters written to describe; and the picture taken up to his bed-room to be seen by candlelight on going to bed, and by the morning sun on awaking; then hung up in the best place in the best room; till in time perhaps it was itself exchanged for some newer favourite.

It is not only delicate and delightful in itself, but it was the only way in which to write of B. B.—a perfect adjustment of medium to subject.

Of "Euphranor" we wish we had room to speak, but we can say no more than to commend it to all whom it has till now eluded. The circumstance that it was printed in the comparatively recent three-volume edition of FitzGerald disqualifies it, to some extent, from particular notice to-day. Mr. Aldis Wright has discovered a few interesting elegiac verses, one of which has a hint of a quatrain in the Persian poem.

Beauty when laid in the grave
Feedeth the lily beside her, wrote FitzGerald many years ago: two lines which bring to mind

And this reviving Herb whose tender Green
Fledges the River-Lip on which we lean,
Ah! lean upon it lightly! for who knows
From what once lovely Lip it springs unseen?

One word of complaining: it seems to us a great pity that Mr. Aldis Wright did not take advantage of this opportunity to print "Polonius" entire; particularly as some of the advertisements of the book which we have seen suggest that the publishers still believe it to have been included. To give the preface and omit FitzGerald's very interesting collection of old saws and modern instances, so shrewdly and wisely brought together, was a proceeding which we fail quite to understand. At most it would have added fifty pages to the book—which the book could well stand.

The Dazzling Youth.

The Fantasticks: a Romantic Comedy in Three Acts. By Edmond Rostand. Freely done into English verse by George Fleming. (Heinemann. 6s.)

THERE is no doubt that not only this particular "free" version of Rostand's early play Les Romanesques (called in the present volume Les Romaniques), but the play itself, make a more favourable impression when read at leisure than they did at the Royalty Theatre on the afternoon of May 29 last. On that occasion the cast was scarcely what it might have been, and so dainty and fragile is the texture of the piece that it is bound to suffer in theatrical representation except under conditions the most ideal. It is an extended "proverb in porcelain," a sheer artificiality in egg-shell china, and it requires both perfect acting and a perfect setting. "The scene," says the author, "to take place where one pleases, provided the costumes are pretty enough." In that flippant phrase is disclosed Rostand's extraordinary instinct for the stage. A clumsy touch, a crude spot of colour, a too-emphasised gesture, the merest indiscretion, and the whole play crumbles to ashes, and you say, "There is nothing in it, after all." There is nothing in it—except a mood and an atmosphere rendered with perfect technique. The plot—that of parents cunningly fostering a marriage between their children while pretending to veto it with fearful oaths—is as old as the century and many times older. The characters—they are purely conventional. The scene—it is "where one pleases." The verse is polished, graceful, pretty and witty, but in no special degree. Only, the result is a faultless something. In this, just as in his two later plays, Rostand obtains the effect by a series of small felicities; he never reaches it by a single dazzling stroke. Take the character of Straforel, the bravo. His first speech is to describe the various sorts of sham abductions which he is prepared to carry out on due payment:

Sir! we've the obvious, open, schoolboy rape,
Which only needs black cloaks, no matter what their shape;
The rape by cab; 'tis little in request;
The rape by day—the rape by night looks best;
The pompous rape with coaches of the court,
With powdered lacqueys, wigs of every sort—
(The wigs are extra)—eunuchs, slaves, and mutes,
Blacks, bravos, brigands, musketeers—as suits;
The rape done by postillions, three or four,
And half a dozen horses, less or more;
The decorous rape, in dowager's landau—
It is not popular, a trifle slow;
The comic rape: the lady must be fond;
Romantic, in a boat; requires a pond;
The rape Venetian—wants a blue lagoon;
The rape by moonlight, or without a moon—
Moonlight is dear, and always in demand;
The rape lugubrious, by blue lightning planned,
With challenge, single combats, clash of arms,
Great flapping hats, dark cloaks, and war's alarms;
The rape emphatic, and the rape polite;
The rape with torches, that's a charming sight!
The rape in masks—we call that classical;
The rape gallant, done to sweet music's call;
The rape in sedan-chair, that's new and gay,
The latest thing of all—and distingué.

The effect of that speech on the audience is much like the effect of the play as a whole. At first they listen perfunctorily, and then slowly they come under the spell, until at last they are rapt away, the applause is enthusiastic, and the actor must bow his acknowledgments. Of course the play is bravura, but it is exquisite bravura. Occasionally there are moments when the bravura, so hard and smooth, breaks as it were into a radiant blossom—as at the culmination of Act III. where Sylvette murmurs—

Oh, not in distant lands, in untrod ways,
In wild adventure or in unusing lays,
But here lives Poetry!

[She falls into his arms.]

Despite the dizzying success of L'Aiglon, we do not by any means yet believe that Rostand is among the great playwrights of the century. But he is a man of brilliant cleverness, and this play proves the fact as amply as either Cyrano or L'Aiglon. "George Fleming" has performed the difficult task of translation very creditably, though one or two of her rhymes are atrocious.

"He Loved all the Rawnsleys."

Memories of the Tennysons. By the Rev. H. D. Rawnsley. Honorary Canon of Carlisle. (J. MacLehose & Sons.)

IF Lord Tennyson had not said (to one of themselves) that "he loved all the Rawnsleys," this little book had hardly been written. There were a good many Rawnsleys upon whom to scatter broadcast this not very specialised affection. The Index of Names at the end of the volume sets forth:

Rawnsley, Alice.	Rawnsley, Margaret.
Rawnsley, Canon.	Rawnsley, Mary.
Rawnsley, Drummond.	Rawnsley, Sophy.
Rawnsley, Mrs. Drummond.	Rawnsley, Rev. T. H.
Rawnsley, Edith.	Rawnsley, Mrs. T. H.
Rawnsley, Edward.	Rawnsley, W. F.
Rawnsley, Mrs. Edward.

The Tennysons and Rawnsleys had been neighbours and friends for two or three generations in Lincolnshire; and here is traced over again the poetry-on-the-map, with allusions to the local influence of Somersby, Mablethorpe, Horncastle, Louth, and the rest, upon the poet's mind. The attitude of Tennyson himself towards this yearning for local identification was characteristic. If you said you saw the influence, he denied it, and called you a dolt. If you did not see it, he said you were "wanting." Canon Rawnsley, we hasten to add, does not put it thus. He writes throughout on the supposition that the public expect a great poet to be also an amiable man, and that the author must fulfil the public expectation.

The most entertaining chapter in the book is contributed to it by Mr. Wilbraham Rawnsley. The poet's love for this member of the Rawnsley family was not without the element that chastens. "Once when I was walking with him, he pulled me up sharply for using the word 'awful.' 'You have used that twice this morning. I can't bear it.'" The delinquent assures us that he used the offending "awful" in its legitimate, not its slang, sense, on both occasions; but he quickly adds that he was "very sorry he had used it." Another time he used the word "knowledge," pronouncing it as a rhyme to college. "He looked at me and said, 'Knowledge, I say.'" I said, "Do you say acknowledge, too?" He thought a moment, and then said, "Yes, I do." When Lord Tennyson had nothing to correct in Mr. Rawnsley, he could always fall back on the critics. "Soon after the publication of Locksley Hall, Sixty Years After, I found him rather angry at the critics having taken the old man who speaks in the poem as intended for a picture of himself. 'I this old white-headed dreamer! As if I should call myself that! I that have not a white hair in my head!'" Against that expression he could put, for comfort, an allusion to his head which he described as "the greatest compliment he ever had paid him." "Two working-men, masons, he thought, passed him in the street, and he heard one say to the other: 'There goes a Shakespeare-like fellow!'" One must not omit Mr. Wilbraham Rawnsley's tribute to the straightforwardness of the poet. He complimented Mrs. W. Rawnsley for not wearing "a dress improver, or, as he called it in his straightforward manner, a bustle." But one is not sure that he approved of the dress any more than of the improver. "It is clothes," said Tennyson, "that make the immodesty, not the want of them. There is nothing immodest in your natural skin."

Tennyson, however, was nothing if not garbed. The little boy who asked him why he wore the purple cloak and wideawake if he didn't like to be stared at, got no answer. Once when Canon Rawnsley was walking with him near Farringford, a char-à-banc of tourists went by. Probably they knew nothing of the poet, but his hat and cloak signalled to them from the roadway. "Lord Tennyson turned his face to the bank and began prodding violently with his stick. 'Are they looking?' 'Yes,' said I. 'Let them look then,' said the poet; and they did look, but they saw nothing but the broad back of his cape and the flap of his ample wideawake." The only thing that would have annoyed the poet more than to hear the passers-by were looking, was that they were not. There is much more of this sort of sorry self-consciousness. And the strange thing is that Canon Rawnsley does not seem to see how pitiful it is.

Of the impersonal side of Tennyson, of Tennyson the wonder-worker in words, we get no real glimpse in these pages. A little side-light is thrown, indeed, on the motive that lay behind the composition of the epitaph for Lord Stratford De Redcliffe in the Abbey; and it is not exhilarating. "I hate doing this kind of thing," he said, "but they bother one out of one's life if one refuses. It is the best way to peace." The one item in the book which has added anything to our own knowledge of Tennyson is the correspondence concerning the Poet Laureateship when it became vacant on the death of Southey. The mysteriousness of the ways and means of appointing laureates becomes greater than ever when we find, in Wordsworth's lifetime, Tennyson being put forward for the laurel by Mr. and Mrs. Butler (Fanny Kemble and her husband), who wrote to Lord Francis Egerton, who, in turn, wrote to the Lord Chamberlain about it. Two letters from Lord Francis to Mrs. Butler show how anxious he was to accede to any request of hers; but any hope he had was dashed by the receipt of a note from the Lord Chamberlain:

DEAR LORD FRANCIS,—The Laureateship is actually offered to Wordsworth. It only remains for me, therefore, to express my regret that I am unable to comply with your wishes in favour of Mr. Tennyson, whose merits are highly spoken of.—Believe me, my dear Lord, yours most truly,
DE LA WARR.

Anyhow, Lord Francis obliged his friend by getting an immediate pension for Tennyson: and the Laureateship also was added to him within a decade of years.

Other New Books.

LONDON MEMORIES.

By C. W. HECKETHORN.

Mr. Heckethorn has done better here than in his similar work, London Souvenirs, with which we found fault just a year ago for its irrelevant and violent opinions on chops and steaks, Browning's poetry, and other things outside the scope of the book. Mr. Heckethorn now sticks to his text, the interesting and inexhaustible text of the London streets. His jocularity is still rather clumsy, and is certainly misplaced when it is directed against the Griffin at Temple Bar, which he describes as a "hideous abortion"—a most unpleasing and incorrect phrase. To dispute with Mr. Heckethorn whether the Griffin is a slightly monument or not is outside our scope; we think it very sightly, and we do not know what Mr. Heckethorn means by saying that its colour "leads our country visitors to imagine that it is carved out of green cheese." Mr. Heckethorn's style permits him to say that Dr. Johnson was "flummuxed" by the language of Billingsgate. By the way, he assumes that "Billingsgate" is still heard, and tells of a woman who only recently said, "I go to hear the langwidge; it do so remind me of my poor dear

'usbing." We fancy this is a lame version of one of Keene's jokes in Punch relating to Covent Garden. We think that Sir Walter Besant is nearer the mark in describing "Billingsgate" as a dead language.

But this book is interesting. From old books, newspapers, and personal observation Mr. Heckethorn has gathered much curious lore about London streets and houses, executions, extinct trades, windmills, earthquakes, fires, and the life of the river; and his pages will both satisfy and stimulate the general reader's interest in these things. Such amenities of "Savage Old London" as nose-slitting, hand-chopping, the pillory, and witch-swimming are described; and we leave it to Mr. Clarence Rook to decide whether the state of society which bred these cruelties ranks lower than the one which sends forth the Hooligan flown with insolence and beer, and gripping his cheap, but murderous, revolver. The study of "The South Lambeth-road" is rightly called "a microscopic bit of topography"; in some respects it is the most distinctive paper in a book which we can cordially recommend to the "Londonarian." (Chatto. 6s.)

THE GREAT BOER WAR.

By A. CONAN DOYLE.

"The book was begun in England and continued on board a steamer, but the greater part was written in a hospital tent in the intervals of duty during the epidemic at Bloemfontein," says Dr. Doyle in his preface, and the book shows evident signs of it. Here and there is an obvious straining after effect, and the constant repetition of "the dark Cronje" in the account of Paardeberg adds to our suspicion that Dr. Doyle is striving for strength and picturesqueness by means which, with greater leisure, he would have avoided. Still, the fact remains that the book is, so far, the only account of the war that has been published. It has the advantage of being written by one who has visited the scene of this great drama, has met many of the chief actors in it, and has seen with his own eyes something of the actual operations. As far as a recollection of many despatches and telegrams may be trusted, Dr. Conan Doyle seems remarkably accurate. He begins at the beginning with an account of the Boer race, and his chapters dealing with the Cause of the Quarrel, and with the events before hostilities began, are written in temperate and well-balanced language. The arrangement of the book is excellent, the only part which might have been fuller being the work of Lord Roberts and Lord Kitchener at Cape Town, and the sudden concentration on the Modder. It is the account of the actual fighting which is disappointing, and in this Dr. Conan Doyle suffers from the books which he has given as hostages for what we feel we have a right to demand of him. In this respect he has the disadvantage of being compared, not with other men, but with himself, and so far—and so far only—he has fallen short of expectation. Nevertheless, the book will, no doubt, remain for a long while the best and most convenient history of the war. The maps are good, the appendix of casualties up to September 8 is most useful, and the index can be referred to safely. (Smith, Elder & Co.)

THE SETTLEMENT AFTER
THE WAR IN SOUTH AFRICA.

By M. J. FARELly.

What is to be done with South Africa after the war? is a question which is just now occupying many minds. The settlement will require not only the genius of the great statesman, but the trained intellect of the lawyer to deal with such subjects as the degree to which legislation should admit natives to civil and political rights similar to those possessed by Europeans; the recognition to be accorded to native usages; the regulation of Asiatic immigration; the effects of systems of land tenure, native and European; and so on, and so on; all of which will have to be finally settled in one way or another. As a preliminary, Dr. Farely inquires into the cause of the dispute between Great Britain and the semi-independent

Boer States, and does it from the point of view of the lawyer who is endeavouring to make an impartial summary of a case. The best part of the book most certainly is the inquiry, with its wealth of documents and facts, which, both in the body of the work and in the Appendix, Dr. Farely puts before his readers to enable them to form a clear judgment on all the matters in dispute. In his remarks on the state of things which must prevail when peace is proclaimed, Dr. Farely is not quite so lucid. He seems to advocate a government something like that of India for the whole of South Africa, with a Governor-General and an Advisory Council; but he does not grasp his subject boldly, and he gives the reader the impression that he is afraid of hurting the feelings of some section or other of the population. This attitude on the part of Englishmen has been the curse of South Africa, and it has weighed on everyone from the Colonial Minister at home to the Colonial Minister at the Cape. The considerations at the end are the weakest part of the book, of which the chief value lies in the very fine and impartial chapter dealing with the events and trend of opinion prior to the issue of Mr. Kruger's ultimatum. (Macmillan.)

THE FAR EAST:
ITS HISTORY AND ITS QUESTION. BY ALEXIS KRAUSSE.

Mr. Krausse, who, in spite of his Russian name, appears to be an Englishman, is certainly a man without whom that odd abstraction, the general reader, would not know much about the Chinese question. His works on Russia in Asia and China in Decay, not to mention the excellent little handbook, The Story of the Chinese Crisis, in a way lead up to the present volume. The Far East is, as far as some three or four hundred pages permit, a complete account of the history of the Oriental Asiatic world in its relations with Western civilisation, with an examination of the existing factors in the Far Eastern question, and a statement of the evidence bearing upon the subject. Of course, the question resolves itself into a struggle between Great Britain and Russia, and Mr. Krausse sums up the state of affairs in the following words:

The prospect in the Far East is clouded. Its ultimate outcome must, by dint of the working of the forces I have discussed, be partition and absorption until the whole of the map becomes reconstituted. The lion's share must go to Russia. Of that there can be no question. China will by slow degrees be divided, first into nominal spheres of influence; subsequently into protectorates; finally into colonies and possessions of the various Powers. Korea as a national entity is doomed. The only question is whether it will fall to Russia or Japan, and it remains only to be seen whether England will at the eleventh hour pull herself together and strive to save the Yangtze Valley as her share of the spoil, or whether she will, by a continuation of her past and present tactics, allow herself to be elbowed out of Central China, even as she has been out of Manchuria, and is about to be out of the north. Such is the outcome of the situation, such the problem to be solved.

It will be noticed that Mr. Krausse is by no means optimistic, and the worst of it is that the multitude which rules in England cannot be persuaded to take China seriously, or to think anything of the chronic bad faith of Russia. The appendices to the book are particularly useful for reference, as they include a chronology of the history of the Far East, the text of the more important treaties and conventions, and furnish a bibliography of authorities on the Far East. The index is fairly good, and the maps and plans are useful, though the large map in the pocket of the cover is by no means up to date in the matter of railways. Generally, Mr. Krausse should take heed not to split his infinitives, and it is with regret that we notice Frankenstein once again transformed into the Monster. Even if Mr. Krausse were not aware that Frankenstein created the Monster, surely there must have been someone at the printer's or publisher's capable of drawing his attention to this all too common blunder. We dwell on the point because mistakes of this kind give rise to the horrid thought, What if Mr. Krausse be as inaccurate about Russia's proceedings as he is about those of Mrs. Shelley's hero? (Grant Richards. 18s.)

THE RT. HON. JOSEPH CHAMBERLAIN:
THE MAN AND STATESMAN. BY N. M. MARRIS.

We do not doubt that there is a public demand for a life of the Colonial Secretary; the only point on which scepticism is allowable is whether the public demanded so stout a tome. But this is an age of gossip, and the present volume is the work of a professed admirer who has gathered together from newspapers and other such sources, anecdotes, quotations, characteristic incidents, and even caricatures, and has woven them together with an artlessness which is in itself attractive. It is often said loosely that Mr. Chamberlain has changed his coat. If this means that he has been inconsistent, it is inaccurate. He has been no more inconsistent than a snake which sloughs its old skin. Rightly considered the Mr. Chamberlain of to-day is the product of evolution and environment. All men are that, no doubt, but few in so striking a degree as Mr. Chamberlain. His mind is essentially commercial: first, he strove for his own commercial advantage, then for that of Birmingham, then for that of the United Kingdom, and, lastly, for that of the Empire. The means which he has employed have varied, and rightly so, with the needs of the situation. He began in the screw trade and did well for himself; he became a municipal councillor, and afterwards mayor, and did well for Birmingham. He then turned his attention to politics and joined the Radicals, partly from heredity and partly because that party seemed to him most likely to advance the interests of business. But as his mind expanded to take in the idea of a world-wide empire living on commerce and supported by trade he joined those who have the interests of the Empire at heart, and with whose aid alone it was possible to achieve that commercial expansion, whether personal or national, which has really always been Mr. Chamberlain's aim. This has been the Colonial Secretary's object in life; he has pushed forward commercial expansion in varying circumstances with the tools ready to his hand, and he has done it with all his might. Mr. Marris's book is really a contribution, and a useful one, to the "Life" that will be written in years to come, but for the present it will serve. The collection of photographs of Mr. Chamberlain is perhaps more extensive than his modesty would altogether approve; but they, like the illustrations of Mr. Chamberlain's residences and the caricatures from various sources, have their value for the historian. The chronological tables are useful, and the index is unusually full. Altogether it is a needed and timely work, but one that must be read with discretion. (Hutchinson & Co.)

WOOLINGS AND WEDDINGS IN MANY CLIMES. BY LOUISE JORDAN MILN.

To produce a book upon the subjects which Mrs. Miln has here adventured was by no means an easy task, if it were to be more than a simple chronicle of curious facts. Mrs. Miln has succeeded in making it much more than that. Her treatment is always broad-minded—conspicuously so, indeed—and she has a sympathy and insight which render her observation of real value. She takes a wide and sound view of sexual relationship which may startle readers who have accustomed themselves to the narrow circle of the single outlook. It is this faculty of seeing things in true perspective, of realising the inevitable force of custom and environment, which enables Mrs. Miln to treat with equal justice and understanding such different marriage systems as those of Norway and Hungary, of Italy and China. The chapter devoted to China is of particular interest, and it is refreshing to read such sentences as these written by a lady who has made an intimate study of the people :

Of all that I have learned of them I am most convinced of two things. First, that they are a great and an admirable people; second, that the European who knows them most knows them little.

As to the question of the general subjection of Eastern women, Mrs. Miln concludes that it exists more in appearance than in fact. Much of this talk of subjection is without understanding, and we are glad to welcome in Mrs. Miln one whose ideas of women's education would be hailed as heterodox by the elect. For ourselves, we are in entire agreement with her.

It must be added that the binding of the book is deplorable; a demy octavo volume, two and a half inches thick, should have a backing calculated to hold the pages together for at least several perusals. A single reading had served to give three of the illustrations in our copy their unwilling freedom. (Pearson. 16s.)

THE NINETEENTH CENTURY: A DIALOGUE

IN UTOPIA.

BY HAVELOCK ELLIS.

We are often unable to accept Dr. Havelock Ellis's ideals, or even to share his interests; but we recognise in him an earnest thinker whose comments on the present and the future of civilisation are always stimulating and suggestive. The criticism of the nineteenth century which he here puts into the mouths of two shadowy personages in a vaguely remote century perhaps gives us of his best. Doubtless it displays a certain impatience with, and a failure fully to understand, ways of life and thought unshared by the writer; yet it has things to say which we poor folk of the nineteenth century's end may well ponder. An extravagant and aggressive development of nationalism, a complete failure to apply the teachings of science to the organisation of physical and material life, a singular want of care for beauty and craftsmanship—these are among the leading charges which Mr. Ellis brings against us; and who shall claim that they are not justified? Yet one feels that it is easy talking for folk in a distant century for whom somehow—but how?—all the problems which baffle us have been solved. An analysis of the British type of character which closes the dialogue contains some good remarks on the interaction of the two racial elements—the Teutonic and what for the present we must call the Celtic—which go to form that type :

The temper of their race was highly composite. Great Britain had not only been the prey of the most savage races of prehistoric Europe, which had thus passed on their characteristics unchanged to their descendants. Those remote islands had also been the ultimate refuge of the shyest and feeblest races of early Europe. And these, too, had passed on their characteristics to the later possessors of the land, their cunning and reserve, their suspicion, their melancholy silence, their ideals, their dreams. Thus, they were perpetually oscillating between awkward timidity and an arrogance so unbounded that their own doctors regarded it as a disease, and dealt with it as "morbid self-assurance." So was produced an extraordinary amalgam of character which admirably fitted the British race for the special work which at one moment it was able to perform in the world. They were aided as much by the qualities of their weakness as by those of their strength. Their brooding reserve, their gloomy suspicion, their cunning, effected what sheer brute strength alone would never have been adequate to effect.

(Grant Richards. 3s. 6d.)

Somehow one does not grudge the multiplication of military biographies. They are records of things definitely done or endeavoured, and if it is impossible to give attention to all of them on publication they are assured of their place in the military records of the Empire. Two such biographies, both associated with India, are The Life of Lieut.-Col. John Haughton, by Major A. C. Yate (Murray, 12s. net.), and General Sir Arthur T. Cotton: His Life's Work, by his daughter, Lady Hope (Hodder & Stoughton, 12s. net). Haughton was an Indian frontier man, and commandant of the 36th Sikhs; Cotton was an Indian famine expert, and a strenuous advocate of irrigation. Their lives terminated within a year of each other (1897 and 1898), though at very different ages, and the one on the field of battle the other at home.

It is rather singular that Captain A. T. Mahan does not write a preface to his Story of the War in South Africa (Sampson Low) to explain his special standpoint. As a master of strategy on the sea he is certainly not likely to be without fresh ideas on the strategy of the veldt, but the multiplicity of war-books forbids our giving his work more than this mention.

Who was Thomas Hariot? How many of us have any knowledge of this inventor of the telescope, friend of Raleigh, historian of Virginia, and present occupant of a lowly bed in the garden of the Bank of England. It was the Virginian connexion that prompted the Hercules Club, of Vermont, to reprint Hariot's Brief and True Report of the New Found Land of Virginia, but it is to the biographical zeal of the late Mr. Henry Stevens, the founder of the club, and of his son, Mr. Henry N. Stevens, that we owe the admirable little book of which the full title is Thomas Hariot, the Mathematician, the Philosopher, and the Scholar, Developed Chiefly from Dormant Materials. The phrase "developed chiefly from dormant materials" exactly describes the scholarly zeal which produced this admirable volume.

Mr. Edgar Sanderson has broken fresh ground in writing and assembling in one book biographies of such patriot-heroes as Martin Diaz, the Spanish Guerilla chief; the heroes of the Tyrolean war of 1809; those of the Greek War of Independence, 1821-1827 (Byron's war); Simon Bolmar, of the South American Revolution of 1811-1830; Schavyl of the Caucasus, and others. Historical novelists in search of plots will find them here.

Members of the Scottish Presbyterian churches will be the readers of The Life of Henry Calderwood, by his son and the Rev. David Woodside (Hodder & Stoughton, 7s. 6d.). As a minister, a University professor, a politician, and an administrator of church affairs, but chiefly as a man of great breadth and kindness, Prof. Calderwood retains a place in Scottish hearts which ensures the popularity of this work. His books on social and ethical subjects were very numerous, and he wrote the Life of David Hume in the "Famous Scots" series.

"A cosmopolitan impartiality," says Mr. Henry Norman, in a preface, characterises M. Leroy-Beaulieu's book on Far East problems which Mr. Richard Davey has translated under the title of The Awakening of the East: Siberia—Japan—China (Heinemann). Mr. Norman's preface is, in effect, a review of the book which he heartily recommends as an impartial dealing with "the gravest matter before the civilised world to-day."

Lord Rosebery does not pledge himself to all the views taken by Mr. H. O. Arnold-Forster, M.P., in his little book, The War Office, The Army, and the Empire, but in a brief preface he recognises the writer's competence to handle a subject of grave importance. The contents appeared in various newspapers.

To the "Temple Primers" Mr. Dent adds International Law, by Mr. F. E. Smith, and Greek History, by Prof. Heinrich Swoboda.

New editions do greatly pullulate. We have popular reprints of "Q.'s" romances, Dead Man's Rock and The Splendid Spur from Messrs. Cassell, at 3s. 6d. each; a second edition of the late Lord De Tabley's A Guide to the Study of Book-Plates (Sherratt & Hughes, Manchester); Kinglake's Eothen in the "Little Library" (Methuen, 1s. 6d. net.); Sir Edwin Arnold's Light of Asia, a pretty pocket edition (Kogan Paul, 1s. 6d. net.); and Fenimore Cooper's Deerslayer (Macmillan, 2s. 6d.).

Fiction.

Lord Jim. By Joseph Conrad.
(Blackwood. 6s.)

Lord Jim is a searching study—prosecuted with patience and understanding—of the cowardice of a man who was not a coward. A moment of great trial came to Jim when he was mate of a steamer. He failed. For years he lived dully, never forgetting this failure; and then came an opportunity to retrieve (before God), and he took it. That is the story, in barest outline, which Mr. Conrad has lavished his energy upon, omitting not the minutest tittle of evidence in Jim's favour (and, through Jim, in favour of us all—for Jim's trial and subsequent penance typify the trials and penances of all men); omitting nothing in Jim's disfavour; reproducing every shaft of light that played upon Jim from all sides; and giving us, too, the wonderful bizarre setting of the drama: the mysterious tropical sea, the odd parti-coloured life of the Eastern port, with its natives, its captains, and its traders; and, later, the inner life of the tiny State in the Malay Peninsula where Jim worked out his salvation—all done with a poetical, romantic, half-wistful air for which we go in vain to any other English writer. That the book is of the sea and the East is in a certain way an accident: its application to life, to all of us, is in no way diminished by this chance. For Jim, as we have said, stands for the universal; he has something in common with us all.

We may, perhaps, return to the subject again, more particularly to Mr. Conrad's revelation of the East. But now we may just refer to the vividness of the glimpses which the story gives us, here and there, of some of the men who are engaged in relating the East to the West; those strange links with the two civilisations; voluntary exiles from this country, denationalising themselves that the British flag shall find trade wherever it penetrates. The romance of the merchant service is not a whit less enthralling, and is many times more curious, than that of the Navy, and Mr. Conrad knows it all. There is in this book, Lord Jim, a wonderful figure of a latter-day buccaneer; and the old trader Stein, with his butterflies and his resignation and his memories and his power, is a figure that fills the eye. They are embodied forth, these odd sojourners in their wrong hemisphere, so subtly, so almost magically, in this poignant narrative; they come silently and suddenly, and stay. And the strange thing is that the story all the time is of Jim and his poor boyish conscience, and his lost opportunity, and his far-reaching egoism (reaching even to the most confident of Mr. Conrad's readers); and yet, though Jim is the subject, and the beginning and the end, there is the crowded, mysterious East too, and there are these notable men—Brown and Stein, Brierley and Brierley's mate, the German captain and the Swedish chandler, Cornelius and Doramin, Jewel and Tamb 'Itam and, more than all, Marlow. And yet, though so fully drawn, they have a place in the book only and solely by virtue of their relation to Jim. How Mr. Conrad can tell so much so incidentally we cannot explain. But the secret gives him a double claim; for not only does he command attention for his story, but also for his art. He is at once a reader's and a novelist's novelist.

The blemishes are very slight. We are a little doubtful if the picture of Jim given in the opening pages is the right one: we do not quite follow Mr. Conrad's scheme in choosing to place him before the reader as a water-clerk at the outset. His water-clerking was not the most important phase of his life. Indeed, we do not quite see why this adult presentation was called for just there at all: why not have begun with page 3, at the words, "Originally he came from a parsonage"? Again, there is a slight jerkiness in the passages immediately following that might have been smoothed away. Lastly, there is the mechanical convention of the story itself, which decrees that Mr. Conrad shall retire at page 34 and hand over the rest of the narrative to a story-teller in an arm-chair on an evening after dinner. There is good precedent for this mannerism. One of the finest short stories ever written—Turgenev's "Lear of the Steppes"—is modelled on precisely the same lines; yet we own to a prejudice against it. In the case of Lord Jim, the objection is twofold, for it is not credible. This after-dinner story, told without a break, consists of about 99,000 words. Now it is unreasonable to suppose that the narrator, who chose his words with care, spoke at a greater rate than 150 words a minute, which means that he was telling that after-dinner story to his companions for eleven solid hours. Mr. Conrad, we fancy, in his zeal, lost sight of this amusing prolixity. He has also occasionally made his spokesman employ phrases such as no oral story-teller would be likely to compass. As an example, take this interlude on the moon:

There is something haunting in the light of the moon; it has all the dispassionateness of a disembodied soul, and something of its inconceivable mystery. It is to our sunshine, which—say what you like—is all we have to live by, what the echo is to the sound: misleading and confusing whether the note be mocking or sad. It robs all forms of matter—which, after all, is our domain—of their substance, and gives a sinister reality to shadows alone.

That is all right; but we have some difficulty in believing it just there. It is not thus that men speak.

One other point: the suicide of Brierley. We are not persuaded that that is proved.

But these, after all, are nothings. We mention them more in the hope that (for our own pleasure) Mr. Conrad may, perhaps, come to revise his preference for story by story-teller above story by himself than because they really matter. Lord Jim is too fine for such spots to injure its beauty.

Peccavi. By E. W. Hornung.
(Richards. 6s.)

MR. HORNUNG rivets our attention on a spectacle of grandiose simplicity. We see a disgraced rector engaged, during the five years of his suspension, in rebuilding his church which an enemy has destroyed by fire. The publicity given to his misconduct alienates from him everybody in his parish. Alone and unaided—the pleonasm is really excusable—he shapes the stones of the new edifice and sets them in their place, while his enemy, the father of the woman he led astray, nurses the implacable hate which is to terminate in a tragic repetition of his sacrilegious crime. There is a moment when the reader fears a breakdown in the poetic scheme of the story. Will the heroic clergyman find a haven in matrimony, and there forget a dead mistress and an expiated sin? Happily he does not, and he stands out in the mind majestically, a type unlikely to be imitated, but one that satisfies the hungriest idealism.

The realism of the story is commendable. We seem to hear the weariful feet of the years of lonely labour; they are verily the "black oxen" of the Celtic poet. Not satisfied with ostracising him, his parishioners kill his dog. He has to be his own butcher and baker and housemaid. One suspects exaggeration, but surrenders to the charm of a simple, direct story, in the perusal of which it is unnecessary to look back at every tenth page to recall some forgotten motion of complicated machinery.

To say that Peccavi is far better than the author's last story is scarcely to place it. It is, in a sense, outside his art. Given the idea, and the inspiration for writing it came as a matter of course.

The book is to be read for a single idea, and the character who impersonates it.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the week's Fiction are not necessarily final. Reviews of a selection will follow.]

RICHARD YEA-AND-NAY.

BY MAURICE HEWLETT.

Mr. Hewlett's first long work since The Forest Lovers. Book I. is called "The Book of Yea"; Book II., "The Book of Nay." The hero is Richard Cœur-de-Lion; but Mr. Hewlett gives him the name Richard Yea-and-Nay, invented by the troubadour baron yclept Bertram de Born. The romance begins before Richard's coronation, and ends with his death at Chaluz. It is dedicated to the author's friend, Mr. Edmund Gosse, "always benevolent to his intention." (Macmillan. 6s.)

CHLORIS OF THE ISLAND.

BY H. B. MARRIOTT WATSON.

A romantic, bustling, adventurous story of a past day by a versatile writer who knows his period to the shape of a periwig. "Gad! so it is!" cried his master in alarm; "but pooh, one man. . . . Drive on, and drive over him, rascal. The lady and I must reach the port to-night ere twelve." It was in the month of May of the year 1805. (Harpers. 6s.)

RONALD KESTREL.

BY A. J. DAWSON.

The cover shows a sandy, Eastern scene. Chapter I. takes us to Morocco, which is what we have the right to expect from the author of African Nights' Entertainment; then we are whisked to New South Wales; but it is in London that the story settles down to tell of journalism, authorship, love, and—rest. (Heinemann. 6s.)

DR. NORTH AND HIS FRIENDS. BY S. WEIR MITCHELL.

In his leisure Dr. Mitchell, a well-known New York physician, writes books—many books. His latest is not a novel in the regular form, but a series of conversations and incidents passing in the lives of a certain group of people, several of whom have already figured in the author's earlier book, Characteristics. Among the characters, besides Dr. North, physician, are an artist, a scholar, a railway speculator, and a variety of ladies. (Macmillan. 6s.)

A GENTLEMAN. BY THE HON. MRS. WALTER FORBES.

A novel of social life, introducing us to the world of titled folk, among them the Duke of Inveresk, "one of the world's darlings," also "one of Nature's darlings, which is a very different matter." A Gentleman is the story of a dressmaker's son, brought up by his mother "as a gentleman," of his awakening, and of his successful career. (Murray. 6s.)

TRINITY BELLS.

BY AMELIA E. BARR.

A costume story of old New York. The heroine's name is Catharine Van Clyffe, "the bright, lovely Catharine Van Clyffe, who, just one hundred years ago, was a pupil in the school of the Moravian Sisters at Bethlehem." The book contains some good pictures, and a quantity of music and lavender sentiment. (Fisher Unwin. 6s.)

YOLANDE, THE PARISIENNE.

BY LUCAS CLEEVE.

Winged words stare at us from the chapter headings, wild imaginings from the text, and on p. 210 we stumble on this: "When we came out of the Sphinx, a fly was waiting outside, with the cabman asleep on the box. I got in, but neither Satan nor Death followed, and I was thankful to be alone." The publisher informs the world in an advertisement that Yolande "can hardly be compared to any other similar work if we [i.e., he] except Marie Corelli's The Sorrows of Satan." (John Long. 6s.)

THE ADVENTURES OF TYLER TATLOCK. BY DICK DONOVAN.

T. T. was a private detective. Twenty-one of his adventures lie at rest between these covers: "The Queensferry Mystery," "Tracked by Teeth," "Between Dead Lips," and so on, and so on. (Chatto & Windus. 3s. 6d.)

THE YELLOW MAN.

BY CARLTON DAWE.

Mystery, murder, Chinese secret societies, beginning "between Slough and Windsor, and ending in China." "I almost shrieked aloud with joy. Why? A moment's reflection gave me pause. Truly it was Ah Yon, but for what purpose? . . . 'Makee set flee,' said Ah Yon. 'Kung no 'ave love for you; Wooching welly chuel also. My 'ave come makee look see.'" Mr. Dawe knows China, and has written many books about China, but the Chinaman in fiction remains a bore. (Hutchinson. 6s.)

OF ROYAL BLOOD.

BY WILLIAM LE QUEUX.

Mr. Le Queux is known to us as a "yarning" novelist with an untiring pen. We gather from a "literary note" submitted by his publishers that he is "a diplomatist as well as a novelist, and is known to most of the European British Embassies," and that Of Royal Blood "contains many thinly-disguised portraits of people well-known in Brussels, Berlin, and St. Petersburg, and is in reality founded on fact." If this "item of news" finds readers for Of Royal Blood Mr. Le Queux will have his reward. (Hutchinson. 6s.)

THE CONSCIENCE OF GILBERT POLLARD.

BY ADELINE SERGEANT.

A leisurely, somewhat old-fashioned tale, but not necessarily any the worse for that. "So, for a time, Gilbert saw himself as God saw him, and knew that he—he, and not Hedworth—was at heart the ———." (Hodder & Co. 6s.)

OVER GRASS-GROWN TRAILS.

BY H. G. SHEDD.

"This, then, is a little book of Western stories, by Harry Graves Shedd, of which five hundred were printed, and the number of this volume is 375." (Lincoln, Neb., U.S.A.: Kiote Co.)

THE DUKE.

BY J. STORER CLOUSTON.

The old Duke was a "drefful" bad man. When he was dying he said to his friend, Sir Pursuivant Debrette: "I haven't had a folly that's cost me less than a £50 note, and I've left a wardrobe that would fit out half the men about town." Then he died, and this light-hearted tale by the author of The Lunatic at Large toys with the career of the new Duke. (Arnold. 6s.)

EDWARD BARRY.

BY LOUIS BECKE.

He was a South Sea pearler. Follow him, and you will have plenty of excitement and adventure, for Mr. Becke is an old hand at the rousing yarn. "Like lightning Billy Onotoa spun round, his sheath knife flashing in his right hand, and the lust of blood in his eyes; in an instant the two were struggling madly together." (Fisher Unwin. 6s.)

A BOER OF TO-DAY.

BY G. COSSINS.

This story is "actual," if nothing else; but we wonder the author was content to end it at the siege of Ladysmith. General Buller, Sir George White, Mr. Kruger, Joubert, are all served up in these pages. This is how the ex-President, having "expectorated fiercely," talks: "Ach! how I hate them, those Englanders! When the time comes, how they will open their eyes at the great guns and the shells! Almachtig! they little know how we are putting by for that day." (Allen. 6s.)

We have also received: The Weird Orient, by Henry Hlowizi (Philadelphia: Coates & Co.); Farthest South, by Harold E. Gorst (Greening, 2s. 6d.); A Detached Pirate, by Helen Milecete (Greening, 3s. 6d.); A Tragedy of Errors, by Geraldine Hodgson (Allen); Straight Shoes, by C. G. Chatterton (Long, 6s.); and Olive Tracey, by Amy le Feuvre (Hodder & Co., 6s.).

THE ACADEMY.

Editorial and Publishing Offices, 43, Chancery-lane.

The ACADEMY will be sent post-free to every Annual Subscriber in the United Kingdom.

Price for One Issue, Threepence; postage One Halfpenny Price for 52 issues, Thirteen Shillings; postage free.

Foreign Rates for Yearly Subscriptions 20s. including postage.

American Agents for the ACADEMY: Brentano's, 31, Union-square, New York.

Mr. J. M. Barrie.

An Inquiry.

It is eleven years since the publication of A Window in Thrums, and in the meantime Mr. Barrie has issued only three novels. When a favourite of the public asserts himself only once in four years he takes the risk of being forgotten, or at least of receiving polite interest in exchange for enthusiastic admiration; but Mr. Barrie's fame is as authentic, as actual, to-day as it was in 1889. Although Auld Licht Idylls preceded A Window in Thrums, it was the latter which, at a single stroke, established its author's position. A Window in Thrums secured for Mr. Barrie more than the warm regard of his readers; it secured their unchangeable affection; so that everyone is incurably prejudiced in his favour, everyone is jealous for his reputation, everyone is ready to make excuses for him. And it may be said that he has needed excuses; for in these eleven years only his ambition has developed. He has industriously tried to write a great novel, but he has failed; we loyally cover up his failure, pointing to this and that excellence of the books, and assuring one another that none but a man with a touch of genius could have written them; nevertheless we cannot entirely hide our disappointment, and occasionally we hint to him that he might return to short stories. We still confidently believe that he will repeat the success of A Window in Thrums, and we shall continue to believe: it is an article of faith; in order not to forget it we constantly remind ourselves of it.

Now, after eleven years, it is permissible and proper to examine the foundation of a man's fame, to test, if we can, its ultimate security. We shall always love A Window in Thrums, but that need not prevent us from attempting to find out whether or not it quite deserves all our passionate worship. Our chief boast concerning A Window in Thrums has ever been that it makes us both laugh and cry, and we have said this in a tone to imply that to cause laughter and tears is the first and noblest aim of imaginative literature. But the first and noblest aim of imaginative literature is not either to tickle or to stab the sensibilities, but to render a coherent view of life's apparent incoherence, to give shape to the amorphous, to discover beauty which was hidden, to reveal essential truth. The great artist may force you to laugh or to wipe away a tear, but he accomplishes these minor feats by the way. What he mainly does is to see for you. If, in presenting a scene, he does not disclose aspects of it which you would not have observed for yourself, then he falls short of success. In a physical and a psychical sense his power is visual, the power of an eye seeing things always afresh, virginally, as though on the very morn of creation itself.

This supreme visual power, this virtue of the eye which creates by seeing, Mr. Barrie does not possess. No trace of it is discoverable in any of his work. He can select his facts with exquisite skill, but he sees them as a plain man. Take one of the most famous pieces in A Window in Thrums—a piece which the author thought sufficiently good to use again in the stage version of The Little Minister—"Preparing to receive company." There is nothing in it that the average reader would not have learnt for himself had he been fortunate enough to witness the scene recorded. The humour of it wants no revealing, and it is neither subtilised nor intensified. The incident is intrinsically and obviously amusing, and the author's phrases are happy—and that is all. It is the unconscious conviction of this lack of visual—that is, creative—power which drives Mr. Barrie to be always, at any cost, either humorous or pathetic, and to divert by nimbleness of fancy and jugglery of phrase. (Remember, that to catalogue his defects is not to depreciate his fine qualities.) When he is neither humorous nor pathetic he is nothing. A Window in Thrums is one long oscillation between making a certain class of people ridiculous by reason of their manners, and making them dignified by reason of their extraordinary trials and fortitude. There is no "setting" to the pictures, no landscape, no verbal beauty, no feeling for anything except the figures; the figures might be against a background of brown paper; they are posed like models in a studio; you will find no Egdon Heath in Mr. Barrie, no sense of nature's large inclusiveness; with Mr. Barrie man is man, and nature is something different, something negligible. As regards the humour and pathos, which alone constitute the book (imagine a diet of sugar and salt, a literature consisting solely of humour and pathos!), the humour is more spontaneous than the pathos. The pathos is too much insisted upon, even forced—as in "Waiting for the Doctor," and "Jamie's Home-coming." One cannot but observe how again and again the author saddens one with the fact that it all happened long ago, "in the dear dead days beyond recall," that everyone is dead and buried now, and the old house in ruins. This, to be frank, is not playing the game. From the beginning Mr. Barrie has had a tendency to sentimentalise, by which we mean to affect or exaggerate sentiment; the tendency was distinctly to be felt in A Window in Thrums; in The Little Minister it became more marked, more noticeably saccharine; and in the stage version of The Little Minister, that excessively profitable lump of sweetstuff, it amounted to a confirmed habit of mind.

When we arrive at the "Tommy" books—that history of the poor boy who runs off to London and becomes a renowned author—we are in Mr. Barrie's second period, his analytic period. We find here that his literary sense, never refined nor robust, has almost disappeared. His prose is even more commonplace, more completely devoid of charm, and the dignity of the novel is openly mocked. "There were no fish to catch, but there was a boy trying to catch them." "At those moments the essence of all that was characteristic and delicious about her seemed to have run to her mouth, so that to kiss Grizel on her crooked smile would have been to kiss the whole of her at once." "Young men about to be married used to ask at the book-shops, not for the 'Letters,' but simply for 'Sandys on Woman,' acknowledging Tommy as the authority on the subject, like Mill on Jurisprudence, or Thomson and Tait on the Differential Calculus." This kind of thing, which abounds in both books, might pass in a farcical sketch for an evening paper, but in novels purporting to be serious it is contemptible and distressing. Mr. Barrie seems to gambol through a story like a boy. He cannot resist the boyish impulse to "lark," and he seems quite unable to distinguish between wit and the most feeble smartness. That he should have chosen to write a two-part satire of nearly a thousand pages on a character with precisely the same failing as himself, was natural but unfortunate. "T. Sandys," as his inventor loves to call him, was sentimental enough, but his sentimentality is as nothing to Mr. Barrie's. Both novels, and Tommy and Grizel especially, are charged with sentimentality, even at their most satiric. The relations between Elspeth and her brother are an orgy of sentimentality. In Tommy and Grizel Tommy gives Grizel a plant to cherish; when it persistently droops she knows he is ill, and rushes across Europe to succour him; she drops down before him just at the crisis of his flirtation with a lady of title, and then disappears; he rushes back in pursuit of her with a velocity equalling hers; she is stricken with fever (of course); he nurses her back to life (of course); her mental recovery is not complete, but chivalrously he marries her. The manner of Tommy's death (he gets hung up on a spiked wall) is evidently meant for a ferocious stroke of satire; it fails in its effect because it is unrealised and unconvincing. Like all the story after Tommy's departure from Thrums, it has not been imagined—only invented in order to clothe an idea. The Thrums portion of the book—there are 260 unbroken pages about the hearts of Tommy, Grizel, Elspeth, and the manly lover of the last-named—is a tremendously detailed and elaborate piece of work; but it is tedious; and it is tedious because it is petty. There is no large poetic movement in it, no profound stir of passion; it seems out of the world, unrelated to the bigness of life, a twopenny affair which might excite a village. Except for the necessary exaggeration of its sentiment, it is an astonishingly correct chronicle of love and love's counterfeit, but its narrowness and its tepidity stamp it with an unimportance against which all the author's ingenuities of diversion are exerted in vain. The trouble with Tommy and Grizel is this: when it is true, it is dull; when it is not dull, it is either flippant or unconvincing; and it is marred throughout by a constitutional sentimentality. Here and there is a delightful page. The idyll of the lark (pp. 112-113) is a bit of sheer loveliness—a perfect trifle. If a last proof were needed, Tommy and Grizel proves for the third time that, though Mr. Barrie may be able to make a miraculous use of material which is ready prepared for him, he can do nothing great without such material. He cannot of himself convert normal life into material, and the reason is that he has neither the visual nor the lyric gift necessary to the transmuting of life into elevated art. He has succeeded twice, but only by chance; he is not, in the strict significance of the term, a literary artist.

Such is the conclusion to which reason leads us. But when we return to the best parts of A Window in Thrums, we are apt to remark that we care not whether Mr. Barrie is a literary artist or not, he is an undefined Something that we enjoy. As for posterity, posterity may think of Mr. Barrie what it likes; and that is just what posterity will do, till it likes not to think of him at all.

Thackeray Revised (after reading "The Master Christian").

THE Pope he is a happy man,
His palace is the Vatican,
And there he sits and drains his can:
The Pope he is a happy man.
I often say when I'm at home,
"I wish I was the Pope of Rome."

And then there's Primate Temple too,
With nothing in the world to do
But smile, a spiritual peer,
And sip delicious ginger beer.
I've often wished, I hope no crime,
That I might have his easy time.

But since The Master Christian
's exposed that awful Vatican,
And proved how Satan makes his perch
Within our own Established Church,
No more I want the Primate's See,
No more the Pope I wish to be

Things Seen.

The Leaf.

"GRAHAM, late Spain," "Baker, late Poletti," were the signs I read over the shops; and into each I read "Present, late Past," as I walked through the main street of this town by the northern sea. Along this street in the late 'sixties I had seen the foam fly, and wondered it could fly so far. The scent of fusees in a holiday crowd came back unbidden. I recalled Jim, the luggage porter, sitting sideways on his trolley as he rattled round the town with the boxes of arriving households. For very relief I looked at the changeless sea. It was my old sea, but desolate. Much else was still mine. These tall wooden palings, the sense of guns up there in the fort, the places in the town where the waves sounded deep or faint, the lodging-houses and their window-tickets—what a harvest of nothings! There stood the Life Boat collecting box, but where was the enamelled picture of the Life Boat? I grew old, and set my face toward the station. A little sound persisted, and I turned. One big leaf, dead, and so dry that it tinkled on the stones, was pursuing me in the dusk at my own pace. The sea muttered and gloomed; the leaf pattered on. I had been disowned; it was fitting that I should be mocked.

Liberté.

THE Frenchman may be more subject to bureaucratic interference than the Englishman, but in his private life he has his liberté to the full. The French live and let live; they are not offended as we are by the idiosyncrasies of neighbours; they do not stare; they go their own way. I saw an extreme case of liberté in the South of France this summer. On the pavement, in the full glare of the sun, at about eleven in the morning, lay a man in a fit. Around him was a crowd of some fifty persons looking on. They were all believers in liberté. They believed in giving him all the sun and all the room he needed in which to have his fit to the uttermost, and therefore they did nothing. It was fine, this fidelity to an idea. In England there would have been all kinds of fussy interference. One officious person would have brought water, another brandy; one would have gone for a policeman, one for a doctor, one for an ambulance; one man would have knelt by the sufferer and loosened his collar; another would have held an umbrella over him to keep off the sun. The wretched fellow would have had no chance: his fit nipped in the bud, he would have been hurried off to a hospital and made a slave. In France they know better; in France there is liberté. That man may be having fits yet, unless it happens that it is defendu to have fits on the pavement: in which case, Heaven help him!

The Pass.

It was a fête day at the Paris Exhibition, and the people covered the grounds like ants. At four o'clock the fête ended, and at half-past four I had an important appointment near the Petit Palais. I had given myself ample time to cross the grounds, but I had forgotten the hiving habits of the French peasant on a Sunday fête day. To reach my destination it was necessary to cross one of those bridges, eyesores of the Exhibition grounds, beneath which ran a Paris street. The steps of the narrow bridge were thronged with people slowly crossing: hundreds, I might say thousands, were waiting an opportunity to ascend. I, too, waited for a quarter of an hour, and was then but a few yards nearer the lowest of the steps. What was to be done? How could I keep my appointment?

A way I saw, but in the face of French officialdom how was it to be negotiated? It was to slip through the wicket-gate, cross the street under the bridge, and re-enter the Exhibition by the wicket-gate on the other side. But the gate was guarded by six gendarmes—stern and unyielding. Cogitating, I recalled the respect the French gendarme has for official documents, and I remembered that my pocket-book contained many, of a kind. I buttoned my coat, gave my moustache a twist, advanced, imitated, as far as I could, Mr. Winston Churchill's manner, pointed to the gate, and demanded, in fierce broken French, that I should be passed through without delay. The six gathered round me like bees, and the tallest of them, shaking his head, muttered something about a pass. Instantly I whipped out my pocket-book, and, as chance had it, there was a pink card loose between the flaps. This was taken, fingered, examined, volubly discussed: then, suddenly, they all raised their eyebrows, nodded their heads, unbent, and ushered me, with no small ceremony, to the wicket gate. It was opened deferentially. I replaced the pass in my pocket-book. It will be useful again, for it was the card admitting me to the Reading Room of the British Museum.

Paris Letter.

(From our French Correspondent.)

MESSRS. CALMAN-LÉVY are issuing a new edition of the joint work of Meilhac and Halévy. It is interesting and instructive to compare these plays with the drama of to-day. The drama of the hour is certainly more intellectual, more complex, more interesting, less innocent, and less gay. Even a generation ago the world was fresher than it is now. It still preserved a pretty note of sentiment, and there was an effervescence, a bubble, about its wit, an innocence in its wickedness, that kept the moralists in good humour even when it went astray. To-day depths in perversity and cynicism have been sounded that poor Meilhac never dreamed of. So in the region of thought complicated heights have been scaled beside which his ingenuous intrigues are infantine. "Frou-frou" is an effective play, agreeable to read; but contrast it with "La Clairière" of Donnay and Descaves, one of the most remarkable plays of our times, and you have all the difference between graceful sentiment and brilliant intellect. Turn from the amusing "Ingénue" of Meilhac and Halévy to such a mordant forcible piece as François de Curel's "L'Envers d'une Sainte" if you would appreciate the immense stride in moral and mental complexity the latter Parisian drama has made. But with the old simplicity has gone a great deal of the gaiety, of the delightful brightness and charm of its character. This we realise as we read over again these old-fashioned plays which carried tears and laughter into the remotest corners of Europe. For who in youth has not wept over the sorrows of frivolous Frou-frou? Who in youth has not felt dreadfully gay after a rakish evening spent in the society of Offenbach and Meilhac and Halévy, with the fast Grand Duchess of Gérolstein, and the faster Belle Hélène? Not to have heard in one's teens "Ah que j'aime les Militaires," "Dites-lui," "Voici le sabre de mon père," is like not having read "Cinderella" or "The Three Calenders" in childhood. And not to have heard Schneider in "La Belle Hélène," and have come out of the theatre humming the cancan or the famous song of Paris with a vague sensation of being frightfully improper, and of having assisted at the jolliest possible sacrilege in the dethroning of the gods of the schoolroom with shouts of laughter—"les dieux s'en vont, les dieux s'en vont!" And to read over years after in the solitude of the library these broad farces, conscious of the vanished high spirits and gaiety of life: without the glitter of footlights, the bright, impertinent music of Offenbach, the singing, the acting, scenery, and dress: all that made the fun of thirty years ago—the fun seems poor enough and the wit thin enough to be sure. As for the wickedness—which I suspect was the best part of their enchantment in young imaginations—it has vanished like the snows of yester-year. We have gone ahead since those days in stage wickedness. Hélène is but an innocent, rowdy schoolgirl, who achieves nothing worse in the dark region of crime than calling a silly shepherd lad "mon petit Loulou." Both the Grand Duchess and the beautiful Helen might nowadays be acted in the nursery, so boisterous and harmless and ingenuous have they become with age.

The plays contained in the two first volumes are varied, and some, like "Frou-frou" and "La Petite Marquise," are known to everybody. On the whole, I think "La Veuve" the best of the lot, so far. The cynicism of these delicious writers is most kindly and human. Contrast "La Veuve," for instance, with "L'Ecole des Veuves"—a terrible play of the rosse school, of a ferocious cynicism—if you would realise how sentimental the wicked Parisian was thirty years ago, how good-natured and transparent in comparison with the depraved and blighted development of modern days. The Countess, ten months a widow, persists in taking her widowhood too tragically for the taste of her friends, who combine in a little conspiracy against the undiminished forces of sorrow. Everywhere in her house are framed portraits of the dear defunct, and in the middle of the drawing-room, above a divan, his bust in marble. Her friends come to dinner, but the Countess will not change her mourning-gown of untrimmed stuff; and when macaroni is served, because the late Count loved it, his widow bursts into tears, and the men profit by the occasion to swallow several glasses of wine "with the air of men who would prefer to drink Bordeaux in a more amusing spot." All noise is banished from the hotel, lest it shall trouble the grief of the Countess; and she invites a poor relation to come and stay with her, to play the "De Profundis" and Chopin's Funeral March every evening. Coming from the dinner-table on the arm of a guest, a naval officer, she sees the bust, and flings herself on the divan under it with a moan. The naval officer mentions that he is soon going to the Martinique, on which the Countess tearfully cries: "He was born at the Martinique." General emotion. It subsides, and he refers to Saint-Pierre; another outburst of the Countess—he passed the first seven years of his life at Saint-Pierre! She then commissions the unfortunate naval officer to procure her a portrait of her husband, which ought to be at the Martinique—"he is on a wooden horse," she explains, "holding a tiny sword in his right hand, his left letting fall a trumpet." The naval officer promises she shall have the portrait of her husband at six years old on his return three months later. Needless to say, the amiable conspiracy of her friends by that time will have succeeded; the dark stuffs will be removed; lights in the house of mourning abundant; laughter once more resounding; the Countess attired in silk with ornaments; and the bust, the famous bust of the dear defunct, relegated to the attic. The naval officer meekly hopes that time, which appeases all grief, will lessen hers—"There are sorrows which time cannot appease. In three months' time you will find me as I am to-day"; and then adds: "You will take every care of the portrait during the journey?" In three months' time he returns to find her going to be married, and the portrait rejoins the bust in the attic. It is a bright and charming play; full of easy wit; written with the delicacy, the grace, the clarity and precision of touch so conspicuous in all the work of these writers. The work throughout is so united, so even, that no one can pronounce what belongs to Meilhac and what is Halévy's. But the stories of Ludovic Halévy may assist us to the conviction that the delicate finish of style, the quiet humour, the urbanity and charm are all his; while Meilhac brings to the united labour dramatic deftness, the stage art, the more boisterous drollery, the more pungent wit. Never did writers so thoroughly complete one another. Never was collaboration more harmonious. The one never runs ahead of the other. Nothing jars, or frets, or perplexes in this polished theatre of two men of the world. Depth, poignancy may be lacking, as in our more complex days we have come to demand these elements in emotion; but the incomparable ease is a quality that grows rarer, and which here claims our full admiration.

There is something else we must admire in these plays: their complete lack of perversity, their general tone of healthiness and virtue. It is not a prudish or a preaching virtue, by any means. It is a sort of laughing, idle, amiable admission that marriage is the best possible union of the sexes, and that in marriage fidelity to its vows is our best security for happiness. This moral is more strongly insisted on in "Frou-frou" than in any of the other pieces, but the same moral underlies even the lightest, the frothiest nonsenses, like the "Ingénue." What could be of a wittier, more mocking irony than the scene in "La Petite Marquise," where Henriette discovers the futility of her sacrifice of home and husband to the lover who has been writing her burning letters, taking the stars, thunder, eternity to witness the depth and height of his passion?

MAX: It is not at this moment when you are making such sacrifices for me that I could hesitate—for you are making sacrifices for me! aren't you? Good God! aren't you? Your position in the world—your reputation.

HENRIETTE: Everything, everything!

MAX: It is too much, perhaps—

HENRIETTE: No, no, my friend.

MAX: You say that because you haven't reckoned it up—but if you had—

HENRIETTE: I have.

MAX: And that didn't prevent you?

HENRIETTE: I only wished there was more.

MAX: Ah! (Movement) So, like this we are going to live together? (Henriette nods.) And what shall we do?

HENRIETTE: We'll travel in Switzerland.

MAX: Oh, Switzerland in winter.

HENRIETTE: We'll go to Italy—to Venice.

MAX: (aside) I was waiting for Venice.

HENRIETTE: And then we'll return here.

MAX: Always together? Alone?

HENRIETTE: In the beginning, yes. You would not expose me— But time, you know, settles things—later, in two or three years, we can begin and see people.

MAX: Ah!—I am enchanted.

HENRIETTE: Of course.

MAX: (without conviction) On my word!

HENRIETTE: I wish I could believe it; but looking at you, in spite of myself—

And when he hears her husband has given her back her freedom, he cried: "But he has no right—certainly not, he has no right. Ah, that would be nice indeed, if the day he wants to get rid of his wife a husband need only say to her: 'You are free,' and if the wife after that has only to go off and drop down upon a poor young man—."

Henriette, disillusioned and wounded on perceiving that what Max wanted was surreptitious visits and not her whole life, exclaims: "He invoked eternity. He took the roar of thunder and the palpitation of the stars to witness"—and takes the next train back to her husband, who lets eternity, the stars and thunder alone.

II. L.

The Book of 1821.

SEVENTY to eighty years ago the most sold, borrowed, thumbed, and talked of book in the English language was "LIFE IN LONDON; or, THE DAY AND NIGHT SCENES OF JERRY HAWTHORN, ESQ., and his elegant friend CORINTHIAN TOM, accompanied by BOB LOGIC, the Oxonian, in their Rambles and Sprees through the Metropolis. By PIERCE EGAN." The same is reprinted in this year of decorum 1900, by Messrs. Chatto & Windus, with the preface that John Camden Hotten wrote to his edition of 1869. "Eight and forty years ago," Hotten begins, trying to take his readers back to an age forgotten, "this was the book—the literature—of that period, the one which many elderly gentlemen still remember far away in the distance of youth." Already, in 1860, Thackeray had been to the British Museum on purpose to get Life in London; and he found it, on reperusal, not so brilliant as he had supposed it. "But the pictures!—oh!—the pictures are noble still. . . . The park! delicious excitement! The theatre! the salon!! the green room!!! Rapturous bliss—the opera itself! and then perhaps to Temple Bar, to knock down a Charley there." But, he added sorrowfully, "Now every London man is weary and blasé. There is an enjoyment of life in these bucks of 1823 which contracts strangely with our feelings of 1860. Here, for instance, is a specimen of their talk and walk"; and then he quotes this Vauxhall passage:

"If enjoyment is your motto, you may make the most of an evening in these Gardens more than at any other place in the Metropolis. It is all free and easy—stay as long as you like, and depart when you think proper." "Your description is so flattering," replied JERRY, "that I do not care how soon the time arrives for us to start." Logic proposed a "bit of a stroll," in order to get rid of an hour or two, which was immediately accepted by TOM and JERRY. A turn or two in Bond Street—a stroll through Piccadilly—a "look in" at Tattersall's—a ramble through Pall-Mall—and a strut on the Corinthian Path, fully occupied the time of our heroes till the hour for dinner arrived, when a few glasses of TOM's rich wines soon put them on the qui vive: VAUXHALL was then the object in view, and the TRIO started, bent upon enjoying all the pleasures which this place so amply affords to its visitors.

So young Londoners were blasé in 1860, were they, and knew no such enjoyment of life as this? Well, I was not born in '60, but in '86 I was Jerry, and S— was my Bob Logic; and we were young and not witless; and we roamed—ah! how we roamed London. That description which seemed out of date to Thackeray in 1860 does not seem out of date when I apply it to '86; it then seems the authentic prean of Youth in London—our youth. To be sure, we did not enter salons or green-rooms, and we never gave a thought to the opera. Nor did we strut anywhere. But how we mowed the night streets, talking, observing, comparing! With what large and irrecoverable grace we dined—table d'hôte—for a shilling in Soho, trifling long with the olives, long with our cigarettes and Le Petit Journal Pour Rire, which was full of Grévin's croquis in the Egyptian style, and Léonce Petit's "Nos Paysans"—all Brittany and Normandy in outline, the cider harvest, the truffle gatherers, the peasants in tall hats shooting for drinks, the ambling priest, the many-gabled village, and the church; and our French host over there at a spare table helping a wing and salad to Madame, who wore a top-knot and chirped to her canary! France in London! Everything in London! Then did we stroll to Leicester-square, and you shall not tell me that the night sky is now so deeply blue over the garden, or the Alhambra lights so wickedly alluring, as they were in '86.

And the clean, quiet Sunday mornings. S— came to my lodging at eleven that we might read Hazlitt in the morning light, and in the evening he received me at his, that we might read Horace over roasting chestnuts, and rant of pale Caecuban and old Falernian as though we knew the taste of them—even in Soho. And in those far-off days we read Sappho, and S— caught Caoudal's trick of pointing and gesticulating at objects with his thumb in a circular twisting motion, like the sculptor working on clay. Or we went round to St. John's Wood, where was a great studio fire, and sketches, and jugs of beer, and halfpenny nap, and lay figures, and stories, and untimely song. And the concerts at the Langham—ah me; and all this was fourteen years ago, when the 'bus drivers were fat. We, at all events, were not blasé, and in the Book of Youth it is not so written. But in that book I hope it is written of us, as of Jerry, that we sought "to respect and follow notions of real gentility—and to select the most sensible and agreeable persons in society as companions . . . to join in the fun—to enjoy the lark—to laugh at the sprees, and to be alive in all our RAMELES." The charm of Pierce Egan's book may have gone, but the charm of its title—how that remains!

U.

An Examination Paper on Richard Feverel.

THE following examination paper on Mr. Meredith's The Ordeal of Richard Feverel has been prepared (for his own delectation) by a student of that unforgettable book who, beyond the statement that he is a Schoolmaster, wishes to remain anonymous. If any of our readers care to answer any or all of the questions we shall be glad to forward their papers to the Schoolmaster, and to publish his decision and comments in the ACADEMY:

1. Discuss Sir Austin Feverel's qualifications for writing his "Proposal for a New System of Education of our British Youth."
2. Sketch his "System," showing its effect (a) on himself, (b) on his son.
3. Enumerate Richard's Ordeals, and say how he came through them.
4. Compare Lucy with Amelia in Vanity Fair.
5. Discuss the merits of the "Pilgrim's Scrip" as a literary device.
6. Put a value on the book (a) as a Love-story, (b) as an essay on Education, (c) as an essay on Woman.
7. Is the author a misogynist or philogynist, a realist or idealist? Upon what do you base your conclusions?
8. Compare the texts of the first and last editions (1859—1899) and say whether you find in the changes evidence of a widening or a narrowing of the author's mind.
9. Say all you can in favour of Bessie Berry. Can anything be said against her?
10. Contrast the significance of "kissin'" and "cookin'."
11. Write short essays on Penny Whistles, Old Dogs, The Wild Oats Theory, Titans, Hot and Cold Blood, Hitting below the Belt, "checked perspiration."
12. Who said, and under what circumstances:
 - "Expediency is man's wisdom, doing right is God's."
 - "Sauces are the top-tree of this science."
 - "You might have shaved your head."
 - "He was a black Berry to me."
 - "Your pipe au't a shrew."
 - "Falstaff is only, to us, an incorrigible fat man."
 - "Will virtuous people let me earn my bread? I could not get a housemaid's place."
 - "We must all die, and the secret of the thing is to die game."
 - "Health's everything."
 - "Johnson haven't got a name for me."
13. Forecast Richard's after-career.
14. What is the conclusion of the whole matter?

Correspondence.

Some Points.

SIR,—Would you allow me to draw your attention to a sentence in the review of Morley's Cromwell in your issue for October 27, p. 375, col. 1: "More finished and artistic English has been his in the work of his earlier days, before politics claimed him for their own?" "Politics" is defined in Chambers's Etymological Dictionary (p. 387, 1879) as a noun singular; but here manifestly it is connected as a plural with "their." Further, if the perfect "has been" implies the continuance of an action from a past up to a present time, its employment in this sentence with regard to work accomplished in a period long ago ended must, I fancy, be due to some oversight. One may occasionally hear a Frenchman say, "I have been there yesterday." Similarly, Miss Braddon writes (The Day Will Come, p. 359, 1890): "I have lain awake many a night when I was a girl listening to his footsteps," where the associated perfect and past tenses relate to one and the same early period of the speaker's existence. Also the Pall Mall Gazette (April 6, 1896, p. 1, col. 3) makes the statement: "In the war of 1793-1802 twice a French force has landed in these islands, and once a large force had come within an ace of landing." The above sentences, I would submit, are all alike contrary to the genius of the English language in their association of the perfect tense with descriptions of totally bygone events.

Another point: In "Things Seen," p. 386, in the words, "On every piece of paper was scribbled ribald or insulting remarks," a slip (far from rare in modern publications) has, I think, been made in the use of the singular "was" for "were." A recent number of the Athenæum falls seemingly into the opposite error where it says (p. 513, col. 3): "Contact with the earth, from which sprang Antæus, the immediate experience of natural things and natural men, are the essential food of the poet." Here what is made to serve as a second subject of the verb appears to be simply an appositional or explanatory clause which should be preceded by a dash.

Further, might I suggest the following as possible emendations in your current issue: On p. 377, col. 2, "or" for "nor" in the sentence: "It is not brilliant nor very attractive"; on p. 376, col. 1, "so" for "as" after "do" in the words: "He did not do as much as was effected by Napoleon"; "probably" for the Scotch "likely" in Mr. T. Edwards-Jones's letter, p. 389, col. 2; and "a usage" for "an usage" in I. C. S.'s communication, p. 390, col. 1?—I am, &c.,

FRANCIS H. BUTLER.

Lowell's Puns.

SIR,—As the contributor to the October Lippincott of the article on "Lowell's Puns," criticised by Mr. Stillman in your columns, permit me to say that I gladly submit with all deference to Mr. Stillman's authority, but feel that he would be the last one to wish his own criticism to remain, where in error, uncorrected.

Mr. Stillman's intimacy with Prof. Horsford must have been before the time of Prof. Horsford's discovery, as he believed, of Norse remains, and his identification of a spot near Cambridge—in fact, some distance farther up the river—with Norumbega. Here he erected a monument, usually called Norumbega Tower, opposite which there is now a popular resort called for that reason Norumbega Park. Mr. Stillman considers it impossible that such an identification could have been made, for the reason that Cambridge is miles from the sea, that it is navigable only by rowboats, and that we should never have heard the last of undergraduate jokes upon the landing in Cambridge. The distance from the sea is, in fact, only three or four miles, and Mr. Stillman will surely recall that schooners pass up to a point opposite the town through a succession of drawbridges. These facts, however, concern Prof. Horsford's theory, not the essential fact of the identification, or the story. Mr. Stillman may readily learn upon inquiry that the theory did awaken some mild amusement in academic circles, even if it was not of such vital interest and importance as to become the object of undergraduate humour.

In regard to the proper place of Eudamidas in the royal line of Sparta, I will certainly assume the blame of misrepresenting Mr. Lowell rather than lay it at the door of my genial informant, who is, I imagine, a friend of Mr. Stillman's as he was of Mr. Lowell's. My own knowledge of such matters is very ancient history indeed, and my mistake in calling the royalty in question the first King of Sparta may very probably have been due to a hazy recollection of the fact that he was not only "brother of Agis," but also had a right to the prouder title, "Eudamidas the First, King of Sparta." At all events, I am content to know it is "all in the family," and the joke none the worse.—I am, &c., C. G. CHILD.

2312, De Lancey-street, Philadelphia, Pa.:

October 29, 1900.

Craps.

SIR,—According to the Standard Dictionary, published by the Funk & Wagnalls Company, of New York, "craps" is a game of chance, in which the object is to guess the numbers thrown on two dice. No doubt it is to this game that "Mr. Dooley" refers in the passage quoted.—I am, &c.,

HARRY TOWNEND.

"A Dream of Fair Women."

SIR,—While thanking you for your appreciative notice of my translation of M. de Maulde's Les Femmes de la Renaissance, may I be allowed to correct a misapprehension, of some importance to the author and the reader, as to my omission of some footnotes, and to clear myself of the implied reproach? The only footnotes omitted are bare references, mainly in abbreviation, to a long list of authorities, printed and MS., occupying twenty-one pages of small print at the end of the French original. The omission of this bibliography was required, as I mention in my preface, by M. de Maulde's publishers, whose motive may be surmised. Since it was thus out of my power to provide the key, M. de Maulde agreed with me that it was useless to encumber the pages of the translation and perplex the reader with enigmatical references like "La Vauguyon, f° 31; Chanzy, p. 148; Bouchet, f° 19 v°; le Tasse, p. 116." The reader is deprived of nothing else.—I am, &c.,

GEORGE H. ELY.

Our Weekly Competition.

Result of No. 59 (New Series).

LAST week we offered a prize of One Guinea for the best set of "Literary Truths." The prize is awarded to Miss M. C. Cordue, 33, Weymouth Street, W., for the following:

Competence is the canker of genius.

A poet is borne, not appreciated.

It is better to be unread than unreadable.

It is quite possible that each maxim in the above set has been excelled by maxims scattered through the others; but the prize was offered for the best set of three, and has been so awarded. Other contributions are as follows:

In the sixteenth century men looked in their hearts and wrote; in the nineteenth, they look in the hearts of the "general reader," and, if they can, into the editor's.

When a poet is dead, the praises of his verse, however loud, do not reach him.

There is nothing in existence that has not an aspect of beauty. Art perceives that beauty and sets it forth; therefore there is nothing that may not be a subject for the artist. And the more beauty a man can see, the greater artist he is. [A. J. C.]

Mere literary "taste" is not necessarily literary talent, any more than a flint is a rifle. The lock, stock, and barrel must count.

As in the preparation of jugged hare the possession of the hare is imprimal, so for success in literature one must first gain a name. How, for example, would a Master Christian or "Absent-minded Beggar" have fared over other signatures?

After all, true literature is but the expression of the best thoughts expressed in the best way. All else is mere trite statement—Ollendorffian sentences of the exercise book.

[H. W. D., London.]

Fiction married to purpose is too often divorced from Art, because purpose is usually a consequence, and not the cause of great works of imagination.

Original minds are valuable because of what they suggest; second-rate minds are condemned by what they express, for in telling all they most frequently teach nothing.

Two critics never err—Time and Human Nature: the first rescues what is true from neglect; the second condemns what is false to oblivion. [A. E. W., Inverness.]

If a thing is worth doing in literature it is certainly worth doing well; but it is a mistake to suppose that because a thing has been well done it was worth doing.

The author's extremity is the devil's opportunity.

There are writers who convince us that language was not given to us to conceal thought, but to conceal its absence.

[F. F. C., Reigate.]

The right word is like the sunlight—it is content in playing hide and seek.

The edges of your style cannot be too fine, and the body of it cannot be too full.

Delicate writers should not trifle with their adjectives, for fear of producing damp that may lead to fog. [C. C., London.]

From other papers we take the following maxims:

The careful author watches his adjectives. There are plenty of them, but, as a rule, only one fits the case in point exactly. [E. P., London.]

A successful novelist, when he writes, must keep one eye on his work, and the other on the amiable weaknesses of his six-shilling public. [E. L. C., R:hill]

A large circulation is as much a sign of literary excellence as a large paunch is a sign of physical health.

You never know what "cant" is till you read the novel of a woman who writes against it. [F. M. E., Minehead.]

In Bookland the state of the circulation is no index of healthy life. [J. D. W., London.]

It was a bad day for literature when men ceased to write "thou," and began to write by the "thou." [H. S., London.]

Other replies received: J. B. H., Sheffield; A. M. P., Hampstead; L. L., Ramsgate; H. A. M., London; A. G., Cheltenham; R. F. McC., Whitby; T. C., Buxted; G. L., Didsbury; M. A. W., London; A. O'D., London; C. C. B., Epworth (?); M. B., Derby; C. S., Kelso; E. H. H., Streatham; E. G., Hornsey; A. C., Blackford; G. W., Hull.

Competition No. 60 (New Series).

We offer a prize of One Guinea for the best prose parody of the style of a living writer. The writer parodied should be well known, and a limit of 250 words should not be exceeded.

RULES.

Answers, addressed "Literary Competition, THE ACADEMY, 43, Chancery-lane, W.C.," must reach us not later than the first post of Wednesday, November 14. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found on the second page of Wrapper, or it cannot enter into competition. Competitors sending more than one attempt at solution must accompany each attempt with a separate coupon; otherwise the first only will be considered.

The Academy

A Weekly Review of Literature and Life.

No. 1489. Established 1869.

17 November, 1900.

Price Threepence.

[Registered as a Newspaper.]

The Literary Week.

THAT the polite reading world is keenly interested in fairy tales, and in Christmas literature generally, is shown by the incident to which we refer on page 472. We received twelve letters, many of them of considerable length, in answer to a chance question in our last issue as to the name of the author of a fairy tale published twenty years ago. Christmas literature has indeed become a business. Our shelves, our tables, our what-nots, are piled and crowded with every imaginable kind of book suitable to children from two years old to a hundred and two. How to grapple with this fascinating mass of picture-books, story-books and gift-books is our present problem. We hope to solve it by publishing an illustrated Christmas Number of the ACADEMY on December 8.

THE future of the literary drama is certainly promising. In this connexion we are glad to be able to give some authoritative information about Mr. John Davidson's new play, which will not be published before March of next year. It was commissioned by Mr. Tree, and was finished in September, 1899. "King of the Lombards" was the original title, but that was changed by the author on the appearance of Mr. Swinburne's "Rosamund, Queen of the Lombards." It is now called "Self's the Man: a Tragi-Comedy." Although the play may be referred to the eighth century A.D., it is entirely modern in conception and treatment, and is not otherwise like any preceding work of Mr. Davidson's. The motto on the title-page will be from Fleet Street Eclogues:

Be your own star, for strength is from within;
And one against the world will always win.

It is in five acts, which are entitled respectively: "The Election," "Elixir Vitæ," "The Conspiracy," "Osmunda's Pomander," and "Nil Nisi Bonum."

MRS. CRAIGIE'S new play, "The Wisdom of the Wise," will be produced at the St. James's Theatre next Thursday. On the following day Mrs. Craigie starts for Egypt, and does not expect to return to London till February.

CAPTAIN MARSHALL—with Mr. W. S. Gilbert and Mr. Pinero—understand the art, and know the spirit, of true comedy. In "The Noble Lord," now being played to a laughing crowd at the Criterion Theatre, we are given some really bright humorous scenes. Mr. Weedon Grossmith, Miss Ellis Jefferys, and Miss Annie Hughes excel in the mock-heroic, and these accomplished players do full justice to their lines. Mr. Bouchier is too conscious of his own absurdities as the "Lord Archibald Melrose." A little more gravity on his part would add a great deal to the success of the whole.

THE Spectator in its review last week of Huxley's Life and Letters makes a curious mistake. Says our contemporary: "He [Huxley] laughed at himself in the Cambridge doctorate red gown, and in the solemn Osborne function when he was made Privy Councillor, at which

Mr. Jesse Collings, taking a stealthy look at the Queen, found that she was simultaneously taking a stealthy look at Mr. Jesse Collings." Why Mr. Jesse Collings? Huxley himself was the man who took the "stealthy look." It is there in plain print, p. 328, vol. ii.

HUXLEY made his first discovery—"a hitherto undiscovered membrane in the root of the human hair, which received the name of Huxley's layer, when he was nineteen." The next year came his interview with Faraday. The boy of eighteen had been long brooding over a "perpetual motion scheme." His brain was heated by the idea, he could not sleep, till at length he determined "to put the questions which neither my wit nor my hands would set at rest" to Faraday for decision. So he wrote a letter, drew a plan, enclosed the two in an envelope, and tremblingly betook himself to the Royal Institution. We must give the interview in his own words:

"Is Dr. Faraday here?" said I to the porter. "No sir, he has just gone out." I felt relieved. "Be good enough to give him this letter," and I was hurrying out when a little man in a brown coat came in at the glass door. "Here is Dr. Faraday," said the man, and gave him my letter. He turned to me and courteously inquired what I wished. "To submit to you that letter, sir, if you are not occupied." "My time is always occupied, sir, but step this way," and he led me into the museum or library, for I forget which it was, only I know there was a glass case against which we leant. He read my letter, did not think my plan would answer. Was I acquainted with Mechanism, what we call the laws of motion? I saw all was up with my poor scheme, so after trying a little to explain, in the course of which I certainly failed in giving him a clear idea of what I would be at, I thanked him for his attention, and went off as dissatisfied as ever. The sense of one part of the conversation I well recollect. He said "that were the perpetual motion possible, it would have occurred spontaneously in nature, and would have overpowered all other forces," or words to that effect. I did not see the force of this, but did not feel competent enough to discuss the question.

WHEN Huxley decided to enter the medical service of the Navy he applied to Sir William Burnett. In five lines Huxley gives an admirable picture (in character drawing, as in other things, it was one of T. H. H.'s gifts always to speak to the essential) of his patron:

He was a tall, shrewd-looking old gentleman, with a broad Scotch accent, and I think I see him now as he entered with my card in his hand. The first thing he did was to return it, with a frugal reminder that I should probably find it useful on some other occasion.

WE have recently quoted several lamentations on the present state of literature, and are doubtful whether our readers will care to hear another. But the Rev. Stopford Brooke is the utterer of the latest that has come before us, and his authority—increased, if possible, by his new professorship of English Literature at University College—tempts us to quote the following remarks. They occur in a little book published by Mr. Philip Green, 5, Essex-street, Strand, and containing two lectures delivered last November in the university cities of Aberdeen, Glasgow, and Edinburgh. It will be seen that Mr. Brooke takes a gloomy view of things as they are, but indicates our need:

Poetry has no captains who give it a steady direction. No master ideas, such as Tennyson and Browning had, urge its course towards a clear end, or fill its sails with a steadfast wind. Nor does it represent, as Arnold and Clough did, or as Morris and Rossetti and Swinburne did after them, the main conditions of the age in which we are living. It only represents (with the exception of the work of a few men who are scarcely read) the helpless wavering of a class in society which has no clear ideas as to what it ought to do with its life, and none with regard to its future. It takes up now one subject and now another, and drops them without finishing them. It tries sensuality, and rebellion, and mysticism, and supernaturalism, and imperialism, and spiritual religion, and nature-poetry, and hospitalities, and crude coarseness, and crime, and sentimental love, and pessimism, and it composes hosts of little lyrics about nothing. Everything by turns, and nothing long. It amuses itself with difficult metres, and surprising rhymes, and elaborated phrasing, and painting in words, and scientific tricks of versing. It has no great matter, no fine thinking, and no profound passion, and it is the reverse of simple. And the world is becoming tired of it, and longs for the advent of youth, originality, joy, hope, and the resurrection of vital ideas, in poetry. Along with this, and always accompanying this prolific littleness, is a terrible recrudescence of criticism. Every magazine, all the daily papers, every publishing house, is filled with essays and articles and books about poetry, carping, or denouncing, or satirising, or praising without knowledge, and in astonishing excess. I cannot tell how often I have lately seen in the papers and in books that a poet, if not superior, then equal to Shakespeare, has appeared on the stage. And all this overwhelming shower-bath of criticism has chilled the world, which wants, nay, hungers, for some warm and living creation. Moreover, we are still, like Arnold, wearied by endless discussions, by the shouting of people who want nothing said which cannot be proved, who replace sentiment by materialism, who will not allow us to love nature except in accordance with science, who, pinning us down to this world only, forbid us to overclimb the flaming walls and go wandering, like gypsies, into the infinities of love and beauty, because we cannot be as certain of such infinities as we are certain that two and two make four. Were these folk to succeed in infecting the whole world with their theories, fine literature would die of disgust, and poetry be drained of its life-blood.

THE commercialisation of literature is revealed almost every week in a new form. A well-known novelist who contributes a causerie to the Sunday Sun says that he was talking the other day about novels to the librarian of a circulating library, who casually remarked that the longer novels are the better for their authors. The novelist pricked up his ears at this, and begged for an explanation. "Well, you see," the librarian said, "the whole thing is so exceedingly simple that it lies in a nutshell. You must look at it not only from the author's point of view, but from the circulating library's also. The library clerk is bound to save himself and his employers all the trouble he can. Now, if a subscriber comes in and asks for a long book, the clerk knows very well that the subscriber will take twice the time to get through that book that he will occupy in reading one of half the length. That stands to reason. Anything which tends to the saving of time and labour is an economy, so you can't wonder that when a new book is submitted to the circulating library for subscription the first impulse of the Press Censor is to look at its length. If it is a hundred-and-fifty-thousand-word book, he knows that it will keep people busy for a long time, and so orders as many copies as he possibly can. The young author who realises this has taken the first step to fame and fortune." Personally, we are almost certain that the measure of the popularity of a given novelist's work often depends on accidental and adventitious circumstances of this kind. The quality of the bulk of fiction is too even to admit always of more reasonable explanation.

THE cup of praise presented to Mr. Stephen Phillips by the critics in acknowledgment of "Herod" is not without its dash of bitter. Truth irreverently says of Herod, Mariamne, and the other characters, that they are simply "embodied quotations from Josephus dished up with Tennysonian source." The attitudes of the Truth critic and Mr. William Archer in the World make a curious contrast. Thus:

The World.

Mr. Phillips stands as far apart from Tennyson as from either Sheridan Knowles or Browning. He is a totally new phenomenon in English drama of the past two centuries—at once an inventor of situations and a master of language. We have had many masters of language and a few inventors of situations; but we have never had them combined in the same person. Moreover, Mr. Phillips's imagination is not only dramatic, but scenic. He has the instinct of stage effect, in which our Victorian poets have been so notably deficient. He reminds one (to choose a very rough illustration) of the elder Dumas speaking with the voice of Milton. His style is essentially epic; yet it is full of lyrical modulations which (the paradox is only apparent) render it vividly dramatic. In his constant search for sonority of diction, Mr. Phillips reminds us more, perhaps, of Victor Hugo than of any other individual dramatist; but neither in his construction nor in his psychology does he rely upon Hugo's mere flamboyancies of effect. His imagination is grandiose, not fantastic; his style is resonant, not scintillating. For all his romantic trappings, I think he is at heart a classic.

Truth.

Mr. Phillips has been much praised for the versification of his "Paolo and Francesca"; but this poem, as I have before remarked, is simply an echo of Tennyson and Maeterlinck, with a scenic arrangement, and a series of stage directions taken from Victor Hugo. He has brought no new element into literature. But people forget Tennyson, and in their craving for some new thing have made an apotheosis for a photograph. Mr. Phillips's "Herod" certainly fails to out-Herod its many predecessors. After the emphatic sameness of the play at Her Majesty's, one turns with pleasure, for instance, to the majestic development, the powerful characterisation, of Calderon's play upon the same subject; "Herod" is written all in scarlet, and spoken in shouts. Flaubert's "Herodias" shows, too, what a fine student of character, a really great writer, may do with the materials which have come down to us from Josephus. It may all be an illusion, and Flaubert's reconstruction of a kindred environment be equally as false as we feel is Mr. Phillips's. But the one writer has the power of characterisation, the other has not.

WE understand that Mr. Richard Mansfield will create the part of Herod when Mr. Stephen Phillips's tragedy is produced in the United States. In the meantime, Herod is having a great and deserved success at Her Majesty's Theatre. Miss Brayton, who is playing Mariamne at present, gives her beautiful lines with real pathos, and, in the love scenes, shows a tenderness rare enough in modern players of romantic drama.

MR. RICHARD WHITEING's forthcoming book, The Life of Paris, will contain five chapters, entitled The Government Machine, Parisian Pastimes, Artistic Paris, Life on the Boulevard, and Fashionable Paris. Never in recent years have so many books, or such good books, on Paris been put before English readers as in the last two years.

BROWNING's greatest work, The Ring and the Book, is being examined anew by Browning students in the light of Signor Giorgi's recent discovery of an Italian MS. giving a full report of the trial of Franceschini and his murderous assistants. Signor Giorgi is the librarian of the Casanateuse Library at Rome, and a translation of the MS. by Prof. Hall Griffin will be found in the Monthly Review. Mr. Griffin adds many notes, and he does not endorse the whole of Browning's version of the story, which, though it was to have been "the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth," presents variations on the facts dictated by artistic reasons, or, in some cases, to be explained as mistakes. The "square old yellow book," from which Browning took his facts, has, however, yet to be translated.

THE war correspondents are now quarrelling among themselves, and Lord Rosslyn has been compelled to apologise for his reflections on the conduct of certain troops in South Africa. Mr. Winston Churchill is particularly loud in his defence of the ability of the British officer. A little while ago it was quite safe and usual to regret the absence of such ability, while yielding unstinted praise to their bravery and energy. For our part, we are inclined to pay little attention to Mr. Churchill's words, which are certainly not wholly supported by Lord Roberts's actions. In any case, no man's patriotism or right feeling ought to be questioned because he endeavours intelligently and modestly to criticise the conduct of fighting by British officers. We are not aware that Mr. Hales has done more than this, or that he has done it from motives that will not bear strict examination.

A CORRESPONDENT asks to be informed of the authorship of two quotations. "The first has run in my head ever since I read it in the late Prof. W. K. Clifford's essays, some ten years ago; the second occurs in the article on Tom d'Urfey in the Dictionary of National Biography:

(a) There is not one thing with another,
But Evil saith to Good: My brother,
My brother, I am one with thee!
They shall not strive nor cry for ever:
No man shall choose between them, never Shall this thing end and that thing be.

(b) Richard Steele praised him, and cold, stately "Atticus,"
Old Rowley lean'd on Tom's shoulder, our king!
D'Urfey, who mocked all the noisy, fanatic fuss;
Plot-bigots moved him to jest and to sing.

"In Course of Formation." These words head a circular we have received setting forth the intended work of "The Anglo-Heraldic Alliance." "Anglo-heraldic" seems a bit mixed, but hyphenation extends to the name of the promoter, Prof. W. J. Hughes-Stewart-Spratly, who himself claims "27 Royal Quarterings, and Heraldic contact with 330 Peers and Baronets." The primary objects of the Alliance are genealogical research into the origin of the English people, it being assumed that the bulk of the nation has descended from the kings and nobles of old Egypt; the formation of a centre of benevolence to assist unfortunate members of the Alliance; the establishment of lodges and lodge-hotels for members in all the chief centres of society and commerce. As regards the Professor's Egyptian theory, its value may perhaps be gauged by his statement, credited to him by a local paper, that all the Bakers and Barkers are descended from the Pharaohs.

THE ideal newspaper is as far to seek as the ideal friend or the ideal curry, but it seems that another attempt is to be made in New York. The "novel feature" of this ideal newspaper will be that it will tell the truth, will be free from political control, and will contain no sensational matter. To tell the truth about events that are happening 6,000 miles away, or even six miles away, is not easy.

"THE best reader of this century—a reader of genius—was not a university man, but a clerk in the South Sea Office, Charles Lamb." Thus Prof. Raleigh in his inaugural lecture at the University of Glasgow on "The Study of English Literature." Nor is this the only passage in which Prof. Raleigh makes light of the professional mind. His address has only just reached us in authorised report, and we shall return to it.

A WEEK or two ago, the editor of Crampton's Magazine almost threw up the sponge in the matter of short stories. While not abandoning them entirely, he expressed his conviction that this literary form has fallen on evil days. Mrs. John Strange Winter has nevertheless made her Christmas annual budget of short stories, and has pre-faced them with a little scolding which will be read with interest and, we may add, with some amazement. We are told, for instance, that "several very famous writers are known by nothing else than their short stories: Balzac, Guy de Maupassant, Tolstoi—these are names which occur to me at the moment." Probably another moment's reflection would have reminded John Strange Winter that Eugénie Grandet, Bel Ami, and Anna Karenina are not short stories, and that the fame of their writers rests on these works, and others of similar length. But she trips on to instance the authors of Les Misérables and David Copperfield, whose novels far exceed in length the average long novel of to-day, and whose short stories are relatively of little importance. We cannot, therefore, feel surprise at her mockery of novels "filled up with more or less wild religious disquisitions, like pills coated with sugar, with deep thoughts and serious problems which are mostly such as 'no fellow can understand.'" All of which usefully indicates the separation of those publics which constitute the public.

IN an article on "The Spirit of Place" we have dealt with Mr. Henry James's book, A Little Tour in France. It is fitting that we should record here, as we have not done so there, our admiration of Mr. Pennell's illustrations. Praising Mr. Pennell is a necessity of the times, and is become so familiar that one's words lose emphasis. But, really, we are enchanted by the brilliance of this draughtsman's technique. There are drawings in this book which are radiant in their cleverness. Particularly is the rendering of southern sunlight mastered; and even varieties of that sunlight, from a white blaze to a sleepy, veiled refulgence, are suggested unerringly. To make sunlight dazzle in a drawing seems impossible. It is impossible. But the impossibility becomes less tremendous under Mr. Pennell's brush than anywhere else in modern book illustration. We do not find everything we wish for in his drawings. Somehow they do not touch us like a sketch by Prout. Depth, reverence, and we know not what of tenderness are not often there; but the triumph of hand and eye is complete.

OUR grammatical lictor, Mr. Francis H. Butler, detects a redundant his in the sentence concluding our recent review of Mr. A. H. Bullen's new book: "the perfect sailor whose every hair is a rope yarn and every drop of his blood Stockholm tar." The sentence would be more scholastically correct if it ended "and whose every drop of blood is Stockholm tar," but here the clause is lengthened by a word, and the mere elision of the his leaves it rather unfurnished. Our critic is certainly right when he says of this conclusion of a sentence in last week's ACADEMY: "Our French host over there at a spare table helping a wing and salad to Madame, who wore a top-knot and chirped to her canary," that it requires inversion of the order of "to" and "a wing and salad," and the relegation of the latter phrase to the end. So also in a "Thing Seen," "I cannot rid him from my mind" had been better written "I cannot banish," &c. Our correspondent continues: "Since the time of Canon, who quotes the ludicrous sentence: 'The negroes are to appear at church only in boots' (Syst. of Eng. Grammar, p. 133, 1845), the misplaced 'only,' referred to by the ACADEMY, p. 436, has remained an unshifted public stumbling-block. In the following notice, which I cull from the Daily Telegraph for September 20, 1900, p. 6, col. 6, malposition of this word leaves the intended meaning in Cimmerian obscurity: 'Mr. A—— V——, in response to numerous inquiries, begs to announce that he can only receive private pupils on Mondays at his residence.'"

Bibliographical.

THE critical condition of Mr. Robert Buchanan, and the sympathy excited by it, have necessarily had the effect of drawing public attention anew to the extent and nature of his work as man of letters. In these circumstances some interest may attach to a list of his publications, approximately, if not wholly, complete. His first appearance in the literary world was as a poet, and with a volume entitled Undertones (1863). Since then he has issued the following volumes of verse:—Idyls and Legends of Inverburn (1865), London Poems and Ballad Stories of the Affections (1866), North Coast and Other Poems (1868), The Book of Orm (1870), The Drama of Kings and Napoleon Fallen (1871), St. Abe and his Seven Wives (published anonymously, 1872), White Rose and Red (also issued anonymously, 1873), Balder the Beautiful (1877), Ballads of Life, Love, and Humour (1882), The Earthquake (1885), The City of Dream (1888), The Outcast (1891), The Wandering Jew (1893), Red and White Heather (1894), The Devil's Case (1896), and The New Rome (1899). Mr. Buchanan's Poetical Works came out in 1874, followed by a necessarily more ample collection, with the same title, in 1884.

Mr. Buchanan "commenced" novelist so long ago as 1862 by producing a story called Storm-Beaten in collaboration with his friend Gibbon (MacGibbon). His first unassisted work in prose fiction was, apparently, The Shadow of the Sword (1876); after which there came in succession: The Child of Nature and God and the Man (1881), The Martyrdom of Madeline (1882), Annan Water and Love Me for Ever (1883), Forglowe Manor and The New Abelard (1884), The Master of the Mine, Matt, and Stormy Waters (1885), That Winter Night (1886), The Heir of Linne (1888), The Moment After (1890), Come, Live with Me, and Be My Love (1891), Woman and the Man (1893), Rachel Dene (1894), Diana's Hunting and Lady Kilpatrick (1895), Marriage by Capture and Effie Hetherington (1896), Father Anthony and The Rev. Annabel Lee (1898), and Andromeda (1900). Mr. Buchanan, further, collaborated with Mr. Henry Murray in The Charlatan (1895)—a "novelising" of Mr. Buchanan's drama of the same name.

In addition to the above Mr. Buchanan has produced the following miscellaneous works: David Gray and Other Essays (1868), The Land of Lorne (1871), The Fleshly School of Poetry (1872), Master-Spirits (1873), The Hebridean Isles (second edition 1883), A Look Round Literature (1887), The Coming Terror and Other Essays (1891), and a pamphlet called On Descending into Hell (1889), addressed to the Home Secretary of that day. Mr. Buchanan has also written introductions to the poems of Longfellow (1868) and Roden Noel (1892), and has edited The Life and Adventures of J. J. Audubon (1869).

The call for a condensed edition of Mr. Leonard Huxley's Life of his father is characteristic of our times—of times in which it appears to have become the fashion to produce inordinately long biographies. It looks as if in future we should be presented with two sets of memoirs of the same person—the first bulky and almost unreadable, and the second terse and really useful. Of course, no one has ever complained of the length of the Lives of Johnson, Scott, Tennyson, and so forth. What annoys so many modern readers is the large extent of letterpress bestowed upon the memories of men and women of the second and third rank—the amount of printed matter which can be of no service to anybody, not even to those to whose fame it has been dedicated. That being so, let us have the condensed biography by all means; its diffuse predecessor can be put aside, or relegated to the top shelves of public libraries. The labours of the bibliographer will not be lightened by this arrangement, but that doesn't matter.

A writer of "words for music" has just raised an exceeding bitter cry because, on studying concert programmes, he finds his name omitted, while that of the composer he has written for is invariably given. The protest is legitimate. There can be no "song without words," in the common acceptance of the word "song," and the authors of such effusions should receive due honour. Even now, I dare say, there are worthy people who ascribe to the still living Mr. Henry Russell both the words and the music of ditties to which he contributed the melody and accompaniment only. In this way the late Dr. Charles Mackay has been deprived of much of the credit that was his due. To Mackay, Mr. Russell owed the inspiration of several of the most world-renowned of his songs. This also suggests more work for the bibliographic scribe, who might be worse employed than in rescuing from obscurity the names of the writers of ditties which have swayed the popular heart.

Mrs. Mayne Reid has been protesting publicly against the statement that her deceased husband's stories have ceased to attract and hold the attention of youth. In this, it seems to me, she is abundantly justified by facts. So far is Mayne Reid from being forgotten that I find five of his stories appeared in new editions last year; new editions of five others appeared in 1893. One of his tales—The Rifle Rangers—was reprinted four times between 1890 and 1897. Two others—The Scalp Hunters and The Headless Horseman—were reprinted thrice between 1890 and 1895. Ten years ago there was quite a "recrudescence" of his popularity, five of his books making a fresh appearance in the course of 1890. Obviously people are still found to buy, and presumably to read, the fictions of Mayne Reid; nor do I see how they could possibly fail to fascinate the boys of to-day as they did those of yesterday. Mrs. Mayne Reid, by the way, is herself an author, having written a story called George Markham: a Romance of the West.

The decease of Mr. Thomas Arnold has followed very closely upon the publication of his Autobiography, which so many of us read with very special interest. Apart from this work, Mr. Arnold made no very important contribution to literature, though he did a good deal of excellent editing and bookmaking. The most popular of his publications, I take it, were his Manual of English Literature (1862), his Short History of English Literature (1870), his English Poetry and Prose (1882), and his Selections from Addison and Pope (1866 and 1876). The Manual of English Literature reached its seventh edition in 1897. To the last-named one belongs his Sacrifice of the Altar, while his Notes on "Beowulf" (which he edited and translated in 1876) appeared in 1898.

The world is threatened with another Tennyson Birthday Book. It already possesses at least three of English manufacture. First came, in 1877, the Tennyson Birthday Book, edited, curiously enough, by a lady of the name of Shakespear. Of this there were new editions in 1879 and 1885. Then, last year, an Edinburgh firm sent out a volume entitled Birthday Chimes from Tennyson; while this year we have received from Mr. J. R. Tutin a Tennyson Birthday Record on the good old plan. One would have thought that the two last would have met the popular demand for some time to come.

It is said that the executors of Mr. Ruskin propose to publish two volumes of his letters, to range with Arrows of the Chase, which, it will be remembered, came out in 1880, and have not, I think, been reprinted. The Arrows, however, were only letters which had been already published in the newspapers; and I assume that the forthcoming volumes will consist of private correspondence. If not, they will be a disappointment.

THE BOOKWORM.

Reviews.

Huxley.

Life and Letters of Thomas Henry Huxley. By his Son, Leonard Huxley. 2 vols. Macmillan & Co. 30s.)

IN August, 1892, at the age of sixty-seven, Huxley was summoned to Osborne to take the oath as Privy Councillor. Passing the Victory he recalled how, six-and-forty years before, he had clambered up her side to report himself on appointment "as a poor devil of an assistant surgeon." Between those dates, 1846 and 1892, what things had happened! From a poor struggling youth, from a writer whose name was anathema in every "average respectable household," he had become one of the most distinguished men of the day, honoured at the Universities, welcomed at Court. He had seen, and to him it was somewhat due, Freedom of Thought no longer generally regarded with horror as an attribute of the Devil's, but as the rightful inheritance of every honest man. He had lived through, and done splendid service in, the world-awakening that the Origin of Species heralded; he could remember the time when his friends advised him not to publish Man's Place in Nature, because such a book would surely ruin its author's prospects; he could look back on a hundred victories in the cause of that Truth whose pursuit was the aim and end of his life—victories won through passes that were never chosen because the way through them looked easy, but because through them the path to the goal led. And now—what were his thoughts? What were his thoughts as he crossed the Solent to receive at the hands of his Sovereign that high honour? Fine thoughts we may be sure. Vanity, theatricality, had no part in his life. Something akin, no doubt, to the thoughts expressed in a letter written earlier that year: "I have always been, am, and propose to remain, a mere scholar. All that I have ever proposed to myself is to say: This and this have I learned; thus and thus have I learned it: go then and learn better." He knew his own mind. He knew exactly what he meant to do in life, and he did it, looking straight before him, unswayed by motives, uninfluenced by self-constituted authorities. If he devoted much of his energy to backwoodsman's work that was because he believed that work called to be done first, and doing it he cleared the brains and stirred the souls of tens of thousands of his countrymen.

Of these two volumes of his "Life and Letters," which have been edited with intelligence and filial conscientiousness by his son, Mr. Leonard Huxley, we have to say that they suffer from the fault common to most modern biographies: they are too long; there is too much in them. This does not apply to the independent, good, impersonal writing from Mr. Leonard Huxley's own pen, but to many of the letters. A third might have been left out, and still there would have remained a Velasquez-Sargent picture of Huxley. His services to science apart—and scientific men will tell you that they meet his hand at every turn—a life so strenuous, so intellectually honest, so progressive in the best sense, is a beacon to all and sundry.

Nothing fell into his life unstriven for. He struggled, and what he gained was his by right of conquest. Health was not even on his side; headache and dyspepsia pursued him. In the late fifties we find such entries in his diary as: "Headache! headache! Used up. Hypochondriacal and bedevilled! Not good for much! Toothache, incapable all day! Voiceless! Missed lecture! Unable to go out!" Yet through it he persevered, never losing faith in himself:

I do not think that I am in the proper sense of the word ambitious. I have an enormous longing after the highest and best in all shapes—a longing which haunts me and is the demon which ever impels me to work, and will let me have no rest unless I am doing his behests. The honours of men I value so far as they are evidences of power, but with the cynical mistrust of their judgment and my own worthiness, which always haunts me, I put very little faith in them. Their praise makes me sorer inwardly. God forgive me if I do them any great wrong.

Or in his aim in life, which he thus describes:

To smite all humbugs, however big; to give a nobler tone to science; to set an example of abstinence from petty personal controversies, and of toleration for everything but lying; to be indifferent as to whether the work is recognised as mine or not, so long as it is done.

Apart altogether from his writings, the mere titles of which fill several pages of the Appendix to Volume II., his public career would have satisfied any ordinary man. He sat on ten Commissions; for ten years he was Secretary to the Royal Society, and, later, President; he was a member of the first London School Board; Inspector of Fisheries; and, in addition to all this, there were his professional duties at South Kensington and Jermyn-street. And this list by no means exhausts the official calls upon his time and energy. Small wonder that before the age of fifty he broke down, and was obliged to take a long rest. Many years of work were still before him; but it was frequently interrupted by ill-health, till the year 1871, when the warnings could be no longer disregarded, and he was obliged to resign one by one his public appointments. "I am continually in a blue funk," he writes, "and hate the thought of any work—especially of scientific, or anything requiring prolonged attention. . . . I am afraid of everything that involves responsibility to a degree that is simply ridiculous."

His "official death" was followed by an attempt to regain his health at Filey and at Bournemouth; and his health was certainly mending when he received a "fillip which started him again into vigorous activity." This was the first of Mr. Gladstone's articles in the Nineteenth Century, in which that versatile statesman attempted to show that the order of creation given in Genesis I. is supported by the evidence of science. The gladiatorial fight that followed, extending over many years, is still fresh in everybody's mind. Huxley threw himself heart and soul into the controversy, and hard as his hitting was, the original draft of his articles was sometimes stronger. One of the articles was returned by Mr. Knowles as "rather too pungent in tone." It was toned down by Huxley with this comment:

I spent three mortal hours this morning taming my wild cat. He is now castrated; his teeth are filed; his claws are cut; he is taught to swear like a "mien"; and to spit like a cough; and when he is turned out of the bag you won't know him from a tame rabbit.

Huxley was no kid-glove fighter. He did not spare himself; he did not spare his enemies; and he gloried in the fight, as all strong natures, with strong views, must. He was not of those who turn the other cheek: when he was hit he hit back, and casuistry, emotional rhetoric, and shuffling he smote hip and thigh. When he felt scorn, he showed his scorn. He was very human; when he thought he was right, he had small sympathy for the views of the other side; he lacked Darwin's gentle courtesy, but his militancy was always in defence of straightforward and honest thinking. The wild-cat element was strong in him, and though on occasion he pared the creature's nails, they always grew again. He was not a Francis of Assisi, but a man whose aim in life was to understand life, its woof and warp and intention, to think and see clearly, and to whip hypocrisy. "Everything which entered his brain by eye or ear," said Prof. Romanes, "came out clarified, sifted, arranged, and verified by its passage through the logical machine of his strong individuality."

He held strong views, he spoke them; and the hearer he liked was the gritty, hard-headed working man, with no illusions, but with plenty of fundamental brain power. "I am sick of the dilettante middle class, and mean to try what I can do with hard-handed fellows who live among facts. . . . I believe in the fustian, and can talk better to it than to any amount of gauze and Saxony." Gladstone, "in the affairs which I do understand," is nothing but "a copious shuffler"; Henry George's Progress and Poverty "is more dammed nonsense than poor Rousseau's blather"; "read Butler, and see to what drivell even his great mind descends when he has to talk about the immortality of the soul"; "I grieve to say that my estimation of Balfour as a thinker sinks lower and lower the further I go." He had wit, too. Note this delightful comment on Dean Stanley's "historical impressionability":

Stanley could believe in anything of which he had seen the supposed site, but was sceptical where he had not seen. At a breakfast at Monckton Milnes's, just at the time of the Colenso row, Milnes asked me my views on the Pentateuch, and I gave them. Stanley differed from me. The account of Creation in Genesis he dismissed at once as unhistorical; but the call of Abraham, and the historical narrative of the Pentateuch, he accepted. This was because he had seen Palestine—but he wasn't present at the Creation.

In his private letters he checked neither his humour nor his scorn, but beneath them ran, undammed, the river of an "underlying tenderness veiled beneath inflexible determination for what was right." To his family, as to the world, it was the same. "We felt," says his son, "our little hypocrisies shrivel up before him; we felt a confidence in the infallible rectitude of his moral judgments which inspired a kind of awe. His arbitration was instant and final, though rarely invoked."

It was Cowley who said: "Reason cannot through Faith's mysteries see." True! Huxley elected—indeed, he was forced by temperament and the calls of his intellect—to guide his life, and to view the world, by the light of reason only. The majority are granted the joy of faith; and through that faith gain a blessed happiness that was probably denied to him. He had nothing to say against them. He could not see things as they saw them, that was all. Mystery surrounded him; he was profoundly and reverently conscious of that, but to his mind there was no way of withdrawing even a corner of the veil save by patient study of the laws of nature. Hidden were Nature's laws; and there was no better way of spending one's time than in attempting to discover a few of those laws. He was no enemy of sincere, honest belief in others: what he hated was false emotional thought, conclusions based on no evidence, and casuistical shuffling. A good man—good in the real sense of the word—even though orthodox, called to the deep in him. Such a man was Charles Kingsley; and we wish we had space to quote in full the letter of over five pages, addressed to Charles Kingsley by Huxley, that begins on page 217 of the first volume. Huxley believed in God, his own God, not the self-appointed God of one of the countless religious bodies. Browning believed that "all's love, yet all's law." Huxley said "All's law," and there stopped. Love, like everything else, comes from knowing the law and following it. Heaven and Hell are here in this world. We and others are blessed by our good acts; we and others are cursed by our bad acts—here. The Law behind the Veil, if careless of the single life, careless even of the type, plays no tricks. It makes us pay its own terrible price; and the price, to our finite intelligences, seems often awfully out of proportion to the offence. A few weeks ago a party of cyclists were riding down Barnet Hill. One of them fell, and died within a few days from his injuries. His offence was foolishly riding too fast down a hill, and his companions were committing the same offence. "All's love, yet all's law," said Browning.

Said Huxley: "I am no optimist, but I have the firmest belief that the Divine Government (if we may use such a phrase to express the sum of the 'customs of matter') is wholly just."

Science seems to me to teach in the highest and strongest manner the great truth which is embodied in the Christian conception of entire surrender to the will of God. Sit down before facts as a little child, be prepared to give up every preconceived notion, follow humbly wherever and to whatever abysses nature leads, or you shall learn nothing. I have only begun to learn content and peace of mind since I have resolved at all risks to do this.

Again:

The more I know intimately of the lives of other men (to say nothing of my own) the more obvious it is to me that the wicked does not flourish nor is the righteous punished. But for this to be clear we must bear in mind what almost all forget, that the rewards of life are contingent upon obedience to the whole law—physical as well as moral—and that moral obedience will not atone for physical sin, or vice versa.

And this is the man who was called infidel and atheist. "I have a great respect for the Nazarenism of Jesus," he once wrote to Romanes—"very little for later 'Christianity.' But the only religion that appeals to me is prophetic Judaism. It may be well to remember that the highest level of moral aspiration recorded in history was reached by a few ancient Jews—Micah, Isaiah, and the rest—who took no count whatever of what might or might not happen to them after death." Indeed, Huxley once promised himself that he would make a cento "out of the works of these people," adding to it something from the best Stoics and something from Spinoza and something from Goethe. "There is a religion for all men."

Huxley chose his own epitaph—three lines from a poem written by his wife. The lines are:

Be not afraid, ye waiting hearts that weep;
For still He giveth His beloved sleep,
And if an endless sleep He wills, so best.

This epitaph might be supplemented by another, the epitaph he himself composed for Henslow: "He had intellect to comprehend his highest duty distinctly, and force of character to do it." That was Huxley.

"Ghosts" Mitigated.

The Coming of Peace (A Family Catastrophe): a Play in Three Acts. By Gerhart Hauptmann. Translated by Janet Achurch and C. E. Wheeler, with a Preface by Janet Achurch. (Duckworth & Co. 3s. 6d. net)

Friedenfest is one of Hauptmann's earlier plays, and, though it exhibits throughout a very fine technique—the author was only twenty-seven when he finished it—the piece runs a little stiffly and has none of that large, free movement which characterises, for instance, Die Versunkene Glocke. On the other hand, it is neither vague nor loose; its meaning is precisely defined. The Coming of Peace (the translators would have been better advised to retain the original title—The Festival of Peace) recalls in some measure, as Miss Achurch points out, Ibsen's Ghosts. It is a milder, less repulsive, and less vindictive version of Ghosts. It deals with the middle-class family of Scholz: Dr. Fritz Scholz, aged nearly seventy; his wife, twenty years younger; and three children—Augusta, Robert and William—all nearing the thirties. Old Scholz was an atrocious martinet when his children were young; hatred sprang up between them; the boys left home—Robert to become a hack writer, William to pursue the art of music. The father also left; apparently he could not tolerate his wife and daughter, despite the fact that he chiefly had made them what they were. For six years mother and daughter lived together, a nagging, whining, unattractive pair. The whole family was morose, dark, brooding, soured. In the children these traits had been intensified by the paternal training. Once William had struck his father for vilifying his mother. We are introduced to the Scholz House on Christmas Eve, and on that night another and brighter element has been brought into it—Mrs. Buchner and her young daughter Ida, both of them kindly, good-humoured and genuine; Ida is engaged to William. All the Scholz men come home, and there is a reconciliation under the fostering influence of the Buchners: a lame reconciliation, yet sincerely meant and costing a frightful effort. The entire play is occupied with this reconciliation and the immediately following outbreak of Scholz bad-temper and the death of the aged Doctor. The scene between the father and the son who had once struck him is simply heartrending. Everyone is astounded that the old man should have gone so far to meet his child. The following passage is the key to the whole action:

WILLIAM: A good deal is beginning to dawn on me.

ROBERT: With my brain and so on, you know, I have grasped it long enough. Everything that happened had to be; I never held father responsible—at least I haven't for years. Certainly not for me—not for any of us. But to-day I have really felt it; and that, you know, is quite another thing. Frankly, it's taken me right off my balance. When I saw him so—so anxious over you, it was like a blow to me; and now I shall always be thinking: That was there, living, in us. Why on earth didn't it show itself before? In father—in you—and, by God! in me too. It was there in us! And he has been stifling it in himself—father, I mean—yes, and we too, for years and years.

WILLIAM: I see one thing: we not only show a different self to every one of our fellow-creatures, but we are fundamentally different to each.

ROBERT: But must it be so with us? Why must we forever keep each other at such a distance?

WILLIAM: I'll tell you why; because we have no natural goodness of heart. Take Ida for instance: what you have got at by hard thinking is natural to her. She never sits in judgment, she treats everything so gently, with such sympathy, and that spares people so much—you understand—and I believe it is that—.

Hauptmann has certainly made an impressive if gloomy spectacle of the fitful better impulses of these people struggling against the sinister characteristics of the Scholz blood. Seemingly they conquer, and then in a moment the battle is lost. As regards William, however, we are allowed to believe that, helped by Ida, he will win the struggle against the Scholz in himself. The Coming of Peace is a serious contribution to dramatic literature; the force of a profound moral animates it, and the author is absolutely fearless in his aim to be true. At present the play would have no chance on the regular English stage. It would be called lugubrious. It is lugubrious, and so are many fine things. We are sometimes so.

The translation is satisfactory.

Greek Minstrelsy.

Songs of Modern Greece. With Introductions, Translations and Notes. By G. F. Abbott, B.A. (Pitt Press.)

In gathering his aftermath Mr. Abbott has endeavoured to supplement rather than repeat the choice already made by other collectors "in Western Europe." He mentions the German book of Passow and the French book of Fauriel, and we suppose, though he does not name it, that he has also avoided the contents of the "Greek Folk Poesy," published with, if we remember right, some valuable folk-lore disquisitions from the pen of Mr. Stuart Glennie, by Miss Lucy Garnett some four years ago. The new collection is the more valuable to scholars, while doubtless it loses in sheer literary attractiveness, for this abstention. These Greek songs are particularly interesting to the student of origins, because they preserve the folk-song types which lie, probably everywhere, at the back of the literary development of European poetry. Thus Mr. Abbott gives examples of the heroic lay in its two forms of choric ronde or carole and minstrel ballad. The former are sung by men and women dancing in a ring at weddings and similar festivals. They hold hands, and after each line or two lines chanted by the leader the rest of the company chime in with a burden. The latter are delivered in monotonous recitative to the accompaniment of a simple lyre by an itinerant rhapsode. Behold the germs, here of epic, there of lyric poesy. Mr. Abbott describes one of these minstrels, Barba Sterios of Thessalonica. Like another, he was old and blind:

Every afternoon he might be seen sitting cross-legged by the road-side, under the shadow of the old Venetian walls, forming the centre of a ring of admiring listeners whom the shrill strains of his lyre drew from far and near. Alas! poor Barba Sterios would have cut but an indifferent figure by the side of the stately Ion. His only platform was mother earth: instead of a richly embroidered dress he was modestly clad in a homespun coarse shirt developing into a kind of kilt below his belt; a blue tunic open in front surmounted this under-garment and allowed its broad flowing sleeves to bulge out in the evening breeze. Again, his head was not encircled with a golden wreath, but with a humble turban hanging loose over his right ear—not a gorgeous but, on the whole, a picturesque figure enough.

The heroic songs of either type belong to the Greeks of the mountains, the hardy shepherds of the war of Independence. Though in all probability absolutely similar in character to the songs of the name and fame of the Thessalian Achilles which Homer worked up into the Iliad, they deal mainly with modern themes. They celebrate the events of that war, such as the siege of Mesolonghi, and the feats of Klephts and Armatoloi, illustrious in the days of the Turkish domination. The subject-matter, but not the form, dear to the Greeks of the islands and the sea-coast towns is different. Here epic gives way to Romance. The note is most often that of love, idyllic and a thought pagan. These are the poems quoted by Mr. Lang to justify Theocritus, "so ardent, so delicate, so full of flowers and birds and the music of the fountain." Unfortunately we are hampered in illustrating these qualities by the fact that Mr. Abbott, though the industry and learning which he has spent on the collection and explanation of his examples is beyond praise, is not a translator. His versions are wooden. The fragrance is gone. The musical soft vowels, gayer and sweeter than those of any Italian ritornel, do not echo in his ear. Does the dainty intention laugh a little through the following?

THE WOMAN OF CHIOS.

Down on the sea-shore: down on the beach,

CHORUS: Down on the sea-shore a little woman,
A little blooming orange-tree.

Are women of Chios, priests' daughters, washing (linen),

CHORUS: A little woman of Chios is washing (linen),
A little blooming lemon-tree.

A little woman of Chios, a priest's little daughter,

CHORUS: A tiny little woman of Chios,
A little blooming orange-tree.

She is washing (linen), and spreading it, and playing with the sand,

CHORUS: She is washing (linen) and spreading it,
A little blooming lemon-tree.

A gilded, well-rigged-out vessel sails by,

CHORUS: A vessel sails by, little one,
Little blooming orange-tree.

It gleamed and its oars gleamed,

CHORUS: It gleamed, little one,
Little blooming lemon-tree.

The North wind blew, a strong northern gale,

CHORUS: The North wind blew, little one,
Little blooming orange-tree.

And lifted up her long skirt,
CHORUS: And lifted up little one,
Little blooming lemon-tree.

And the ankle of her foot came to sight,
CHORUS: And came to sight, little one,
Little blooming orange-tree.

And the sea-shore gleamed, and the universe gleamed,
CHORUS: And the sea-shore gleamed, little one,
Little blooming lemon-tree.

So, had she not been a princess, and with the dignity of her house in reserve, might the saucy maids of Phaeacia have chaffed Nausicaa.

Mr. Abbott gives the folk-lorist much matter to perpend, particularly a "swallow-song" sung by quêteurs, who carry round a wooden swallow on the feast of the Worship of the Cross in the third week of Lent to bring good luck to the houses since spring has come. Such a "swallow-song" Athenaeus mentions as used in Rhodes. But in Athenaeus' day it was probably the literal first swallow of the year that was carried, having been caught and sacrificed as soon as seen.

St. Kilda.

St. Kilda. By Norman Heathcote. (Longmans. Net 10s. 6d.)

THE little islet of the West, "set far amid the melancholy main," has always possessed a poetical and unique interest. During nine months of the year it is unapproachable by reason of the Atlantic storms, when, says the resident minister, "spray is carried over the highest cliffs, and masses of green water pour over rocks 300 feet in height." Dr. Johnson once vowed he would spend a winter on it. "We shall have fine fish, and we shall take some dried tongues with us and some books"; but neither he nor any other writer has realised that day dream. Nine months' confinement on an island ten miles in circumference, with no company save that of the simple, unlettered natives; no means of communication except that of launching a message on the sea to take its chance of wind and wave, has cooled the enthusiasm of the most ardent lover of storms and solitude. Mr. Heathcote has pursued the next best alternative by spending as much of the summer as was available there, and he has set down the results in a modest and charming volume. The spot is so little that he was able to do the work thoroughly, and the book yields a curious sense of completeness as though it cannot possibly leave anything more of importance to be told of St. Kilda. In a measure, this is due to the author's many-sided sympathies. He declares himself no naturalist, yet the ornithology of the island must have attracted him if we are to judge from the interesting and satisfactory chapter devoted to it. True, the subject could not have been very difficult to master, since there are very few land birds, such as the starling and the hooded crow, and only a round score or so of sea birds; but it is highly interesting to read of the primitive methods by which fulmars (whose flight is finely described) and gannets are captured, while the descriptions of various sea-gulls, scart, puffin, and guillemot, deepen the lines of the picture, and deepen one's impression of rock and breaking wave and clamouring bird.

The topography of the island has not before been studied so thoroughly. Martin, its first historian, gave a map, but appears to have drawn upon his imagination for its details, so that the results of Mr. Heathcote's careful survey are doubly welcome. He has taken a greater liking to the people than did some of his predecessors, and writes of them in optimistic terms: "They are better counsel and better fed than any other people in their rank of life," and "they have no worries." Happy St. Kildans! He is afraid, however, that their unsophisticated nature will in the future be contaminated by tourists. One hopes it will not be so; but Mr. Heathcote has done something to bring about the result he deprecates by the excellence of this book.

We must conclude our notice with a word of criticism. The volume generally deserves unstinted praise. It is modelled on Mr. Kearton's With Nature and a Camera; and if the photographic illustrations are not quite equal, more than due amends is made by the excellence of the drawings, of which, in our opinion, the frontispiece and "Boating in St. Kilda" are the best. Also, the pictures are not only good in themselves, but they really do illustrate the text. The one fault we have to find with Mr. Heathcote is one of style; he writes simply and without rhetoric—that has to be recorded in his praise; but for the sake of the English language it were desirable that he should distinguish between simplicity and bald colloquialism. A book of this kind should undoubtedly be as lucid, direct, and simple in its language as is possible; but surely that result may be achieved without the incorporation of expressions that are almost, if not absolutely, slangy in character. To show what we mean, here are a few passages out of very many with the phrases italicised: "I had long wanted to bring off this expedition," p. 5; "The horse began to kick, the driver laid into him," p. 71; "someone collared the pennies," p. 85. A very good writer might occasionally employ any of these phrases without offence; but when the style is homely, hoddenn grey almost, they produce an effect of commonness.

"Some of the Best Fighting in Literature."

The Story of Burnt Njal. By Sir George Webbe Dasent, D.C.L. (Grant Richards. 6s.)

THIS book was published some forty years ago in two imposing volumes, with notes, appendices, introduction, and maps. It passed as a scientific work, and therefore remained unread of the multitude. Now, after the death of its author, it is republished under the editorship of Mr. E. V. Lucas, in a single attractive volume, with the hope that it may appeal to its proper second public of boys, young and old. That is its true mission. For it is before all things a stirring story, full of brave battle and the elementary directness of quick and stirring life. "Some of the best fighting in literature is to be found between its covers," says Mr. Lucas. And it is true. The thing is a Saga—that is to say, it is a narrative of actual events handed down by word of mouth, and no more embellished than is inevitable in such a process. It is at once a record of facts, a living picture of everyday life in those distant ages (before King Canute the Dane conquered England), and withal an engrossing tale, as full of appeal to the imagination as any contrived romance of the present day. One feels the breath of truth in its inartificiality. It is through the sheer interest of the events that it comes right and holds the reader; there is no attempt at artistic plot and heightening of the situation. Skarpheddin, instead of dying as a conventional hero should amid a pile of his slaughtered enemies, is burned like a rat in straw, unable to lift a hand, for all his past exploits. The finding of his body bears the stamp of eye-witness:

He had stood up hard by the gable-wall, and his legs were burnt off him right up to the knees, but all the rest of him was unburnt. He had bitten through his under lip; his eyes were wide open, and not swollen nor starting out of his head; he had driven his axe into the gable-wall so hard that it had gone in up to the middle of the blade, and that was why it was not softened. . . . Then he was stripped of his clothes, for they were unburnt; he had laid his hands in a cross, and the right hand uppermost. They found marks on him; one between his shoulders and the other on his chest, and both were brauded in the shape of a cross; and men thought that he must have burnt them in himself. All men said that they thought that it was better to be near Skarpheddin dead than they weened, for no man was afraid of him.

These minutiae have no trick of fancy. So, again, great hero though he be, he is represented as an ugly man, with very plain detail. Of the Homeric single-combats, which clang through the book in heart-rousing manner, take the onslaught of Skarpheddin on Thrain, across the half-frozen Markflett:

A great sheet of ice had been thrown up by the flood on the other side of the Fleet as smooth and slippery as glass, and there Thrain and his men stood in the midst of the sheet. Skarpheddin takes a spring into the air, and leaps over the stream between the icebanks, and does not check his course, but rushes still onward with a slide. The sheet of ice was very slippery, and so he went as fast as a bird flies. Thrain was just about to put his helm on his head; and now Skarpheddin bore down on them, and hews at Thrain with his axe, "the ogress of war," and smote him on the head, and clove him down to the teeth, so that his jaw-teeth fell out on the ice. The feat was done with such a quick sleight, that no one could get a blow at him; he glided away from them at once at full speed. Tjorvi, indeed, threw his shield before him on the ice, but he leapt over it and still kept his feet, and slid quite to the end of the sheet of ice.

Or take the sword-play of Kari against odds:

Against Kari came Mord Sigfus' son and Sigmund and Lambi Sigurd's son; the last ran behind Kari's back and thrust at him with a spear; Kari caught sight of him and leapt up as the blow fell, and stretched his legs far apart, and so the blow spent itself on the ground, but Kari jumped down on the spear-shaft and snapped it in sunder. He had a spear in one hand and a sword in the other, but no shield. He thrust with the right hand at Sigmund and smote him on his breast, and the spear came out between his shoulders, and down he fell and was dead at once. With his left hand he made a cut at Mord and smote him on the hip, and cut it asunder and his back-bone too; he fell flat on his face, and was dead at once.

Yet in this book running blood the hero is the wise and peaceful Njal. Even to these men the chief thing, after all, was the sage and gentle heart.

The City of Flowers.

Florence. By Edmund G. Gardner. (Dent. 4s. 6d. net.)

READERS familiar with Mr. Edmund G. Gardner's Dante's Ten Heavens, and his more recent Dante primer, will be prepared for the quiet and lucid English of the present dainty volume, and for the skill with which the author sifts from an enormous mass of material the essential and most suggestive facts. But it is necessary to read this book to learn how easily the author moves about in the crowded and perplexing thoroughfares and byways of mediæval art and letters. So perfect an example of intelligent compression is the chapter dealing with the Medici and the Quattro Cento, that we hope, as soon as he has done with the promised volume on Dante's lyrical poems, he will write the history of Italy, which il lungo studio e il grande amore have peculiarly fitted him for. At the least, we trust that when the "Mediæval Town" series is complete he will write a general introduction to the Italian section. Such a volume need not be larger than the present one, and should enable the reader to correct the impressions given by the study of isolated phenomena, and help him some little towards the answering of the question which Prof. Villari puts, but does not answer, in his Machiavelli, "How is it that Italy became so weak, so corrupt, so decayed in the midst of her intellectual and artistic pre-eminence?"

With such a question Mr. Gardner has, of course, no concern here: his task was to write a popular history which could be used as a guide-book to the streets, buildings, and artistic treasures of Florence.

The history naturally falls into four periods: the first extends from the death of Countess Matilda in 1115 to the birth of Dante, 1265, during which time "the most triumphant Republic of the Middle Ages was organised—the Constitution under which the most glorious culture and art of the modern world was to flourish. The great Guilds were henceforth a power in the State and the Secondo Popolo had arisen—the Democracy that Dante and Boccaccio were to know."

The century from the birth of Dante to the deaths of Petrarch and Boccaccio in 1374 and 1375 spans the second period, two or three events of which only can be mentioned here: the battle of Campaldino in 1289, when the Ghibellines and their allies were utterly defeated. According to Leonardo Bruni, Dante fought in this battle, and may have taken part in the subsequent harrying of the Aretines and the capture of Caproni.

"At evening the nightingales are loud around the spot" (the site of Campaldino in the Casentino); "but their song is less great than the ineffable stanzas in the fifth canto of the Purgatorio, in which Dante has raised an imperishable monument to the young Ghibelline warrior" (Buonconte da Montefeltro): The quarrels between the Bianchi and Neri, which resulted in the expulsion of the former in 1302, among whom was Dante, an exile henceforth until his death in 1321 at Ravenna: and The awful plague of 1348, which swept over Europe, robbed Florence of more than half her population. The great names in painting, architecture and sculpture during this time are Giotto, who died in 1326; Cimabue; Arnolfo, of whom Symonds wrote that "no Italian architect has enjoyed the proud privilege of stamping his own individuality more strongly on his native city"; Andrea Pisano, Orcagna, and Francesco Talenti. In literature, in addition to the three great names already mentioned, there are Guido Cavalcante, Dino Compagni, Villani, and Franco Sacchetti, politician, novelist, and poet, who, says the author, "may be taken as the last Florentine writer of the period."

After this second or heroic period comes the era of the Medici; then the preaching and death of Savonarolo—closing the Middle Ages; and, finally, the Renaissance passes with the death in 1564 of Michelangelo—"Michel, più che mortale, Angel divino."

The book is beautifully and fully illustrated, and the second part describes in detail the buildings, paintings, streets, and bridges; the whole concluding with an interesting account of the country round about Florence, with special reference to the Casentino so intimately associated with the life of Dante during his exile.

But more famous than its castles, or even its Dantesque memories, the Casentino is hallowed by its noble sanctuaries of Vallambrosa, Camaldoli, La Verna . . . La Verna hallowed with memories of Savonarola and the Piagnoni, and still a place of devout pilgrimage to Our Lady of the Rock . . . Here the Middle Ages still reign a living reality, in the noblest aspect with the poverelli of the Seraphic Father; and the mystical light, that shone out on the day of the stigmata still burns: "while the eternal ages watch and wait."

"I HAVE a great love and respect for my native tongue, and take great pains to use it properly. Sometimes I write essays half-a-dozen times before I can get them into the proper shape; and I believe I become more fastidious as I grow older."—HUXLEY.

Other New Books.

THE BYSTANDER.

By J. ASHBY-STERRY.

Mr. Ashby-Sterry's weekly article in the Graphic under the above title is as well known as anything in journalism, and one opens this book with an idea that it is a collection or quintessence of the familiar column. But it is not; there is no reprinting. The vein, nevertheless, is the same; and how shall we describe that? It is the vein of the leisured bachelor who lives in the heart of London, has long lived there, has his club and friends at hand, and is not so bound to routine that he cannot give up a morning to the spring sunshine, or to an antiquarian whim. The man who will prove that he has leisure, that he is not competing with his readers for bread, and that he has time and inclination to note the little graces and accidents of daily life, is sure of an audience. Mr. Ashby-Sterry may have hustled as hard as most of us in his time; but in his Graphic column, and in these pages, he has a "What-shall-I-do-this-morning?" air which is very alluring to Londoners who know to a nicety what they must do this morning. And, this said, all is said. It seems hardly necessary even to name Mr. Ashby-Sterry's subjects. The free sights of London, ingeniously intertwined with the memory of Mr. Jonas Chuzzlewit, is one of them; and if a plea for late rising were not another, we should feel bound to begin our inspection again in fear that we had diagnosed the book amiss. But there it is—"Before Breakfast." Likewise, we look for, and find, such a piece of harmless May-morning sentiment as "Unknown Friends," and find it written round the figure of Tollamore Turleywane, oft encountered in Bond-street. Add to his observation and his sentiment a turn for small Utopian suggestions and you have Mr. Ashby-Sterry's gifts in full view. He would like to see—that is to say, while he is writing it—a Bayard Society whose badged brethren were pledged to assist all strangers and feeble folk in the streets of London with information about buildings and cab fares. He would like to see City men live over their shops again, or at least nearer to their shops, being momentarily concerned for their railway nerves. He has a friend who says, "Quite well, thank you!" the moment he shakes hands, not putting you to the tedium of insincere inquiry, and so: "What a deal of trouble would be saved if people were to walk about with inscriptions round their hats!" &c., &c. It looks trivial, and it is trivial; but Mr. Ashby-Sterry does it all in such an engaging, self-possessed way, and with so much kindness and anecdote, that you cannot help liking his book immensely. (Sands. 6s.)

THE TALE OF A FIELD
HOSPITAL.

By FREDERICK TREVES.

"This is a bad business." "Yes, but we took the bally trench." Mr. Treves was the first speaker, and a British private, crippled for life by a Mauser, was the second; and the story occurs in Mr. Treves's chapter called "The Fighting Spirit." It is the fighting spirit that emerges in highest interest from the sombre and often painful pages of this little record.

We need not refer here to a recent controversy; as Mr. Treves says, "war, as viewed from the standpoint of a field hospital, is anything but cheery." Nor does Mr. Treves spare us on occasion the horrors of fighting. The utterances of wounded men who saw the fray again through the vapours of chloroform were often terrible in their suggestion. One poor fellow was evidently haunted by the spectre of a certain fight. "His fragmentary utterances made vivid the unearthly land he was traversing. All who stood by could picture the ghostly kopje, and could almost share in his anguish when he yelled: 'There they are on the hill! For God's sake, shoot! Why don't we shoot?'" The book is full of things rightly seen and noted; and we are minded to give the touching "thing seen" with which the book ends abruptly. It is the record of a soldier's end—unhalo'd and unassuaged.

I remember at Chieveley one morning before breakfast watching a solitary man approach the hospital lines. . . . He dragged his rifle along with him; his belt was gone; his helmet was poised at the back of his head; his frowzy tunic was thrown over his shoulders; he was literally black with flies. His clothes had not been off for many days, and he had missed the ambulance, he said, and had walked to the hospital.

How far he had come he could not tell, nor could anyone gather how he had fared or where he had slept. All that was evident was that he was wet with dew and had spent the night in the open. He knew that for vague hours he had been making his way, with ever faltering steps and failing eyes, towards the red cross flag on the crest of the hill. And now he had reached it. As to why he had come: "Well! he had a touch of the dysentery," he said, "and was about played out."

Poor lad! this was a sorry home-coming at the last. A squalid ending of a march; staggering in alone, a shuffling wreck, without a single comrade, with no fife and drums, no cheering crowd, and no proud adoration of mother or wife. He was helped to a bell-tent and put to bed on a stretcher, and on the stretcher he died.

Mr. Treves has secured a series of perfect photographs, and his little volume has the luck to isolate itself in one's memory. (Cassell. 6s.)

TURKEY IN EUROPE.

By ODYSSEUS.

We must confess that we distrust books on current politics written under a pseudonym, for we always suspect that the affectation of mystery lends more weight to the volume than the author's real name would supply. However, in the present case, Mr. Edward Arnold assures us that the writer of Turkey in Europe is a man who would be at once recognised as a great authority on the Eastern Question. And, indeed, "Odysseus" has produced a very useful book, and has compiled within his four hundred and fifty pages a summary of the history and present state of the Balkan Peninsula which will be of the greatest value to those who have not time to read longer histories, or to visit the countries for themselves. His book opens with a couple of chapters comprising a brief sketch of the country before and after the Turkish Conquest, and in succeeding chapters the Turks, the Greeks, the Bulgarians and Serbs, the Albanians and the Vlachs, are dealt with as well as the Armenians, who, though not a European people, are so intimately mixed up with what is known as the Eastern Question as to make their inclusion necessary. The two chapters on Mohammedanism and the Orthodox Church are also exceedingly well placed, and are vital to a proper understanding of the problems of the Balkan Peninsula. The author is by no means one of the dry-as-dust style of historian; occasionally he is humorous, and a vein of irony runs through his pages. Many readers will be glad to make the acquaintance of the classic Khoja Nasreddin Effendi, a species of Calino, who is the hero of a great number of comic Turkish stories. Here is a characteristic tale of the Khoja:

One hot night the Khoja slept on the verandah to be cool. He awoke, however, in a fright, and saw what he took to be a robber dressed in white, climbing over the garden wall. He seized his bow and at once sent an arrow straight through the imaginary burglar. . . . On calm examination, however, he found that the white object was one of his own nightshirts which his wife had washed and hung on the wall to dry. The Khoja accordingly began to call out "Praise be to God" and other religious exclamations, which awoke the neighbours, who mistook them for the morning call to prayer. Finding it still wanted several hours to sunrise, they surrounded the Khoja and indignantly inquired what he meant by his untimely piety. "I was thanking God," he replied, "that I was not inside my shirt when I shot an arrow through it."

"Odysseus" appears to have visited the greater part of the Balkan Peninsula, and to have studied the situation on the spot, but there are one or two points which we have noted that need revision. Servia can hardly be called a creation of the Treaty of Berlin, since Milosh Obrenovich was acknowledged hereditary Prince by the Sultan in 1830, though of course it was not until 1878 that the country ceased to be tributary to the Sultan. The Albanians are almost unknown to most Europeans, so that a few mistakes in dealing with them are perhaps excusable. In the matter of dress, "Odysseus" is wrong in saying that the fustanella is never worn by the Ghegs. It is the peculiar dress of the Mussulmans of the towns, especially Scodra, and the red baggy trousers embroidered with black braid, which he says are worn by "most of the Ghegs," are only the dress of the same Mussulmans in coldish weather. The Albanian League was not formed "about 1880," but early in April, 1878, and was not a national protest against the cession of Dulcigno to Montenegro, but against the proposed surrender of the Gussinje-Plava district among the mountains on the inland frontier. Moreover, the name of the Mirdite chief who was banished in January, 1881, was not Pip Prink Doda, but Prenk Bib Doda. He was a young man of no consequence, and would have been insignificant had it not been for his name and birth. But in general, "Odysseus" appears to be accurate as well as painstaking, and his book is undeniably the best résumé we possess of the modern phases of the Eastern Question. (Edward Arnold. 16s.)

THE OLD DRAMATISTS: CONJECTURAL
READINGS.

BY K. DEIGHTON.

Shakespearean scholars are pretty well agreed that, as far as the text of their poet is concerned, the term of conjectural emendation has been reached. The obvious corrections have long ago been made, and a spilt of ingenuity has added but few to the brilliant guesses of Theobald, whom the perverse intelligence of the eighteenth century rewarded for his work with a pillory of the Dunciad. A modern editor can make no better contribution to the purity of his text than by turning out the accepted emendation and restoring the reading of the First Folio or other old print in passage after passage. Consequently, as far as Shakespeare is concerned, Mr. Deighton comes rather late in the day, and, for all his industry and his considerable acquaintance with Elizabethan texts, we doubt whether any of his emendations are destined to rise higher than the footnotes of the "Cambridge Shakespeare." Like most of his fellowship, he appears to act on the conception that Shakespeare's text must be corrupt whenever it is not readily paraphrasable, and disregards the fact that during a considerable part of his career Shakespeare wrote English which, though rarely unintelligible in its main drift, often defies paraphrase. A sense of humour is a saving grace in an emendator. Mr. Deighton does not show a sense of humour when he proposes to convert

A fellow almost damned in a fair wife, into

A fellow almost damned in an alfares, and explains "alfares" as an Old Spanish or Moorish term from the Arabic alfiris, "ensign." The emendation that moves laughter is lost. Naturally, Mr. Deighton is more lucky in trying his hand on Ford, Shirley, and the miscellaneous plays collected by Dodsley and Hazlitt. For in these there is much correction of obvious misprints still to be done. It is amusing to find that Mr. Deighton prefaces his second series by cancelling, without comment, twenty-three of the proposed emendations contained in his first. (Thacker, Spink & Co.)

PIETRO VANNUCCI, CALLED
PERUGINO.

BY GEORGE C. WILLIAMSON.

This is Dr. Williamson's second contribution to the useful little series which he edits, and which has already distinctly made its mark. His treatment of Perugino is satisfactory within its very obvious limits. He is of the school of Morelli, a diligent student of technique, much occupied with periods and with questions of authenticity. The "Apollo and Marsyas" of the Louvre is not by Perugino, he will tell you, because, among other reasons, "the feet of the two figures are very Peruginesque, the open and upward curling great toe is clearly defined; but the hands have not the awkward, booby shape of his earlier work, nor the very thin, boneless appearance of his mature work." We do not wish to depreciate the value of this science, which, no doubt, is an element in the criticism of art; but it is not the whole nor the coping-stone of it; and he who desires to arrive at a final summing-up of the æsthetic value of Perugino's work will not find Dr. Williamson quite so discriminating or helpful as he could wish. On Perugino's strong point, indeed, the sense of space and atmospheric distance in his exquisite landscape backgrounds, he lays due stress, but hardly, we think, upon the qualities of weakness and prettiness which render him one of the least pleasing of the great masters. There is a corner in the Belle Arti at Florence from which you can bring into one view the large picture of the Assumption, and one very similar in general conception by Botticelli. The comparison is damning to the Umbrian; and the characteristics of that unfortunate altar-piece, the feeble sentimentality of gesture and pose, the figures not floating in the heavens but swung there as by wires, the invincible determination to soften every curve which spots the canvas with annoying circles—these, alas! pursue him from beginning to end of his career. It is the sensuous, unvirile art of a devotional manual. (Bell.)

CHINAMEN AT HOME.

BY THOS. G. SELBY.

The work of preaching the Gospel in China, quite apart from the chronic feeling of unrest that proceeds from the knowledge that in the midst of silence trouble is nigh at hand, must be the more interesting from the intellectual surprises that lie in wait for the missionary. "What you have been saying about the promise of the future is good," said a shrewd hearer to the missionary who had been expounding the parable of the Labourers in the Vineyard, "but a sensible workman always insists upon an advance of wage before he begins his task." A Chinaman asked whether Adam might not lawfully have eaten the forbidden fruit if he could have contrived it in successful secrecy. The claims of Jesus, according to another Chinaman, cannot be seriously discussed, wanting the eight natal characters of his horoscope. Here is a casus conscientie: "Is P'om-pom at liberty to keep in his store sham dollars with which to buy off the simple-minded burglar?" Here, on the other hand, is an example of what a Chinaman can do in the way of illustrating the sacred scripture—"Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God," was his text:

You say that it is hard to worship a God who cannot be seen, and that you have no inward evidence of His activity. A mirror, from the back of which all the quicksilver had dropped away, might as well complain that it could find no trace of the objects placed before it. Clean thoughts, clean affections, clean desires have the same function in human nature as the quicksilver at the back of the mirror. When the heart is filled once more with holy thoughts, the perfect image of God will again be seen there.

Mr. Selby was for twelve years a missionary in China, and his book, from which we have quoted rather at random, is wholly readable. (Hodder & Stoughton. 3s. 6d. net.)

Mr. Walter Jeffery's book, A Century of Our Sea Story (Murray, 6s.), is an attempt to tell in short space our naval story of 1800-1900. It follows that such events as the loss of the Eurydice, the historic escape of the Calliope, and the sinking of the Victoria are brought again before us. What is perhaps specially new is the author's collections concerning old sea ceremonies, etiquette, punishments, and the changes that have come over nautical speech within living memory. The book has a scope and a quality of its own, and we cordially commend it to our readers.

Fourteenth century town life in England emerges in a thousand details from the Great Gild Book of Beverley. This priceless document gives a code of the laws promulgated by the fathers of the town at the beginning of the fifteenth century, when Beverley was, and had long been, the cathedral centre of the most populous and wealthy of the Yorkshire Ridings. The substance of the Gild Book is now embodied in the Selden Society's fourteenth volume, entitled Beverley Town Documents (Quaritch).

No personal event in South Africa has affected the nation more than the death of General Wauchope. It was to be expected, and wished, that a record of this distinguished and hapless soldier should be written. Such a record—General Wauchope (Oliphant, 2s. 6d.)—has been written in the right compass by Mr. William Baird, who dedicates his book to the officers and men of the Highland Brigade who were at Magersfontein. Mr. Baird wisely refrains from an obvious controversy, leaving his record to tell its own tale.

A Life of Mrs. Booth, by Mr. W. T. Stead, will, of course, find readers. Mr. Stead's book, which is issued by Messrs. Nisbet, is of no great length, and it professes to be no more than a character-sketch. But a character-sketch by Mr. Stead is often a brilliant affair, and in any case the full and authoritative biography of Catherine Booth has already been written by Mr. Booth Tucker. Mr. Stead's point of view is by no means "Army"; rather he seeks to sketch for those outside the fold Mrs. Booth's influence in the making of modern England.

"There is a distinct demand for a simple book on horticulture—a book, for instance, such as a country gentleman who is anxious to encourage his tenants, and to interest them in their cottage gardens, could put into their hands." To meet this need, which we do not think is at all imaginary, Mr. F. C. Hayes has written A Handy Book of Horticulture (Murray, 2s. 6d. net). Mr. Hayes is Lecturer in Practical Horticulture in Alexandra College, Dublin; and his book, comely to look at, seems to us to be well arranged and free from over-loading.

Australasia, edited by Mr. William Showring, makes a timely appearance in Messrs. Kegan Paul's "British Empire" series. The papers comprised in the volume are mostly reprints of lectures delivered at the South-place Institute by travellers, governing officers, and others.

Now editions are many and handsome. To their "Library of English Classics" Messrs. Macmillan add the robust version of Don Quixote, made by Thomas Shelton in 1607, seven years before any translation was made on the continent. The facts of Shelton's life are obscure, but, as Mr. Pollard says, whatever his birth and behaviour (there is a shadow on his loyalty), he had a fine command of the English tongue.

Cervantes is also represented on our table by a neat two-volume reprint of his Exemplary Novels, in Malbe's translation, and with an introduction by Mr. S. W. Orson. Mr. Orson expresses some just surprise that these "novels," printed in 1613, and described by the censor of the day as "very honest pastime," have fallen into so much neglect, portraying, as they do, "human virtues and failings in almost every grade of life, from princesses to servant maids, and from dukes to muleteers." Messrs. Gibbings have in the past done excellent work in reprinting classics, and this presentation of the Exemplary Novels of Cervantes is entirely welcome.

Fiction.

The Mantle of Elijah. By I. Zangwill.
(Heinemann, 6s.)

WHATEVER Mr. Zangwill may be worth as an artist, it is clear that he is more than a temperament—he is a force. He exercises a gift noticeable in commanding spirits and parodied in mediocrities—the gift of range. He has the large interest in life detached from himself which has been the inspiration of all great, as distinguished from little, masters in fiction. His ego cheerily travels and is impressed by life. It is venturesome and industrious, therefore it does not starve for lack of subject matter, or feed upon itself. There is a kind of genius in being a Jew, but Mr. Zangwill discovered that the ghettos of the world were not enough for him. If not the ghettos, neither were the studios; and so at last we find him penetrating political laboratories.

Elijah is a prophet who preaches Peace and Economy in days which the younger generation vaguely imagine to have been extinguished under crinolines. In the olive-season Elijah became a Cabinet minister, and nursed an Elisha whose precocious taste in mantles awoke his patron's hopes of an appreciative heir to his own. But England emerged both from the crinoline and the glasshouse of 1851, and learned to "maffie" as well as traffic. Then Elijah's mantle went begging, for Elisha became an Imperialist. The tragi-irony of the book is both general and personal. The man who wished to see "the wen of India amputated" and "the spider spinning his web across the cannon's mouth" lived to see his own daughter—the sensitive and idealistic Allegra—suffer as the wife of a person who, when head of a great department of the State, fomented a war which Beaconsfield himself might have disavowed to excuse. And this person was Elisha!—a very respectable though incongruous Elisha, be it added, "car, en apparence toujours, il n'a rien sacrifié rien répudié, ni son nom, ni ses théories, ni 'sa surface' de radical," as M. Bérard says of another English politician.

Broser is Elisha's workaday name, and it is one that cleverly indicates the formidable tenacity, the expansive self-complacence, and innate coarseness of fibre which characterise him. He is to England what the Lyons of Unleavened Bread is to the United States. By cunningly describing himself in his election address as "a humble follower of Marshmont," the Elijah of Mr. Zangwill's story, he involved the latter in "opinions more iconoclastic than he had ever professed." Yet it was Marshmont's "translation" to the Upper House which induced Broser to propose to his daughter; and his humility did not prevent him from remarking to the first Mrs. Broser, when she pleaded her inability to converse with political gentlemen, "Well, talk about me. That will always interest them." But his second helpmeet knew the texture of his humility, and when, on the occasion of going to a music-hall, he observed: "I couldn't risk hanging about. I've wired for a box," a "suspicion that what he could not risk was being incognito awoke within her a feeling of absolute pity for his limitations."

On its political side the book is distinctly successful. Herein Mafekingness, so to call it—though Mr. Zangwill has naught to do with South Africa—is viewed philosophically. Kingdoms progress en masse in legislation and in almanacs, but the quality of the type varies hardly at all through the centuries. Otherwise, we would all be Beyond-Men. Underneath "Rule Britannia" breaks the cry, "Fee-fo-fum," a primitive cry for blood or treasure. The clever journalist and political opportunist are shadowy artists in insincerity; euphemism is so habitual with them that to break to them the painful news that black is not white after all is to incur a serious responsibility. These are not Mr. Zangwill's words, but they outline the train of thought which he suggests.

On the domestic side his novel leaves something to be desired. An immaculate lady of the old school found fault with him in our hearing for the pertness of his early Victorian children; but it must be observed that Mr. Zangwill does not attempt to reproduce the typical early Victorian domestic life. He makes, however, a gallant effort to create the aristocracy in their own homes. His duchess drops her final g's, as the privileged may hear the Duke of Fife do on the platform at this day. When Allegra remarks that something is an "economic fallacy," she exclaims: "Good gracious—what is the world comin' to! Such a phrase in your mouth—it's like a cigar!" Did they drop their g's in those days? It hardly matters. What does matter is the importation of a type whose presence in a mundane narrative is as perplexing as that of Melmoth the Wanderer. We refer to the philosophical Raphael Dominick, in whose company the probabilities suffer severely. It is a character such as a poet-romanticist could invest with charm. Knowing him to be patently of the stuff of dreams, he would have filled him with the melliliously mysterious speech of dreams, and he would have been "lifeless, but beautiful." But the lips of this bodiless Zangwill open but to emit a crashing discord of clevernesses. In Chapter XXI., Book II., he avenges his creation by making even Broser momentarily impossible. We also object to the manner in which the characters run against one another for the convenience of the plot. This is certainly Victorian—both early and late.

The feminine triumph of the book, in our opinion, is Elijah's wife. In youth (like how many heroines of fiction?) she had clasped a hunted hare to her bosom, an action that had made Elijah fall in love with her. But the cherisher of hares was a nagger of the most impracticable kind. "You sent him to the shambles!" she screams to her innocent husband when she heard that their headstrong son had been killed in the war. But when Elijah is being mobbed for Little Englandism she rediscovers the hare in him, and cries: "Fight fair, you hounds of hell." It is probable that this woman will appear overdrawn to many, but we can vouch for the fact that she is an ably-studied Cymric type. Allegra, the heroine, is drawn more ambitiously. She writes a letter to her middle-age as Mrs. Meynell did to her old age. But she uttered no words comparable with these:

Oh, in some hour of thine my thoughts shall guide thee
Suddenly, though time, darkness, silence hide thee,
This wind from thy lost country flits beside thee.

Yet Allegra's letter, which recurs as a motif in the book, rings pathetically true. The Idealist she thought to marry turned out to be Self-Interest under another name. The Idealist she did not marry was become a mere Egoist, and for refuge she had nothing better than a motherly representative of the feudalism she had once despised.

But we must pause. Mr. Zangwill's book is, as a whole, worthy of his reputation. It is wise and witty, serious and pathetic. If it be not all life, it is at least life and Mr. Zangwill; and the second of these twain is not bad company even when out of place.

As a Watch in the Night. By Mrs. Campbell Praed.
(Chatto & Windus. 6s.)

THE mystic symmetry of the title-page, whereon "Scenes from the Waking Life," "Interlude," "In the Life of Dream," and, again, "Scenes," are superimposed like the layers of a Neapolitan ice, is a fair warning of the nature of Mrs. Campbell Praed's story. In a word, reincarnation, the adapted Buddhism which calls itself esoteric, is the theory which a story of modern life is used to exemplify.

The story is of a woman-artist who for years has been the adored friend of one man and the mistress of another. And we are happy to add at once that we are thoroughly satisfied with Mrs. Dorothea Queste, with Gavau Sarel (her lover), and with the charming Kaia (though she does sing "a wild sort of melody inexpressibly plaintive"), out of jealousy for whom Dorothea in the end compasses the ruin of Sarel's political career. The mischief lies in a shadowy old humbug named Charafti, who is consciously guilty of innumerable pasts, and persuades Mrs. Queste to launch herself into "fourth dimensional vantage space." That seems to mean the area of such a vision as that which in an omnibus at night the opposite window shows you of what goes on in the street at your back. Mrs. Queste's pasts are two. She sees them in immense detail; and Mrs. Praed describes them in the historic present. She has taken, you are certain, immense pains to find among the categories of Greece and Imperial Rome the precise equivalents for Mayfair, the Row, smart society, an archdeacon, a court train of duchesse satin, and a picture hat, the gift of a bridegroom; her imagination even avails to identify a debate in the House of Commons with a gladiatorial combat—and you may be sure the fourth-dimensional Dorothea turns down her thumb with the best. For she was a person of importance, dwelling in "a mansion situated in its own grounds"—nothing semi-detached, mark—and frequented "fashionable gatherings." The fact is, that Mrs. Praed has spoiled a good story very well. You have only to stick to the layers of plain vanilla and her ice is palatable enough—only, of course, the result is not Neapolitan. But, if you come to that, why should it be?

Love of Comrades. By Frank Mathew.
(Lane. 3s. 6d.)

WOMAN masquerading as man is a favourite in current fiction, where she takes after Miss Ellen Terry's Imogen rather than Spenser's Britomart. In the present story, the scene of which is laid in Ireland in 1640, Mr. Mathew allows the masquerader (Margery) to speak for herself. She is a distressingly arch little person, who is always wanting to be "fondled" or "cuddled" in the throes of her adventures. Those adventures arise from her attempt to deliver to Strafford a letter entrusted to her by a brother whose murder she seems to have borne with super-sisterly fortitude. They culminate in her being cut down after ignominious suspension. Her lives are a cat's; but the fact that, from the first, one is aware that she did not exhaust them diminishes the tension proper to high romance. Her exuberant feminism prevents the story from rising to dignity, although the figure of a knight, haunted by children whom he has slain lest "nits" become "lice," is obviously intended to impress the reader. A bracing effect of plein air is gained when Margery suddenly arrives at the sea:

The blue waters curvetted, fondled by an affable wind.
Green waves poised near me and crumbled into shivering foam. . . . The glittering beach resounded with the din of their romps. Said I to myself, "This is a beautiful world."

Mr. Mathew's pretty talent is, in fine, serviceable for better things than the conventional improbabilities of his latest novel.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the week's Fiction are not necessarily final.
Reviews of a selection will follow.]

THE HOSTS OF THE LORD. BY FLORA ANNIE STEEL.

A long novel of Indian life, marked by Mrs. Steel's well-known characteristics—minute and sympathetic knowledge of the country, movement, and characterisation, battling against a background of bewildering detail. The scene is laid in a small Indian town, where lives Laila Bonaventura, daughter of General Bonaventura and Anari

Begum. She is beloved by a native officer and a British officer, and so follows jealousy, fighting and tragedy. (Heinemann. 6s.)

WHILOMVILLE STORIES.

By STEPHEN CRANE.

A posthumous volume containing thirteen stories, probably the last stories that Mr. Crane wrote. Whilomville, from which the collection takes its name, was in no sense a summer resort, but "the advent of the summer season meant much to it, for then came visitors from the city—people of considerable confidence—alighting upon their country cousins." The stories, which are well illustrated, appeared in Harpers's Magazine. (Harpers. 5s.)

A YEAR OF LIFE.

By W. S. LILLY.

Every man, it has been said, has it in him to write one novel. At the age of sixty, Mr. Lilly, author of Ancient Religion and Modern Thought, First Principles in Politics, &c., &c., &c., favours us with his novel. It treats modern life, although there is a quotation from George Chapman on the title-page. The beginning is alive: "Sir Philip Savile was giving a little dinner to three friends, and was particularly pleased with himself and his surroundings, as, indeed, he had some reason to be." (Lane. 6s.)

GOD'S LAD.

By PAUL CUSHING.

A vivid adventure story. In the early chapters Mr. Cushing, having justly observed that "only one key fits the lock of the Present and that is the Past," tarries in the eighteenth century, but once the tale is started the period is 1849, when "the good ship Samantha, not a hundred days out from New York, dropped anchor in the beautiful bay of San Diego." (Pearson. 6s.)

THE SMALL PART LADY.

By GEORGE R. SIMS.

Thirteen short stories from our cheery Dagonet's manufactory. Dagonet rides like a cork on the waves of time and custom. His sentimentality is incurable; his heart is ever young. "Most of us," he says, "have dreams—day-dreams which are agreeable, night dreams which are frequently the reverse, and one special dream, arranged for endurance, which is commonly known as 'the dream of my life.'" These stories are entertaining in a way, and forgotten as easily as the speeches of a Borough Council mayor. (Chatto.)

THE LADY OF DREAMS.

By UNA L. SILBERRAD.

This is a story of East-End life, but we understand that the author has not studied her characters in their homes or described their haunts from personal observation. It is rather a tale of "mean streets" evolved from the inner consciousness of one who has not walked them. Miss Silberrad is the author of that clever novel, The Enchanter. (Heinemann. 6s.)

SONS OF THE COVENANT.

By S. GORDON.

A long, industrious tale of Anglo-Jowry. Mr. Gordon, who is the author of several excellent novels, has dipped deeply into that world already made living to us by Mr. Zangwill's Ghetto stories. One of the characters in Sons of the Covenant is Mr. Diamond, a "ritual slaughterer," whose office "it is to make beef, mutton, or veal out of live cattle for his co-religionists' consumption in accordance with Mosaic traditional precept." (Sands. 6s.)

ONE OF OURSELVES.

By L. B. WALFORD.

The author of The Baby's Grandmother, and a score of other readable tales, never disappoints her particular public. The opening passage of the present story strikes its note: "'Of course she would be one of ourselves,' said Mrs. Tom Farrell. Mrs. Tom was the very head and front and centre and apex of 'ourselves.' She had hopped into the ring early—that is to say, she had married into the great, widespread family connection of the Farrells"—and so on. (Longmans. 6s.)

AN ARISTOCRATIC DETECTIVE.

By RICHARD MARSH.

We do our best to keep up with Mr. Marsh. This is the eighth volume that he has published this year. We have begun to take quite a sporting interest in Mr. Marsh, and ask ourselves anxiously—"Can he manage twelve in the year?" An Aristocratic Detective is, of course, all about an aristocratic detective. Fiction detectives always have just enough thrilling cases on tap to fill a volume. Mr. Marsh's new detective is called the Hon. Augustus Champnell. When he informs his father, the Earl of Glenlean, that he proposes adopting the profession of detective, the following dialogue takes place:

"A what?"

"A detective."

"Do you mean a policeman?"

"My dear father!"

(Digby, Long. 6s.)

DEACON BRADBURY.

By E. A. DIX.

A very American story, the scene of which is laid in an American village. The dialect, which is prominent on every page, is not easy to those who speak the tongue that Shakespeare spake. "B'cause I ain't. Au' I'd like—no one'd like better—to've given a trifle in this matter f'r instance—that is, ef y' 'd 've accepted it —." Mr. Dix may be entirely right, but his method of spelling does not vastly allure the reader. (Macmillan. 6s.)

A SUFFOLK COURTSHIP.

By M. BETHAM EDWARDS.

A pleasant domestic tale of the ins and outs of farmhouse society life in East Anglia fifty years ago—the kind of tale that Malvern and Matlock Bath will receive gladly. Fifty years ago! So in the chapter where Susie found it so difficult to die of love, the gig box on market days would bring home such literary purchases as a copy of the Illustrated London News, the month's Family Herald, and the Language of Flowers. (Hurst & Blackett. 6s.)

JULIE.

By A MAN.

We have not an idea who "A Man" is, but feel sure that he is not very old. We doubt even if he be a man. At any rate he or she makes it all right for Julie in the end, that is on the last page, where she finds herself, for the first time in her life, "sweetly and comfortably folded in a lover's arms" (the arms of Douglas Gale, Lieut.). "It was wonderful! it was glorious!" says our author, "better than roses, better than wine, better than music." But we do not quite see why Julie's hair should have "come unrolled." (Water Scott. 2s. 6d.)

THE MYSTERY OF LADYPLACE.

By CHRISTIAN LYS.

Mystery, murder, a ghost (a white monk), a Mephistophelian German doctor, ending in a double wedding, "and a pretty one everybody says." The story opens in a London ball-room, with the theft of a pearl necklace, and shifts to Ladyplace, a house on the banks of the Thames, with ruined cloisters. (Warne & Co. 6s.)

We have also received: The Doctor Speaks, by W. J. Dawson (Richards); The Justice of Revenge, by George Griffith (White); Shadows from the Thames, by E. Noble (Pearson); Pride of England, by Marcus Reed (Constable); Adventures of Merriman Bros., by W. Palmer; The Charming-ton Mystery, by Le Voleur; The Vereker Family, by May Crommelin (Digby, Long).

THE ACADEMY.

Editorial and Publishing Offices, 43, Chancery-lane.

The ACADEMY will be sent post-free to every Annual Subscriber in the United Kingdom.

Price for One Issue, Threepence; postage One Halfpenny Price for 52 issues, Thirteen Shillings; postage free.

Foreign Rates for Yearly Subscriptions 20s. including postage.

American Agents for the ACADEMY: Brentano's, 31, Union-square, New York.

The Spirit of Place.

WHAT is the spirit of place? This is a question that one simply dare not have spread before Dr. Johnson, even in connexion with Fleet-street. The Doctor's love of Fleet-street had not, one imagines, anything to do with the spirit of place, though it had everything to do with the life of Fleet-street as interpreted by his own spirit. And his own spirit led him to talk about a pie-shop in the Strand while roaming the farthest Hebrides—a nostalgia of pie, not place. Iona moved him, but not in the way we mean. It reminded him of the Marathon of books. One would put the question to Lamb with a good heart; but even Lamb's remarks might seem rather 1820. That he "felt the genius of places" is most true—Pater says it—but the feeling for place did not exist for Lamb as it does for ourselves. We refine far ahead of Elia. The spirit of place which Mrs. Meynell recognises is as modern as the phonograph. It is indeed electric in character, and you may try in vain to mesh it in such words as personal, psychological, elusive, and impressionistic. Some of these words suggest, by association, that the spirit of place is a superfluity of intellectual naughtiness, or a wreath of Bostonian soul-cirrus. And, in truth, the sentiment does now and then refine itself away into something which one would rather dismiss as preciousness than pursue as doctrine. M. Maurice Barrès is reported to teach a new topography in terms resembling these. Arrived in a town, you are to scour it promiscuously for an hour, drinking in its spirit. Then you lie down in a darkened room for an indefinite period, confusing the place with your soul. If you have luck you will find the inevitable word for Toledo. It is not exactly thus that Mrs. Meynell deals with the spirit of place (the subject and the phrase are her own); in her hands it may remain a stumbling-block to the Jews, but to the Greeks it is not foolishness. In Mrs. Meynell's essay on "The Spirit of Place" are these sentiments, which we hold to be delicately true and illuminative.

Of all unfamiliar bells, those which seem to hold the memory most surely after but one hearing are bells of an unseen cathedral of France when one has arrived by night; they are no more to be forgotten than the bells in "Parsifal."

They mingle with the sound of feet in unknown streets. They are the voices of an unknown tower; they are loud in their own language. The spirit of place, which is to be seen in the shapes of the fields and the manner of the crops, to be felt in a prevalent wind, breathed in the breath of the earth, overheard in a far street-cry or in the tinkle of some blacksmith, calls out and peals in the cathedral bells. It speaks its local tongue remotely, steadfastly, largely, clamorously, loudly, and greatly by these voices; you hear the sound in its dignity, and you know how familiar, how childlike, how lifelong it is in the ears of the people. The bells are strange, and you know how homely they must be. Their utterances are, as it were, the classics of a dialect.

"You know how homely they must be." You know this, that is to say, if the spirit of place makes any appeal to you. No doubt, pleasure of every kind may be defined as a sort of renewal of the freshness of life. Such a renewal comes, in apt degree, to the man who turns out upon the streets of a strange town and sees its tramcars moving in their orbits and its theatre bills glowing on the walls. Or it may come to him through the absence of tramcars and theatre bills; by the presence of some reed shaking in the wind; some bare little park; some pedlar on his round; some sunny, empty square; some grateful silence which only a shop-bell breaks. But a man who is sensitive to the genius loci is sensitive throughout. He is as easily repelled as pleased, and is not at all a travelling expert who has given a guarantee that he will extract honey from every municipal flower in his path. Lamb could not endure Hastings; he found that its genius loci was dissipated by insincere visitors, and he said, with delightful choice: "I should not so feel in Staffordshire." In Staffordshire! and he was right. Not in Hanley or in Burslem, with their vistas of chimneys and cinder-heaps, had he been bored. There he had found the clear spirit of the place, and had yielded himself to it for good or evil, exultant or resigned, but in either case alertly perceptive, and therefore not unhappy. A feeling for place will lend interest and significance to the back gardens between Liverpool-street and Stratford; and even the hinder parts of Romford will only dismay—they will not excoriate—a mind so endowed.

The feeling for place is no mere cult of these latter days. It pervades fiction, and colours poetry. Mock it, and you mock Dickens, and Matthew Arnold, and Stevenson, and Mr. Henry James. In Dickens it was the endowment of houses and streets with that overplus of humanity for which his brain had no leisure to find surnames and clothes. In Arnold it was the willingness to linger on anything that was at once tangible and spiritual, or, if you will, the desire to draw spiritual food even from stones to fill a heart from which faith kept ebbing. How you see this in the "Stanzas from the Grande Chartreuse," which begin thus:

Through Alpine meadows soft-suffused
With rain, where thick the crocus grows,
Past the dark forges long disused
The mule-track from Saint Laurent goes.
The bridge is cross'd, and slow we ride
Through forest, up the mountain-side.

The autumnal evening darkens round,
The wind is up, and drives the rain;
While, hark! far down, with strangled sound
Doth the Dead Guier's stream complain,
Where that wet smoke, among the woods,
O'er his boiling cauldron broods.

Stevenson had the sense of place in full. In him it was ever gay, never studious. He could abandon it without a pang, and in his Inland Voyage it is for ever cheating—no, not cheating, but teasing you with its gusty variations. But then Stevenson is a little like Sterne, whose Sentimental Journey is a misnomer if you go to it for the spirit of place. Sterne has points to make, and dead donkeys to bewail; and Stevenson has a world of light philosophy to deposit, not to mention such shy benefactions as "What a number of things a river does by simply following Gravity in the innocence of its heart." And yet Stevenson can pause to give you as much genius loci as this at one time:

A miry lane led us up from Quartes with its church and bickering windmill. The hinds were trudging homewards from the fields. A brisk little old woman passed us by. She was seated across a donkey between a pair of glittering milk cans; and, as she went, she kicked jauntily with her heels upon the donkey's side, and scattered shrill remarks among the wayfarers. It was notable that none of the tired men took the trouble to reply. Our conductor soon led us out of the lane and across country. The sun had gone down, but the west in front of us was one lake of level gold. The path wandered a while in the open, and then passed under a trellis like a bower indefinitely prolonged. On either hand were shadowy orchards; cottages lay low among the leaves and sent their smoke to heaven ; every here and there, in an opening, appeared the great gold face of the west.

And Mr. James? Being the indirect inspiration of this article, Mr. James's quality may now wait such prominence as our conclusion can give. It would be interesting to observe how far this place-sentiment wanders back through the fabric of our literature. We cannot at the moment think of it as visible before the last century. Had Shakespeare and the Elizabethans any feeling for the genius of places? In truth, it is not one that we expect to find where there is much life and light and warmth of blood. The patriotic fervour which regards place is another thing altogether; and where emotion prevails, there will scarcely be room for constructive emotion. Oddly enough, the first writer who challenges mention is Defoe. His sense of place was extraordinary, and in Robinson Crusoe it is part of the triumph. In Colonel Jack the Moorfields, the fields toward St. Pancras, Dallow's Glasshouse in Rosemary-lane, and the lanes about St. Bartholomew's-close are put before us with almost uncanny realness; and if ever the "historic shudder" of Flaubert is to be felt it is surely in certain passages of the Journal of the Plague, where the drear Thames banks or City streets of the seventeenth century are felt as something familiar and immediate, and as they are felt nowhere else. But Defoe did so many things so coldly and so well that one has learned to consider the man an enigma, and to give up the attempt to discover where his pen moved like a piston, and where—if ever—it trembled like a wand. We have already called Sterne a fraud in this connexion. Travelling over nearly the same Old France as Mr. James, his fantastic spirit recked little of the places in his path. "There's Fontainebleau, and Sens, and Joigny, and Auxerre, and Dijon the capital of Burgundy, and Chalons, and Mâcon the capital of the Mâconese, and a score more upon the road to Lyons—and now I have run over them—I might as well talk to you of so many market towns in the moon, as tell you one word about them." Cowper had a real sympathy with places, but he exercised it in ways which perhaps tend to disguise his possession of such sympathy. Assuredly Byron had it, though we prefer to look for it only in Don Juan—the poem which reflects his suspended and defeated emotions. Haidée's island is more than described, it is felt; and the account of Don Juan's entry into London by Shooter's Hill, and through Kennington to Westminster Bridge, is full of that gusto we are considering. Lamb's feeling for place was both abundant and delicate, and it is the first thing that meets you in his Essays, if you begin with the first. With Lamb the feeling was particularly humane and relative; not a separate satisfaction. Indeed, to end a survey not yet fairly begun, Lamb belongs to an age when men were not intimate with many places. There was so much ado to reach them, so much cold and hunger to dissipate at the journey's end, travel had in it so much of dread and discomfort, that the mind could rarely have been prepared for subtle influences. The feeling for place is a delicate tendrilled plant which flourishes where travelling is swift and cushioned. Whatever, be it knowledge of French or a good map, simplifies the business of getting about is favourable to the perception of the spirit of place.

To such facilities Mr. Henry James added others when he set forth on the journey which inspired his Little Tour in France (Heinemann). A lifelong debt to the genius of France has indeed begotten in him a doubt whether that debt ought not to have been discharged in greater fulness than by a record of surface impressions; and we have a self-examining preface, very characteristic and difficult, but asking only to be read twice and slowly. The end is that Mr. James does not repent his water-colour quality of observation, does not wish to do greater things for France in sterner forms. As why should he? If we were to side for an instant with Mr. James against himself it would be on the ground that so fine a method as his is perhaps applied with a too processional patience to all these French towns and villages. That is to say, for its method, which is fine edged and Ariel-like, the book seems rather long and heavy in the hand. It is an affair of measure, that is all. Six places fewer, and we had said nothing.

The water-colour metaphor is Mr. James's own, and more than once he recurs to the idea of the brush. The figure is right. Almost always where Mr. James touches us most he is a draughtsman and colourist. Take this glimpse of Tours:

Tours has a garrison of five regiments, and the little red-legged soldiers light up the town. You see them stroll upon the clean, uncommercial quay, where there are no signs of navigation, not even by an oar, no barrels nor bales, no loading nor unloading, no masts against the sky nor booming of steam in the air. The most active business that goes on there is that patient and fruitless angling in which the French, as the votaries of art for art, excel all other people. The little soldiers, weighed down by the contents of their enormous pockets, pass with respect from one of these masters of the rod to the other, as he sits soaking an indefinite bait in the large indifferent stream.

The feeling for place could hardly be more delicate and sane than it is here. Mr. James has all that delight in place names, and the habit of taking them seriously, which one expects of him. Le Mans had suggested feudal sturdiness, Plantagenet hauteur; but it yielded a sight of the cathedral that has soon faded, and a ten-minutes' musing in another church. Mr. James took his disappointment quietly, and ordered a bitter-et-curaçoa. It was then that he saw Le Mans.

The afternoon was warm and still; the air was admirably soft. The good Manceaux, in little groups and pairs, were seated near me; my ear was soothed by the fine shades of French enunciation and by the detached syllables of that perfect tongue. There was nothing in particular in the prospect to charm; it was an average French view. Yet I felt a charm, a kind of sympathy, a sense of the completeness of French life and of the lightness and brightness of the social air, together with a desire to arrive at friendly judgments, to express a positive interest. I know not why this transcendental mood should have descended upon me then and there; but that idle half-hour in front of the café, in the mild October afternoon, suffused with human sounds, is perhaps the most abiding thing I brought away from Le Mans.

Pray do not imagine that Mr. James spends himself on streets and stones, on white roads, rushing grey rivers, and the mossy east-purlieus of cathedrals. His human element is far stronger than we have planned out to indicate; and we find in such a picture as that of the ancient peasant sunning himself against the walls of Carcassonne, with his crutches and his memories of the campaign in Mexico, content to return, old and battered, to the mediæval city where he had played as a child, an incident as true in life and much more discreet in art than certain over-cut gems of Sterne. Take, also, this inn-window look at Narbonne:

Innumerable rusty men, scattered all over the place, were buying and selling wine, straddling about in pairs, in groups, with their hands in their pockets, and packed together at the doors of the cafés. They were mostly fat and brown and unshaven; they ground their teeth as they talked; they were very méridionaux.

If the fine love of place is a little suspect; if it connotes ever so indefinitely an eye unwilling to search the heavens, or a heart bereft of greater satisfactions; if it has in it something of refuge, of despair—it is still the frail flower of our own age, and may be cherished discreetly until the tree of faith begins once more to make wood. You may think this a curious association of ideas; yet we fancy it is just.

Things Seen.

The Odd Man.

WHEN I had walked four miles I sat upon a gate to rest, partly because I was tired, but also because my sixth sense told me that something was about to happen in that neighbourhood. Men on horseback, white-breeched, with bright top-boots, were gathered there, and from behind the stables came the jolly baying of hounds. Then a man, clad in runner's costume, shirt open at the neck, came towards the gate. He carried a small sack bag tied to a rope: it bulged with something, and I smelt the smell of aniseed. "Must I get down?" I asked. "Yes," he said; "the hounds will be through here in twenty minutes." He went lightly into the field, and, trailing the bag on the ground, started to run. The clock struck three. My eyes followed his little figure through hedges, across fields, and over the distant hill. "Who is he?" I asked, and was told he was the odd man about the place. That odd man, whoever he was, earned his wages. Twenty minutes later I watched the hounds rush, with cries of delight, into the field, pick up the scent, scramble through the hedges, scurry across the fields, and disappear behind the hill, followed by the straggling field. Quarter of an hour later the odd man, breathless, in colour like a peony, stumbled homeward from his circuitous hare run. He threw down the aniseed bag, put on his coat, muffled his throat, and went off—to rest? No! to prepare the dogs' meal. He appeared again, removed the aniseed bag from the ground, carried a stray bucket to the stables, and then jumped upon the gate and strained his eyes towards the hill. The hounds had been sighted. We shouted and danced with excitement. Then, suddenly, tearing up the road towards us, came a riderless horse. The odd man jumped into the road, stopped the beast, gave him over to a groom to hold, and was just in time to prevent half the pack from escaping from the field. Then he helped an exhausted rider from his recalcitrant steed, and producing a cloth from his pocket dried the coat tails of another which had been flapping on his horse's steaming flanks. When all the field had come home he walked three horses up and down while their masters had gone indoors to refresh, and then when the drag hunt had quite come to an end he fetched a bag of tools to do something to the lock of the gate. And that was the last I saw of him—mending the lock.

"There is a Tide —."

HE had kept the moth under a glass for about sixteen hours; in the early moments of its captivity I had pleaded for its release—in vain. Now it sat silent on the piece of paper which formed its floor, and awaited destruction. It had long since ceased to beat its wings against its prison walls and had given up hope; there was patient resignation expressed in its crestfallen attitude.

I grew stern and commanding. "You must either put that moth in the killing bottle at once or let it go free," I said. The small boy laughed; he explained that it had no wish to be free; he volunteered to prove the truth of this statement by removing the glass. "Very well," I said; "do so." Carefully he lifted it; took it away altogether; stood hovering over it, ready to lower it instantly if the moth showed signs of movement . . . it sat patiently on, absolutely unconscious of its freedom, making no effort to move or fly.

"Touch it," I said; "it doesn't understand; it has forgotten what it feels like to be free." He covered it again smilingly. "I told you so," he said; "it doesn't want to go away." There was horrid triumph in his eyes. "I have given it its chance," he added; "it has lost it. Now it must stay in prison!" He patted the top of the glass with a comfortable smile.

"Give it one more chance?" I pleaded; "it was so weak for want of air it couldn't fly." "Well," he said, "it shall have one more chance. I will let it go free if it flies away while I count twenty."

He lifted the glass again. He felt the game was becoming exciting. He began to count. We both held our breath—watching—5—6—7—8—: the sun shone in, and a butterfly flitted past the window. The moth made no movement. I was reminded of the prisoner in the Bastille—11—12—13—it moved; it raised itself almost imperceptibly as though it were trying to make sure if it were alive: the excitement became painful—15—16—it stood feebly fluttering its wings; the small boy hurried a little in the counting—17—18—it was fluttering still—if it could but realise how the time was going—19—20—still fluttering—and a prisoner again.

"There," said the small boy, with a laugh; "it has lost its chance." "Yes," I echoed feebly, "it has lost its chance"; and I moved away with the sick feeling of having watched a tragedy play itself out before my eyes. Yet I doubt not it is a common thing to die a prisoner because we lose the chance that would make us free.

FitzGerald's "Polonius."

I WAS glad to note that the reviewer of FitzGerald's Miscellanies in your columns last week regretted the decision which caused Mr. Aldis Wright to omit all but the preface to Polonius from that collection. For two reasons: one being that no edition of Polonius is now obtainable, and the other that a book of extracts made by a wise man like FitzGerald is as much an index to his character and personality as any words from his pen can be. Not that the book is all extracts either. It has many sage extracts in FitzGerald's phrasing; this, for example:

Plato's philosopher pursues the true light, yet returns back to his former fellows who dwell in the dark, watching shadows.

Polonius is very good, very FitzGeraldian. In turning idly over the pages of the copy before me—William Pickering, London, 1852, with its charming motto on the cover, La verdad es siempre verde—I note the following:

TRAVEL.

Fool, why journeyest thou wearisomely in thy antiquarian fervour to gaze on the stone pyramids of Geeza, or the clay ones of Sacchara? These stand there, as I can tell thee, idle and inert, looking over the desert foolishly enough, for the last 3000 years. But canst thou not open thy Hebrew Bible, then, or even Luther's version thereof?—CARLYLE.

Once it was, "Farewell, Monsieur Traveller; look you lisp, and wear strange suits; disable the benefits of your own country—be out of love with your nativity, and almost chide God for making you that countenance you are; or I will scarce think you have swum in a gondola."

We may now add—"You must swear by Allah, smoke chibouques, and spell Pasha differently from every predecessor, or we shall scarce believe you have been in a harem!"

"Never went out ass, and came home horse."

Still, "A good traveller," says Shakespeare, "is something at the latter end of a dinner."

CONTENT.

The fountain of content must spring up in the mind; and he who has so little knowledge of human nature as to seek happiness by changing anything but his own disposition, will waste his life in fruitless efforts, and multiply the griefs which he purposes to remove.—JOHNSON.

Cœlum non animum mutant qui trans mare currunt.

Contentment, says Fuller, consisteth not in heaping more fuel, but in taking away some fire.

POETRY.

"Milton is very fine, I dare say," said the mathematician, "but what does he prove?" What, indeed, does Poetry prove?

"It doth raise and erect the mind," says Bacon, "by submitting the shows of things to the desires of the mind, whereas Reason doth buckle and bow the mind unto the nature of things."

But Sir Philip Sidney says the poet shows the "nature of things" as much as the reasoner, though he may not "buckle and bow the mind" to it: "He doth not only show the way, but giveth so sweet a prospect into the way as will entice any man to enter into it. Nay, he doth as if your journey should lie through a fair vineyard, at the very first give you a cluster of grapes, that full of that taste you may long to pass further."

"Some have thought the proper object of Poetry was, to please; others that it was, to instruct. Perhaps we are well instructed if we are well pleased."

"Poetry enriches the blood of the world."

TORY.

Tacitus wrote (says Luther) that by the ancient Germans it was held no shame at all to drink and swill four-and-twenty hours together. A gentleman of the court asked "how long ago it was since Tacitus wrote this." He was answered, "Almost 1500 years." Whereupon the gentleman said, "Forasmuch as drunkenness is so ancient a custom, let us not abolish it."

An old, ruinous church, which had harboured innumerable jackdaws, sparrows, and bats, was at length repaired. When the masons left it, the jackdaws, sparrows, and bats came back in search of their old dwellings. But these were all filled up. "Of what use now is this great building?" said they; "come, let us forsake this useless stone-heap."—GERMAN.

These are sufficient to show how much of FitzGerald will be unknown to many persons if Polonius is not reprinted; and the golden opportunity for reprinting it seems now to have been lost. The book illustrates, more than any other I know, what might be called the impact of juxtaposition. FitzGerald concentrates from all sides shafts of bright light upon the matter in hand, and the cumulative effect is very emphatic.

The copy of Polonius from which I have been quoting is unique. It was presented by FitzGerald to a friend at Woodbridge, and has a number of marginalia in the author's own hand. The Preface, for example, has been amended here and there. The beginning of the third paragraph has been altered to:

A French Epigram of the Time says that Ipecacuana is worth all the Ana which were the fashion in Louis the Fourteenth's Reign. Johnson said Mr. Selden's Table-talk was the same.

And that exquisite passage about the motto on the roof of Castle Ashby is amended to:

The parapet balustrade round the roof of Castle Ashby, in Northamptonshire, and carved into the letters, "NISI DOMINUS CUSTODIAT DOMUM, FRUSTRA VIGILAT QUI CUSTODIT EAM." Not amiss to decipher as you came up the long avenue some summer or autumn day, and to digest afterwards at the little "Rose and Crown" at Yardley, with such good Homebrewed as used to be there before I knew I was to die.

In the body of the book are these pencil notes:

Simplicity is "sine plicâ," without fold, without duplicity, a word, as Trench says, that should not be applied to any folk but such as is not of this world (p. xlvi.).

Kindness is the recognition of our kind (p. lxi.).

On p. lxxxix. of the ordinary edition is this anecdote:

Argenson's friend read a book many times over, and complained of the author's repeating himself a good deal.

"Argenson's friend" has been altered, in ink, to "He had a pretty turn for self-science, who," and so on.

One more of FitzGerald's afterthoughts:

"When in doubt play a trump." When doubting of one duty go and do another; and that very act will light you to the generous side of the question (p. cxxxviii.).

Finally, there are two loose scraps of paper: one is this anonymous extract, cut apparently from some newspaper, and entitled by FitzGerald "Truth and Whole Truth," with, for second title, a sentence in Persian, which may be translated: "Ignorance is not without falsity":

Enjoyment soon wearies both itself and us! effort, never. That man is happy, for instance, who devotes his life to the cultivation of an island, to the discovery of one that is lost, or to the extent of the ocean. In London it is he who was born rich, not he who has made himself rich, that commits suicide; and, on the other side of the picture, it is not the poor man, but he who has become poor, that kills himself. The miser grows old enjoying rather than wearied of life; but the heir who comes into possession of his active gains sinks into ennui. So I would rather be the Court gardener who watches and protects an aloe for fifteen years, until at last it opens to him the heaven of its blossom, than the prince who is hastily called to look at the opened heaven. The writer of a dictionary rises every morning like the sun to move past some little star in his zodiac; a new letter is to him a new year's festival, the conclusion of the old one a harvest home; and, since after each capital letter the whole alphabet follows successively, the author on his paper may perhaps frequently celebrate on one and the same day a Sunday, a Lady-day, and a Crispin's holiday.

The other insertion is this tiny scrap in FitzGerald's hand:

"Only Early Bird gets Worm,"
"But the Worm —?"

V.

An Unforgotten Fairy Tale.

THERE has come under our notice a striking instance of the lasting gratitude of readers to a writer who has once charmed them. A fortnight ago we casually mentioned The Necklace of Princess Fiorimonde as a charming fairy tale. Last week we published the letter of a correspondent who, as a child, had read this book, but had lost sight of it, and was an-hungered to read it again. This simple inquiry has brought us no fewer than twelve replies, showing by their number, and still more by their tone, that after twenty years (for the book was published in 1880) there is a very large amount of floating affection for this book, and of floating loyalty towards its author. Thus Miss Netta Syrett writes: "Until quite recently, when, after the manner of cherished books, it has disappeared from my shelf, The Necklace of Princess Fiorimonde was one of my treasured possessions. It was written by Mary de Morgan, illustrated by Walter Crane, and, I think, published by Macmillan. I was much interested in your correspondent's letter about this delightful book of fairy stories, for it strengthens my conviction that it is the poetical, mysterious type of fairy tale that appeals to the childish imagination, and not the burlesque, bristling with topical allusions, which of late years has usurped the name. One looks in vain nowadays for beautiful stories like The Necklace of Princess Fiorimonde, or George MacDonald's Princess and the Goblin, or Mrs. Molesworth's The Cuckoo Clock. Magic is surely the essential quality of a fairy story, and magic these books certainly possess. The new 'fairy' book may be amusing, vivacious, even witty; but magical, seldom or never." The identification of the book, by the way, is carried to the full by one correspondent who gives the title-page as follows :

THE NECKLACE
OF
PRINCESS FIORIMONDE,
AND OTHER STORIES.
BY MARY DE MORGAN
(Author of "On a Pincushion").
WITH ILLUSTRATIONS BY WALTER CRANE.
LONDON :
MACMILLAN & CO.
1880.

Several correspondents think that Miss de Morgan's earlier book, On a Pincushion, is even better than the Necklace. Speaking of both stories, a Brighton correspondent, whose name we are not able to decipher, says that "the fact that they have not been reprinted or become more widely known has been a loss to the children of to-day," and Mr. J. R. Mitchell suggests that Messrs. Macmillan should reprint the Necklace. We have had similar replies and suggestions from other correspondents. It may not be known even to our informants that Miss de Morgan is a daughter of the late Prof. de Morgan, whose mathematical genius was so brilliantly inventive.

It happens that in this propitious hour a new book from Miss de Morgan's pen is published. The tales in The Wind Fairies, just issued by Messrs. Seeley, are of the true fairy order, and they are told in the right spirit, with perfect seriousness, and with that touch of mystery which belongs of right to a magic world. Their author knows that the fairy country is a moon-and-star-charmed land, where nothing that is prosaic or mundane can find a place. In tales like "Vain Kesta" and "The Ploughman and the Gnome," therefore—which, by the way, are the least successful in the volume—she has been careful to introduce no fairy element. It is in "Dumb Othmar," or in "The Pool and the Tree," where she gives the rein to her poetical fancies, that Miss de Morgan is at her best. Othmar is a boy whose beautiful voice is stolen by the spirit dwelling within a magic violin. Following the evil dwarf to whom the musical instruments belong, Othmar comes to the top of a high hill, at moon-rise. Here the dwarf lays the horns, viols, and trumpets in rows, and presently, to the sound of his shrill whistling, they rise from the ground and melt into human shapes. "The flutes and pipes were tall and thin, and they and the violins had changed into beautiful girls with slender throats. . . ." After a time they began to sing, and "each voice was like the sound of its own instrument, only it said words through its tones, and in Othmar's ears their music sounded as never music had sounded before. . . . When he took his eyes from the dancers for a minute, he found that the place was quite full of all the animals who are never seen by day. There were crowds of bats and owls, and odd moths poised in the air, and seeming to watch the musicians and listen to their singing."

It is a charming fancy such as this which, unless we are much mistaken, delights children infinitely more than the boisterous fooling with which it is assumed they can never dispense, even in a fairy tale. Children's taste in these matters is instinctively better than that of their elders. It is the story which the writer has himself taken seriously, upon which he has lavished the most beautiful words at his command, that they love best. If they tolerate humour at all, in a fairy story, it must be of such a subtle and delicate nature that it does not dispel the enchanted atmosphere of that land "where even the old are fair": the sort of humour upon which Hans Andersen could venture, but which lesser people would do well to avoid. Miss de Morgan has chosen the path of safety.

Correspondence.

"Crossing the Bar."

SIR,—Surely there is something wrong in the story you quote from Mr. Hare's Story of My Life relating to Tennyson and "Crossing the Bar." The story, in your own words, runs as follows :

One day when he [Tennyson] was unusually depressed, his nurse said to him : "Mr. Tennyson, you ought to be ashamed of yourself for grumbling in this way : you ought to be expressing your gratitude for your recovery from your bad illness by giving us something—by giving it to the world." He went off repentant to his own room, and returned in half an hour with "Crossing the Bar."

But we know, on indisputable authority, that Tennyson wrote "Crossing the Bar" long after he had been raised to the peerage, and composed it while crossing the Solent on his way to Farringford. Mr. Hare would seem to have confused the issues in his passion for anecdote.—I am, &c.,
ARTHUR WAUGH.

"Boys of the Empire."

SIR,—My attention has been drawn to a paragraph which appeared in your paper of November 3, written evidently without knowledge of facts. You call our action in the matter "a very scurvy trick"—rather a severe statement to make on the tale of an interested individual.

The case stands thus. In 1888 we published for some time a journal called Boys of the Empire. It was registered at Stationers' Hall then. It ran as a weekly paper for a considerable time, and when it was no longer issued in parts we sold the work in volumes, which are still selling. We had under consideration a plan for re-issuing the journal, when we noticed an advertisement of a similarly-named paper about two months before the Sunday School Union issued their first number. Our solicitors drew the attention of Mr. Melrose and the Sunday School Union to our possession of the title, which, indeed, is printed on all our stationery. We pointed out that, as it stood in the register at Stationers' Hall, they must have known they had no right to it, and we asked them to take another title. About four weeks were wasted in negotiations, and then the Sunday School Union, or their friends and agents, declined to withdraw from the position they had taken up. In consequence of this, and in order to protect our title, we at once re-issued our weekly edition of Boys of the Empire, and three numbers were issued and sold before our friends the enemy produced their No. 1. These papers were sold on our advertisements, and through means of our other boys' papers, and not owing to Mr. Melrose's advertisements ; in fact, there is no doubt that the opposition Boys of the Empire has been sold through our advertisements, as we publish ten weekly journals having large sales, and use these as a medium for pushing the new paper, in addition to the usual methods of posting bills. As the law stands at present we have no redress, as it is so difficult to prove damage when we are doing so well ; but it is simply ridiculous for Mr. Melrose to complain when, after an attempted attack upon our stronghold, he found the garrison wide awake.—We are, &c.,

EDWIN J. BRETT, LTD.

(T. Murray Ford, Manager).

Giacomelli.

SIR,—Following on "The Bookworm's" remarks re the above in this week's issue, it may interest many of your readers, especially those who care for beautiful books, to learn that most, if not all, of Giacomelli's books can be bought at much reduced prices from second-hand book-sellers.

I have frequently seen The Bird, The Insect, The Sea,

Nature, &c., offered for three or four shillings, the published price in cloth being "twelve-and-six," all published by Nelson & Sons; there was also, With the Birds, Songs of the Woods, "with ninety illustrations," and "100 illustrations" by Giacomelli. The plates in all cases being engraved by the finest engravers of the time, let anyone possessing The Insect turn to pages 55 and 119, engraved by Whymper, and, with the writer, regret the death of "wood-engraving."

It also may be new to many to learn that the same firm of publishers, in 1865, issued from their house a Vicar of Wakefield, illustrated by the late "Keeley Haswell."—I am, &c.,

T. EDWARDS-JONES.

Our Weekly Competition.

Result of No. 60 (New Series).

LAST week we offered a prize of One Guinea for the best parody, not exceeding 250 words, of the style of a living writer. The attempts sent in strike us as careful and clever. We award the prize to Miss Judith MacKinnon, Spilfeathers, Ingatestone, Essex, for the following:

LA P'TITE BAB'LINETTE.

(With apologies to Mr. Gilbert Parker. M.P.)

"La p'tite Bab'linette, m'sieu' ? You say how com' she here—my leetla sunshine ! Voilà ! I tell you. Allons, there is a girl at Fort Retraite so beautiful, mon Dieu ! Holy ! she was fine always to see—la pauvre Angèle ! But, Mother of Heaven, she have a lover—a caurien ! Eh bien, m'sieu', a man is a man—comme ça ! What you tink !—one day she have a leetla chile. Enfin ! there is troub'—there is the grand explode. Dis donc, m'sieu', the grand'père of she—he have the heart of flint—sacré ! he drive her from the door—God of love !—to the snow—so cold ! Ah, la pauvre ! she die—the game for her is done ! Quel mort—what death ! Yes ! And the chile ?—thunder ! how she cry ! Alors, comes a moose to his cache—bagosh ! He take the chile—so gentil ! he hold her safe—mais, like that—patte en l'air. He trot-trot—Jésu ! he make a grand journey that night—Mother of Heaven ! he do a Hell-to-split gait ! Bien, m'sieu', straight to Tonpiac he come—chut ! what makes three hunder' mile to a moose ?—straight to m'sieu' le curé.

"Hein—you not believe ? Holy smoke ! but you make me augry ! I go !"

And the Scarlet Hills echoed from afar his song :—

Oh ! the moose in a trap and the moose who goes free—

Tire-l-on ! tire-là ! là ! là !

When the trap it is loosed—Oh ! the moon and a tree !

Voilà ! Tire-l-on ! tire-là !

Other parodies received are the following :

CUPID'S WAKING.

(After George Meredith.)

This is the tantalising thing to the pursuers of Beauty ; when she is found she becomes a habit, an assumption ; only at rare moments does the elusive goddess appear to strike. He is then no pursuer, he is the slave, yet happier than when still a hunter. The tacit assumption waits a query to proclaim "She is beautiful," unless the little God of Love should oust the disdainful, strengthen the passionate—and there is love indeed. But such love, ye pretty, simpering maids is never yours. Beauty alone has that tacit acknowledgment. Mere prettiness chatters like a bell with a thousand tongues clicking out the fair one's prettiness, and leaves no place for the great Awakening from the sleep of disdain to the heralding of Love. Beauty alone, with the key of ecstasy, can free the half-fledged cupid on its way. Chrysalis-like and ready for the butterfly, Cupid lay rosy in Bertram's heart, but only waiting for the time to burst his case, and emerge masterful and eager to test the battlements of Evelyn's soul. He had but to knock at the postern to be admitted, unconditioned ; she would have made no terms, and would have asked none. The chrysalis took wings the day he saw her stretched asleep, palely smiling, the fortress doors ajar, and one porcelain delicate hand, waiting loosely to be kissed. . . . The key to the castle is won by stealth ; to take more were treachery ere yet the defender is awake.

[F. H. T., St. Margarets-on-Thames.]

LUCILLA.

(After Mrs. Humphry Ward.)

Lucilla lay on a sofa, her head wrapped in a white Shetland shawl. She pressed her delicate fingers against her thin temples, where the ripples of brown hair still waved in heavy masses. Her Dante fell on the ground. She made no attempt to pick it up.

"A few more minutes," she whispered, "and James must be back. Oh ! this suspense, what killing work it is ! How long he has worked with no recognition from the unheeding world outside—and as Professor, with a settled income, lifted above sordid worries—"

The squeak of boots on the staircase made the poor, overwrought woman leap from her couch. She threw herself on the man who entered timidly, unwinding a knitted scarf from his neck.

"James," she cried sobbing, "have you got the appointment ?"

The man made no answer to his wife's appeal. He selected a chair out of the range of her eyes, and let his head drop on his hands.

"I've withdrawn my application," he said.

"Impossible !" she gasped. "Oh, my dearest, for the love you bear me, do not kill me outright."

The husband started from his seat, strode backwards and forwards in the little room, the planks creaking under his tread.

"Lucilla, in heaven's name, don't make it harder for me than it is," he groaned. "Night and day I have fought the matter out with my conscience. For our love's sake, yes, but for honour's sake, how can I take my stand in open competition against the fortunate of the earth ? Even to you I have not confessed the secret of my tainted origin. . . . Lucilla, my father was a pork butcher. . . ."

The poor wife's head drooped. But she cast her shawl aside, rose, and staggered to her feet. He bent towards. She seized his head in her hands and pressed her lips to the bald spot : "My noble James !" she murmured.

[R. M., Brighton.]

MR. SWINBURNE CRITICISES THIS WEEK'S COMPETITION.

Parody is sometimes the sincere, if sinister, homage which perverted talent pays at the shrine of incontestable genius ; more often it is the effete product of a mind, essentially mimetic, whose original and inveterate imbecility has developed something of the mischief, and all the malignity, of simian decrepitude. To which class belong the score or so of mocking-birds, who are led or driven, for the guerdon of a guinea, to gibe or gibber, strut or stammer, with notes borrowed from the masters of incomparable speech and peerless song, it would need the discernment of a Daniel to decide. Some, no doubt, are nothing more heinous than misguided and miscalculating enthusiasts, who desire to derive a not wholly infamous immortality from a momentary association with men, whose mannerisms they can mimic, but whose merits they are impotent to emulate or destroy. There are others, who take the assonance, alliteration, and matchless music which are the radiant and glorious garment of rare and translucent thought, to cover or clothe the senseless emanations of the shrunken cerebellum of a palsied ape.

[F. G. C., Hull.]

In addition to the above we have received :

PARODY OF	BY
Ouida.....	A. G., Cheltenham.
Macterlinck	E. U., London.
Henry James	M. E. H., Whitby.
Marie Corelli	J. D. W., London.
.....	A. H. C., Lee.
.....	A. E. W., Inverary.
.....	A. M. C., Leicester.
.....	H. W. Dunn, S. Tottenham.
Rhoda Broughton	T. C., Buxted.
Bernard Capes	A. S. W., Preston.
Richard Le Gallienne.....	H. A. M., London.
J. M. Barrie	C. D. L., Cricklewood.
.....	B. H. G., London.
Anthony Hope.....	E. L. S., London.
George Meredith.....	H. R., Great Grimshy.
.....	N. S., London.
.....	E. W. H., Manchester.
Clement Scott	N. P., London.
Jerome K. Jerome	L. H. D., London.
W. E. Henley	F. W. S., London.

Competition No. 61 (New Series).

THE Beacon tower on Duart Point, on the west coast of Scotland, which has been built as a memorial to William Black, the novelist, and as a landmark to the fishermen, is now completed. We offer a prize of One Guinea for the most suitable inscription to be placed on the tower. Limit fifty words.

RULES.

Answers, addressed "Literary Competition, THE ACADEMY, 43, Chancery-lane, W.C.," must reach us not later than the first post of Wednesday, November 21. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found on the second page of Wrapper, or it cannot enter into competition. Competitors sending more than one attempt at solution must accompany each attempt with a separate coupon ; otherwise the first only will be considered.

MR. HENTY'S NEW STORIES.

WITH BULLER IN NATAL:

Or, a Born Leader.

With 10 Illustrations by W. Rainey, R.I., and a Map.
Crown 8vo, cloth elegant, olive edges, 6s.

"One of the most powerful of Mr. G. A. Henty's annual instalments of boys' books."—Pall Mall Gazette.

IN THE IRISH BRIGADE:

A Tale of War in Flanders and Spain.

With 12 Page Illustrations by Charles M. Sheldon.
Crown 8vo, cloth elegant, olive edges, 6s.

"A noble tale.....The chapters concerning the war in Spain are particularly full and interesting."—World.

OUT WITH GARIBALDI:

A Story of the Liberation of Italy.

With 8 Illustrations by W. Rainey, R.I.
Crown 8vo, cloth elegant, olive edges, 5s.

"The practised author tells his story well."—Athenæum.

"An exciting tale of adventure."—Pall Mall Gazette.

London: BLACKIE & SON, LIMITED, Old Bailey.

Just published, royal 8vo, cloth, 6s.

THE STORY of DON QUIXOTE.

Retold by his Honour JUDGE PARRY, and Illustrated by WALTER CRANE.

WITH 11 COLOURED FULL-PAGE PLATES, 19 HALF-PAGE PLATES,
THE TITLE-PAGE, AND THE COVER.

"An exquisite book is Judge Parry's version of 'Don Quixote.' Mr. Walter Crane's illustrations are most delightful."—Echo.

. Also an Edition of 100 Copies, printed on Japanese Yellum and suitably bound, price 25s. net. Each Copy of this Edition is signed by the Author and numbered.

London: BLACKIE & SON, LIMITED, Old Bailey.

A SELECTION FROM

Wells Gardner, Darton & Co.'s List.

The New Work by the Author of "The Prisoner of the Khalifa."

UNDER THE REBEL'S REIGN:

A Story of Egyptian Revolt. By CHARLES NEUFELD. Illustrated by C. M. SHEDDEN. Large crown 8vo, cloth boards, 6s.

Mr. Neufeld will be remembered as the unfortunate prisoner of the Khalifa. He was liberated by Lord Kitchener after the battle of Omdurman.

The New Book by the Author of "Dinkinbar," &c.

THE WHITE STONE.

By H. C. MACILWAINE, Author of "Dinkinbar," "Fate the Fiddler," &c. With numerous Illustrations by D. G. ROWLANDSON. Extra crown 8vo, cloth boards, gilt top, 6s.

The New Volume by the Author of "Stories from the Faerie Queene."

THE BOOK OF KING ARTHUR AND HIS NOBLE KNIGHTS.

Stories from Sir Thomas Malory's "Morte d'Arthur." By MARY MACLEOD. Introduction by Prof. J. W. HALES. With Illustrations from Drawings by A. G. WALKER, Sculptor. Large crown 8vo, fancy cloth boards, 6s. Uniform with Darton's Fine Art Gift-Books.

THE GOBLIN:

A Novel. By CATHERINE S. and FLORENCE FOSTER. Large crown 8vo, cloth boards, 6s.

A thoroughly wholesome tale, of which the scene is the Yorkshire Moors.

The Question of the Day.

NO ROOM TO LIVE.

By GEORGE HAW. With an Introduction by Sir WALTER BESANT. Crown 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d.

"Deserves to be widely read and deeply pondered."—Morning Post.

"This is a volume that everybody should read, and not read only, but keep at hand for reference."—Spectator.

CALLED TO FIGHT:

Sunday Reading for Boys. By CAROLINE M. HAILLETT. Fcap. 8vo, cloth boards, 2s.

These Readings are the result of long experience and of many talks with boys.

London: WELLS GARDNER, DARTON & CO., 3, Paternoster Buildings, E.C.; and 44, Victoria Street, S.W.

Smith, Elder & Co.'s New Books.

THE REMINISCENCES OF THE FIRST PREMIER OF NATAL.

JUST PUBLISHED. Large crown 8vo, 10s. 6d.

A LIFETIME IN SOUTH AFRICA:

Being the Recollections of the First Premier of Natal.

By the Hon Sir JOHN ROBINSON, K.C.M.G.,

Author of "George Linton," "The Colonies and the Century," &c.

Pall Mall Gazette.—"Few could write a South African book carrying so much authority as one by Sir John Robinson. These reminiscences constitute one triumphant testimonial to the persistence for good of British men. It is a story to make every Briton proud of his race, of Natal, and of Sir John Robinson, and a story for every Briton to read."

A VOLUNTEER'S EXPERIENCES IN THE BOER WAR.

IMMEDIATELY.—With a Frontispiece, crown 8vo, 6s.

IN THE RANKS OF THE C.I.V.

A Narrative and Diary of Personal Experiences with the C.I.V. Battery (Honourable Artillery Company) in South Africa.

BY "Driver" ERSKINE CHILDERS,

CLERK IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

NEW VOLUME BY DR. W. H. FITCHETT.

IMMEDIATELY.—Crown 8vo, 6s.

WELLINGTON'S MEN.

Edited by W. H. FITCHETT, M.A., LL.D.,

AUTHOR OF "DEEDS THAT WON THE EMPIRE," "FIGHTS FOR THE FLAG," "HOW ENGLAND SAVED EUROPE," &c.

. This work describes war as seen by the man in the ranks. There is enough reality about it to give it historical value, with sufficient personal incident to make it as readable as a novel.

A TREASURY of IRISH POETRY in the ENGLISH TONGUE. Edited by the Rev. STOPFORD A. BROOKE and T. W. ROLLESTON. Crown 8vo, 7s. 6d. [On November 28th.

DOMESTICITIES: a Little Book of Household Impressions. By E. V. LUCAS. Small fcap. 8vo, 5s.

[In a few days.

CONFERENCES on BOOKS and MEN.

Reprinted from the "Cornhill Magazine." By the AUTHOR of "PAGES from a PRIVATE DIARY." Crown 8vo, 6s. [Immediately.

FIFTH IMPRESSION NOW READY.—With Maps, large crown 8vo, 7s. 6d.

THE GREAT BOER WAR.

By A. CONAN DOYLE.

AUTHOR OF "THE WHITE COMPANY," "RODNEY STONE," "UNCLE BERNAC," "THE TRAGEDY OF THE 'KOROSKO,'" "THE GREEN FLAG, AND OTHER STORIES OF WAR AND SPORT," &c.

Sketch.—"Unquestionably the most striking book the War has produced. A masterly piece of work, a real contribution to historical writing."

NEW NOVELS.

THIRD IMPRESSION.—With Illustrations by Albert Sterner. Crown 8vo, 6s.

ELEANOR.

By Mrs. HUMPHRY WARD,

AUTHOR OF "ROBERT ELSMER," "MARCELLA," "SIR GEORGE TRESSADY," &c.

St. James's Gazette.—"The character of Lucy Foster is beautifully drawn. The struggle between jealousy and friendship in Mrs. Burgoyne is exceedingly true to life. The situation is intensely dramatic, and Mrs. Humphry Ward has realised it with subtle insight, and handled it with a refined and feeling touch which no contemporary writer could surpass.....The whole book shows a great writer at her very best."

NEW NOVEL BY KATHARINE TYNAN.

JUST PUBLISHED.—Crown 8vo, 6s.

A DAUGHTER OF THE FIELDS.

By KATHARINE TYNAN,

AUTHOR OF "THE DEAR IRISH GIRL," "SHE WALKS IN BEAUTY," &c.

THE ISLE of UNREST. By Henry Seton

MERRIMAN, Author of "The Sowers," "In Kedar's Tents," "Roden's Corner." With 6 Full-Page Illustrations. Crown 8vo, 6s.

Third Impression nearly exhausted.

Fourth Impression in the Press

Times.—"Capital reading, absorbing reading.....An exciting story with 'thrills' at every third page."

London: SMITH, ELDER & CO., 15, Waterloo Place, S.W.

THE RELIGIOUS TRACT SOCIETY INCORPORATED.

NEW BOOKS.

FROM ALDERSHOT TO PRETORIA.

A Story of Christian Work among the Troops in South Africa. By the Rev. W. E. SELLERS. With 15 illustrations. Crown 8vo, cloth boards, 2s. 6d.

"We lay the book down with regret; we could willingly and thankfully read twice as much, so full of interest is every page, so sympathetically and pleasantly is it written."—Record.

"Mr. Sellers' book is deeply interesting, and will repay one interested in this engrossing subject for both the purchase and perusal of it."—Guardian.

"Well-chosen anecdotes of a kind that would be useful to speakers at religious meetings."—Manchester Guardian.

KNOTS.

For the Sunday Address to Boys and Girls. By Rev. A. N. MACKRAY, M.A. Crown 8vo, cloth boards, 2s.

"We can recommend this book to teachers and preachers who are in search of material for teaching purposes, and who wish for a model of clear, unfettered pulpit address."—Literary World.

THE WAY INTO THE KINGDOM:

Or, Thoughts on the Beatitudes. By Rev. J. D. JONES, M.A., B.D., of Bourne-mouth. Fcap. 8vo, cloth gilt, 1s. 6d.

"Fresh, cultured, earnest, practical."—Life of Faith.

"Mr. Jones writes in an effective style, and has always something to say that is interesting and suggestive."—Glasgow Herald.

"Foresful and suggestive."—Baptist Magazine.

NEW EDITIONS.

THE HARVEST OF A QUIET EYE.

By Prebendary J. R. VERNON, Author of "Random Truths in Common Things," &c. Crown 8vo, cloth boards, 6s.

Mr. RUSKIN wrote of the first edition of "The Harvest of a Quiet Eye," that "he had never seen anything more gracefully or rightly done."

THE GREAT REST-GIVER.

By the late W. HAIG MILLER. New Edition. Small crown 8vo, cloth gilt, gilt top, 2s. 6d.

The Rev. C. H. SPRUGEON said of this book: "We never enjoyed any kind of reading more than that which Mr. Haig Miller produced; he was a master of the art of simple, touching, illustrative book-talking. We would have all men read this book, if they desire peace of mind and joy of heart."

THE TEMPLE AT THE TIME OF JESUS CHRIST.

By ALFRED EDERSHEIM, M.A., D.D., Author of "The Bible History," "Sketches of Jewish Social Life in the Days of Christ," &c. New Edition. Imperial 16mo, cloth gilt, gilt edges, 5s.

THE RELIGIOUS TRACT SOCIETY,
INCORPORATED,
56, PATERNOSTER ROW, LONDON.

JARROLD & SONS' NEW LIST.

FIRST AND SECOND EDITIONS EXHAUSTED.
THIRD EDITION NOW READY.

Maurus Jokai's Famous Novel. THE DAY OF WRATH.

By MAURUS JOKAI. 6s.
Translated by R. NISBET BAIN. With a special Photogravure Portrait of Dr. Maurus Jokai, Author of "Black Diamonds," "A Hungarian Nabob," &c. 6s.
"There is no novel in which Jokai's all-round forcefulness and daring wealth of colour are more terrible. It is altogether as barbaric, outrageous, and grand a book as could be imagined, even from the pen of Jokai. The farcical humour of the school-master's treatment of his pupils and of his night in the dog-kennel is the genius of extravagance."—Pall Mall Gazette.

SECOND EDITION NOW READY. By a Popular Hungarian Author. ST. PETER'S UMBRELLA.

By KÁLMÁN MIKSZÁTH.
With an Introduction by R. NISBET BAIN, a Photogravure Portrait of the Author, and 3 illustrations. 6s.
"The freshness, geniality, high spirits, and humour of Mikszáth make him a fascinating companion. His peasants and priests, Jews and gentilefolk, are amazingly human. Mikszáth is a born storyteller. His gaiety is always unforced, he can be tender at will, but his pathos, to judge from this book, is wholly free from any falsetto notes."—Spectator.

JUST PUBLISHED. Curtis Yorke's New Novel. CARPATHIA KNOX.

By CURTIS YORKE. 6s.
With a fine Photogravure Portrait of the Author.
Author of "Hush Once," "That Little Girl," &c.
The story treats of an idyllic summer through Northern Spain by a charming quartette. The manners and customs of Asturias are faithfully and amusingly presented in the author's brisk, fresh style.

Fergus Hume's New Novel. A WOMAN'S BURDEN.

By FERGUS HUME. 6s.
Author of "The Mystery of a Hansom Cab," "The Lone Inn," &c.
Written in Fergus Hume's most thrilling style, it is an exciting novel from first to last. For originality of plot, the weaving and unweaving of its threads, striking situations, and bright descriptive dialogue, surpasses most of his latter works.

An Exciting Historical Romance of Virginia. VIVIAN OF VIRGINIA.

Being the Memoirs of our First Rebellion by John Vivian, of Middle Plantation, Virginia.
By HUBERT FULLER.
With 10 charming illustrations by Frank T. Merrill. 6s.
"There is not a dull moment in the quaintly written story, adventure following adventure, holding the reader in thrall, whilst the love interest is fully sustained."—The Gentlewoman.
London: JARROLD & SONS, 10 & 11, Warwick Lane, E.C.

SERMONS BY REV. ALEX. MACLAREN, D.D.

Crown 8vo, cloth boards, price 5s. each, post free.
THE UNCHANGING CHRIST, and other Sermons.

"Distinguished by the finest scholarship and most exquisite literary finish."—Christian Leader.

THE GOD of the AMEN, and other Sermons.

"The several sermons contained in this volume are replete with a keen spiritual insight, combined with an aptness of illustration and beauty of diction which cannot fail to both impress and charm the reader."—Methodist Times.

THE WEARIED CHRIST, and other Sermons.

"They show the same wonderful fertility of apt and beautiful illustrations, the same exquisite use of language, the same direct heart-searching power which we are accustomed to find in all Dr. MacLaren's works."—Christian World Pulpit.

PAUL'S PRAYERS, and other Sermons.

"They are plain enough to be understood by the unlearned, and yet have sufficient richness and cogency to attract the most cultivated."—New York Observer.

CHRIST'S "MUSTS," and other Sermons.

"Felicitous exposition, rugged, intense eloquence, and beautiful illustration."—Word and Work.

THE HOLY of HOLIES. A Series of Sermons on the 14th, 15th, and 16th Chapters of the Gospel by John.

"No British preacher has unfolded this portion of Scripture in a more scholarly style."—North British Daily Mail.

THE BEATITUDES, and other Sermons.

"An excellent exposition of the Beatitudes.... full of thought and knowledge and power."—British Weekly.

ALEXANDER & SHEPHEARD, LIMITED,
21 & 22, FURNIVAL STREET, HOLBORN, LONDON, E.C.

FROM MR. MELROSE'S LIST.

.. NEW BOOKS ..
At 5s.

THE MAGIC MIST, And other Dartmoor Legends.

By EVA C. ROGERS.
Profusely Illustrated by C. Eldred and P. B. Hickling. Imp. 16mo, cloth boards.

FOURTH EDITION. 20th THOUSAND. FIELD - MARSHAL LORD ROBERTS,

V.C., K.P., G.C.B.

A Biographical Sketch.

By HORACE G. GROSER,
Author of "The Kingdom of Manhood," &c.
Price 1s. net.

"An accurate and interesting account of a crowded career."—Indian Review.

"It has reached a third edition, a good fortune which it well deserves."—Literature.
"Yet another edition of this excellent little biography."—Bookman.
"Written with great care and considerable literary effect."—Outlook.

JOHN RUSKIN, A Biographical Sketch.

By R. ED. PENGELLY.
With a Reproduction from a Water-Colour Portrait by the subject of the Sketch, and with Original and hitherto Unpublished Letters. Price 1s. net.

"Modestly described as a sketch. But though only a sketch, a very graphic one, giving us an admirable idea of the great master of art and English prose, from the inside! Everywhere it breathes the warm sympathy that alone can interpret any man's life and ideals. The writer keeps a sane and sound judgment; he does not worship his hero; but, all the more he commands our respect as he attempts to depict him, and expound his teachings. We have much enjoyed every page of the sketch; even the orderly disorder with which it is planned. It deserves to run into many editions; and if it shall lead to the reading of Mr. Ruskin's earlier works, only good will come of it. We gladly welcome and commend the little volume."—Sword and Trowel.

At 3s. 6d.

FROM THE SCOURGE OF THE TONGUE.

By BESSIE MARCHANT (Mrs. J. A. Comfort). Imp. 16mo, cloth, bevelled boards, gilt top.

WESTWARD HO!

By CHARLES KINGSLEY.
Imp. 16mo, cloth, bevelled boards, gilt top.
Illustrated by Ayton Symington.

At 2s. 6d.

BARFIELD'S BLAZER, And other School Stories.

By W. E. CULE.

At 2s.

THE SCHOOL'S HONOUR And other Stories.

By HAROLD AVERY.
New and Enlarged Edition. Illustrated.

.. BOOKS FOR THE HEART ..

Edited, and with an Introduction by
ALEXANDER SMELLIE, M.A.
Fcap. 8vo, printed on antique wove paper, cloth boards, gilt top. Price 2s. 6d. each volume.

NEW VOLUME.

THE HEIDELBERG CATECHISM.

A NEW TRANSLATION.
Uniform with "Books for the Heart."

QUIET HOURS.

SECOND SERIES.
By JOHN PULSFORD, D.D. Price 2s. 6d.

THE SUPREMACY OF MAN.

By JOHN PULSFORD, D.D.,
Author of "Quiet Hours," &c. Price 2s. 6d.

SPORTS FOR BOYS.

AN OUTDOOR SERIES.
By HOWARD SPICER, and others.
Illustrated. Price 1s. net.

SPORTS FOR GIRLS.

AN OUTDOOR SERIES.
Arranged and Edited by HOWARD SPICER, Editor of "Sandow's Magazine of Physical Culture," "Sports Library," &c. Illustrated. 1s. net.

16, PILGRIM STREET, LONDON, E.C.

MESSRS. HUTCHINSON & CO.'S NEW BOOKS

Messrs. HUTCHINSON & CO. announce this day a SECOND LARGE EDITION of

THE RIGHT HON. JOSEPH CHAMBERLAIN:

The Man and the Statesman.

By N. MURRELL MARRIS.

In demy 8vo, buckram gilt and gilt top, with 32 Page Illustrations and Photogravure Portrait, 10s. net.

SOME EXCEPTIONALLY FAVOURABLE REVIEWS.

"A really admirable record of a remarkable life. We confess to having taken up the bulky volume with considerable reluctance; we laid it down with the verdict 'Well done!' Well and usefully done. A succinct and thoroughly readable narrative, quite the best life of a living man which has appeared since Lord Roberts's autobiography. The illustrations of the volume add considerably to the interest of the text."—Pall Mall Gazette.

"As to the interest and importance of the work there can be no question."—Observer.

"An extremely well-balanced book, which is not only of the highest interest as describing the career of one of the ablest statesmen of the end of the century, but for the light which it throws on the political, social, and commercial life of the fifty years now closing."—Glasgow Herald.

"A striking book."—Daily Express.

"He has told his story with complete success, and his book will be read on all sides."—Yorkshire Post.

"It will be widely read."—Globe.

"Mr. Marris is to be congratulated on having written a useful and interesting book."—Morning Post.

"THE WORK HAS UNDOUBTED VALUE."—STANDARD.

LORD ROSEBERY: his Life and Speeches.

By THOMAS F. G. COATES.

In 2 large demy 8vo vols. (over 1,000 pages), handsomely bound in buckram gilt and gilt top, 24s. net.

With Full-Page Illustrations and Portraits printed on Art Paper, and 2 Photogravure Portraits.

THE SPEECHES ARE GIVEN BY PERMISSION OF THE EARL OF ROSEBERY AND THE TIMES.

"The author has fulfilled his task with diligence and discretion. The life is not wholly without attraction, even for that fastidious and pampered person the general reader, while as a trustworthy record of the views of Lord Rosebery on the vast range of subjects in which he has shown himself specially interested it renders to the student of modern politics a substantial service. The work is accompanied by photogravure portraits and other illustrations, and, more important still, is provided with an index which will be especially prized by those who desire to use it as a book of reference."—Daily News.

"It makes a really valuable record, complete to date, of one of our leading public men. A couple of photogravures and numerous portraits and cartoons enhance the interest of the memoir."—Observer.

KINGS OF THE ROD, RIFLE, AND GUN.

By "THORMANBY." In 2 vols., demy 8vo, cloth gilt, with 32 Page Portraits, 21s. net.

[Immediately.]

DISCIPLES OF ÆSCULAPIUS.

By the late Sir BENJAMIN WARD RICHARDSON, M.D., F.R.S., &c. With a Memoir of the Author by his DAUGHTER.

In 2 vols., demy 8vo, cloth gilt, with 48 Page Portraits and other Illustrations, and with Photogravure Portrait of the Author, 36s. [Immediately.]

THE STORY OF BELGIUM.

With a Chapter on the Congo Free State. By CARLYLE SMYTHE, B.A. In crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 6s.

HERO-PATRIOTS OF THE NINETEENTH CENTURY.

By EDGAR SANDERSON, M.A. In crown 8vo, cloth gilt, with 8 Illustrations, 6s.

VIRGIN SAINTS AND MARTYRS.

By S. BARING-GOULD. In crown 8vo, cloth gilt, with 16 Page Illustrations by F. Auger, 6s.

[Immediately.]

INTIMATE CHINA.

By Mrs. ARCHIBALD LITTLE. Popular Edition. In demy 8vo, cloth gilt, with 120 Illustrations, 6s.

"The Celestial as he is. It is a graphic word-picture."—Daily Chronicle.

Mr. T. P. O'Connor, M.P., says: "This is the kind of book we want about China—a book written after careful and prolonged observation, and not merely strung together after a brief and hurried rush through the country."

HUTCHINSON'S NEW SIX-SHILLING NOVELS.

JEZEBEL.

BOY.

THE FILLIBUSTERS.

IN MALE ATTIRE.

OF ROYAL BLOOD.

THE MESMERISTS.

THE WASTREL.

THE OUTCAST EMPEROR.

THE YELLOW MAN.

A LITTLE GREY SHEEP.

MORRISON'S MACHINE.

THE WHISTLING MAID.

Richard Pryce.

Marie Corelli.

Cutcliffe Hyne.

Joseph Hatton.

William Le Queux.

B. L. Farjeon.

Mary Angela Dickens.

The Lady Helen Craven.

Carlton Dawe.

Mrs. Hugh Fraser.

J. S. Fletcher.

Ernest Rhys.

A ROGUE IN LOVE.

PRIDE OF RACE.

GWYNETTE OF THORNHAUGH.

CHARMING RENEE.

THE SECOND YOUTH OF THEODORA

HAGGITH SAY: QUAKERESS.

KING OF THE ROCKS.

PLOTTERS OF PARIS.

UNLEAVENED BREAD.

A LADY OF THE REGENCY.

Tom Gallon.

B. L. Farjeon.

[In the press.]

F. W. Hayes.

Arabella Kenealy.

DESANGES.

Mrs. Lynn Linton.

[In the press.]

Mark Ashton.

Ambrose Pratt.

Edmund Mitchell.

Robert Grant.

Mrs. Stepney Rawson.

AND NEW NOVELS BY

Mr. Richard Whitelng, Madame Sarah Grand, Mr. Frankfort Moore, Mr. J. A. Steuart, Mrs. Hugh Fraser, Mr. Tom Gallon, Mr. B. L. Farjeon, Mr. William Le Queux, Miss Adeline Serjeant, and Mr. Percy White.

London: HUTCHINSON & CO., Paternoster Row.

A. & C. BLACK'S LIST

READY NEXT WEEK.

Demy 8vo, cloth, price 7s. 6d. net.

CLUE: a Guide through Greek to Hebrew Scripture. By EDWIN A. ABBOTT, Author of "St. Thomas of Canterbury," &c.

This work aims at demonstrating that parts of the Synoptic Gospels are based upon a common original Hebrew document, not Aramaic, but Hebrew in the strict sense—"Biblical Hebrew." The details of the demonstration are supported by quotations from the Hebrew and from the Greek translations of it, and are given in notes for "the learned." But the text contains neither Greek nor Hebrew, and appeals to the general reader.

NOW READY.

Crown 8vo, cloth, price 7s. 6d. net.

THE ASCENSION OF ISAIAH.Texts, Translations, and Commentary.

By R. H. CHARLES, D.D., Professor of Biblical Greek, Trinity College, Dublin, Author of "The Assumption of Moses," "The Apocalypse of Baruch," &c.

"The entire volume is one which will receive the same grateful welcome from all readers of Apocalyptic literature as has been extended to the author's previous important contributions to this branch of scholarship."—Record.

READY NEXT WEEK.

Crown 8vo, cloth, price 5s. net.

CHRISTIAN CONFERENCE ESSAYS.

Edited by Rev. A. G. B. ATKINSON, M.A., with an Introduction by the Right Rev. the LORD BISHOP of HEREFORD, and contributions by Prof. Auguste Sabatier, the Very Rev. the Dean of Ripon, the Rev. Canon Barnett, the Rev. Brooke Herford, D.D., the Rev. R. E. Bartlett, M.A., the Rev. Brooke Lambert, M.A., the Rev. Agar Beet, D.D., F. Reginald Statham, the Rev. Prof. G. Henslow, M.A., the Rev. R. F. Horton, M.A.

NOW READY.

Crown 8vo, cloth, price 1s. 6d. net.

THOUGHTS OF A FREETHINKER.

The design of this book is to determine if possible whether we have in the Bible a divine revelation demanding veneration and unquestioning acquiescence; or whether, like all other writings, these Scriptures are to be examined and tested before we believe their assertions and accept their teaching.

NOW READY.

In 2 vols., square demy 8vo, cloth, price £2 2s. net.

THE VENETIAN REPUBLIC: Its Rise, its Growth, and its Fall, 421-1797.

By W. CAREW HAZLITT.

"Mr. Hazlitt has devoted vast industry and no inconsiderable learning to it."—The Academy.
 "This splendid work will continue the fame of a noteworthy literary family."—Glasgow Herald.

NOW READY.

Crown 8vo, cloth, price 2s. 6d.; paper, price 2s.

THE LIKENESS OF THE NIGHT. A Play, in Four Acts.

By Mrs. W. K. CLIFFORD, Author of "Aunt Anne," "The Last Touches," "Mere Stories," &c.

NOW READY.

Crown 8vo, cloth, price 2s. 6d.

ON SANITARY AND OTHER MATTERS.

By GEORGE S. KEITH, M.D., LL.D., F.R.C.P.E., Author of "A Plea for a Simpler Life," "Fads of an Old Physician," &c.

"Dr. Keith is familiar to a large number of readers, and his new small volume should introduce him to many more."—Observer.

NOW READY.

Cloth, gilt top, price 2s. net per volume.

HORÆ SUBSECIVÆ.

By JOHN BROWN, M.D., LL.D., &c. New Edition. In 3 vols., 6½ × 4½ in., printed on thin Bible paper, With Portrait of Dr. John Brown by Sir George Reid.

A. & C. BLACK, Soho Square, London.

MACMILLAN & CO.'S LIST.

READY ON TUESDAY.

F. MARION CRAWFORD'S NEW WORK.RULERS of the SOUTH: Sicily, Calabria, and Malta.

By F. MARION CRAWFORD.

Illustrated by 28 Photogravures and 91 Illustrations in the Text by HENRY BROKMAN.

In 2 vols., 8vo, 21s. net.

REFLECTIONS ON THE ORIGINS AND DESTINY OF IMPERIAL BRITAIN.

By Professor J. A. CRAMB, M.A.

Extra crown 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

NOTICE.—The First Large Impression having been exhausted, a Second Impression is now ready.

LIFE AND LETTERS OF

THOMAS HENRY HUXLEY.

By LEONARD HUXLEY.

With Portraits and Illustrations. In 2 vols., 8vo, 30s. net.

SYLVANA'S LETTERS TO AN UNKNOWN FRIEND.

By E. V. B.

With numerous Full-Page and other Illustrations.

Extra crown 8vo, 8s. 6d. net.

GLOBE.—"Well deserving of a hearty welcome from all who can appreciate alike the charms of Nature and of literature. 'E. V. B.' has displayed on more than one previous occasion her feeling for all that is beautiful in both, and her latest book will not disappoint her admirers.....Adorned by some admirable pictures."

The NECKLACE of PRINCESS FIORIMONDE.

By MARY de MORGAN.

With 25 Illustrations by WALTER CRANE. Globe 8vo, 3s. 6d.

THE ROMANCE OF SPAIN.

By CHARLES W. WOOD, F.R.G.S.

Illustrated. 8vo, 10s. net.

MANCHESTER COURIER.—"A work brimful of the charm of a lovely land and interesting people."

THE LATEST 6s. NOVELS.

RHODA BROUGHTON.

Foes in Law.

MAURICE HEWLETT.

Richard Yea-and-Nay.

MARION CRAWFORD.

In the Palace of the King.

ROSA N. CAREY.

Rue with a Difference.

W. WALDORF ASTOR.

Pharaoh's Daughter.

S. WEIR MITCHELL.

Dr. North and his Friends.

EDWIN ASA DIX.

Deacon Bradbury.

B. K. BENSON.

Who Goes There?

The Story of a Spy in the Civil War.

NEW CHILDREN'S BOOKS.

BY MRS. MOLESWORTH.

THE HOUSE THAT GREW. Illustrated by ALICE B. WOODWARD. Crown 8vo, 1s. 6d.

WITH COLOURED ILLUSTRATIONS BY S. ROSAMOND PRAEGER.

THE TALE of the LITTLE TWIN DRAGONS. Oblong 4to, picture boards, 6s.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "ELIZABETH AND HER GERMAN GARDEN."

THE APRIL BABY'S BOOK OF TUNES. With Coloured Illustrations by KATE GREEN-AWAY. Small 4to, 6s.

WRITTEN AND PICTURED BY MABEL DEARMER.

A NOAH'S ARK GEOGRAPHY. Globe 4to, picture boards, 6s.

MACMILLAN & CO., LIMITED, London.

The Academy

A Weekly Review of Literature and Life.

No. 1490. Established 1869.

24 November, 1900

Price Threepence.

[Registered as a Newspaper.]

The Literary Week.

MR. CHURTON COLLINS, who, like the late Mr. Huxley, has had experience of the bloodless warfare of controversy, will in his next book tell some plain truths about current literature. The volume will be called Ephemera Critica, and Mr. Collins has this to say in his preface: "These essays are partly a protest and partly an experiment. As a protest they explain, and, I hope, justify themselves; as an experiment they are an attempt to illustrate what we should be fortunate if we could see more frequently illustrated by abler hands. They are a series of studies in serious, patient, and absolutely impartial criticism, having for its object a comprehensive survey of the vices and defects, as well as of the merits, characteristic of current Belles Lettres."

THOSE who have read Mr. Max Beerbohm's charming "fairy tale for tired men," called "The Happy Hypocrite," will be glad to hear that Mr. Beerbohm has dramatised this trifle, which contains a deal more purpose and intention than many a bulky tome. It will be produced by Mrs. Patrick Campbell, but we have not heard which actor has been cast for the hero, Lord George Hell, who was "proud of being horrid," and whose appearance resembled Caligula with a dash of Falstaff.

MR. J. M. MORRISON is about to issue, through Messrs. Gay & Bird, a translation of the poems of Leopardi. In a modest preface, Mr. Morrison gives a brief account of Leopardi's life, and says:

If it is any justification for one's temerity in attempting what one of our greatest living authorities and critics has pronounced to be a task never likely to be accomplished adequately in our language, may I say that several able renderings of the canti have appeared in German, whilst they have been practically ignored with us? It seemed to me strange that England should be left behind in an honest attempt at least to interpret the great Italian classic of the nineteenth century to a wider public in this country than those who can approach him in the original. . . . Of the thirty-four canti, ending with "The Genista," that last and most mature and most sublime product of Leopardi's genius, I have omitted three from this translation; two ("Consalvo" and the "Palinode") as being likely to seem of little interest or even trivial to English readers, the third ("On the Marriage of my Sister Pauline") as being, though fine in itself, mainly repetitious of the lofty sentiments and of the fervour and passion of Leopardi's other patriotic odes. . . . I have retained Leopardi's form and metre, employing the same regular, and sometimes intricate, sequences of rhyme wherever he does. Leopardi, however, latterly almost discarded this artificial aid to verse, as if it were a base fetter which impeded the free soaring of his genius.

A LITTLE play was produced on Wednesday night at the Kennington Theatre which should not be overlooked by those who care for that unusual thing, literature on the stage. It is called "Carrots," and is a translation, admirably done by Mr. Alfred Sutro, of Jules Renard's "Poil-de-Carotte." Renard has described himself as "chasseur d'images," but in this little dramatic experiment he is simply a story-teller, with all the charm and naïveté which has gone from the stage to the short story, such stories as Mary Wilkins, for instance, can write. The thing was a picture, not only because Miss Gertrude Elliott looked and acted delightfully in it; it presented clear, quaintly-defined types of character; it had truth to nature, and a fresh, youthful humour. "Poil-de-Carotte" is already, in France, a synonym for a particular kind of child, not at all the usual French kind. The little play was received with ready sympathy at Kennington; it is to be hoped that we shall soon be able to see it at a less distant theatre.

MR. ARTHUR L. HUMPHREYS seems to have become Lord Rosebery's publisher. After the Napoleon, he issues the text of the Rectorial Address at Glasgow, apparently from Lord Rosebery's MS. The address was a fine appeal to the nation, full of arresting and inspiring passages. None better than this on the British Empire:

How marvellous it all is! Built not by saints and angels, but the work of men's hands; cemented with men's honest blood and with a world of tears, welded by the best brains of centuries past; not without the taint and reproach incidental to all human work, but constructed on the whole with pure and splendid purpose. Human, and yet not wholly human, for the most heedless and the most cynical must see the finger of the Divine. Growing as trees grow, while others slept; fed by the faults of others as well as by the character of our fathers; reaching with the ripple of a resistless tide over tracts and islands and continents, until our little Britain woke up to find herself the foster-mother of nations and the source of united empires.

MR. SPOFFORD'S A Book for All Readers (Putnam)—with which we have already dealt briefly—is "Designed as an aid to the Collection, Use, and Preservation of Books, and the Formation of Public and Private Libraries." One of the chapters is called "Humours of the Library," from which we make a few extracts:

In a Wisconsin library, a young lady asked for the "Life of National Hawthorne," and the "Autograph on the breakfast table."

Boy's remark on returning a certain juvenile book to the library: "I don't want any more of them books. The girls is all too holy."

Anthology is the study of insects.

Belles lettres are the letters of French writers.

Cicero was known for Latin poetry.

Charlotte Brontë is an American nine-tenth-century children's book.

Hudibras was an early Saxon poem.

Mr. Swinburne once wrote "A Century of Scoundrels."

At last! A new weekly comic paper is announced at the price of a penny. The Editor is Mr. Leslie Wilson, and Sir George Newnes is the publisher. There is room for it.

OF living critics, who is the least likely to be a worshipper of Coventry Patmore? The answer is, of course, Mr. Augustine Birrell. And the Speaker has turned Mr. Birrell's mind upon Patmore, with the result that it has been able to print an article at once tactful and racy, kindly and destructive. We print a salient passage:

It would be cruel, and perhaps unfair, to collect from the ample materials Mr. Champneys has placed before us Patmore's testimonials to himself and his depreciations of his contemporaries. He had no doubt of his own consecration—he even conceived he had had lain upon him an injunction from on high, first to be the poet of Wedded Love and next to render into verse that would reach the hearts of men the mystery of the Virgin Mother of God. Whimsical notions of this kind are a true test of genius. If a man can carry them along with his other burdens without injury to his department, without allowing them to obscure his outlook or upset the equanimity of his mind, it will not be difficult to pronounce him great. It is for the careful reader of these volumes to say whether Coventry Patmore can stand a test to which he need never have been exposed. If, despite the darkness of our blockheadism, we are compelled to say Aye or No to this question, for our own part, and without an ounce of braggartism, we are sorrowfully compelled to say No! We notice plainly enough the contortions of the Sybil, but the Inspiration we cannot discover. We anxiously await, as from a witness in the box whose evidence is all-important to our case, words of illuminated wisdom, of penetrating thought, something to testify the seer, the thinker; but they never come. The man, as he now stands revealed to us, seems less than his verse. Given the Angel in the House and the Odes, we should have constructed, had we been bidden to write the poet's life and been unsupplied with any other materials, a very different being, happier, wiser, and more cheerful. As it is, we encounter a man full of protests and complaints, of extravagant opinions and ill-natured comments, without the strength and force of the great combative natures, and destitute of the charm that belongs to those who are quiet, wise, and good.

That is Mr. Birrell's view. We do not share it, and in Mr. Birrell's failure to appreciate Patmore we discern the limitations which enabled him to write down Emerson. We always enjoy Mr. Birrell's criticism because it is alive; but, though alive, and even boisterously so, is it not a trifle flat-footed?

MR. HENLEY tenders Mr. Sidney Lee a qualified apology for his recent assertion that the Dictionary of National Biography had excluded the heroes of certain forms of sport. Mr. Lee protested, and Mr. Henley admits that names whose absence he had bewailed in print are actually present in the Dictionary. But he adds: "All the same, having looked into the matter for myself, I cannot but come to the conclusion that, in this matter of sport, the D.N.B. has not been altogether so well guided as it might have been. To take the P.R. only: we get Broughton, and Mendoza, and Jackson, and Sayers, and Paddock, and Painter, and Spring. But we do not get men so eminent in their line of life as Slack, nor Hen Pearce, nor the Evanses (père et fils), nor Dick Curtis, nor Owen Swift; and, what is worse, we have never a word of either Jem Belcher or Jack Randall—all things considered, the two greatest fighters that ever stripped. So that my apology is offered, and must be accepted, with reservations."

THE New York Nation has usually something to say of a great man that is not said in England. It was outspoken on Ruskin; it is outspoken on Max Müller; yet it has done justice to both. Of Max Müller the Nation says:

Despite the unsatisfactory nature of much of his later work, Müller was by no means a mere go-between, feeding the public with grain raised by others. It is true that he was somewhat vainglorious and not very scrupulous in the allotment of praise which should be rendered for what was done by others under his supervision. What he constantly proclaimed to be his own great work, the edition of the "Rig Veda," was in reality not his at all. A German scholar did the work, and Müller appropriated the credit for it. But, even in this case, though the judgment be true, it is harsh. The German scholar was paid for his labour, and did the best he could to circumvent Müller in getting out his editio prima. The incident is not altogether creditable to either party, but one thing is certain: there would have been no scholar doing the work at all had not Müller started it. That his hand left the plough and he hired someone else to do willingly what he was unwilling to complete, is a matter of minor importance. Then, again, Müller's "Ancient Sanskrit Literature," published forty years ago, was an independent and thoroughly scholarly book, which has ever since held its own with the first publications in this complex field of investigation.

In his guide to English composition, reviewed in another column, Mr. L. Cope Cornford remarks that French and German teachers have come to the conclusion that the classics may be cheerfully abandoned in favour of the simple plan of teaching boys to express themselves in the language into which they are born. We do not believe that the highest authorities (by whom we mean the most consummate literary artists, and not the most energetic educationalists) hold such an opinion. It is increasingly difficult and unprofitable to keep up classical education, but it is for ever idle to depreciate the effects of Latin and Greek on the mind. In a recent article in the Paris Annales Politiques et Littéraires, M. Anatole France has these observations:

I bear a desperate affection for Latin studies. I firmly believe that, without them, the beauty of the French genius is done for. All those of us who have thought somewhat vigorously have learned to think from Latin. I do not exaggerate when I say that that ignorance of Latin is ignorance of the sovereign clearness of expression. All languages are obscure beside Latin. . . . Take "Hamlet"—it is a whole, immense world. I doubt whether anything grander has ever been done. But what do you want a scholar to extract from it? How is he to seize the phantom ideas that are less substantial than the wandering phantom of the Elsinore esplanade? How is he to obtain clearness out of the chaos of images as uncertain as the clouds whose changing forms the young visionary shows to Polonius? The whole English literature, so poetic and so profound, offers similar complexity and similar confusion. . . . Now, open the histories of Titus Livy. There everything is well-ordered, lucid, simple. He is not a profound genius; he is a perfect pedagogue. He never troubles us; but how logically he thinks! How easy it is to explain his ideas, to examine each part separately and show its relation to the whole! This in regard to form. As to content, what do we find there? Lessons in courage, in devotion, in worship of ancestors, in the cult of fatherland. Here is a true classic! I speak not of the Greeks. They are the flower and the perfume. They have more than virtue; they have taste. I mean that sovereign taste, that harmony which is begotten of wisdom.

MEANWHILE it is true, as M. France himself admits, that the abandonment of the classics grows more complete. Not Latin felicities of speech but Anglo-Saxon felicities of slang are mingling with the academic French of to-day. We can understand this. To an imaginative Frenchman the acquisition of a racy English word, which he knows is understood in the East, in the West, on every sea, and in every port, must bring a sense of exaltation. Hence the English "hall" is ousting the French "antichambre," and the English lunch is eaten instead of "déjeuner." "Un vigoureux shake-hands" occurs in a new French novel, and even such expressions as "to boss" and "to give 'em beans" contribute to the growing anglicisation of French.

"I MUST write another time of other books and plays," says Mr. G. S. Street in the Pall Mall Magazine, but straightway adds: "Another time—alas! no. This is the last causerie—confound that word for the last time!—I shall write in the Pall Mall Magazine. I hope you have not been too dreadfully bored." No, we have not been bored. Why this hegira?

In reply to an inquiry we inserted last week a correspondent writes: "The lines

Richard Steele praised him, and cold, stately 'Atticus,'
Old Rowley lean'd on Tom's shoulder, our King!
D'Urfey who mock'd all the noisy, fanatic fuss,
Plot bigots moved him to jest and to sing,

are extracted from an 'Impromptu' consisting of twenty-two lines addressed to the writer when he left Exeter (the city of D'Urfey's birth), some dozen years ago, by the Rev. J. W. Ebsworth, Vicar of Molash, by Ashford, Kent, who is the author likewise of the article in the Dictionary of National Biography. I have the original MS. inserted in my copy of Mr. Ebsworth's fascinating Cavalier Lyrics for Church and Crown, 1887. The printed lines vary somewhat from those in the original MS.; in the latter they run thus:

Addison praised him, the chill, stately 'Atticus,'
'Old Rowley' lean'd on Tom's shoulder, our King!
D'Urfey who mock'd all the noisy, erratic-fuss,
Plot bigots moved him to jest and to sing."

"I FEEL creeping over me the conviction that it is indispensable to life, that it supersedes all other sources of information, and in future the sine qua non of a library will be the possession of the Encyclopædia Britannica." Lord Rosebery spoke these words in a vein of banter at Edinburgh last Saturday afternoon, but we have no doubt that his words have most effectually advertised the Encyclopædia. A shrewd business man remarked that the speech was worth £10,000 to the present promoters of that work. The promised Supplement, by the way, is likely to run to six or seven volumes, and perhaps more. The editor is Mr. W. H. Chisholm.

EVERYONE with a love of biography and a taste for succulent foot-notes will welcome Dr. George Birkbeck Hill's edition of The Memoirs of the Life of Edward Gibbon. We shall deal with the book in due course, quoting here only the first striking words of Dr. Hill's Preface. "If, as Dr. Johnson said, there had been only three books 'written by man that were wished longer by their readers,' the eighteenth century was not to draw to its close without seeing a fourth added. With Don Quixote, The Pilgrim's Progress, and Robinson Crusoe, the Autobiography of Edward Gibbon was henceforth to rank as 'a work whose conclusion is perceived with an eye of sorrow such as the traveller casts upon departing day.'" One disappointment, at least, Dr. Hill has suffered in the discharge of his task:

I discovered with real regret in the course of my reading that two passages that throw a charm over the genealogies with which the autobiography opens had been proved to be mere illusions. To that pride of descent "from a patron and martyr of learning," which Gibbon felt as, "a man of letters," he had no just claim. More than a hundred years ago Sir Egerton Brydges showed that the historian was not sprung from the Baron Say and Seale who was murdered by Jack Cade for the crime of "erecting a grammar school," and "building a paper mill contrary to the king, his crown and dignity." In our own day Mr. J. H. Round has, at a blow, demolished the fabric by which Henry Fielding and his kinsmen, the Earls of Denbigh, were made "the brethren" of "the successors of Charles the Fifth."

HOLGER DRACHMANN is a name unknown to the ordinary English reader. It is borne, nevertheless, by a distinguished Danish poet and dramatist, to whom English men of letters are about to do honour. A dinner at the Carlton Hotel, at which Holger Drachmann will be the guest of the evening and Mr. Edmund Gosse the chairman, has been arranged for the 30th inst.

THE Irish Texts Society, formed, it will be remembered, in 1898, is pursuing its work in a healthful frame of mind. The next volume to be issued by the Society is a complete collection of the poems of Egan O'Rahilly, a famous Munster poet of the close of the seventeenth and beginning of the eighteenth centuries. The volume will contain text and literal translation, with introduction, glossary, and notes, besides brief special introductions to such of the poems as require elucidation. The work has been prepared and edited, chiefly from MSS. in Maynooth College, by the Rev. P. S. Dinneen. It is hoped that it will be ready for distribution by October next at latest. Good progress has been made in the compilation of the Society's Irish-English, English-Irish Dictionary, which will be issued in pocket size.

In our correspondence columns will be found another letter on the origin of Tennyson's "Crossing the Bar." As Mr. Hare's anecdote has evoked criticism, we will give another from his pages which may pass unscathed. Under date October 8, 1877, Mr. Hare recounts a meeting with Tennyson at Haslemere.

He asked if I would like to go out, and we walked round the gardens. By way of breaking the silence I said: "How fine your arbütus is." "Well, I would say arbütus," he answered, "otherwise you are as bad as the gardeners, who say Clemätis." When we returned to the house, Hallam Tennyson brought in his mother very tenderly, and put her on a sofa. She is a very sweet-looking woman, with "the glittering blue eyes" which fascinated Carlyle, and a lady-abbess look from her head-dress—a kind of veil. Mrs. Greville revealed that she had broken her promise of not repeating an unpublished poem of Tennyson's by reciting it to Mr. Carlyle, who said: "But did Alfred give you leave to say it?" and Tennyson said: "You are the wickedest old woman I ever met with: it is most profligate conduct"—and he half-meant it too. Tennyson then insisted that I should tell him some stories. I did not like it, but found it was no use to resist—I should have to do it in the end. He asked for "a village tragedy," so I told him the story of Caroline Crowhurst: he said he should write it in a play or a poem. Then I told him the stories of Mademoiselle von Raasloff and of Croglu Grange. He was atrociously bad audience, and constantly interrupted with questions. He himself repeated a little story, which Mr. Greene, of the English History, had told him—of a man who felt that his fiddle, to which he was devoted, was the source of temptation to him by leading him to taverns, where he got drunk. On the Mississippi River, he said, he heard a voice saying to him that he must destroy the fiddle; so he went down, kissed the fiddle, and then broke it to pieces. "I put in that kiss," said Tennyson, "because I thought it sounded better."

WE are tempted also to appropriate an anecdote of a day in 1874. Mr. Hare says:

I went to luncheon at Lady Castletown's; she was not come in from church, but I went up into the drawing-room. A good-looking, very smart young lady was sitting there, with her back to the window, evidently waiting also. After a pause, I made some stupid remark to her about heat, or cold, &c. She looked at me, and said, "That is a very commonplace remark. I'll make a remark. If a woman does not marry she is nobody at all, nothing at all in the world; but if a man marries at all he is an absolute fool." I said, "I know who you are; no one but Miss Rhoda Broughton would have said that." And it was she.

THE late Mr. Thomas Arnold, brother of Matthew Arnold, devoted the later years of his life to the teaching of English Literature at Dublin University, and he was the author of a Manual of English Literature, and Chaucer to Wordsworth: a Short History of English Literature. A new edition of the latter work is now issued by Mr. Thomas Murby, of Ludgate Circus Buildings. The book is of moderate size, and well arranged and indexed.

FROM San Francisco we hear a voice crying:

A steamer is pointing its high, sharp prow to the open sea,
A tug pants by with deep-voiced cry blown far and free;
At the docks is a forest of masts with a maze of cordage and spars,
And the flags of the nations are fluttering there 'mid the stripes and the stars.

The voice is that of Charles Keeler, whose Idylls of El Dorado are fuller of the new America than of the old poetry.

Bibliographical.

REALLY there ought to be some protection for the illustrious dead. Here is the Elizabethan Stage Society announcing a dramatisation of Marmion, which is to be enacted in costume in a lecture theatre, with songs and choruses, and illustrations by the aid of lantern slides! Poor Sir Walter! He has suffered much over Marmion. That the poem should have been "dramatised" at least twice in America is bad enough; but in 1848 it fell into the hands of Edward Fitzball, of melodramatic memory, who transferred it, "in three acts," to the boards of Astley's, where it shone for a time with the aid of "equestrian spectacle" and "comic underplot"! Much more worthy treatment was accorded to the poem nine years ago in Glasgow, where an adaptation of it by Mr. Robert Buchanan was put upon the stage, to the accompaniment of music by Sir A. C. Mackenzie and brilliant scenery by Edmund Glover. I am afraid, however, that even Mr. Buchanan's "Marmion" has not secured permanence on the Scottish boards or any other.

Mr. Max Pemberton has done good service by recalling the fact that it was Sir Wemyss Reid who gave the first impulse to the present Brontë movement. It is, indeed, twenty-three years since Sir Wemyss brought out his work on Charlotte Brontë. This was followed, in the same year (1877), by Mr. Swinburne's eloquent Note on the same subject—a book running to only ninety-seven thinly-filled pages, but eminently characteristic of its author, who, in his opening sentence, described Sir Wemyss's book as "the priceless contribution to our knowledge of one of the greatest among women, for which the thanks of all students who have at heart the honour of English literature are due to Mr. Wemyss Reid." The Note, by the way, was dedicated "To my friend, Theodore Watts."

Mr. Arthur Lawrence, who is to write a Life of Sims Reeves, is already known as the author of a biographical sketch of Sir Arthur Sullivan. No doubt he will make good use of his material, such as it may be. It is of the operatic career of Reeves that the accounts have hitherto been so meagre. Mr. Sutherland Edwards published in 1881 a memoir of The Life and Artistic Career of Sims Reeves, but it was a very slight performance. Better than this was Mr. Reeves's own book of Recollections, issued in 1888, followed up as it was, next year, by another narrative, entitled My Jubilee; or, Fifty Years of Artistic Life. Unhappily, the reminiscences of public favourites are apt to take, in print, a very vague form—though it is only fair to remember that Mr. Santley's Autobiography made a substantial and acceptable volume.

The announcement of a book of parodies by the Rev. Anthony C. Deane—New Rhymes for Old—reminds me, as no doubt it has reminded others, that we possess no satisfactory anthology of rhythmical travesty. Mr. Walter Hamilton made, with great industry, a big collection of parodies in verse, but it was in no sense an anthology: rather was it, simply, the materials for one. Travesty is not difficult, and there are in the world a tremendous number of bad parodies, for which no condemnation is too strong; but a selection of such things, made with a keen sense not only of humour but of literary finish, would be a very welcome addition to our libraries. Who will essay the task? Why not Mr. "A. T. Q. C."—of present-day parodists "one of the best"?

We are to have from Mr. John Davidson, in book form, a new drama in verse, which he is going to call Self's the Man: a Tragi-Comedy. This, we are told, was commissioned by Mr. Beerbohm-Tree. Will it ever be enacted? Mr. Davidson is pathetically true to the "poetic drama." I have on my shelves his Godfrida, bearing date 1898; also his Plays (1894), containing five pieces: Bruce (1886), Smith (1888), and An Unhistorical Pastoral, A Romantic Farce, and Scaramouch in Maros (1889)—all printed for the first time on the dates named. And, meanwhile, the only work of his that has been actually performed is his verse-translation of Coppée's Pour la Couronne. Such is the irony of life.

We are promised, in the "Westminster Biographies," a miniature memoir of George Eliot, by Miss Clara Thomson; and, in the "Beacon Biographies," a little life of Edwin Booth, the actor. Both, no doubt, will find readers on account of their succinctness and handiness. Of Booth we have already the biographies by Mrs. Clarke, Mr. William Winter, and Mr. Laurence Hutton, not to mention the book of Recollections by Mrs. Grossmann. The "official" life of George Eliot, by Mr. Cross, is a little bulky; but Mr. G. W. Cooke's "Study" is within reasonable limits, and the memoir by Miss Blind is comparatively slight. Both of the last-named date from 1883.

It is, of course, by "The Church's One Foundation" that the late Rev. S. J. Stone will be popularly remembered. The hymn is an excellent one, and deserves its vogue. It is to be hoped, however, that Mr. Stone's volumes of verse will not be wholly neglected by this and the coming generations. There is some good work, not only in The Knight of Intercession, and Other Poems, but also in the more recent Lay of Iona, and Other Poems (1897). Mr. Stone wrote, I believe, "a village idyll," called Deare Childe; but with that book I am not acquainted.

I see Messrs. Bell & Sons announce a shilling edition, in paper covers, of Calverley's Verses and Translations. Could they not see their way to give us an edition of Calverley's verse-work, complete in one volume? The Verses and the Flyleaves have been published together; but to these should be added the Translations and the Literary Remains, with Sir Walter Sandall's memoir by way of preface. The time for bringing Calverley's literary products together, in cheap and handy shape, seems to have arrived.

A bibliographical interest attaches to Mrs. Clifford's play, The Likeness of the Night, as published by Messrs. Black on Tuesday. This, it appears, is not absolutely identical with the play so named printed in the Anglo-Saxon Review for March. The drama issued by Messrs. Black consists of the original text "considerably altered and added to" by the authoress, at the request of Mr. W. H. Kendal. The version in book form is, in other words, the "acting" version.

In connexion with the new American magazine called Good Cheer, no further notice seems to have been taken of the fact that Good Cheer has always been the title of the Christmas number of Good Words.

THE BOOKWORM.

Reviews.

Another Converted Decadent.

Œuvres Complètes de Paul Charles Joseph Bourget. Tomes I.-III. (Paris: Plon Nourrit & Cie. 8 fr. each Vol.)

MONSIEUR BOURGET has taken the wise step—more common, perhaps, in England than in France—of issuing during his lifetime a “complete” collection of his own writings, with such corrections and explanations as he thinks they require. The only objection to this course is that the collection will probably never be absolutely complete during the author’s lifetime, and as M. Bourget is still some years off fifty, we hope he will add many volumes to the three before us. These last are made up of two volumes of the critical essays that first established his reputation, and one of novels, comprising Cruelle Enigme, Crime d’Amour, and André Cornélis. As these are not his earliest efforts in romance, we gather that he considers them the most typical of his early manner, or in other ways best suited to his new readers. They are excellently produced, with all the pomp of large paper and good printing that we here associate with a library edition, and the clou of the series is supplied by the preface, in which M. Bourget declares his conviction that for the moral diseases of France, as regards both society and its individual members, “Christianity is at the present moment the sole and necessary condition of health or cure.” When this was published last year it excited much hostile comment in the Paris Press, which prides itself upon being, above all things, Voltairian, and it was said in many quarters that M. Bourget had, since his election to the Académie, gone back on his former professions. The attack was renewed when, in his last published volume, he claimed to have established the fact that in “every series of observations upon human life everything occurs as if Christianity were the truth.” But the attack then changed its form, and it was said that if M. Bourget has become a Christian, he has no right to republish such books as he is now doing.

As to the first of these charges, it may be said at once that, even if it were proved, it would give no ground of offence to reasonable people. A man who violently attacks opinions that he has once violently asserted does, indeed, prove himself to be an unsafe guide for the future; but M. Bourget has much too gentle and refined a spirit to be violent one way or the other. Although, at his entry into the world of letters, he found himself called upon to lament his inability to believe, he is perhaps nearer the truth than he is aware of when he describes this attitude of mind as one not of negation but of expectation. M. Bourget, like most mystics, wears two faces under his hood; and while he thinks that the reasonable side of him rejects as a myth “the pale face of the Crucified One” that he learnt to adore in his youth, the stronger or sentimental side aches with what one of his critics calls “a bitter homesickness for religious faith.” Hence his conversion—if conversion it be—should surprise no one but himself, and the seeds of it have for a long time been pointed out by the more clear-sighted of his critics. Thus, M. Doumic, writing in 1894, pointed out that M. Bourget’s “religion of human suffering” was really “a Christianity timid and inefficacious”; and, while noting the change that had come over the spirit of his writings, claimed that his genius was “evolving in the direction of a doctrine more and more positive, and altogether bordering on Christianity.” And this tendency is one of those things which appear more plainly when looked at from a distance. Hence it is perhaps less plain to his French than to his English readers, to whom, as he himself said of Renan, “the self-styled rebel appears in his true light as a deeply and intimately religious thinker.”

In making the second charge—which means, if it means anything, that a writer who is also a Christian should not publish anything with an immoral tendency—its authors have, perhaps, been led by hostility to the accused into paying a higher compliment to Christianity than they perhaps wish to do. In England, where centuries of Puritanism have managed, at any rate, to drive the grosser forms of immorality beneath the surface, no one professing any form of religion could hope to be taken seriously unless he used the most jealous care in keeping his page clean. But on the Continent this has not always been so. Boccaccio, the commentator of Dante, as well as author of the Decameron, was, no doubt, a sincerely religious man; Rabelais, though on slighter grounds, has been claimed by most English writers as another; Balzac professed the Christian faith at a time when reactionaries vied with republicans in denying it; yet all three had abundant reason to regret with Chaucer on his death-bed that they had written so much ribaldry. M. Bourget might therefore plead in justification that, as one of his characters would have said: “That which is of the flesh is flesh, and that which is of the spirit is spirit”; and that the profession of the most sublime of religions does not hinder a man from calling a spade a spade in treating of contemporary manners. But he has not done so, and it will, therefore, be as well to let the three novels he has now reprinted speak for themselves. In Cruelle Enigme we have the story of a fatherless boy brought up by his mother and grandmother in a state of innocence. In due time he falls a prey to a married Delilah, who takes him with her to Folkestone. He thereby causes the two protectors of his youth the cruellest grief, arising, as is expressly said, as much by their fears for his soul as for his worldly future, and he suffers the same pangs himself when convinced by an old friend of the family of his mistress’s innate infidelity. Then he again meets his love and again falls, taking from the affectionate souls who live only for him their last gleam of comfort. Why love should cause so much suffering is the enigma that the book propounds.

Crime d’Amour advances us a little in the solution of the problem. A woman, beautiful and sensitive, is married to a worthy being who thinks that he best shows his affection for her by working for her and their child. Mistaking this devotion for neglect, she falls a victim to the friend of the house, the husband’s schoolfellow, a lady-killer, who has taken to seduction to enable him to forget his rather lackadaisical conviction of the hollowness of existence. The husband, gaining some inkling of the state of affairs, successfully appeals to the other’s better feelings; and the lover, already beginning to tire of his new conquest, breaks off the connexion by accusing his mistress of unfaithfulness with an officer who has lyngly boasted of her favour. At first, in frenzy, she justifies the accusation; but after an illness that follows upon her distracted condition, she sees that it is her duty to live henceforth for her husband and child. She therefore forgives her seducer his love crime, and he feels, for the first time, that “something has sprung up within him through which he can always find reasons for living and acting—the religion of human suffering.”

In André Cornélis we have the same three persons of the drama with a difference. Here, again, the husband is a self-made man, who has married above him and has failed to gain the love of his beautiful and accomplished wife; but she is incapable of the depth of feeling of her erring sister in Crime d’Amour, and will not yield to her lover until she can do so lawfully. Consequently, the lover is obliged to have the husband, whose suspicions have already made him weary of life, taken out of the way, and then marries the unconscious widow. Her son, then a mere child, grows up with the secret resolve to avenge his father’s death, and circumstances soon led him to fix the guilt upon his step-father. The life of the latter, persecuted by remorse, becomes in its turn a hell, until at length he is stabbed by the son, and contrives in his agony to scrawl a few words to his wife causing her to think of his death as a suicide, while the son's revenge becomes ashes in his mouth.

We entirely fail to see how these three tales justify the charge of immorality. M. Bourget does not write for maidens and children, but he is too true an artist to deal in sensuality for its own sake, and there is not a description in these three stories that could rouse the passions of the most imaginative boot-boy. That the occurrences he depicts actually happen, would be forced upon the knowledge of every adult by the reports of cases in the divorce and police-courts, even if they did not form the plot of nine-tenths of the novels and plays of Republican France as of early Georgian England. But he does not attempt to make vice attractive, and had he written his stories with the express purpose of illustrating the axiom that "lawless love is guilt above," he could hardly have done so more forcibly than by the fate which he here brings down upon the heads of his guilty lovers. As he himself says in his slightly precious way, the commands "Thou shalt not commit adultery," and "Thou shalt not covet," might be written as epigraph to much of his work, and the danger of giving rein to the passions is marked in every line. Except in the choice of a subject, which the peculiarity of the national taste in some sort forces upon the French romancer who would make himself heard, could any tract writer do more?

This does not blind us to the fact that M. Bourget has written other tales less edifying than these; but when he republishes them it will be time to deal with them. Nor do we attempt to palliate the pessimism apparent in certain of his writings which gives them, in our judgment, an unhealthy tone. This seems to be due to the pose, whether natural or affected, adopted by the admirers of Baudelaire, and known as "Décadence"—a phrase which M. Bourget has explained as the weariness of life felt by those natures whose over-sensitiveness unfits them for the struggle for life under the conditions of modern civilisation. Like other sufferers from nervous disease, a décadent generally treats his excessive sensibility as a possession in which he should take an honest pride, and the contemplation of it soon leads him to prefer morbid self-analysis to any attempt to do his duty to those about him. Most of M. Bourget's characters suffer from this failing; and, if we may be so impertinent as to see the artist in his work, we should say that the pessimistic side of their creator may be traced to a childhood passed in lycées, where he was as unhappy as many sensitive boys are at school, and an adolescence spent under the shadow of the Commune. That he has taken the most effective way of curing himself of this by his return to the Church will be the opinion of most of his readers, and we trust that, like his fellow décadent, M. Huysmans among the Benedictines, he may find rest for his soul.

A Nation that Was.

The North American Indians of To-Day. By George Bird Grinnell, Ph.D. Illustrated. (C. Arthur Pearson, Ltd. 21s. net.)

THOSE of us who are old enough to have been brought up in familiarity with Leather-Stocking and Chingachgook and the romantic, but unconvincing, Uncas—that Raoul de Bragelonne of the American cycle—will be reminded by Dr. Grinnell's volume of the sad conversion that changed the chivalrous and high-minded Mohican (no reader of Fenimore Cooper can consent to "Mohegan") into a melancholy, resigned and bewildered nominal Christian, known as Indian John. The portrait was probably drawn from life, and appears to remain sadly true. Chingachgook has ceased to be a warrior, and has not yet succeeded in becoming a prosperous citizen. As we read this careful analysis of tribes and reservations, an image gradually takes shape before us of noble elements wasting away, of vitality sapped, patience, willingness, and industry coming somehow to nothing; of a race full of intelligence, poetry and generosity, standing, sad and perplexed, before the oncoming of a great social machine, the course of which no goodwill, either of white man or of red, avails to turn aside.

That is the first impression; but as we read again, and as we study the fifty-eight large portraits, we begin to differentiate and to perceive that the Indian problem is not single. To think of the future of all Indians together is like thinking of the future of Europe. For practical purposes we consider rather the future of the separate nations. The 262,965 Indians now under the tutelage of the United States Government represent probably at least as many nations as have gone to make up the inhabitants of our own continent. "The linguistic families of North America number fifty-nine and represent over eight hundred tribes." Among these varied tribes and families exist racial differences almost as well marked as those that divide the Russian peasant from our town artisan. The fifty-eight portraits show not only distinct varieties of type, but distinct degrees of development. The Apaches, in particular, have a cast of features that recalls the leaner old Roman type, of which modern representatives may not rarely be found in Scotland, and of which General Wauchope was a fine example. Naiche, who wears the uniform, presumably, of a United States scout, and two medals, might pass for a Scotch sergeant, or, for that matter, a Scotch general; Bartelda, of the same Apache tribe, suggests the profile portrait of the young Napoleon as a lieutenant. An Apache of another tribe, Henry Wilson, might have been photographed from some early Florentine fresco: Masaccio must have looked very much like him. Some of the Sioux (including Crows) and Flatheads (who were so called not because they artificially flattened their heads, but because, unlike some of their neighbours, they abstained from artificially making them pointed) have countenances that would stand out with distinction in any collection of European portraits. Swift Dog, of the Standing Rock Sioux, has a false air of Savonarola masquerading in the panoply of an Indian brave. On the other hand, there are heads among other tribes very much less pleasant to contemplate. Some of the Assiniboinés, for example, if the portraits given are in any degree typical, would evidently require some centuries to bring them to the level of modern civilisation at its poorest.

An examination of Dr. Grinnell's detailed analysis tends to confirm the impression produced by the portraits. "All the Apaches . . . are energetic and industrious, eager to work, provided only there is a promise of reward for labour." "Many of the Flatheads are well-to-do, possessing good herds of cattle and horses, fenced farms, fairly good houses, and raising crops of grain and hay, good gardens and perhaps a little fruit." On the same reservation and under the same management as these prosperous Flatheads are to be found Kutenais, belonging to a different race and a different stage of development, who "still support themselves by hunting and fishing and by the wild roots and fruits which they gather in their seasons." Various branches of Sioux seem to do well when well managed; but it is sad to read of that fine Sioux tribe, the Crows, that "they have been badly handled in the past and are rapidly dying off." The Iroquois, again, were a fine race both physically and mentally, and well advanced on the way to civilisation, "living in permanent villages, whose houses were built of logs and which were fortified with palisades. They cultivated great fields of corn, beans and tobacco, raising each year more than they could consume," and they had a system of recording their songs and stories by belts and strings of wampum in which the arrangement and design of the beads was related to the narration. They were noted for their fierceness in war, but they formed a league, under Hiawatha, in the middle of the sixteenth century, for the total abolition of war. It is curious to recollect that Henry the Fourth of France was, about the same time, laying a similar scheme before Queen Elizabeth. Up to thirty years ago the Iroquois do not seem to have deteriorated. "Dr. Brinton has told us that 'the five companies (500 men) recruited from the Iroquois of New York and Canada during our own Civil War stood first of the list among all the recruits of our army for height, vigour and corporal symmetry.'" Now, however, most of the Iroquois governed by the New York Agency seem to be progressing very slowly, if at all. But the Oneidas of the same stock at Green Valley, in Wisconsin, seem to be doing particularly well; nearly all talk English, are regular church-goers, recognise the importance of education for their children, and are, in fact as well as in theory, American citizens who vote at all elections and "cast their ballots as intelligently as their white neighbours."

The health of the Indians is in many cases very unsatisfactory; in part, no doubt, because they have been taught to live in houses before they had attained enough knowledge and civilisation to keep those houses healthy. With them, as with the Highlanders, whom in many ways they so much resemble, consumption is the chief cause of death, though epidemics, especially measles, seem to claim a considerable percentage. Probably the health, hardly less than the happiness and prosperity, of an Indian depends principally upon the character of the autocrat who, under the name of an agent, rules over him. Practically the agent can do exactly what he pleases with his subjects. "If he thinks best, he can cut off their supply of food at an hour's notice; he can shut up in the guard-house any man whom he chooses, can divorce any couple, can deprive anyone of his tools or stock or house. Over a white man married to an Indian woman he has the same power, and, in addition, he may expel him from the reservation or confine him in the guard-house for an indefinite period." Nor are the men entrusted with these vast powers always carefully chosen: "For many years the officials sent out to the various agencies . . . were usually . . . minor politicians 'out of a job.'" As the post of agent is "exceedingly ill-paid," it is not strange that many agents made dishonest profits. Moreover, the fatal American custom of making appointments political, causes agents to be liable to lose their appointment at the end of four years, and to be replaced by a man who possesses no experience, and is a stranger to the Indians. All these things, much as they are to be regretted, yet set the Indian problem in rather more hopeful a light. If, under circumstances so singularly calculated to impede advance, there has been a distinct, though slow, progress, what progress might not be hoped for under management more enlightened and more consecutive? The American nation cannot afford to lose the elements of nobility, endurance, and loyalty that belong to the Indian race—a race, moreover, which, unlike that of the negroes, mingles well with that of the whites.

Nor is it the American nation alone which has a duty towards Indian fellow-subjects. In Canada also there are Indians to the number of some 100,000. To these, who lie beyond the scope of his survey, Dr. Grinnell gives but a couple of paragraphs, just enough to make us fear that the Canadian Government has done little or no better than that of the United States. The health of the Indians in Canada is equally unsatisfactory; their numbers are about stationary, but show a small decrease in the last year recorded. How many of the millions of Englishmen who know the Indians of Mayne Reid and Fenimore Cooper have even a suspicion that more than 100,000 descendants of them owe allegiance to the Queen of England? Surely, here is a fresh and interesting field of inquiry for some travelling Briton. Will not some writer of our nation arise to do for the Canadian Indians what Dr. Grinnell has done for those of the United States?

An Honoured Woman.

Emma Marshall: a Biographical Sketch. By Beatrice Marshall. (Seeley & Co., Ltd. 6s.)

MRS. MARSHALL, her daughter informs us, was the author of nearly two hundred volumes. She was born in 1830 at Norwich, being related to the great banking family of Gurneys, but it was not till she had reached the age of thirty years, was married and had a family, that she began to write, so that between 1861 and 1899 she must have published at the average rate of a volume every ten weeks. Yet Miss Marshall tells us that her mother's literary work was always secondary to her domestic duties. Such productiveness, such sustained industry, were worthy of Dumas. The fame of Mrs. Marshall may not long survive her death; but it is an indubitable fact that a number of distinguished figures in literature thought highly of her historical and other tales. Among these were Longfellow, John Addington Symonds, and John Nichol. With Longfellow she corresponded pretty regularly, and his letters to her, printed in the biography, are full of kindly appreciation. He wrote once: "I have all your novels ranged together in a bookcase in my bedroom, so that I can see them every day, and now and then read a page or two in them, and refresh my memory with something pleasant coming from you."

The letters from John Addington Symonds are very interesting. Here is a passage:

I have been working much too hard lately: two volumes of the Renaissance in Italy, a life of Jonson, a life of Sidney, and one or two minor pieces, all going at the same time. I feel so much uncertainty about the future of things in England and Europe at large that I should like to make my literature a breadwinning industry. But what I write does not get so well paid as what you do, and you know too well how trying it is to write for money.

What he thought of Mrs. Marshall's fiction is shown in a letter dated from Davos Platz in 1883:

All my boyhood and young manhood, and all the noble memories of the best of fathers, came over me in one melodious chime evoked by an honoured woman's hand. I have always regarded you, if you will permit me at this moment of deeply stirred sincerity to say the simple truth, as one of the brightest ornaments of literature applied to pure and healthful purpose for the youth of England, applied also to the uses of the home by one who has worked for her loved ones.

Mrs. Marshall's most outspoken, and perhaps most valuable, critic was John Nichol. Writing of her In the East Country (a novel which introduces Sir Thomas Browne), he says:

I have now read through your book with much pleasure and admiration, tempered by some lack of sympathy for one of your heroes, . . . your Puritan Andrew. . . . The longer I live, the less I agree with Puritan theology or, with what concerns us more nearly, Puritan views of this life. . . . They, and some of your former people too, . . . start with the idea that enjoyment is, in itself, an evil thing; whereas I hold with Plato, that pleasure, including spiritual exaltation, or artistic, mental, and even physical delight, is, in itself, a good, and only hurtful when in excess. . . . You talk of Andrew's self-sacrifice, a noble thing for a noble end, but, in itself, . . . a mere Western Juggernaut. In your Andrews, and all, male and female, of the same type, it is wholly marred by its indissoluble marriage with self-sufficiency, self-righteousness, and self-glorification. If there be a future world, I expect to find Aspasia, and even Ninon de l'Enclos, in as good seats as any of the Fifth Monarchy men. . . . Excuse this outbreak.

With his usual brusque acumen, John Nichol had certainly laid his finger firmly on the weak spot in all those two hundred volumes. For the rest, Mrs. Marshall was a conscientious and sincere craftswoman. Talent she decidedly had, of a quiet, modest kind. Like Mrs.

Oliphant, she laboured hard for the children's sake, and proved brilliantly that the "literary character" need not always be what Benjamin Disraeli said it was. In the five cathedral cities of England in which she lived she did what she could towards the spread of tolerance and enlightenment. Miss Marshall relates that once, when the services of Prof. Sylvanus Thompson had been engaged for a series of science lectures at Gloucester, the use of the room was curtly refused, and her mother charged with attempting "to take the bread out of a fellow-citizen's mouth to put it into an outsider's."

Mr. Marshall's career was remarkably even and uneventful. It called for just such a brief and discreet biography as Miss Beatrice Marshall has written. The book (which is illustrated) is a very favourable specimen of its kind. The one fault of it is the style, which is stilted. The author, no doubt, was unduly oppressed by a pious sense of the dignity and sacredness of her task. It is a pity, for Miss Marshall has quite an attractive style of her own, though there is no trace of it in the present volume.

Mental Crochet-Work.

Roses of Pæstrum. By Edward McCurdy. (Allen. 3s. 6d. net.)

ASSUREDLY it were not hard to make a book about Pæstrum—Pæstrum celebrated in the verse of Virgil, Ovid, Martial, Claudian; Pæstrum fragrant yet with remembrance of roses that granted two summers to the Pæstrum year. Under the inspiration of those gaunt Doric columns of dismantled temples, such as are seen in old John Berkenhout's work, Pæstrum sheds a glamour surpassing that of any Italian rose, save the white rose in whose image Dante tells us that Paradise is shaped, the glamour of a mighty race hardly to be more clearly distinguished in Modern Greece than in this Dorian city by the sea. Pæstrum, and its god Poseidon, whose white horses could not save it from Lucanians, Saracens, and that pious vandal, Robert Guiscard, deserves to enlist an epic poet, to say nothing of a vagrant essayist, in its service.

But Mr. McCurdy goes to Pæstrum for little save his title. His essays, which treat of Italy and the "medieval spirit," may be denominated mental crochet-work; they are made up of little elegancies, deftly fashioned in a piece; yet porous withal, and not free from the affected sentiment which is obscurely known as "preciousness." The first symptom of this delicate malady appears in the preface, where we are assured that "now that the leaves" of Mr. McCurdy's book "are all placed together" he knows that "they are but wind-flowers." If they only were!

But though they are not wind-flowers, they reveal a mind which, even if we measure it against one of the fluted pillars of a Pæstrum ruin, is something more than dapper.

Dante's love-story is related with simple charm, and it was a happy thought to compare it with that told in "Aucassin and Nicolette."

How virile the song-story, how dreamlike the book of the new life. For in "Aucassin and Nicolette" the minstrel sings of the love that "many waters cannot quench, love more potent than desire to be dubbed knight or follow tournaments, more potent, too, than threats of hell and hopes of Paradise." . . . In the "Vita Nuova" the lover is pale and protesting, prone alike to verse and tears, to hold colloquies with love, and to call on passers-by for pity, but shrinking from rather than seeking contact with the lady; and the lady, she is gentle, pitiful, but yet a shadow—she glides silently across our path of vision, she is robed in red or in white, she is attended by one or more other ladies; a word, a gentle look, and she has passed by, and we only see the lover repining in solitude, or writing verses to other ladies in order to veil the identity of his love.

It is a mind of no ordinary sensibility which perceives, as our author does, the injustice done to antiquity by the ruthless stripping away of Nature's "girdle of beauty" by too zealous conservators. Respecting the Baths of Caracalla, he writes that the glades and thickets, mentioned by Shelley, "are there no longer. No glint of colour in the arches. Their dull red is arid and bare as the sand beneath them. There is nothing to . . . hinder the realisation of the fact that these were once baths and are dust baths still."

On the whole, this is a nice little book, despite the crochet-work and the irritating preciousities of Mr. McCurdy's style.

Other New Books.

THE BIBLE TRUE FROM THE BEGINNING.

VOL. VII.

BY THE REV. E. GOUGH.

Some centuries ago there was a certain Cardinal Cajetan, or Cajetano, who thought, like St. Thomas Aquinas, that Christianity should be defended with the weapons of reason as well as with those of faith. As he flourished during the Revival of Learning, he found that the stories in Genesis were a little hard to swallow in their literal sense, and he accordingly wrote a book explaining them away as allegories. The book was received with the respect due to anything emanating from the pen of a prince of the Church, and the Roman Court were a great deal too wise to hint at even a suspicion of its unorthodoxy. Yet it never, so far as we know, confirmed in the faith a single waverer, and is now as completely forgotten as the maunderings of the prophet Brothers.

Not otherwise does Mr. Gough proceed. To every alleged instance of immoral teaching, self-contradiction, or downright absurdity taken from the Bible he has but one answer—allegory. In this volume, wherein he reaches the great event round which the whole of Christianity centres—viz., the Crucifixion—he explains away the clear and simple narrative of the Gospel in the same manner. Herod is Fleshly Glory, Pilate is the Military Power, and Jesus is the Truth. Hence, when the Bible says that Pilate delivered Jesus to the priests, it means that "the Military Power gives up the Outer Christ who is in Faithful Preachers" to the Judaisers. Hence it is idle to look for the site of Golgotha, which, as he broadly hints, never existed, and we need not trouble ourselves with the fact that the darkening of the sun mentioned in the Gospel is not referred to by profane writers. If the murder of Jesus was, as the author says, "a spiritual killing," what is the use of hunting for evidence of an historical one?

Ex pede Herculem. If the reader is inclined to this sort of stuff, he will find here plenty of it, for the work is to extend to eight volumes. For our part, we think Philo handled the allegorical method with more intelligence and at less length for the Old Testament, and that the Gnostic authors, from whom Mr. Gough quotes largely, were, at least, as good guides as he through the New. Perhaps the oddest thing about the book is that its author should still be, as we gather from his title-page that he is, a Congregational minister. (Kegan Paul.)

THE HANDY MAN AFLOAT AND ASHORE.

BY REV. G. GOOD-ENOUGH, R.N.

We have no doubt, any of us, that "Jack's the Lad."

For if ever fellow took delight in Swigging, kissing, dancing, fighting,

Dam'ne I'll be bold to say that Jack's the lad.

With my tol de rol, &c.

Certainly Mr. Goodenough believes in Jack, and he writes of him with ample knowledge and appreciation. This is a book which it is a real pleasure to read, though it is by no means a model piece of literature. It might be better in arrangement, and in parts it is too scrappy. But the heart of the matter is here, the facts are reliable, and, above all, the author rejoices in his subject. He does not present to you pictures of a navy morally swept and garnished, neither does he invite you to consider minor shortcomings. What he does is to give a clear account of a system which produces a set of men of whom the nation may be honourably proud. All through there is the intimate personal touch which gives life to details, breadth to sympathy. How the Handy Man is trained, the routine of his ship, his songs (the above quotation is from one of the most popular of them), what he eats and smokes, drinks and reads, his vocabulary, his weaknesses and his amazing generosity—these matters are all treated with kindness, toleration, and humour. The way they have in the navy is a good way. It works well all round, even with grumblers. A carping marine complained that he'd been given "'all the thick of the coffee—all grouts, sir.' 'Very good,' said the officer, 'you may have the thin of the soup to-morrow. See that he has, mind, sergeant.' That man never made another complaint during the time he was in the company." (Fisher Unwin. 6s.)

TITANIA, AND OTHER POEMS.

BY A. S. CRIPPS.

This collection of a hundred pages comprises specimens of the work of twelve years. In 1888 Mr. Cripps was lyric about Titanias, Undines, Perdidas. In 1898 he was pre-occupied chiefly with Christian mysticism in an elegiac vein. The technical qualities of his verse had improved in the meantime. His muse was always modest, austere, and correct, but some of the later and longer poems show dignity and strength, and a rather fine restrained passion. The piece on the Death of St. Francis discloses a certain lofty simplicity of imagination, and a deep sense of what Sir Thomas Browne called "the mystical mathematicks of heaven," which are quite worthy of the theme:

I that in Christ had tasted to the full
The nails and knotted scourges of the world,
Now felt the contrary and greater woe,—
The utmost ache of God's atoning grief,—
Their bitterness who scourge and drive the nails,
And bring upon themselves a darker pain
Than any felt by scourged or crucified.
Upon my heart gnawed, worse than sorrow of death,—
Sorrow of selfishness, and cursed my Cross
With black forsaking of the Face of Love,
My God, my God, Thou wast forsaking me!

On the whole the religious poems are much the best. The remainder, and especially the sonnets—Mr. Cripps walks even too "circumspectly in that funambulatory track and narrow path"—lack both colour and movement, though there is a song here and there which contains a pretty fancy very neatly expressed. The nine lines on the death of a child—"Early to Bed"—would look well in an anthology. (Mathews. 2s. 6d. net.)

ANO, AND OTHER POEMS.

BY HENRY HOUSMAN.

Mr. Housman, in his preface, ingeniously wards off the remark, Nec satis apparet cur versus facitet, which the sarcastic critic might carelessly fling at this little volume. Nevertheless, the implied question is one which Mr. Housman would find it extremely difficult to answer. There is too much of the "yielding-to-the-importunities-of-friends" tone in the author's preliminary observations. More than half the book is occupied with four narratives in verse, none of which is good; the least tedious is "The Four Knights of Sussex," a fairly picturesque elaboration of "some dim recollection of an old nursery story." Mr. Housman is more successful in the very short pieces with an aphoristic turn to them. There is some tolerable proverbial philosophy in "A Handful of Couplets":

Beauty God makes, and having made it, straight
The devil steals and uses it for bait,—

One short piece is entitled "Advancing spring hath wintry days":

Advancing spring hath wintry days,
Ascending paths have downward ways,
And quickest flights have sore delays.

Tides oft seem ebbing while they flow,
Spring flowers are frost-nipt ere they blow,
Returning health ill days can show.

And so on. It is not high passion, but it exhibits an indubitable fact. Spring flowers are frost-nipt ere they blow. (Brighton: W. J. Smith.)

GIRLS' CHRISTIAN NAMES.

BY HELENA SWAN.

Someone inclined that way might write an amusing analytical book about the choice of Christian names, the popularity of some names, the epidemic rejection of others, the localisation of certain names in certain social spheres, and what not. Perhaps the choice of names is a too vast chaos of fad, association, and vanity to be handled. One thing is certain, Christian names are rarely bestowed nowadays for their meaning. The name is chosen, and its meaning is looked up afterwards. Ethel means of noble birth, and one hears it shrieked from an upper window in Leather-lane. Maggie means child of light, and it is probably common among the chainmakers' children at Cradley Heath. Hilda means "battle-maid," and is bestowed by Quakers. Susan means a graceful white lily, and is scorned of flower-girls. Gladys means lame, and "has of late years become popular." Una means "born in famine," and is usually found among girls born in luxury. Such contradictions abound. Another curious thing is the identity of names seemingly widely separated. Alice is a variant of Ethel, and so is Audrey. Yolande is Violet writ fine. Winifred and Gwendolen are one. Miss Swan has done her work very prettily. We only wonder that, taking such pains, she did not give us a special list of names grouped under the headings Hebrew, German, Norse, Saxon, &c., or have arranged her index so. The etymology of each name is carefully declared or surmised, and then its history and the names of its famous owners are given; finally, we have its occurrences in literature noted. Oddly enough, in her diligent search for poetical eulogies of girls' names Miss Swan has overlooked Lamb's sonnet on Edith, which it would surely have suited her purpose to quote. We will present her with it here:

In Christian world MARY the garland wears!
REBECCA sweetens on a Hebrew's ear;
Quakers for pure PRISCILLA are more clear;
And the light Gaul by amorous NIXON swears.
Among the lesser lights how LUCY shines!
What air of fragrance ROSAMOND throws around!
How like a hymn doth sweet CECILIA sound!
Of MARTHA, and of ABIGAIL, few lines
Have bragged in verse. Of coarsest household stuff
Should homely JOAN be fashioned. But can
You BARBARA resist, or MARIAN?
And is not CLARE for love excuse enough?
Yet, by my faith in numbers, I profess
These all than Saxon EDITH please me less.

(Sonnenschein. 2s. 6d.)

LIFE IN SCOTLAND A HUNDRED YEARS AGO.

BY JAMES MURRAY.

How many Englishmen know of the existence of the remarkable "Statistical Account of Scotland, 1791-1799," compiled by Sir John Sinclair, Baronet? It is anything but statistically dry, and is repellent to the ordinary reader only in its bulk, which runs to twenty-one large volumes. Sir John Sinclair's idea was to get an account of each parish in Scotland from its minister; and he practically succeeded. The ministers entered into the scheme with zest, and most of them supplied information far exceeding what the schedule of inquiries contemplated. The result was a huge budget of facts relating to the domestic economy, customs, amusements, superstitions, and education of the people at a time when they were emerging from what we should now be tempted to call barbarism. A good idea of the period may be formed from the simple fact that the Statistical Account—of which Mr. Murray's pages are the whipped cream—abounds in lamentations over the spread of tea drinking and whisky drinking as vices between which there was little or nothing to choose. The disuse of the old Kilmarnock bonnet in favour of hats is frequently noted with regret, as a sign of spreading luxury. The minister of Forres says :

The drinking of whisky instead of good ale is a miserable change, and so likewise is the very general use of tea. These put together have been exceedingly hurtful both to health and morals. It will probably be considered as a pretty curious fact that, instead of two or three tea-kettles about sixty years ago, perhaps one for the laird, another for the parson, and a third for the factor, there are here now two hundred at the least.

The book abounds with such curiosities, and it will usefully swell that tide of interest in old Scottish life which has risen of late so conspicuously. (Paisley: Gardner.)

A LIFETIME IN SOUTH AFRICA.

BY SIR JOHN ROBINSON,
K.C.M.G.

When the time comes for the great and comprehensive history of South Africa to be written, one of the most useful volumes to which the compiler will turn will be this story of the first Premier of Natal, Sir John Robinson, K.C.M.G. In telling the story of his life in South Africa Sir John Robinson really gives the history of Natal, the colony in which his father settled and in which he brought up his family. Just half a century ago Robinson the elder went out to South Africa, and in November, 1852, started the Natal Mercury in partnership with a local printer. The paper was a little weekly sheet, but it seems to have been needed by the young community, for it gradually became a bi-weekly and eventually a daily paper. In 1854 Mr. Robinson became its sole proprietor, and in 1860 handed it over to his son, the future Sir John Robinson, and the first Premier of Natal. In 1863, after a visit to England, the young journalist became a colonial legislator, being returned for Durban. He started with three great cardinal lines of policy, which he adhered to all through his career—Railway Extension, Responsible Government, and South African Union. Responsible Government was granted to Natal in 1893, but in 1887 Sir John Robinson had been chosen by Natal as its sole representative at the first Imperial Conference just before the Queen's Jubilee. It was on this occasion that Sir John was knighted by the Queen. The autobiography is so modestly told that it is really more of a history of the colony than of the writer, but the Minister and the colony were so closely bound up together that, perhaps, this was inevitable. It is interesting to have the opinion of so well-balanced a mind on the Boer War. Sir John Robinson, in a chapter on this phase of South African history, says that everything that he has heard and read since the Bloemfontein Conference broke up makes it more and more manifest that British supremacy was the one thing hanging in the balance, and that the struggle has been a contest for existence between Boerdom and the Empire, between British paramountcy and Republican domination. This pronouncement is of great value at the present time, as Sir John Robinson has had every opportunity for learning the truth, and the calm judgment which would cause him to arrive at a just conclusion. The state of his health unfortunately prevented him from being present at the Diamond Jubilee of 1897, but all interested in South Africa will be glad to make his acquaintance in these modest and pleasantly-written pages. (Smith, Elder & Co. 10s. 6d.)

THE HOLY YEAR OF JUBILEE. BY HUBERT THURSTON.

The practice of celebrating the beginning of a new cycle is not new or peculiar to the Christian Church. Following her usual policy in the case of things in themselves indifferent, the Church of Rome has adopted and adapted to her own ends and the spiritual welfare of her children the customary rejoicings over the opening century. The Christian ceremony of unsealing that one of the five great doors opening from the portico of St. Peter's into the nave which is kept fast from jubilee to jubilee is generally attributed to Burchard, master of ceremonies to Alexander VI. His first investigations showed that the golden door of Jubilee, of which there was common report, was no door at all; merely "there had been an altar in that place where we thought there had been a doorway." That difficulty was easily circumvented, and pretty soon there was a doorway in fact: "Since the populace had this idea, I was unwilling to disturb a belief that could only foster devotion." With the Pope's formal opening of the porta santa begins the observance of the Holy Year, and with the door are loosed the floodgates of the Church's Treasury of Merit for the extinction of the debt of temporal punishment due for sin forgiven. Father Thurston's book is a searching study of what is at the least an extraordinary example of the Church's instinct of conservation. (Sands. 12s. 6d. net.)

The "English Theological Library" (Macmillan, 7s. 6d. each volume) is inaugurated by the issue of reprints of the Sermons and Analogy of Bishop Butler in two volumes. The intention is to issue either complete editions or selected portions of the writings of the principal English theologians of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, with such introductions and notes as may make these works of real service to students, especially those preparing for university and ordination examinations. The volumes are handsomely produced, and the series is furnished with a general introduction by the Bishop of London.

Recitation is not a very popular art among adults; but at school it is both popular and useful. Bell's Standard Elocutionist used to be the great collection; but we fancy its knell has been sounded of late years by numerous successors. Among these none is so imposing as The Public School Speaker, compiled by Mr. F. Warre Cornish, the Vice-Provost of Eton, and published by Mr. Murray. The greater part of this portly volume is filled with selections from British poetry, drama, prose, and oratory; but the Greek, Latin, French, German, and Italian classics have short sections to themselves. We do not quite see merit in the alphabetical arrangement of authors in each section, which places Shakespeare between Lytton and Shelley, and Milton between Mickle and William Morris; but the selection of pieces and the printing are alike admirable.

The verse collected by Mr. Philip Gilbey in The Troubadour (Cassell, 1s. 6d.) is intended also for recitation; and it is the editor's belief that many collections of poems for recitation are but ill-adapted for declamation, though beautiful in themselves. And yet to many poems extremely well fitted for recitation, Mr. Gibbs adds Shelley's "Skylark" and Adelaide Procter's "Lost Chord," neither of which seems suitable.

A naïve and engaging autobiography is Reminiscences of Morris Steinert. Mr. Steinert is a pianist of considerable repute in America, and a zealous collector of old instruments. In a long and varied career begun in Bavaria in 1831, and continued mainly in the United States, Mr. Steinert has seen men and things worth talking about, and from it all he has deduced the lesson "to enjoy what we have, and to be happy at any cost."

Fiction.

The Life and Death of Richard Yea and Nay. By Maurice Hewlett. (Macmillan. 6s.)

MR. HEWLETT'S new book prepares a situation from which we would choose to escape, because, in our opinion—admirers of Mr. Hewlett as we are, believers in Mr. Hewlett as we are—it is a failure. A splendid failure; yes; but a failure.

The principal cause of this failure is the author's divided mind. Psychologically Mr. Hewlett's Richard may be true. Richard may have been like that. But a psychological study must be concentrated to have any real force, and in Mr. Hewlett the psychologist and romancer are always at war. During their conflict the story loses force, and the reader is puzzled into something that is often very like fatigue. A man must do one thing or the other, and Mr. Hewlett has tried to do both.

Yet even had Mr. Hewlett suppressed his pleasant, robust, romantic tendencies, and decided exclusively to exhibit Richard as (say) Mr. Meredith exhibits Sir Willoughby Patterne, the attempt would, we think, have been a mistake. It would have been an error in tact—novelists' tact. Because Richard Cœur-de-Lion is essentially a romantic figure to the imagination, a man of action, and a novelist dares too much who would lay bare the machinery of such a character and disturb such an illusion. Indeed, our own advice to Mr. Hewlett would be never to touch history at all. History always means old prejudices and foregone conclusions, and these things take a tremendous discount off the novelist's efforts. In The Forest Lovers Mr. Hewlett made his own history, and it was entrancing. He should always make his own history, we are convinced.

And we are not sure but that Mr. Hewlett would do well to cultivate a quieter manner. Nothing is better than sparkling wine now and then, but for steady use the still is best. Mr. Hewlett effervesces all the time. To be sure, no one effervesces better, with more savour and spirit; and there are some excellent pages in this book; but his efforts seem to us a woful waste of superb energy. The total effect is as though a dead steed—or, if you will, dead leopard—were being flogged with every grace and gusto that the art of flagellation knows. "What a consummate whipster!" we say; "but what a singularly deceased animal!"

Mr. Hewlett must take himself in hand, be more single-minded again. For few of our novelists have finer powers than he.

Chloris of the Island. By H. B. Marriott Watson. Illustrated. (Harper Brothers. 6s.)

IF Mr. Marriott Watson had as much imagination as he has fancy, and if his powers of invention equalled his powers of—shall we call it?—contrivance, he would be in a fair way to rejuvenate the dying romantic school. For his literary methods are admirable, and he knows the right word when he sees it. He is a most delicate craftsman, and hates anything less good than his best. With him a sentence is a procession, not a string, of words. The present book shows no new departure. It is in the heroic vein, and Chloris Carmichael, member of a bullying family who on their Cornish isle concocted sundry nefarious schemes in the year 1805, is just such a heroine as we have seen many times before. The first collision of Warburton, the quite satisfactory hero, with the hard-riding Carmichaels is better than anything else in the book, except the very brilliant description of the yacht in the "Gut," on page 60. After the beginning, the intrigue lacks the inventive quality even more than is usual with Mr. Marriott Watson. For instance:

"I pay a double debt, Mr. Warburton," he said, and pulled at the trigger.

At that moment there was a short cry, and out of the interior darkness of the passage stepped Chloris Carmichael.

"You shall not, Nick," she cried angrily. "You are blood-guilty. I will not have you so stain yourself."

"Get you gone, Chloris!" said Nicholas savagely. "Interfere not!"

Dr.pping the torch she held she sprang at his arm.

"Nay, I will be obeyed! I command obedience!" she cried fiercely. "Do you think you have some poor serving-maid to reckon with? Put that down, you mad-man!"

These almost supernatural appearances "in the nick of time" are a device too entirely fatigué for the use of a novelist of pretensions—too facile, too inexpensive. The writing is as meticulous, as prettily mannered, as ever. "Gouts of blood . . . distained his cravat." The National Observer might be alive again. Sometimes Mr. Marriott Watson exceeds his license, as in, "If these were brothers . . . they were discriminated by a marvellous incongruity." But how infinitely better are even these things than the clichés of the hack!

Verity. By Sidney Pickering. (Edward Arnold. 6s.)

WHEN, at the commencement of a novel, "a reddening winter sun" is "sending long, level beams across the fields"; when the hero's Christian name is Noel; and he has a "hawk's eye" and "a knack of getting what I want," then the wise reader is fairly sure that that novel will contain a great deal of conventionality and not much original observation. In the case of Verity, however, the wise reader, without being wholly mistaken, would have a narrow escape of being in the wrong. Conventional the novel is, and signs of original observation are sadly to lack, but it is far better than most stories about dashing young fellows named Noel—especially considering that the youth's surname is Champneys. Mr. Pickering has somehow given a picture of rural England in the time of the Regency which has a decided effectiveness; and the course of his plot, too, is fresh and even surprising, though the end is not quite convincing in its sudden tragedy. Verity, one of five sisters named after the virtues, and child of a hard-drinking, loud-swearing scoundrel of a parson who struck and starved his daughter of twenty-three, and was mixed up with smuggling crimes, is a human enough girl, not at all an angel (as admirers of Noels are wont to be), and she is drawn without the slightest trace of sentimentality. The author has lavished all his sentimentality on a single figure—that of Zadok Tregoeze, the son of the soil who loved Verity and died for her. Noel, the jeune premier, of whom it is recorded that he kissed two girls in one chapter, is a failure. On the whole, Verity is a praiseworthy book. Invented with skill, and written with conspicuous care, it shows a little imaginative power, and a pleasant fancy everywhere. The author is sometimes innocently unfortunate in his phraseology, and he has been content to take several characters at second hand, instead of direct from life.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the week's Fiction are not necessarily final. Reviews of a selection will follow.]

A VIZIER'S DAUGHTER.

BY LILLIAS HAMILTON, M.D.

Dr. Lillias Hamilton is known to fame as the lady doctor at the court of the Amir of Afghanistan. This novel, "a tale of the Hazara war," is entirely Afghan. "Every character," says Dr. Hamilton, "is drawn from a model, and should, therefore, as far as it goes, give an accurate description of one phase, at any rate, of Afghan life." The Chief Secretary, Dr. Hamilton tells us, "is described as he was then, not as he is now, surrounded with the luxury of the most refined and cultured intellects in the world." The MS. of the book was shown to the Chief Secretary, wisely, we think, remembering the fate of Charlotte Leyland. He read it and said: "I think it very like what I was." What a nice man! (Murray. 6s.)

A DAUGHTER OF THE FIELDS. BY KATHARINE TYNAN.

A pleasant, simple story of Irish life, the life that ends in marriage, by an Irishwoman who is three parts poet and one part novelist. Meg, the heroine, was of finer clay than her mother, or, as Bridget put it, referring to some cream cakes she had made, "Not that the mistress 'll know the differ; but Miss Meg's more delicate in the appetite, as is but natural, seein' how the mistress reared her, God help her." Meg married the Captain, and the Epilogue speaks of a nursery. (Smith, Elder. 6s.)

A ROGUE IN LOVE. BY TOM GALLON.

The author of Tatterley has been described as one whose novels have a "distinct Dickensian flavour," and A Rogue in Love seems to come under that category. It is a story dealing with that class of life where the characters call each other "mate," and say "fink" instead of "think." Much of it is faintly humorous; but the beginning introduces us to prison and murder: "Matey, 'tain't so bad as that, is it? An' I led yer into it! Ain't there nuffink I kin do?" Of course there was. (Hutchinson. 6s.)

LOVE IN OUR VILLAGE. BY ORME ANGUS.

A collection of nine sketches of Dorsetshire village life, from the sympathetic pen of the author of Jan Oxber. In a preface Orme Angus explains the thread of continuity that runs through the sketches. The peasant, she maintains, is not dull. "No life can be called dull where there is that supreme desire of man for maid and maid for man." So we are given a series of stories, studies of character and dialect, based upon the love affairs of various dwellers in the village. There are pictures too. (Ward, Lock. 6s.)

THE INIMITABLE MRS. MASSINGHAM. BY H. COMPTON.

"It was early in the month of May, in the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-nine —" The yarn is told in the first person. Book I. passes in London Town and Kentish lanes; in Book II. we are transported, with the narrator, to Botany Bay: "I would have saved you," said Patty, "but you have rejected me; you shall learn what a woman scorned can accomplish." (Chatto. 6s.)

FROM VALET TO AMBASSADOR. BY PHILIP TREHERNE.

Written in the first person. The narrator begins as a valet and ends as an ambassador to the Court of Mangaboo. We have not been entertained by this valet's progress. The valet in "The Lackey's Carnival" had humour of a kind. Mr. Treherne's gentleman has none. Such a passage as this is just nothing: "Your grandfather, my boy, had all the disadvantages of a public school and university education; you, James, have to suffer for the time-honoured tradition of indiscriminate primogeniture." (Sands. 3s. 6d.)

ALIENS AFLOAT. BY H. E. A. COATE.

"Go where, bo'sun?" asked the elder apprentice in a quiet tone, "to hell, or to sea?" As may be gathered from the above, this is a story of the sea, telling how the British ship Magic set sail for Sydney manned by a foreign crew, and what befel her in the Southern Ocean. When Dora and Gregory rose from the surface of the "seething cauldron, locked in each other's arms . . . from out the heavens a shaft of golden light fell upon them as they swept onward to that life that knows not death." (Elliot Stock. 6s.)

THE WHITE BATTALIONS. BY FRED M. WHITE.

Mr. Fred M. White, if we may be permitted the locution, has "gone it" this time. The cover of his book shows a company of soldiers advancing upon the British Lion, and on page 12 we read: "And then in a moment there flashed out a roar of war, war—France and Russia at the throat of England!" Mr. White writes like this: Example I.—"The City of all Emotions throbbed and palpitated with a fierce knowledge of life. Paris the Gay, Lutetia the Splendid, stood quivering on tiptoe with the garlands in her hair and the singing robes about her." Example II.—"The Cleopatra of the North still lay sinuous in the embrace of the quicksilver Antony of the South." (Pearson. 6s.)

MADAME BOHEMIA. BY FRANCIS NEILSON.

A story of New York Bohemian life by the stage-manager of the Royal Opera House, Covent Garden, and two other London theatres. Mr. Neilson evidently knows the Bohemian side of New York life well—such corners as Guarini's dive, to which we are told Edwin Booth and Lawrence Barrett were wont to repair "for the soup and spaghetti for which Guarini was famous." (Macqueen. 6s.)

THE JOY OF CAPTAIN RIBOT. BY A. PALACIO VALDÉS.

Signor Valdés is a Spanish novelist. Minna Smith is his translator. Sylvester Baxter is his introducer. When the author wrote to Mr. Baxter about The Joy of Captain Ribot, he said: "It is a protest from the depths against the eternal adultery of the French novel." The last two lines of Signor Valdés' masterpiece are:

"Uncle Ribot, I am waiting for you!"
"I am coming, my girlie, I am coming."

A SCHOLAR OF HIS COLLEGE. BY W. E. W. COLLINS.

A story cast in a somewhat old-fashioned form beginning with pictures of English country life and a venerable type of squire. "All I know is that this d——d schooling cost a pretty penny. More than £500 I have paid for the young rascal already, and there seems to be no end to it." The college part of the book begins at Chapter VIII. with a "rather more than a year later, on a February night, some three weeks after the commencement of the Easter term, four men were standing round the fireplace of a ground-floor room in the back quad of St. Hilary's." (Blackwood. 6s.)

JEAN KEIR OF CRAIG NEIL. BY SARAH TYTLER.

A pleasant domestic story passing, as the title indicates, in Scotland, by an author whose name is well known to the readers of what are known as the rectory public magazines. Jean, aged twenty-two, had neither brother nor sister, and the intercourse between herself and her father was of "an affectionately distant character." (Long. 6s.)

We have also received from Messrs. Sands & Co. four novels by Mr. Charles Garvice. They are entitled Her Heart's Desire, Nance, The Outcast of the Family, and A Coronet of Shame, and have had a large sale in America, where, we are also informed, more than 250,000 volumes have already been sold. The scenes in each case are laid in England, and the incidents, dealing largely with English society, are of an exciting character. We have also received from Mr. John Long The Strength of Straw, by Esmé Stuart, and Friendship and Folly, by Mary Louise Pool

THE ACADEMY.

Editorial and Publishing Offices, 43, Chancery-lane.

The ACADEMY will be sent post-free to every Annual Subscriber in the United Kingdom.

Price for One Issue, Threepence; postage One Halfpenny Price for 52 issues, Thirteen Shillings; postage free.

Foreign Rates for Yearly Subscriptions 20s. including postage.

American Agents for the ACADEMY: Brentano's, 31, Union-square, New York.

Patmore's Philosophy.

IN our review of Mr. Champneys's biography of Mr. Coventry Patmore, we left untouched the large section dealing with his speculative opinions and unpublished fragments. We propose now to give some view of both. Our space, indeed, will not allow us to follow Mr. Champneys in his full and very excellent account of the poet's whole system, but we may give, perhaps, an idea of its central portion.

The whole of his teaching, both in prose and poetry, was based upon the principle that "the things which are unseen are known by the things which are seen"; or, in his favourite quotation from Goethe, "God reveals himself in ultimates." The universe, no less than man, is made after the image of God. But, since things equal to the same thing are equal to one another, it follows that Nature is throughout analogous with man, as both are with God. On this, the system of the Neo-Platonists, Mr. Patmore proceeds, in verse and prose, perpetually discerning in Nature the revelation of man, in man of Nature, of God in both. For his first principles he relies on intuition, which, like all true poets and Platonists, he holds to be a higher reason. Of the ladder of symbols by which he ascends to God and the "choir invisible," the base, to him, is nuptial love. He rightly discerns the mystery of sex as the core of creation—"Which two great sexes animate the world." And nuptial love he considers the image and key of the ultimate relations between God and man. Hence he exalts the sanctity of true marriage, as not opposed to, but a heightening of chastity. Chastity lost can be regained by struggle. "There, of pure virgins seen, Is purer none, Save one, Than Mary Magdalene," he says in one Ode. True marriage is that wherein spiritual union precedes, exalts, and justifies the union of sense. "Bright with the spirit shines the sense, As with the sun a fleecy cloud." It is such marriage alone which is a symbol of the marriage between Creator and creature.

These views explain his life-long devotion to the single theme of sex, which, in his hands, comprises the whole scheme and philosophy of human life. He carried the analogy into literature, art, and even (as Mr. Champneys rightly judges) politics. The method of symbolical interpretation which resulted from his philosophy he applied to the ritual of his church, and to the explanation of Scripture. In this he merely revived a primitive tradition, thrust out of sight by modern Rationalism. There is an example among the fragments in this book where he applies the loss and finding of Christ in the Temple to man's spiritual loss of Christ amidst the cares of business. Finally, he says, the soul finds Him in the Temple, its own body. For it is a consequence of the principles we have sketched, that in the study of the analogies of the body man has a key to the knowledge of God, so far as such knowledge applies to his own needs. The poetic beauty with which he handles this method can only be understood in the reading; nor will it be relished by the average Anglo-Saxon, with his terror of imagery. It is a further result of Coventry Patmore's principles that he holds no men to have been without some truth; and therefore applies his system to the heathen myths, finding in them analogies to Christian doctrine, as did the Early Christians. Hence the abundant allusions to pagan mythology in his poems, never arbitrary, but showing true insight into analogy. The difference between his poems and his prose is strictly the difference between synthesis and analysis. What in the one is condensed in all the splendours of inclusive imagery, in the other reappears set forth with almost scholastic plainness and severity—so far as the difficult subject-matter will admit.

The fragments which are given in Mr. Champneys's biography from his papers or his letters are unequal, especially in the poetical sections, but often contain the quintessence of his spirit, for the not too many who are in sympathy with his peculiar cast of mind. Thus in verse:

Men oft see God,
But never know 'tis He till He has passed.

Or this very characteristic couplet:

What little, laughing Goddess comes this way,
Round as an O, and simple as Good-day?

Here is one of his most truculent epigrams:

A bee upon a briar-rose hung,
And wild with pleasure, suck'd and kiss'd;
A flesh-fly near, with snout in dung,
Sneer'd, "What a Transcendentalist!"

The second line of the following is in the poet's most Crashaw-like vein of exquisitely discriminated diction:

Thou'st turned my substance all to honeycomb,
Each atomy a cell of discrete sweet.

Lovely is the line on primroses:

That touched mine eyes like kisses cool.

Touched with his own grave pathos is this couplet:

Sad as a ship far off at fall of day,
Alone upon the wide sea-way.

He speaks, with keen observation of natural contrast, about

The baby leaves of aged elms in Spring.

And there is a very fine bit, full of ominous magic:

A cloud-bank pale
With phantom portent of unhappy peace.

This has the great and singular suggestiveness of his best work. Another couplet has the vignette quality which one finds in Milton's—and Coventry Patmore's—"L'Allegro":

The sunny field of shadowy stooks
Untied by ambush-fearing rooks.

Finally, we may cite a passage the serenely sweet felicity of which is entirely his own:

As seen from smoky street, the thymy head
Of some high hill alone with the sweet sun.

To quote the aphoristic and other prose fragments of Coventry Patmore, when they bear on religion, is a more difficult matter; because they are usually intimately concerned with his most recondite spiritual psychology, and are not unfrequently couched in the special terms of his own religion. Thus they would each require a commentary of some length to be made intelligible for average readers. But it is possible to adventure on a few, which shall be given without comment:

A little bone, questioned by the anatomist, remembers the whole beast, a million years deceased.

Thy love is an incessant trouble in my breast, like one of those little quiet wells where the upheaval of the sand never ceases.

Like milk from the kind, impatient breast, so willing to feed that, on the approach of the baby's mouth, it waits not to be pressed.

Good people and religious are the first to say, "He bath a devil" of any one whose way is widely different from, and may be greatly higher, than their own.

The song that is the thing it says.

That which is unique in the soul is its true self, which is only expressed in life or art when the false self has been surrendered wholly. In saints this surrender is continual; in poets, &c., it is only in inspired moments.

None can move this world unless he stands upon another.

As the Word of God is God's image, so the word of man is his image, and "a man is known by his speech."

By this you may know vision: that it is not what you expected, or even what you could have imagined, and that it is never repeated.

Then comes a selection, partly from letters, partly from writings for the press, with the difference from those already quoted that they are on secular themes—largely literary. Here there is scarce any need for commentary; yet it may be said of the two first extracts that he did actually acknowledge a power and meteoric splendour in Shelley which it would not be surmised that he confessed from what is here said. Browning, on the other hand, he would not accept as a poet—repelled by his outrages on form. This he held more essential than matter—firmly though he insisted on the latter:

I have been reading Shelley again, after never having looked at him for thirty years. My young impression of him is quite unchanged. Most of his poems—even his most celebrated, as "Prometheus Bound" [Unbound]—is all unsubstantial splendour, like the transformation scene of a pantomime or the silvered globes hung up in ginpallaces. He is least unreal when he is wicked, or representing wicked people, as in the "Cenci."

Browning has nearly every poetic faculty—except that of writing poetry—in an eminent degree. But as a pie must have a crust, and a good pie must have a good crust, so a good poem must have, not merely worthy contents, but a beautiful exterior; indeed, the external in poetry is of more consequence than the internal.

I have lately read again Morris's poem, "Love is Enough," which you gave me. It is a most lofty and delicate atmosphere of mystic tenderness and joy. I don't know that a poem can have higher praise. But it is one of those things which, as Lord Dundreary says, "No fellow can be expected to understand."

[By this he probably meant that it was beyond the vulgar comprehension. He always maintained his high admiration for this single poem of William Morris.]

There is a good deal [in Coleridge] which is not much worth reading, but when he is himself, that is, in about one-sixth of what he has written, he is quite beyond any modern poet in the power of expressing himself consummately and with apparent ease. Yet he, more than anyone else, always gives me the impression that poetic expression is far from having reached its last development. Language, I am sure, has latent musical powers beyond anything we at present imagine; and if I were twenty years younger, I would set about endeavouring to prove this. Perhaps I may yet do a little in that way.

[His Odes were his contribution to the experiment. But he held that only in a handful had he made adequate use of the metre; and he still cherished vague ideas of further possible refinements in versification.]

It is a common mistake of modern artists—poets, painters, musicians, and others—to think that they are intense when they are only tense. Great intensity is always calm, often gay and playful in its exterior.

I went to see the exhibition of the Blake drawings at the Burlington Club, and they quite confirmed me in my old view of Blake as artist and poet. It was nearly all utter rubbish, with here and there not so much a gleam as a trick of genius. He does not seem to me to have been mad, but only to have assumed a sort of voluntary madness of freedom from convention in order to make himself original. He is, therefore, in a measure original, as any tolerably clever and perceptive mind would become if it chose to pay so ruinous a price for originality. He reminds me a good deal of that "pet lamb" we had at Heron's Ghyll, who imperceptibly grew into a strong pet ram, and was still called the "pet lamb," until suddenly it dawned on us it was not a lamb at all, but a very ill-behaved ram assuming the airs and privileges of his infancy. So, you remember, we sent him to the butcher's.

The synthetic eye, which is the highest and rarest faculty of the artist, is almost one and the same thing with what is called poetic imagination, and is the source of all artistic beauty. The heather is not much, and the rock is not much, but the heather and the rock, discerned in their living expressional relationship by the poetic eye, are very much indeed—a beauty which is living with the life of man, and therefore inexhaustible. The greater the number of objects that are taken in at once by the poet's or the artist's eye, the greater the beauty: but true poets and artists know that this power . . . can only be exercised, in the present state of our faculties, in a very limited way: hence there is generally . . . a great simplicity in and apparently jealousy of their subjects, strikingly in contrast with the works of those who fancy that they are describing when they are only cataloguing. The power of seeing things in their living relationships which constitutes genius is rather a virtue than a talent. . . . Simply to believe the witness of their own eyes is what few men ever dream of unless such witness happens to have the testimony of common consent. There is, perhaps, more of the innocent vision of ripe genius in English poetry than in all other poetry, ancient and modern put together; and this confers upon English poetry a rhythmical excellence which is not only scarcely ever found in the poetry of any other modern people, but which no other modern people seem to have faculties to comprehend.

The whole of this last passage, which we have abbreviated, is profound and true. Indeed—while we leave to the reader these extracts too varied and question-raising to be summed up—it may be said, in conclusion, that, if the judgments on individuals may often call for careat and modification, the statements of general principle appear more sound to the roots the more they are meditated. This was characteristic of Coventry Patmore. He is not strong in "appreciation," but in philosophic analysis of artistic law his writings have a quite classic weight and permanence.

A FAREWELL.

With all my will, but much against my heart,
We two now part.
My Very Dear,
Our solace is, the sad road lies so clear.
It needs no art,
With faint, averted feet
And many a tear
In our opposed paths to persevere.
Go thou to East, I West.
We will not say
There's any hope, it is so far away.
But, O, my Best,
When the one darling of our widowhead,
The nursling Grief,
Is dead,
And no dews blur our eyes
To see the peach-bloom come in evening skies,
Perchance we may,
Where now this night is day,
And even through faith of still averted feet,
Making full circle of our banishment,
Amazed meet:
The bitter journey to the bourne so sweet
Seasoning the termless feast of our content
With tears of recognition never dry.

By Coventry Patmore. Quoted in the "Oxford Anthology," by A. T. Quiller-Couch (Clarendon Press).

Things Seen.

One of the Public.

On my first attempt at public speaking the ordeal was made easy for me. I was allowed to sit, and the audience seemed really eager to hear what I had to say. It was composed of a score or so of earnest men and women, members of a reading circle, and they had gathered in a narrow room to hear me discourse on Thackeray's Vanity Fair. The sight of those intelligent people, each head inclined a little forward, each face lit with encouragement, gave me confidence, and I spoke for an hour and a half, spoke to one person after the manner, I believe, of orators. She was an elderly woman, small and thin, with deep eyes that glowed behind her spectacles. Her ungloved hands showed the marks of toil, her shabby black dress indicated her station, but her soul, it seemed to me, untarnished by her hard life, leapt up to meet my thought. The last clause of the book, that clause which some call the most pathetic passage in literature, telling how "he, whose heart was as that of a little child, had answered to his name, and stood in the presence of his Maker," I read to her alone, to her eager eyes, eloquent as an animal's conscious speechlessness. I closed the book, and the little company filed past me, murmuring words of thanks; but she remained behind—which was what I expected. Then she began to talk—how the woman talked!—"I oughtn't to have come," she said; "I oughtn't to have come, for there was a lot to do at home, tidying up, and the lamp to clean. But I always come to a lecture on Shakespeare, or Plato, or Bacon—I don't care who it is—and I thought to-night it was Shakespeare; but the gentleman you have been talking about does just as well. Oh, that poor dear Colonel! I do hope they looked after him in that place; but, you know, I don't very much care whether he died or not. People who die in books don't really die—once I read a book about Black Bess, and that made me cry, because I knew that Black Bess had really died. It was on the way to York, and Dick —, I forget the gentleman's name —" At this point the caretaker turned down the lights, and I escaped.

On Westminster Bridge.

A FEW suburban worshippers, whose trams had been late in arriving at the terminus by St. Thomas's, were hastening to Evensong at the Abbey.

Two urchins were crossing from Westminster: one looked five, may have been eight, and, judging from his omniscient expression and the patronage he extended to the younger babe, might have been fifty.

He had been impressing the younger babe with historical accounts of New Scotland Yard and of the Abbey, but Three-Year-Old's attention wandered, for just then there passed four or five unhappy-looking demonstrators, whose sashes of green and gold proclaimed to all and singular that they were Free Foresters or Ancient Druids. Three-Year-Old removed his emergency-ration thumb from his mouth, to point it admiringly at the receding band.

"Look at them Awse Gawds!" he said.

Then the Elder Brother spoke. Should he allow the honour of the family to be disgraced by such ignorance and make no protest?

"Awse Gawds! Them Awse Gawds! Listen at 'im. Awse Gawds, fat 'ed!"

Three-Year-Old was subdued. The floods had risen, and only the restoration of the well-loved thumb to its first estate availed to keep them back. But the Elder Brother spoke on. As Lambeth opened its mighty jaws to swallow up the twain, I heard the relentless voice:

"Awse Gawds. Yer must be bawmy, stright! Awse Gawds!"

The Poloniad.

WE were looking about for a subject when there arrived—for the first time, we think, in this office—the half-yearly volume of Great Thoughts. The title struck us. It had never struck us before, but just then it did. Perhaps the multitude of little thoughts on our book-table had something to do with it; or some ripened sense of the frivolity of weekly journalism clamoured for expression. Here, at least, was something the reverse of frivolous. Great thoughts! Not smart paragraphs, not bright, chatty articles, not whispers from the theatres, not up-to-date features, not something to suit all tastes, but great thoughts. Why, they needn't even be great. If only thoughts, how splendid. So we took the volume to the nearest armchair.

And now we know that "the pleasure of knowledge is the use of knowledge" (T. T. Lynch); that "a wise man stands firm in all extremities, and bears the lot of his humanity with a divine temper" (Seneca); that genius is "the highest individual embodiment of an unconscious activity of reason" (Martensen); that imagination is "the first wheel of the soul" (Sibbes); that "the best source of wealth is economy" (Cicero); that language is "the indispensable tool of thought" (Bautain); that "stretching out his hand to catch the stars, man forgets the flowers at his feet" (Bentham); that man is "the incarnation of thought" (Descartes), or "a piece of diseased egotism" (Birrell), and that he is "not simply an example of his kind, nor an individual; but is designed to be a person" (Lacordaire). It seems amazing that the editors of papers like Truth, and the World, and the Onlooker, never record these things. They prattle about society! Society! This is what the editor of Great Thoughts says about society. Pray read it aloud:

The great evil of an excessive devotion to society and fashion is the mechanical hollowness and insincerity which it breeds. The relish of existence is destroyed, the glory of the soul is darkened, the splendour of the universe, with all its moral sanctions and godlike possibilities, is dwarfed and hidden, to multitudes of tender and receptive spirits, by the loathsome treachery, the frivolous fickleness, the petty jealousies, and the shallow judgments of that empty and contemptible presence which men call society. Masterful, lawless, and intrusive, it is still destitute of every claim to honour and regard, and every woman who aspires after nobleness should shake its dust from her feet, and go forth beneath the stars to commune with God, and to lay hold of the sanctities of eternity. "Womanhood," as one has finely said, "should be the consecration of the earth." But how can that consecrate which is itself debased and unworthy?

Ye great and little fishes!—how? And note the words: "as one has finely said." Another great nameless thinker! There are cogitators in a large way of business whose tracks are all but covered up in these sumptuous pages under such expressions as:

It has been said.
It has been well said.
It has been aptly said.
It has been finely said.
It has been nobly said.
It has been beautifully said.
It has been exquisitely said.
It was said of old.

Others are hidden from our sight under such names as Dr. Winchell, J. S. Zelig, Sibbes, Cogan, Robert Tuck, B.A., the Rev. W. L. Watkinson, and Colton. We think of them all as having lofty pale foreheads. They probably pass us in the street, knowing that they have deposited their thoughts in this weekly register, yet, like ordinary people, they go modestly to catch their trains. Who is the being among us who wrote the following thunderous sentences about "The Blight of Atheism"?

The whole spiritual universe is shattered and shivered by the hand of Atheism, into innumerable glittering quick-silver globules of individual personalities, running hither and thither at random, coalescing, and parting asunder without unity, coherence, or consistency. In all this wide universe there is none so utterly solitary and alone as a denier of God. With orphaned heart—a heart which has lost the Great Father—he mourns beside the immeasurable corpse of Nature, a corpse no longer animated or held together by the Great Spirit of the Universe—a corpse which grows in its grave; and by this corpse he mourns until he himself crumbles and falls away from it into nothingness. The wide earth lies before such an one like the great Egyptian sphinx of stone, half buried in the desert sand; the immeasurable universe has become for him but the cold iron mask upon an eternity which is without form and void.

It is only when we have submitted to the surf-beat of this denunciation that we remember that we have never in our lives met an atheist. We have met the word, and we have met one or two young persons who applied it to themselves; but atheists and atheism do not exist, and if they did they could not exercise an hour's consistent influence on any human being. Another unnamed great thinker throws off this about Music:

Wondrous is the power of music, passing that of fabled necromancy. It takes a man out of his most sordid surroundings, and sets him in heavenly places. It touches fibres of the inner nature, lost, forgotten, ignored, and makes them thrill with new life. It seals the eyes to outward sights and unfurls new vistas full of transcendental beauty; it breathes over hot wounds and heals them; it calls to the surface springs of pure delight, and bids them gush forth in an arid desert.

We surmise that this was delivered in undulating accents by a Dissenting preacher in a chapel off, say, the Kingsland-road. And if it took its audience out of that neighbourhood it was not uttered in vain.

To be sure, we find a difficulty in extracting from this budget of good advice and great thinking anything like a trend, a steady sign-post, or an abiding conviction. Our mind reels under the shock of seas of sententiousness. The editor, too, seems to be so occupied in thinking great thoughts on his own account that he does not hold his party in leash. On one page we find Dean Paget bewailing the horrors of war, on another a sketch of "Alfred Krupp, the Cannon King," with a wood-engraved portrait of a peaceable old gentleman whom we should have taken for a Clapham plate-holder. Again, on page 82, our blood is stirred by some thoughts on the "Love of Country" in which we are told that "God has made us Englishmen, and it is His Will that we should do our best for England"; while in a later article, on the "Higher Patriotism," we are exhorted to "beware of the Khaki Bible." We turn to things of which we have a less faint understanding, and alike in literary criticism and descriptions of nature we find the great manner. Of a poem by Mr. John Davidson it is written that "the weird melody of the Celtic genius blows, flute-like, through every line, and the poem is quick with the passion of despair." We have great confidence in Mr. Davidson's prospects as a dramatist, but we should never have thought of saying that "his soul [his soul!] claims kinship with Massinger and Webster and Kit Marlowe. . . . He can crush his lightnings into a lily's bell or sheathe them in a tear." Nature as seen by great thinkers quite transcends the nature that we see during a Saturday-to-Monday, though faint perceptions of it have come to us when passing Mr. Rimmel's shop in the Strand. Thus:

Late in the afternoon the sunlight steals round into the mossy cove on the hillside, where the lovely phantom of the waterfall is hidden, and turns the misty whiteness of the spray to spun-glass and crystal, against its setting of olive-green and golden-green mosses, transfiguring their crimson capsules, each with its pendent crystal drop, into resplendent rubies. The upper part of the fall is still in shadow, but above the green swirl of water cutting the sky at its head drops of water from the fall over the unseen ledge above sparkle like diamonds against the blue.

It was like a beacon to the storm-tossed mariner (a touch of the manner there!) to see the title, "Learning to Think," at the head of a column. That hit our need exactly. We had felt the need of learning to think great thoughts; and we settled into our armchair to receive the missing lesson of our life. The article began:

Of the thousands who visit Hastings, few are aware that in one of the churchyards of that ancient town there lie buried the remains of one who, in his day, was a great friend of English children. Take the 'bus, which carries you through the quaint and narrow main street of the old town. Stop at the church on your right, where the 'bus leaves the town to go into the country beyond. Enter the churchyard, and in the higher part—for you are upon sloping ground—and near the centre, you will find a regular and unauthorised path, made by the feet of many pilgrims, which threads between the graves. Follow it, and it will lead you to the quiet resting-place of George Mogridge.

He was a writer whose books, forty or fifty years ago, "were to be found in English homes and school libraries all over the land." An excellent man, we are sure, and Great Thoughts is an excellent little paper. But we are convinced that great thinking is not our forte.

Sedulous Apéry.

In a little red-covered manual, called English Composition: a Manual of Theory and Practice (Nutt), Mr. L. Cope Cornford has carried out a dubious project with much intelligence and critical taste. His title is rather misleading. "English composition" is already taught in schools, but it connotes the art of writing clearly and correctly about ordinary matters, and with such elegance as you expect in a good business letter; whereas this book is a manual of the art of writing as Stevenson understood it. Inspired by Continental practice, particularly the French, Mr. Cornford sets out to teach schoolboys to think literary thoughts and write them down with literary force and grace. In its essence and its bulk this book is a guide to such practice, although its earlier chapters on "The Subject" and "The Four Essential Factors of Composition" may overlap, or coincide with, such instruction in Composition as is now generally given. A crucial question is therefore precipitated. Is it well to teach the literary art to English schoolboys? We do not think it is well. The arguments we should urge against such instruction are of a natural kind. It is alien to the genius of the nation. It is not likely to produce fine or very useful results. It is a diversion of the natural energy of a boy into channels which are barely wholesome. It is beset with the difficulty that at every stage in such instruction you find yourself asking the boy to write more than he thinks, or—what is the same thing—to think for writing's sake. These may be "stock objections," but we cannot help that. There are such things as "stock" facts, and we think that the teacher who should try to take his class through Mr. Cornford's course would only run his head against them and be bruised. The literary art, as an art, is absurdly over-valued in these days. Its use and beauty are great only when it is in the hands of a great writer, and there is no evidence that great writers can be produced at will. In this respect literature differs from other professions. Every doctor, however obscure, can set broken bones, prescribe medicine, and alleviate the pains of the dying. But the ordinary writer—what does he do for society? He commonly wastes a great deal of its time, and disorders his own soul. Or, granted that he wreathes in smiles the faces of tired men bending over their evening papers in railway carriages, that he inspires small talk, promotes wit, and redeems the sordid day—still, in practice it has been found that this work is so alluring or so easy—which you please—that thousands embrace it, and thousands more stand in a melancholy fevered queue waiting to embrace it. We are over-run with ordinary writers, and Mr. Cornford wishes to raise them like sweet peas. We call this a dubious project, but we repeat that Mr. Cornford has forged a likely instrument for tickling the soil.

In essence his book is a consideration, by example, comment, and suggested exercises, of the qualities which should be found in the “five orders of composition,” identified by Mr. Cornford as The Story, Description, Dialogue, The Letter, and The Essay. Thus among the examples of Description we are given three attempts to render the force and character of wind, by Roger Ascham, Richard Jefferies, and Charles Dickens. The examples are well chosen, and they form, with Mr. Cornford’s commentary, a critical demonstration that will be useful and agreeable to many. But as a matter for the schoolroom we misdoubt it. Mr. Cornford’s instructions to the teacher are as follows:

The love of nature is lively, or latent, in nearly all children; in many, it becomes little less than a passion. Let the Subject set be—Seeing the Wind, as Ascham calls it—the wind’s action, as manifested in any manner soever; as acting upon trees, or open country, or houses, or the sea. And let the pupil be obliged to make a definite observation of nature with this definite end in view; if possible, writing his notes out of doors, face to face with his subject.

Here the business of Invention is at first to analyse—investigate, take to pieces—the scene under observation; next, in certain cases, to combine and improve; of Selection, to choose those elements that serve to suggest the rest of the picture, and so to convey the whole impression—the effect—it is designed to produce; and of Disposition, to arrange these elements in the order that most vividly conveys the impression; bearing in mind that, as a general rule, the first and last things mentioned, necessarily, by reason of their position, strike the dominant notes in the composition.

Not for worlds would we send boys out into the wind to write about it. Nor would we, with Mr. Cornford, ask them to ape Bunyan in Dialogue, or Lamb in an Informal Essay on the old and new schoolmaster, or Dickens in his rendering of the terrors of “The First Day at School,” or Abraham Cowley on “Myself.” The main question could be argued at almost any length, and we have little space available, but a passage in Prof. Walter Raleigh’s recent inaugural lecture at Glasgow, on “The Study of English Literature,” seems to us worth quoting in this connexion. It is the business of Prof. Raleigh to inculcate the taste for literature. Yet he points out with perfect truth, and a procession of instances, that our greatest writers have owed little to the nourishment of schools:

Some writers there are, no doubt, like Matthew Arnold or Cardinal Newman, who are the highest products of academic culture—although even these took pleasure in pointing out the faults and failings of the nursery in which they were reared and in making fun of their foster-mother. But for the most part the greatest of our writers came from less scholarly surroundings. Now it is a small tradesman, familiar with debtors’ courts and prisons and the haunts of thieves, a Government spy, a venal pamphleteer, and one of the best prose-writers in the English language, Daniel Defoe. Again it is a country girl who amuses herself by taking note of the visitors at her father’s parsonage, of their conversation and their petty foibles, and for her own diversion writes books describing the society that she knows—Jane Austen. Or it is a printer’s apprentice who, after the manner of good apprentices, marries his master’s daughter, rises to affluence and beguiles his later years with original composition—Samuel Richardson. Or it is a banker—Samuel Rogers. Or a peer and darling of society—Rochester or Byron. Or it is a farmer’s son who collects traditional songs and ballads and exercises his satirical vein in the theological disputes of his parish. Or it is a provincial High Bailiff’s son plunged at an early age into the riotous life of the street, the tavern, and the theatre in Elizabethan London. What could a poor Professor of Literature have done for any of these?

The truth is, that even self-discipline such as Stevenson’s issues in a talent which, though it may dazzle in its day, may in the end be found to be doubtful and derivative.

Nothing that we have said is intended to discourage literary beginners from using Mr. Cornford’s book, which will probably help them in many ways. It will certainly introduce them to the difficulty and endlessness of the literary art, and so enable them to define their ambitions.

Correspondence.

“Crossing the Bar.”

SIR,—In your last issue Mr. Arthur Waugh contends that something is wrong with the version Mr. A. J. C. Hare gives in his Story of My Life of the circumstances under which “Crossing the Bar” was written. There is no necessity for me to repeat that version, and the account alluded to by Mr. Waugh, as given by the present Lord Tennyson in his “Life” of his father, is familiar to all. Mr. Hare is undoubtedly wrong as to when the poem was composed, but in what he says about how it was written he receives support from Canon Rawnsley’s new volume, Memories of the Tennysons.

In the Spring of 1900 Canon Rawnsley was visiting at Farringford. Tennyson was recovering sufficiently from a bad attack of influenza to take short walks, though, as a precaution against any sudden attack of faintness, he never went unaccompanied either by his son or his nurse. One day, when walking with his visitor, Tennyson spoke of the certainty of life beyond, and quoted a verse from his “Crossing the Bar.” After finishing the quotation he said: “I wrote that between here and home in a single walk,” and he turned to the nurse who was with them and said: “Did I not, nurse?” She replied: “I know it was written down when you got home from your walk.”

Canon Rawnsley continues: “It did not seem strange that it should have been so swiftly composed. It reads so simply and inevitably that one can well believe it was written right off, so I said, ‘Yes, but then you had been thinking over it for years.’ And he answered: ‘Well, I suppose the most of us think a good deal—do we not?—of the time when we shall put out to sea.’”

Canon Rawnsley seeks to reconcile the version with that given by Tennyson’s son by suggesting that while the thought of the poem might have been given to Tennyson one day when he crossed from Lyam to Yar, the working out of it must have taken place on the walk between the Briary and Farringford.—I am, &c.,

(REV.) R. WILKINS REES.

Cheetham Hill, Manchester.

Dr. Bridges’s “Opus Majus.”

SIR,—In 1897 Dr. Bridges published an edition of Roger Bacon’s Opus Majus. It was searchingly reviewed in more than one literary journal, and unsparingly condemned for its many textual inaccuracies. Dr. Bridges tried to defend himself, but has now acknowledged the justice of the severity by reprinting one part of the book, and giving a list of corrections for the rest. A few additional notes also appear. For this (which he incorrectly calls a “supplementary” volume) the charge made is 7s. 6d.—the original two volumes costing 32s. Surely the Clarendon Press, who have washed their hands of the book, should issue this volume free to those who were led to purchase the book because of the esteem in which their name is held. At any rate, Dr. Bridges should do so, in atonement for what he himself confesses to have been "insufficient equipment of expert skill."

J. CALDER ROSS.

Ada Negri.

SIR,—I have seen from time to time quotations from the work of this Italian poetess, about whom a good deal was written in English papers a year or two ago. I should be very glad if any of your readers can give me a brief connected account of Ada Negri. The following poem by her appears in the Philadelphia Conservator, and I should be interested to know whether it was written in English or whether the following is only a translation from the Italian. I fancy that you may not object to print the whole of the verses for their own sake. They have no title.—I am, &c., Bedford.

H. T. T.

The verses to which H. T. T. draws attention are as follows:

Yea, there are hundreds, thousands, millions more,
Unending hosts there are.
The serried ranks are muttering like the roar
Of thunder from afar.

And they advance, chilled by the icy air,
With even step and slow.
They're clad in sackcloth and their heads are bare,
Their eyes in fever glow.

All, all united, as if seeking me—
Grey forms, by suffering bowed,
Of surging waves a turbid, troubled sea,
Of faces wan a crowd,

Covering, imprisoning me, they press around,
Their hoarse breath fills my ear,
Their long-drawn sobs and sighs—oh, woful sound—
Their blasphemies I hear.

"We come from houses where no fire glows,
From beds where rest is not,
Where, broken, tamed, the body slowly grows
Accustomed to its lot.

We come from caves and dens, from chambers low,
From many a dark retreat.
Shadows of peril and of pain we throw
Wherever tread our feet.

And we sought faith that to ideals cleaves,
Alas! we were betrayed;
And we sought love that hopes and that believes,
Alas! we were betrayed.

And work we sought that gives new life and strength,
Only repelled to be.
Where then is hope? Oh mercy! Where is strength?—
The world's defeated, we!

In the great flood of sunshine's golden light
All round us and above
Bursts forth upon the air in joyous flight
A hymn of work and love.

An iron snake the steam-train thundering winds
Through towering mountain-wall,
And industry is summoning arms and minds
With warlike trumpet-call.

A thousand mouths each other seek, enticed
By love's intent desire;
A thousand generous lives are sacrificed
In glowing furnace-fire.

And we are useless!—Who has thrust us, who
On this stepmother earth?
Who has denied us every wish we knew,
Yea, from our very birth?

What unknown power with hostile hand does reign
And will not let us free?
Why does blind fate cry out to us: In vain?—
The world's defeated, we!

Natural Law in the Cycling World.

A few weeks ago a party of cyclists were riding down Barnet Hill. One of them fell, and died within a few days from his injuries. His offence was foolishly riding too fast down a hill.

SIR,—Permit me to take exception to the above (cut from your review of Huxley's life, page 460). Your facts are wrong.

The cyclist was not travelling too fast; he was going at a moderate pace. The cause of the fatality was a stone drain-cover which stands up from the surrounding surface of the road, and the fault lies with the local authority in not keeping the road in proper repair.

The immediate cause of the accident was side-slip, which occurs frequently in the streets to the most moderate riders. I know men who ride fast to avoid side-slips on greasy roads. This is a form of accident which we cyclists have very little power to prevent. It may, roughly speaking, be attributed to the faults of others, not to the sufferer.

Perhaps you will say this does not affect the argument: the thesis remains, though the "law" is shifted from the cyclist to the local authority. But before I admit that I want you to acknowledge that you were prejudiced; and that the expression of it gives pain to the readers who knew the cyclist. A man who meets with his death through the criminal negligence of others should not be condemned as "foolish."

There is no finality in speed. Our ancestors crawled, our fathers walked, we cycle. Notwithstanding what each has thought of the other, there is a law of progress. A cyclist cannot be foolish because he goes too fast. He cannot go too fast. The natural "law" will stop him from doing that; but the natural law does not manifest itself in neglected drain covers.

You may, on Huxleyian lines, say, perhaps, that the man who elects to go fast must increase in adequate degree his faculty of caution, and the law that prevents accidents must be stronger in him. His sense of sight must improve. But one of my cycling friends (a most cautious man) was recently thrown at night under similar circumstances.

There undoubtedly is law behind all accidents; but, when you invoke it, please put the blame on the guilty cause instead of the innocent victim; otherwise, as in this case, you may fall unconsciously into prejudice. You are prejudiced against speed in a form of motion which is undoubtedly a great factor in present-day progress. Men who rode ten miles an hour ten years ago are now riding twenty, and will in ten years hence be riding thirty: and it will be regarded as quite reasonable. The man who was killed was riding seventeen. (I am a cyclist and do Barnet Hill very frequently.) Prejudice is not becoming in a reviewer of Huxley's work. His shade might resent it.—I am, &c.,

E. B. RIDGWAY.

The Bank House, Wood Green,
November 18, 1900.

[Mr. Ridgway's imputation of "prejudice" is absurd. We print his letter, as he evidently knows all the facts of this unhappy accident; but we do not think that his statement affects our argument.]

THE approach of Christmas is authenticated by the arrival of the Christmas numbers. Messrs. Pears' Annual is composed of a spirited last century story in seventeen chapters by Mr. Max Pemberton, and three pictorial supplements, of which the largest, "The British Lion," from the original painting by Vastagh Gezah, is a good piece of colour-printing, and an admirable picture for the walls of a nursery.

Our Weekly Competition.

Result of No. 61 (New Series).

LAST week we offered a prize of One Guinea for the most suitable words to be inscribed on the beacon-tower raised to the memory of William Black on Duart Point, on the west coast of Scotland. The inscriptions suggested are not very remarkable, but we award the prize to Miss (?) C. C. Bell, Epworth. C. S.'s inscription would have had an almost as good claim to the prize if instead of "the hardy toiler of the northern deep," he had written "seafarers":

In memory of William Black, the home of whose genius was this coast of Scotland, the scenes and characters of which he portrayed in many a story of undying interest, this tower is built, and this lamp is lit; a guide and a sign to the seafarers whom he loved.

Other suggestions are as follows:

To the memory of William Black, novelist, this tower has been erected, amid scenes whose beauty and terror he described with equal power and felicity; that, in death as in life, he may remain a constant friend to the hardy toiler of the northern deep.

[C. S., Lochfyne.]

To William Black, whose name we would fain save from being "writ in water," by memorialising it in this beacon: which beacon shall be famed abroad as a light and guide to all mariners sailing these seas, even as his books have carried far the renown of our Western Highlands.

[A. M. P., Hampstead]

In life he filled us with delight,
Weaving a web of fancies bright;
In death his mem'ry comes to guide
Poor wanderers o'er the heaving tide.
Oh, happy fate! In life to charm,
In death to shield his friends from harm!

[M. A. B., Camberley]

He loved the sea, and the heather,
And the people of the north,
And the old songs of the Gael.

[A. W., Tonbridge.]

This beacon has been raised as a memorial to William Black, on the coast of the land he so faithfully describes, by those whom his genius has illumed and taught, and who wished to throw a guiding light for men over the sea he loved so well.

[E. L. C., Redhill.]

To William Black, whose best novels were inspired by a devoted love of Highland life and scenery, this landmark, and memorial of his unchangeable affection, was erected for the benefit of Highland fishermen.

[A. E. W., Inverness.]

In life he loved this country-side,
Here let the memory of him dwell,
A tower to be the fishers' guide,
Across the waters: All is well.

[H. M. G., London.]

Erected to the memory of William Black, novelist, who by the creation of fictitious characters has done so much towards the perfection of the real characters of his readers.

[E. P., London]

Replies also received from: E. H., Esling; T. C., Buxted; R. H. S., Fulham; F. G. C., Hull.

Competition No. 62 (New Series).

We offer a prize of One Guinea for the best Literary Riddle. All riddles must, of course, be accompanied by their answers.

RULES.

Answers, addressed "Literary Competition, THE ACADEMY, 43, Chancery-lane, W.C.," must reach us not later than the first post of Wednesday, November 28. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found on the second page of Wrapper, or it cannot enter into competition. Competitors sending more than one attempt at solution must accompany each attempt with a separate coupon; otherwise the first only will be considered.

Special cloth cases for binding the half-yearly volume of the ACADEMY can be supplied for 1s. each. The price of the bound half-yearly volume is 8s. 9d. Communications should be addressed to the Publisher, 43, Chancery-lane.

Announcements.

MESSRS. METHUEN & Co. have arranged with Messrs. Macmillan & Co. for permission to use Edward FitzGerald's translation of The Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam in their edition of this work, which will be characterised by a full commentary on each stanza by Mrs. H. M. Batson, and a biography of Omar by Prof. Ross.

MESSRS. METHUEN are about to publish the first volume of The History of the Boer War, by F. H. E. Cunliffe, Fellow of All Souls' College, Oxford. This volume carries the war to the Relief of Ladysmith.

OWING to the success of the new pocket edition, on thin paper, of the late Dr. John Brown's Horæ Subsecivæ, Messrs. A. & C. Black have decided to issue a similar edition of the Waverley Novels in twenty-five volumes. The first two volumes—Waverley and Guy Mannering will be published on December 1, and two volumes will be issued monthly thereafter until the set is complete in November, 1901. Each volume of the new pocket edition of the Waverley Novels will have a photogravure frontispiece, and will contain the late Dr. Laing's copyright notes, as well as Messrs. Black's copyright corrections and emendations, obtained by careful collation with Sir Walter Scott's own interleaved copy of the Novels, which has been long in their possession.

The Relation of St. Paul to Contemporary Jewish Thought, now published by Messrs. Macmillan, to which was awarded the Kaye Prize in 1899, is an essay by Mr. St. John Thackeray.

The Divine Love, by the Rev. Charles Abbey, published by Macmillan & Co., is a study of Christ's sayings on judgment and condemnation.

MESSRS. WATTS & Co. are about to publish a new work by the Rev. R. C. Fillingham, Vicar of Hoxton, well known as "The Radical Parson." The book is entitled Christ in London.

A LARGE-PAPER issue of Mr. Edmund J. Sullivan's edition of Tennyson's "Dream of Fair Women," limited to 125 copies, each numbered and signed by the artist, is to be published by Mr. Grant Richards. Many of the illustrations are in photogravure and in duplicate.

H.M. THE QUEEN has just accepted from Mrs. Mayne Reid an advance copy of The Life and Adventures of Captain Mayne Reid, which will be published this week by Messrs. Greening & Co.

Two new volumes in Messrs. Greening's "English Writers of To-Day" series will be published next week. These are Bret Harte, by T. Edgar Pemberton, to which Mr. Bret Harte has contributed a prefatory letter, and Swinburne, by Theodore Wratiaslaw.

MISS HELEN MILECETE, the author of A Girl of the North, has just returned to London from Canada in time for the publication of her new novel, A Detached Pirate, which, by the way, has been published in America, with very great success, under the title Miss Vandeleur—Pirate. Miss Milecete is now engaged on two new novels, one of which will be published in the spring.

MR. HEINEMANN announces a new "Dooley" book with the title of Mr. Dooley's Philosophy. Among the great variety of subjects discussed are Marriage and Politics—The Servant Girl Problem—The Future of China—The American Abroad—The Paris Exhibition—Alcohol as Food—Anglo-American Sports—The Negro Question—The American Stage, &c. The book will be fully illustrated and will have as a frontispiece a portrait of Dooley in colours by William Nicholson.

MESSRS. BLACKWOOD & SONS announce for immediate publication a sacred anthology of prose and verse entitled Flowers of the Cave. The editors are Mr. Laurie Maguire and Mr. Cecil Headlam, whose volume of Prayers from the Poets, published by the same firm last year, is now in its second edition.

MESSRS. SANDS & Co. announce for immediate publication a new contribution to turf history, entitled Ashgill; or, The Life and Times of John Osborne, Jockey, Trainer, Owner, and Breeder of Thoroughbreds, by J. B. Radcliffe. The work will treat of the interesting career of John Osborne ("Honest John") the doyen of North-country horsemen from 1846 to 1892. It will contain over thirty illustrations, consisting of portraits of jockeys, trainers, horses, &c., besides family groups, and views of Osborne's residence.

YOUNG WRITERS OF PROSE or VERSE should send stamped envelope for full Prospectus of "Literary Tutor per Post," as conducted by E. L. T. HARRIS-BICKFORD, F.S.Sc. (Lond.), Ex-President of, and Critic to, the International Literary Association; Critic to the Junior Literary Association, &c., &c. MSS. criticised, corrected, and commented on weekly, accompanied by "Practical Papers." Prizes and Payment have been won by Mr. Bickford's Pupils.—Address Thoruley House, Redruth. (Please mention THE ACADEMY.)

A LITERARY MAN about to PUBLISH a PERIODICAL devoted exclusively to high-class Literature of a special character, desires the co-operation of another, willing to risk £100. The profits might be considerable, but there is a possibility of loss. Half share of paper offered. Interview by appointment only.—Address, Box 2,849, Self's Office, Fleet Street, London.

MR. HENRY LITTLEHALES undertakes the COLLATION of MSS. and PRINTED BOOKS, Liturgical or other, of any period. Proof Reading, Indexing, &c. Foreign Libraries visited.—Please apply to 53, Stockwell Road, S.W.

SOUTH AFRICA.—CLASSES in ZULU and TAAL (Cane Dutch) every SATURDAY, at 4, SANCTUARY, WESTMINSTER. SWAHILI, &c., by arrangement.—Apply Miss A. WERNER, 20, Dry Hill Park Road, Tootingbridge.

CATALOGUES.

D A V I D N U T T,
57-59, LONG ACRE, LONDON, W.C.
NOW READY.

CATALOGUE OF SECOND-HAND BOOKS,
No. LXVI

ENGLISH PHILOLOGY and LITERATURE.
ICELANDIC and the MODERN SCANDINAVIAN LANGUAGES.

GOthic, OLD and MODERN GERMAN.
(798 Lots)

Including the Anglo-Saxon and Icelandic Portion of the Library of the late Thomas Miller, Esq., sometime Professor at the Universities of Göttingen and Strasbourg.
And a Collection of First Editions of Modern English Authors.

To be had free on application.

SOTHERAN'S PRICE CURRENT OF LITERATURE.

MONTHLY LIST OF NEWLY-PURCHASED SECOND-HAND BOOKS.

No. 603, just published for NOVEMBER, includes a Supplement of Newly-bound Books for the Library or Presentation.

Post free from HENRY SOTHERAN & CO., Book-sellers, 140, Strand, W.C.; and 37, Piccadilly, W.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE,
IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN BOOKS.
14, Beaufort Street, Covent Garden, 20, South Frederick St. Edinburgh, and 7, Broad Street, Oxford.
CATALOGUES post free on application

FOREIGN BOOKS and PERIODICALS promptly supplied on moderate terms.
CATALOGUES on application.
DULAU & CO., 37, SOHO SQUARE.

LITERARY RESEARCH.—A Gentleman, experienced in Literary Work, and who has access to the British Museum Reading Room, is open to arrange with Author or any person requiring assistance in Literary Research, or in seeing Work through the Press. Translations undertaken from French, Italian, or Spanish.—Apply, by letter, to D. C. DALLAS, 151, Strand, London, W.C.

TABOOED SCIENTIFIC WORKS.—The Manager of the University Press, Limited, begs to inform the Medical Profession, Clergymen, and Teachers that the Scientific Works indicated at a recent trial and burnt by order of the Court—viz., Dr. Havelock Ellis's "STUDIES in the PSYCHOLOGY of SEX," Professor Kraft-Ebing's "PSYCHOPATHIA SEXUALIS," Dr. Ch. Féréz's "THE SEXUAL INSTINCT," and G. Mortimer's "CHAPTERS on HUMAN LOVE," in the future, cannot be stocked by Book-sellers in Great Britain, and will only be supplied direct from Leipzig and Paris.—THE UNIVERSITY PRESS, Limited, 2, Broad Street Buildings, London, E.C.

BOOKS WANTED.—25s. each given for any Presentation Volumes with inscriptions written inside by Dickens, Thackeray, Browning, Lamb, Keats, Shelley, Tennyson, Scott, Long, and any notable Author. Special List (5,000 Books Wanted) free.—BAKER'S, John Bright St., Birmingham.

BOOKS RARE and OUT-OF-PRINT, SUPPLIED.—State wants. CATALOGUES free. Libraries and Small Parcels Purchased for Cash. WANTED: Gardner's HISTORY, 2 vols., 1863.—HOLLAND Co., Book Merchants, Birmingham

THE PHOENIX LITERARY AGENCY undertakes TYPE-WRITING at 8d. per 1,000 words; Translations from or into Oriental Languages; Research in Literary, Religious, Scientific, Philosophical, and Political Matters. Punctuality and neatness our speciality.—Address 8, Prince's Parade, Muswell Hill, London, N.

TYPE-WRITING promptly and accurately done. 10d. per 1,000 words. Samples and references. Multi-Copies.—Address, Miss MESSER, 13, Mortimer Crescent, N.W.

CHRISTMAS LECTURES.

ROYAL INSTITUTION of GREAT BRITAIN, Albemarle Street, Piccadilly, W.

Sir ROBERT BALL, D.Sc., LL.D., F.R.S., Lowndean Professor of Astronomy, University of Cambridge, will deliver a COURSE of SIX LECTURES (adapted to a Juvenile Audience) on "GREAT CHAPTERS in the BOOK of NATURE," commencing on THURSDAY, December 27, 1900, at 5 o'clock; to be continued on December 29; and January 1, 3, 5, 8, 1901. Subscription (for Non-Members) to this Course, One Guinea (Children under 16 Half-a-Guinea); to all the Courses in the Season, Two Guineas. Tickets may now be obtained at the Institution.

MUDIE'S LIBRARY

(LIMITED).

For the CIRCULATION and SALE of all the BEST

ENGLISH, FRENCH, GERMAN, ITALIAN, SPANISH, and RUSSIAN BOOKS.

TOWN SUBSCRIPTIONS from ONE GUINEA per annum.

LONDON BOOK SOCIETY (for weekly exchange of Books at the houses of Subscribers) from TWO GUINEAS per annum.

COUNTRY SUBSCRIPTIONS from TWO GUINEAS per annum.

N.B.—Two or Three Friends may UNITE in ONE SUBSCRIPTION, and thus lessen the Cost of Carriage.

Town and Village Clubs supplied on Liberal Terms.

Prospectuses and Monthly Lists of Books gratis and post free.

SURPLUS LIBRARY BOOKS

NOW OFFERED AT GREATLY REDUCED PRICES.

A NEW CLEARANCE LIST (100 pp.) Sent Gratis and post free to any address.

The List contains: POPULAR WORKS in TRAVEL, SPORT, HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, SCIENCE, and FICTION. Also NEW and SURPLUS Copies of FRENCH, GERMAN, ITALIAN, SPANISH, and RUSSIAN BOOKS.

30-34, NEW OXFORD STREET;

241, Brompton Road, S.W.; 48, Queen Victoria Street, E.C., LONDON;

And at Barton Arcade, MANCHESTER.

An American Transport in the Crimean War.

By Capt. CODMAN.

In this work Capt. Codman relates his experiences of an American Chartered Transport in the Crimean War..... The Crimean War is the connecting link between old and modern methods of warfare.

Frontispiece.

198 pp.

Price 3s. 6d.

London:

SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, HAMILTON & CO

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK,

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London, W.C.

CURRENT ACCOUNTS

2% on the minimum monthly balances, when not drawn below £100.

DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS

2 1/2% on Deposits, repayable on demand.

STOCKS AND SHARES.

Stocks and Shares Purchased and Sold for Customers. The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free.

FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

Telephone, No. 5, Holborn.
Telegraphic Address, "BIRKBECK, LONDON."

F. V. WHITE & CO.'S LIST.

Now ready.—In Illustrated Cover, price 1s.

Sixteenth Year of Publication.

WINTER'S ANNUAL,

ENTITLED

She Was Called Noel.

(SECOND EDITION.)

By JOHN STRANGE WINTER,
Author of "Bootles' Baby."

A NEW JUVENILE BOOK.

In cloth gilt, Illustrated, price 2s. 6d.

A MAGIC GARDEN.

By CECIL MEDLICOTT.

FOUR POPULAR NOVELS.

Price 6s. each.

A SELF-MADE COUNTESS.

(Fourth Edition.) JOHN STRANGE WINTER.

IN WHITE RAIMENT.

(Second Edition.) WILLIAM LE QUEUX.

IN SHEEP'S CLOTHING.

HUME NISBET.

THE JUSTICE of REVENGE.

GEORGE GRIFFITH.

F. V. WHITE & CO.,
14, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C.

Crown 8vo, Illustrated, price 2s. 6d. post free.

CONVICTED OF HEROISM. A Tale of John Penry, Martyr, 1559—1593. By HERBERT M. WHITE, B.A. Illustrated by Frank H. Simpson.

"Excellent, unusual grasp of events, nobility of ideal, vividness, and grace of style."
REV. ARCHIBALD DUFF, D.D.

Twenty-first Thousand. Limp cloth, price 6d., post free.

OUR PRINCIPLES: a Congregationalist Church Manual. By G. B. JOHNSON.

London: ALEXANDER & SHEPHEARD, Limited,
21 and 22, Finsbury Street, Holborn, W.C.

COMPLETE SETS OF THE PORTRAIT SUPPLEMENTS TO

"THE ACADEMY"

can still be obtained for 3s. 6d. They consist of 37 Portraits—viz.:

BEN JONSON.	JOHN MILTON.
JOHN KEATS.	WILLIAM COWPER.
SIR JOHN SUCKLING.	CHARLES DARWIN.
TOM HOOD.	ALFRED, LORD
THOMAS GRAY.	TENNYSON.
ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON.	HENRY WADSWORTH LONGFELLOW.
SIR WALTER SCOTT.	ANDREW MARVELL.
SAMUEL RICHARDSON.	ROBERT BROWNING.
THOMAS DE QUINCEY.	THOMAS CARLYLE.
LEIGH HUNT.	PERCY BYSSHE SHELLEY.
LORD MACAULAY.	CHARLES DICKENS.
ROBERT SOUTHEY.	JONATHAN SWIFT.
S. T. COLERIDGE.	WILLIAM MAKEPEACE THACKERAY.
CHARLES LAMB.	WILLIAM BLAKE.
MICHAEL DRAYTON.	SIR RICHARD STEELE
WALTER SAVAGE LANDOR.	ALEXANDER POPE.
SAMUEL PEPYS.	DOUGLAS JERROLD.
EDMUND WALLER.	FRANCIS BACON.
WILKIE COLLINS.	HENRIK IBSEN.

THE POEM OF THE YEAR.

AD ASTRA.

By CHARLES WHITWORTH WYNNE.

SIXTH EDITION.

Fcap. 4to, cloth, gilt top, 5s. net.

A FEW EXTRACTS FROM REVIEWS OF "AD ASTRA."

Literature.

"A fine poem."

Methodist Times.

"There are many passages of exquisite beauty of thought expressed in apt and felicitous phrase. If, as we believe, Mr. Wynne is still in the earlier days of his manhood, we may expect more mature work—work which shall warrant him in taking his place among those immortals whose work is enshrined in the permanent and wealthy literature of the nation. Nor will he then have occasion to be ashamed of this, the venture of his nascent muse."

Liverpool Mercury.

"The author works out his subject with admirable skill, portraying Love in many aspects—love for Nature, love for Woman, love for our kind at large, and supremely, love for God. It is an essentially religious poem, and no one can read it without being deeply impressed by the lofty spirit breathed throughout its flowing and dignified measures."

Literary World.

"In speaking of nature, Mr. Wynne nearly achieves eloquence, and later, while emphasising his belief that the world will pass from religious cliques to a grand and consoling catholicity, he rises to and maintains utterance worthy of his theme."

Court Circular.

"We dare venture to say that this poem would have created quite a sensation towards the close of the last, or at the commencement of the present century."

SOME STANZAS FROM "AD ASTRA."

ON HUMAN SUFFERING.

CXXXVI.

What man is there that hath a sickly child,
That doth not love it more than all the rest?
Thus is our grief for sorrow reconciled,
And larger love exalts the parent's breast—
The little sufferer is of all most blest,
For love and sympathy are dearer far
Than all the joys that other children share.

CXXXVII.

So every sorrow hides a central joy,
And with all suffering and pain'd under-song
There is a leavening mixture of alloy,
That more than compensates the seeming wrong,
For to all such far other joys belong—
A keener sensibility to bliss,
A finer insight into all that is.

CXXXVIII.

So Pain and Sorrow also have their part
In the great scheme of universal good,
Without them how refine the human heart,
Too soon elated unless these withstood?
So lightly do we flit from mood to mood,
We seldom see the sorrow of the thing,
Until the Angel Pity droops her wing.

CXXXIX.

And Sorrow is not only to refine,
For Love leaps up with tenfold sympathy,
To mitigate the suffering and the sin
That are a part of the divine decree,
In that foreshadowing of the life to be—
Where Pity hath become an Angel grace,
And Sorrow shows once more a smiling face.

ON RELIGION.

CXC.

But live the Christ-like life, and thou shalt know
"Whether the doctrine be of God or not!"—
What simpler answer could our Lord bestow?
How doth it lighten our poor human lot!
How soon are all our doubts and fears forgot!
For God reveals Himself in many ways,
Till Disbelief a Doubt of Doubt betrays.

CXCVI.

His laws are built upon Eternal Truth—
Truth that is evermore inviolate!
'Tis but the fashion of misguided youth
Infinite Wisdom to interrogate,
Youth irreligious, unregenerate!
But with each Spring a deeper feeling flows,
Lights with the Lily, reddens with the rose.

* * * * *

CCI.

What man is there would be afraid to die
If Christ should meet him in the way to-morrow,
And tell him of the shadow drawing nigh?
Dost think that he would look on Death with sorrow?
Nay, rather, would he not new comfort borrow
To know that Christ doth live, hath power to save,
That there is Victory even in the grave!

CCII.

And canst thou doubt that Christ doth surely live
That Sun and Moon and Stars hold Him in awe:
Disorder never yet had power to give
The cosmic cycle, the Metonic law—
What other inference can our reason draw?
We feel the beat of His o'er-shadowing wings,
The harmony in all created things.

CATALOGUES.

TO BOOKBUYERS and LIBRARIANS of FREE LIBRARIES—The DECEMBER CATALOGUES of Valuable SECOND-HAND WORKS and NEW RE-MAINERS, offered at prices greatly reduced, are Now Ready, and will be sent post free upon application to W. H. Smith & Sons, Library Department, 186, Strand, London, W.C.

BOOKS at DISCOUNT PRICES.—Just published, a New CATALOGUE, of 184 pages, of the Best New Books offered at a Discount of 25 per cent., except on those published at net prices. A copy sent post free on application. Orders for Books received by the morning post are executed the same day.—Trotter, Hanson & Co., Limited, 143, Oxford Street, and 69, Sloane Street, London.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE, IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN BOOKS.
14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, 20, South Frederick St. Edinburgh, and 7, Broad Street, Oxford.
CATALOGUES post free on application.

BAEDEKER'S & BADDELEY'S TOURISTS' GUIDE BOOKS.
New fully detailed CATALOGUE sent post free on application.
DULAU & CO., 37, SOHO SQUARE, LONDON, W.

LITERARY RESEARCH.—A Gentleman, experienced in Literary Work, and who has access to the British Museum Reading Room, is open to arrange with Author or any person requiring assistance in Literary Research, or in seeing Work through the Press. Translations undertaken from French, Italian, or Spanish.—Apply, by letter, to D. C. DALIAS, 151, Strand, London, W.C.

BOOKS WANTED.—25s. each given for any Presentation Volumes with Inscriptions written inside by Dickens, Thackeray, Browning, Lamb, Keats, Shelley, Tennyson, Scott, Lang, and any notable Authors. Special List (3,000 Books Wanted) free.—BARKER, John Bright St., Birmingham.

TYPE-WRITING promptly and accurately done 10d. per 1,000 words. Samples and references Multi-Copies.—Address, Miss MESSER, 15, Mortimer Crescent, N.W.

TYPE-WRITER.—AUTHORS' MSS. COPIED with accuracy and despatch. Carbon Duplicates, Circulars, Examination Papers, &c.—Miss F. TIGAR, 23, Maitland Park Villa, Haverstock Hill, N.W.—Established 1884.

MUDIE'S LIBRARY

(LIMITED).

SUBSCRIPTIONS for 3 Months, 6 Months, and 12 Months

CAN BE ENTERED AT ANY DATE.

THE BEST and MOST POPULAR BOOKS of the SEASON ARE NOW in CIRCULATION.
Prospectuses of Terms Free on Application.

BOOK SALE DEPARTMENT.

Many Thousand Surplus Copies of Books always ON SALE (Second Hand). Also a Large Selection of BOOKS in LEATHER BINDINGS SUITABLE FOR CHRISTMAS, NEW YEAR, BIRTHDAY, AND WEDDING PRESENTS.

30 to 34, NEW OXFORD STREET; 241, Brompton Road, S.W.; 48, Queen Victoria Street, E.C., LONDON; and at 10-12, Barton Arcade, MANCHESTER

THE NINETEENTH CENTURY

No. 286.—DECEMBER, 1900.

THE STRATEGICAL VALUE of the CHANNEL ISLANDS. By WILLIAM LAIRD CLOWES ("Nauticus").
"BALFOURIAN AMELIORATION" in IRELAND. By the Right Hon. HORACE PLUNKETT (Vice-President of the Department of Agriculture and Technical Instruction for Ireland).
THOMAS HENRY HUXLEY. By LESLIE STEPHEN.
RECENT SCIENCE. By PRING K. POLKIN.
THE ROLE of WOMEN in SOCIETY. I. In Eighteenth-Century France. II. In Nineteenth-Century England. By the Hon. Lady POWSON.
THE DEFECTIVE ADDITION to our COMPANY LAW. By His Honour JUDGE EMERSON.
A VISIT to the BOER PRISONERS at ST. HELENA. By Mrs. JOHN RICHARD GREEN.
THE POET'S END. By FREDERICK WIDMOR.
PRESENT-DAY PROGRESS in INDIA. By PROF. CHESLER MOZDON.
"THE SOURCES of ISLAM." By Sir WILLIAM ALMEIDA, K.C.S.I.
NEGLECT in RECRUITING. By Captain P. G. ELGARD.
THE RETURN of the EXILE. A Retrospect. By Sir CHARLES ROE.
THE NEWSPAPERS. By Sir WALTER RILEY.
THE USAGES of WAR in SOUTH AFRICA. By JOHN MACDONELL, C.B. (Associé de l'Institut de Droit International).
ARE WE REALLY a NATION of AMATEURS? By the Right Hon. Sir HERBERT MAXWELL, Bart., M.P.
LORD ROSEBERRY on the DANGERS to BRITISH TRADE. By HENRY BIRCHENOEGR.

London: SAMPSON LOW, MARSTON & CO., LTD.

PORTRAIT SUPPLEMENTS TO "THE ACADEMY,"

Consisting of Thirty-seven Portraits of Old and New Celebrities in Literature, may still be obtained, singly, or in complete sets for 3s. 6d., on application to the Office, 43, Chancery Lane, W.C.

BY ORDER OF THE EXECUTORS OF PHILIP A. HURT, Esq., deceased.

SALE on the Premises, 20, Randolph Crescent, Maida Vale, on WEDNESDAY, 12th December, at 1 o'clock, of the LIBRARY of BOOKS, comprising Works of Ancient and Modern English and French Authors; also a Henry VIII. Bible, and quantity of Old Prints, &c.—Auctioneers.

CHESTERTON & SONS, 140, Kensington High Street, W.; 15, Sloane Street, S.W.; and 51, Cheap-side, E.C.

CORPORATION of SHEFFIELD

MAPPIN ART GALLERY.

An ASSISTANT to the CURATOR is WANTED in this Gallery, at a commencing salary of £80 per annum. Full particulars to be obtained from

E. HOWARTH, Curator.

HIGH SCHOOL of GLASGOW

The School Board of Glasgow invite APPLICATIONS for the position of RECTOR of the HIGH SCHOOL, vacant by the retirement of Mr. Paton. Salary, £450 per annum. Candidates should not be over 45 years of age, and should be Honors Graduates of a University in the United Kingdom.

Applications, with twenty copies of testimonials, must be lodged with the undersigned on or before 31st December.

G. W. ALEXANDER, Clerk.

School Board Offices,
129, Bath Street, Glasgow.

MOFFAT LINDNER'S WATER-COLOUR DRAWINGS of THE HARBOURS of BERGEN and THE RIVERS of DORRECHT, at ROBERT DUNTHORN'S, The Rembrandt Gallery, Vigo Street, W.

IMPORTANT TO LITERARY MEN.

The well-known London Editor of an important forthcoming Publication is ready to consider Original Contributions from capable Writers possessing FIRST-HAND EXPERT "up-to-date" information on Military, Naval, Medical, Scientific, Social, Legal, Commercial, Financial, and Musical Subjects—Apply, stating clearly the nature of information and remuneration required, but sending no testimonials nor MSS. Young authors also can have some research work in connection with the above.—Editor, Poste Restante, Nice.

THE REV. WILLIAM C. STEWART, LL.B., LECTURES on HISTORY and LITERATURE, and gives LESSONS in ELOCUTION and in COMPOSITION, orally or by Correspondence.—7, Spencer Road, Wandsworth Common, S.W.

F. V. WHITE & CO.'S LIST.

NOW READY.—In cloth gilt, price 5s.

With Illustrations by A. Wallace Mills.

A CABINET SECRET.

BY

GUY BOOTHBY.

A NEW JUVENILE BOOK.

In cloth gilt, illustrated, price 2s. 6d.

A MAGIC GARDEN.

By CECIL MEDLICOTT.

FIVE POPULAR NOVELS.

Price 6s. each.

WAR and ARCADIA.

By BERTRAM MITFORD.

Miss CLEVELAND'S COMPANION

By ADELINE SERGEANT.

BROUGHT TO BAY.

By RICHARD HENRY SAVAGE.

IN SHEEP'S CLOTHING.

By HUME NISBET.

THE JUSTICE of REVENGE.

By GEORGE GRIFFITH.

F. V. WHITE & CO.,

14, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C.

BLACKWOOD'S MAGAZINE.

No. 1022. — DECEMBER, 1900. — 2s. 6d.

ARMY REORGANISATION: THE HOME ARMY—TRAINING AND REDISTRIBUTION IN RELATION TO TRAINING and to MOBILISATION FOR WAR.—WITH PLUMER to the RELIEF OF MAEPKING. By ONE of HIS TROOPERS.—THE WATCHER BY THE THRESHOLD. By JOHN BUCHAN.—A RECONNAISSANCE. By ERNEST DAWSON.—AT A CHINESE DINNER-PARTY.—DOOM CASTLE: A ROMANCE. By NEIL MUNRO.—CHRISTMAS UNDER ARMS. By CAPTAIN NEILL MALCOLM, D.S.O.—THE CASKET LETTERS. By ANDREW LANG.—HELENA FAUCHT (LADY MARTIN).—MUSINGS WITHOUT METHOD: CAMP-FOLLOWERS of FALSEHOOD.—CALUMNIES AGAINST THE BRITISH OFFICER.—THE CENSORSHIP.—THE PATRONAGE of GENERALS.—MR. W. T. STEAD'S RECKLESS CHARGES.—"NAPOLEON"—THE JUSTIFICATION of the ENGLISH.—NAPOLEON'S TABLE TALK.—THE PASSING of a NATION. By "LINESMAN"—THE FOREIGN OFFICE.

WILLIAM BLACKWOOD & SONS, EDINBURGH AND LONDON.

The Book of the "Foudroyant,"

NELSON'S FLAGSHIP.

Write to GOODALL, LAMB and HUGHWAY, Ltd., Manchester, for the above, containing beautiful Reproductions of rare Portraits, reproduced from Old Prints in the British Museum of Nelson and his Captains, not elsewhere procurable, which will be sent post free on approval.

A SELECTION FROM
Wells Gardner, Darton & Co.'s List.

The New Work by the Author of "The Prisoner of the Khalifa."

UNDER THE REBEL'S REIGN:

A Story of Egyptian Revolt. By CHARLES NEUFELD. Illustrated by C. M. SæLTON. Large crown 8vo, cloth boards, 6s. Mr. Neufeld will be remembered as the unfortunate prisoner of the Khalifa. He was liberated by Lord Kitchener after the battle of Omdurman.

The New Book by the Author of "Dinkinbar," &c.

THE WHITE STONE.

By H. C. MACILWAINE, Author of "Dinkinbar," "Fate the Fiddler," &c. With numerous Illustrations by D. G. ROWLANDSON. Extra crown 8vo, cloth boards, gilt top, 6s.

The New Volume by the Author of "Stories from the Faerie Queene."

THE BOOK OF KING ARTHUR AND HIS NOBLE KNIGHTS.

Stories from Sir Thomas Malory's "Morte d'Arthur." By MARY MACLEOD. Introduction by Prof. J. W. HALES. With Illustrations from Drawings by A. G. WALKER, Sculptor. Large crown 8vo, fancy cloth boards, 6s. Uniform with Darton's Fine Art Gift-Books.

THE GOBLIN:

A Novel. By CATHERINE S. and FLORENCE FOSTER. Large crown 8vo, cloth boards, 6s.

A thoroughly wholesome tale, the scene of which is the Yorkshire Moors.

The Question of the Day.

NO ROOM TO LIVE.

By GEORGE HAW. With an Introduction by Sir WALTER BESANT. Crown 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d.

"Deserves to be widely read and deeply pondered."—Morning Post.

"This is a volume that everybody should read, and not read only, but keep at hand for reference."—Spectator.

CALLED TO FIGHT:

Sunday Reading for Boys. By CAROLINE M. HALLETT. Fcap. 8vo, cloth boards, 2s.

These Readings are the result of long experience and of many talks with boys.

London: WELLS GARDNER, DARTON & CO., 3, Paternoster Buildings, E.C.; and 44, Victoria Street, S.W.

A CHARMING GIFT BOOK

6s., claret roan, gilt, Illustrated.

LONDON in the TIME of the DIAMOND JUBILEE

London: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL & Co. Llangollen: DARLINGTON & Co.

DARLINGTONS' HANDBOOKS.

Edited by RALPH DARLINGTON, F.R.G.S.

Maps by BARTHOLOMEW.

Fcap. 8vo. ONE SHILLING EACH. Illustrated.

THE VALE OF LLANGOLLEN.—With Special Contributions from His Excellency E. J. PHELPS, late American Minister; Professor JOHN RUSKIN, LL.D.; ROBERT BROWNING; A. W. KINGLAKE; and Sir THEODORE MARTIN, K.C.B.

BOURNEMOUTH and NEW FOREST. THE CHANNEL ISLANDS.
THE NORFOLK BROADS. THE ISLE OF WIGHT.
BRECON and its BEACONS. THE WYE VALLEY.
ROSS, TINTERN, and CHEPSTOW. THE SEVERN VALLEY.
BRISTOL, BATH, WELLS, and WESTON-SUPER-MARE.
BRIGHTON, EASTBOURNE, HASTINGS, and ST. LEONARDS.
{ LLANDUDNO, RHYL, BANGOR, PENMAENMAWR, }
{ LLANFAIRFECHAN, ANGLESEY, and CARNARVON. }
ABERYSTWYTH, BARMOUTH, MACHYNLLETH, and ABERDOVEY.
CONWAY, COLWYN BAY, BETTWS-Y-COED, SNOWDON, & FESTUNIOG.
BARMOUTH, DOLGELLY, HARLECH, CRICCIETH, and PWLLHELI.
MALVERN, HEREFORD, WORCESTER, GLOUCESTER, & CHELTENHAM.
LLANDRINDOD WELLS and the SPAS of MID-WALES.

1s.—THE HOTELS of the WORLD. A Handbook to the leading Hotels throughout the world.

"What would not the intelligent tourist in Paris or Rome give for such a guide-book as this, which teaches so much that is outside the usual scope of such volumes!"—The Times.

"The best Handbook to London ever issued."—Liverpool Daily Post.

THIRD EDITION, REVISED, 5s.—60 Illustrations, 24 Maps and Plans.

LONDON AND ENVIRONS.

By E. C. COOK and E. T. COOK, M.A.

With Index of 4,500 References to all Streets and Places of Interest.

Llangollen: DARLINGTON & CO.

London: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, HAMILTON, KENT & Co., LTD.

The Railway Bookstalls, and all Booksellers'.

MACMILLAN & CO.'S LIST.

F. MARION CRAWFORD'S NEW WORK.

RULERS OF THE SOUTH:

Sicily, Calabria, and Malta.

Illustrated by 28 Photographures and 91 Illustrations in the Text by HENRY BROMAN. In 2 vols., 8vo, 21s., net.

RHODA BROUGHTON'S NEW NOVEL.

FOES IN LAW.

Crown 8vo, gilt top, 6s.

NEW VOLUME OF STORIES BY

WILLIAM WALDORF ASTOR,

PHARAOH'S DAUGHTER.

Illustrated. Crown 8vo, 6s.

THE NECKLACE OF PRINCESS FIORIMONDE.

By MARY de MORGAN.

With 25 Illustrations by WALTER CRANE. Globe 8vo, 3s., 6d.

NEW CHILDREN'S BOOKS.

By Mrs. MOLESWORTH.

THE HOUSE THAT GREW.

Illustrated by Alice B. Woodward. Crown 8vo, 4s., 6d.

Pilot.—"One of the most pleasant story books in Mrs. Molesworth's long list."

With Coloured Illustrations by S. ROSAMOND PRAGER.

THE TALE OF THE LITTLE TWIN DRAGONS. Oblong 4to, picture boards, 6s.

Westminster Gazette.—"Altogether charming... A bright and entertaining little fairy-story... The illustrations, excellently well drawn, daintily coloured, and full of life and humour, are beautiful enough to please anyone."

By the Author of

"Elizabeth and her German Garden."

THE APRIL BABY'S BOOK

OF TUNES. With Coloured Illustrations by Kate Greenaway. Small 4to, 6s.

Daily Chronicle.—"Delightfully told. The tunes alone should ensure the book a welcome in the nursery. As to the pictures, it is enough to say that they are by Miss Kate Greenaway, and in every way worthy of her."

Written and Pictured by MABEL DEAMER.

ANNOAH'S ARK GEOGRAPHY

Globe 4to, picture boards, 6s.

World.—"Mrs. Deamer's is an excellent scheme and she has worked it out with much skill and no little humour. Her illustrations are as clever as her letterpress, and her book should be a much-prized addition to a Nursery Library."

MACMILLAN'S MAGAZINE.

Price 1s. Contents for DECEMBER.

The Sinner and the Problem. By Eric Parker. Chaps. IV.—VII.
The Missionary in China. By F. Thorold Dickson.
Union and Annexation. By Professor Lodge.
Notes from a Sentimental Journey.
The Sufferings of an Honorary Secretary.

Weathering an Earthquake. By A. M. Brice.
The House by the Sea.
A Christmas Carol.
Impressions of Klondyke. By C. C. Osborne. (Conclusion.)
The Reservist in War. By a Regimental Officer.

TEMPLE BAR MAGAZINE.

Price 1s.—Contents for DECEMBER.

I. Foes in Law. By Rhoda Broughton. (Conclusion.)
II. A Radical Lady of the Last Generation.
III. The Charteris Episode.
IV. Blackthorn Winter.
V. A West Country Maid.

VI. Stratford's Friend—Lucy, Countess of Carlisle.
VII. Miss Lutimer's Resentment.
VIII. Winter Holly.
IX. A Point of View.
X. Dr. Donne.
XI. Jan Huukum's Money. By Maarten Maartens. (Conclusion.)

Grand Christmas (December) Numbers Now Ready.

THE CENTURY MAGAZINE.

Illustrated. Price 1s. 4d. Annual Subscription, post free, 16s.

The DECEMBER NUMBER contains:

GHOSTS WHO BECAME FAMOUS: A Christmas Fantasy. By C. Wells.
EAST LONDON TYPES. By Sir Walter Besant. Pictures by L. Raven-Hill and Joseph Pennell.
WITH THE PEKING RELIEF COLUMN: A Correspondent's Notes of the Fighting in China. By Frederick Palmer.
THE STRUGGLE ON THE PEKING WALL. By W. N. Pethick (Secretary to Li Hung-Chang).
And numerous other Stories and Articles of General Interest.

ST. NICHOLAS.

Illustrated. Price 1s. Annual Subscription, post free, 12s.

The DECEMBER NUMBER contains:

CHRISTMAS ON THE "MAYFLOWER." A True Story. By Elizabeth Cady Stanton.
A CHRISTMAS PONY. Story. By Caroline Benedict Burrell.
A FRIGATE'S NAMESAKE. Serial. By Alice Balch Abbott.
THE STORY OF BARNABY LEE. Serial. By John Bennett.
And numerous other Stories for the Young.

MACMILLAN & CO., Limited, London.

CHATTO & WINDUS'S NEW BOOKS

THE INIMITABLE MRS. MAS

SINGHAM a Romance of Botany Bay. By HERBERT CAMPION. Author of "A Free Lance in a Far Land." Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 6s.
"A capital novel. It is very long since we read so delightful a story as 'The Inimitable Mrs. Masingham.' Its title gives no idea of the healthy, vigorous, and charming romance contained in the book... one well worth reading."—Daily Graphic.

"AS a WATCH in the NIGHT":

a Drama of Waking and Dream. By Mrs. CAMPBELL PRAED. Author of "Midnight Izan," &c. Crown 8vo, 6s.
"Mrs. Campbell Praed has always exhibited a praiseworthy desire to be unconventional in her choice of motifs for her stories, and in 'As a Watch in the Night' she is, in that respect, more successful than on any previous occasion... Those who like to dabble in mysticism will find that in 'As a Watch in the Night' the writer has composed a story fertile in imagination... compact of dramatic incident presented in a thoroughly up-to-date setting, a device productive of some really startling contrasts."—Globe.

THE FOURTH GENERATION. By

Sir WALTER BESANT. Author of "The Orange Girl," &c. SECOND EDITION. Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 6s.
This interesting and highly conceived book... So clearly are the diverse types characterised that at moments one is tempted to compare this novel of 'The Fourth Generation' to the poem of 'The Ring and the Book' of Browning. There is humour, too."—Vanity Fair.

THE MAN THAT CORRUPTED

HADLEYBURG, and other Stories and Sketches. By MARK TWAIN. With a Frontispiece by LEWIS HIRSHCOCK. SECOND EDITION. Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 6s.
"Mark Twain's stories and sketches, published under the title 'The Man that Corrupted Hadleyburg,' are good throughout, a rare quality in such collections. The tale that gives its name to the book is rich with the quaint humour that marks Twain at his best. It is so cleverly constructed that my Baroness hesitates to point out a flaw.... In relating the 'Private History of the Jumping Frog Story' the author achieves the apparently impossible feat of making it funnier than ever."—Punch.

PHILIP WINWOOD: a Sketch of the Domestic History of an American Captain in the War of Independence. By ROBERT NELSON STEPHENS. With 6 Illustrations by E. W. D. HAMILTON. Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top.

"A good novel... almost every page of which bears the impress of that quality which, for want of a better name, we will term 'distinction.' It is a quality not easily defined; but many readers will understand us when we say that it is present in much of Fielding and in more of Melville, in almost all of the great romances of Scott, and in much of the work of Sir Walter Besant.... We are so pleased with 'Philip Winwood' that we shall look eagerly for the next book by Mr. Stephens."—Freeman's Journal.

AS LUCK WOULD HAVE IT.

By WILLIAM WESTALL. Author of "With the Red Eagle," &c. Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 6s.
"An ingenious story, very well worked out, and told in an agreeable style."—Athenaeum.
"A capital book, never dull."—St. James's Gazette.

THE BAG of DIAMONDS, and

THREE BITS of PASTE. By GEORGE MANVILLE FENN. Author of "A Crimson Crime," &c. Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 6s.
"All highly sensational, and all excellently told.... We can heartily recommend his last volume to all who enjoy a few hours' reading of the thrilling, the melodramatic, and the highly wrought."—Scotsman.

IN a CATHEDRAL CITY. By

BERTHA THOMAS. Author of "The Son of the House," &c. SECOND EDITION. Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 6s.
"Stories of quiet life in minister towns have before now been written, but there are few with a greater charm than this of Miss Thomas. The character of Elsie Ford is one of the best she has ever given us, and many readers will be glad to make the acquaintance of that winning little dressmaker in this new edition of the story."—Lloyd's News.

THE "PRETTY POLLY":

a Voyage of Incident. By W. CLARK RUSSELL. Author of "The Wreck of the 'Grosvenor,'" &c. With 12 Illustrations by G. E. ROBERTSON. Small demy 8vo, cloth, gilt edges, 5s.
"Not only is 'The Pretty Polly' a very amusing book, but it is instructive, in the pleasantest way; we advise all boys who mean to go to sea to pay attention to Captain Bott's opinion of 'Cooper and Cupples and Dana and Melville' authors to consult concerning that element. Mr. G. E. Robertson's twelve illustrations make all the queer people and the others plainly visible."—World.

THE SMALL-PART LADY, &c.

By GEORGE R. SIMS. Author of "The Diamond Duties," &c. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

A SUGAR PRINCESS. By

ALBERT ROSS. Crown 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d.
"The plot is interesting, and there is a breezy freshness about the book which entices the reader onwards. The background is full of charm."—Literary World.

THE ADVENTURES of TYLER

TATLOCK, PRIVATE DETECTIVE. Related by DICK DONOVAN. Author of "A Detective's Triumphs," &c. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.
"This volume of detective stories by Dick Donovan reflects in a striking manner the genius of the writer. In truth, the volume is good from end to end—full of fresh, well-written, and entertaining matter."—Scotsman.

HANDLEY CROSS; or, Mr. Jor-rocks's Hunt. By ROBERT S. STURTESS. With 70 Illustrations by JOHN LEECH. A NEW EDITION. Fict 8vo, cloth, 2s.

THE CLOISTER and the HEARTH

By CHARLES READE. A LARGE-TYPE, FINE-PAPER EDITION. Fict 8vo, cloth, 2s. net; polished leather, 3s. net.

LONDON MEMORIES: Social,

Historical, and Topographical. By C. W. HECKETHORN. Author of "London Souvenirs," &c. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s. London: Chatto & Windus 111, St. Martin's Lane, W.C.

CASSELL & COMPANY'S
ANNOUNCEMENTS.

JUST READY.—Price 6s.

CAMPAIGN PICTURES

OF THE

WAR IN SOUTH AFRICA,

1899-1900.

LETTERS FROM THE FRONT.

By A. G. Hales.

THE BOOK OF THE HOUR.
THE TALE OF A FIELD
HOSPITAL.

By FREDERICK TREVES, F.R.C.S.

Price 6s.

Handsomely bound in leather, gilt top, with 14 Illustrations.

The First Edition of this remarkable Book was exhausted within a few days of its publication, and a Second Impression is now ready.

The ATHENÆUM says: "Mr. Treves, who has seen, easily surpasses Zola, who had only inquired, and as a picture of war this 'tale' may almost rank with 'The Red Badge of Courage.'"

The SPECTATOR says: "Few we should say, can read this book with dry eyes, but everyone should read it."

The PALL MALL GAZETTE says: "It thrills with a quiet, restrained power of description that is far more convincing than the blood-curdling word painting. Mr. Treves's moving tale is not all of the horrors of war either; it has its humorous side also. Above all it is superbly human and thoroughly English. Therefore it is one of the most refreshing of books."

JUST PUBLISHED.—Price 7s.

REMINISCENCES OF OXFORD.

By the Rev. W. TUCKWELL, M.A.

With 16 Full-Page Illustrations.

"A more entertaining volume of its kind, or one dealing with a greater variety of personalities, has rarely been issued."—Record.

JUST PUBLISHED.—Price 5s.

OUR BIRD FRIENDS.

By R. KEARTON, F.Z.S., &c.

With 100 Illustrations from Photographs by Cherry Kearton.

READY SHORTLY.—Price 3s. 6d.

PICTURES FROM CHINA.

By Mrs. BISHOP, F.R.G.S.

(ISABELLA BIRD).

With 60 Illustrations from Photographs by the Author and Notes.

THE FINE ART GIFT-BOOK.

JUST PUBLISHED.—Price 6s.

SONGS OF NEAR AND FAR AWAY.

By EVA RICHARDSON.

With numerous Coloured and other Illustrations.

CASSELL & COMPANY, Ltd. Paris, New York, & Melbourne

A. & C. BLACK'S LIST

NOW READY.

Demy 8vo, cloth, price 7s. 6d. net.

CLUE: a Guide through Greek to
Hebrew Scripture. By EDWIN A. ABBOTT,
Author of "St. Thomas of Canterbury," &c.

This work aims at demonstrating that parts of the Synoptic Gospels are based upon a common original Hebrew document, not Aramaic, but Hebrew in the strict sense—"Biblical Hebrew." The details of the demonstration are supported by quotations from the Hebrew and from the Greek translations of it, and are given in notes for "the learned." But the text contains neither Greek nor Hebrew, and appeals to the general reader.

NOW READY.

Crown 8vo, cloth, price 5s. net.

CHRISTIAN CONFERENCE ESSAYS.

Edited by Rev. A. G. B. ATKINSON, M.A., with an Introduction by the Right Rev. the LORD BISHOP of HEREFORD, and contributions by Prof. Auguste Sabatier, the Very Rev. the Dean of Ripon, the Rev. Canon Barnett, the Rev. Brooke Herford, D.D., the Rev. R. E. Bartlett, M.A., the Rev. Brooke Lambert, M.A., the Rev. Agar Beet, D.D., F. Reginald Statham, the Rev. Prof. G. Henslow, M.A., the Rev. R. F. Horton, M.A.

NOW READY.

Crown 8vo, cloth, price 1s. 6d. net.

THOUGHTS OF A FREETHINKER.

The design of this book is to determine if possible whether we have in the Bible a divine revelation demanding veneration and unquestioning acquiescence; or whether, like all other writings, these Scriptures are to be examined and tested before we believe their assertions and accept their teaching.

NOW READY.

Crown 8vo, cloth, price 2s. 6d.

ON SANITARY AND OTHER MATTERS.

By GEORGE S. KEITH, M.D., LL.D., F.R.C.P.E., Author of "A Plea for a Simpler Life," "Fads of an Old Physician," &c.

"Dr. Keith is familiar to a large number of readers, and his new small volume should introduce him to many more."—Observer.

NOW READY.

Crown 8vo, cloth, price 3s. 6d. net.

THE HUMAN EAR.
Its identification and Physiognomy.

By MIRIAM ANNE ELLIS.

With illustrations from Copyright Photographs, chiefly from nature prints.

NOW READY.

Crown 8vo, cloth, price 2s. 6d.; paper, price 2s.

THE LIKENESS OF THE NIGHT.

A Play, in Four Acts.

By Mrs. W. K. CLIFFORD, Author of "Aunt Anne," "The Last Touches," "Mere Stories," &c.

NOW READY.

Crown 8vo, cloth, deckled edges, price 6s.

UNDER ENGLAND'S FLAG.

From 1804 to 1809.

By Captain CHARLES BOOTHBY, Author of "A Prisoner of France," &c.
Containing Frontispiece Portrait of the Author, and numerous Full-Page and other Illustrations.

This book, which comprises the Diaries and Letters of Captain Boothby, R.E., gives us a vivid picture of the stirring times in Europe between the years 1803-1809. Especially interesting are his notes of personal conversations with such men as Sir John Moore and Sir Sydney Smith.

NOW READY.

Cloth, gilt top, price 2s. net per volume.

HORÆ SUBSECIVÆ.

By JOHN BROWN, M.D., LL.D., &c. New Edition. In 3 vols., 6½ x 4½ in., printed on thin Bible paper, With Portrait of Dr. John Brown by Sir George Reid, P.R.S.A.

"Seldom has so much sound sense, sterling human nature, and literary art been gathered together in so small a space."—The Scotsman.

A. & C. BLACK, Soho Square, London.

The Academy

A Weekly Review of Literature and Life.

No. 1491. Established 1869.

1 December, 1900.

Price Threepence.

[Registered as a Newspaper.]

The Literary Week.

HOLOER DRACHMAN, the Danish poet, who to-night (Friday) is to be entertained to dinner by some of his English confrères, has written novels, plays, sketches of travel, and short stories. His work is not very well known in this country, but some may remember a little set of breezy stories of a Danish fishing village, No. 24 in Mr. Unwin's "Pseudonym" Library. The volume, which was called The Cruise of the "Wild Duck," was by Drachman, who is described as loving the sea as only Englishmen and Scandinavians love her.

HE who makes an anthology, however conscientious, however good it may be, must expect bad weather. The rumble of the storm that is about to break over Mr. Quiller-Couch's head has already reached our ears. It is the latter part of his Oxford Anthology—the section devoted to poems by poets of our day—that has roused the singing-birds. One of his critics sends us a tabulated list of Mr. Couch's inclusions and exclusions. Another writes: "Q.'s anthology! What a triumph of respectability. There should now be a Cambridge collection to set the balance right as regards the nineteenth century people."

WE are always glad to receive letters of literary interest from our readers, although our pleasure is tempered by the impossibility of finding room for all of them. A well-known journalist, grown grey in his craft, once remarked that every letter an editor did not publish made an enemy. Hoping humbly that this is not the case, we may remark that there are some letters which it is a waste of time to write to an editor. Among these we would include new theories on the meaning of the Round Towers of Ireland, ill-written jottings on the Shakespeare-Bacon folly, playful attacks on the author of The Master Christian, and exposures of errors appearing in our columns that are obviously not due to ignorance—the kind of errors that a generous world places, not always justly, on the broad shoulders of the printer. We can honestly say to those correspondents who have sent us letters—facetious, solemn, and minatory—that we did know that Colonel Newcome dies in The Newcomes and not in Vanity Fair. Such slips are always discovered just too late—and wept over.

THE very latest of the War Books (we have received six since Monday) is Campaign Pictures, by the irrepressible Mr. A. G. Hales, of the Daily News. In the forefront of the book Mr. Hales prints some verses of his own composition called "Australia's Appeal," with this footnote:

I have decided to enclose these verses in my book because some critics have pronounced me anti-English in my sentiments. Heaven alone knows why; yet the above poem was written and published by me in Australia just before war was declared between England and the Republics, at a time when all Australia considered it very probable that we should have to fight one of the big European Powers as well as the Boers.

In his very interesting article on Ysaye and Busoni, which we print this week, Mr. Arthur Symons remarks, that "it is a fashion of the moment to prize extravagance and to be timid of perfection. That is why we give the name of artist to those who can startle us most. We have come to value technique for the violence which it gives into the hands of those who possess it, in their assault upon our nerves. We have come to look upon technique as an end in itself, rather than as a means to an end." Mr. Symons's subject is a musical performance, but just here we have no doubt that he has many forms of art in his mind, and not least the literary art. An expert violence is the quality in the writing of to-day which most quickly secures attention. It is, indeed, the property of violence to secure attention. But unfortunately the response is not, nowadays, a chorus of protest, but a chorus of praise. "Make us jump again," the critics cry; and the author makes them jump again. However, there are signs that the nerves offered so freely to these literary galvanists are becoming slack and tired. The old, quiet art that was, and is, and ever shall be the true art is coming into request.

VERY simple and engaging is the idea of Mrs. Meynell's poem, "The Modern Mother," in the December Monthly Review. It is that a child gives its mother a kiss of greater warmth and eagerness than she had expected. She would have been content with "a little tenderness" or gratitude:

Nay, even with less.
This mother, giver of life, death, peace, distress,
Desired ah! not so much
Thanks as forgiveness; and the passing touch
Expected, and the slight, the brief caress.

Oh, filial light,
Strong in these childish eyes, these new, these bright
Intelligible stars! Their rays
Are near the constant earth, guides in the maze,
Natural, wild, keen in the dusk of days.

In giving these verses we have quoted half of a charming little poem.

IN the same number Mr. William Archer writes interestingly on the subject of a Pantheon in connexion with Westminster Abbey. Incidentally, he considers which of our writers would now be resting there if the Pantheon had been ready to receive the illustrious dead in 1850; and he names more than thirty writers to whom the honour might properly have been accorded. Lord Rosebery's paper on "The Love Episode of William Pitt"—"this strange, tender episode—this secret mirage in a long aridity of office"—adds details to our knowledge of Pitt's love for Eleanor Eden. Lord Rosebery's special business is to bring forward letters in the possession of Captain Ernest Pretyman, M.P., and Mr. Dickson, Mayor of Bath and M.P. for Wells; and out of the twenty-six pages filled by his article twenty are occupied with the quotation of these documents.

THE inscription on the memorial to Mr. William Black will take, we understand, this form: "To the Dear Memory of William Black, Novelist. Erected by his many friends and admirers in all countries, on a spot which he knew and loved."

THE lost Necklace of Princess Fiorimonde is found indeed. Messrs. Macmillan inform us that Miss De Morgan's story has never been out of print; and they send us a copy dated 1880. We can only conclude that in some way, not very scrutable, this fairy-tale has missed the fame it deserves. A story that after twenty years is so well remembered—as our recent correspondence proves the Necklace to be—must have been worthy of a boom; but then booms were not every-day phenomena in 1880. The book has twenty-five illustrations by Mr. Walter Crane.

"WITH Notes by Henley." Messrs. Gibblings issue a new edition of Beckford's Vathek, with notes by Henley, and an introduction by Dr. Garnett. "Henley" is not "W. E.," but Beckford's friend, the Rev. S. On the other hand, it is our own W. E., with a vengeance, who is contemplated in Henley and Burns; or, the Critic Censured, by John D. Ross. The book, which is sold by Mr. Eneas Mackay, at Stirling, is described as "a collection of papers replying to an offensive critique on the life, genius, and achievements of the Scottish poet." The papers bear such titles as "Henleyism and the First Edition of Burns," "A Critic Scarified," "The Misrepresentations of a Critic," and "Speech by Mr. Faithful Begg, M.P." All the papers are reprints, and the book is apparently merely a backwash of that tide of protest which long ago swept over Mr. Henley's "bloody but unbowed" head.

THERE seems to be a split in the Book-plate camp. The supporters of the Book of Book-Plates (Williams & Norgate) are before all things devotees of the Book-plate beautiful; and they are not satisfied with the proceedings and influence of the existing "Ex-Libris" Society. This society, we are warned, is "a society of collectors of book-plates; not lovers of art collecting plates for the enjoyment to be derived from the study of their beauties, but book-plate hunters, whose measure of the value of a plate is its rarity, and who, so long as a plate is rare and much sought after, ask no inconvenient questions as to its merits." Now we can understand the collecting of book-plates for Art's sake, and we can understand the collecting of them for History's sake; and we can easily see why the Art-loving collector deprecates the "quasi-learned disquisitions of an historical nature" which are the delight of the History-loving collectors. It is probably better that these antagonistic connoisseurs should part company. The Book-plate Society will now receive those who decide to "secesh." The new Society will consist of artists, collectors, and others interested in book-plates from an artistic standpoint. The Book of Book-Plates, now in its third number, will be its organ, and there will be an annual exhibition and an exchange club. The subscription of 10s. 6d. annually includes the subscription to the Book of Book-Plates. Clearly there is life in the Book-plate still.

CONCERNING the novel Julie, by "A Man," of which we recently said, in our notes on fiction, "We have no idea who 'A Man' is, but feel sure that he is not very old," a correspondent writes: "I may say that, when the story was published serially in the Clarion, the author's name was given. 'A Man' is Mr. Robert Blatchford, better known, perhaps, as 'Nunquam,' of Merric England fame. As a friend of Mr. Blatchford, I regret to say that he is fifty years of age in March next. It may interest you to know that, within the last half-dozen years, 'Nunquam' has given some ten books—novels, sketches, essays, and quasi-economic volumes—to the world. I think it was Mr. W. T. Stead who said of him: 'He is the best-beloved journalist in England.' I believe that to be true, and would ask to be allowed to say, further, that I believe him to be one of the most brilliant writers in England, and one who will yet be recognised as such by all lovers of literature." We congratulate Mr. Blatchford on the possession of such a backer; and are not ignorant of Mr. Blatchford's achievements, for which we have great respect. But we failed to recognise him in the rôle of sentimentalist.

A WRITER in the Pilot has a curious note about an alleged printer's error in the Prayer Book. An old clergyman objected to compulsory education, and when it was suggested to him that the Church at least intended that her children should read, because in the Collect we pray: "Grant that we may in such wise hear them, read, mark, learn," &c.—the old gentleman contended that the comma after "them" was a printer's error, and that the true reading was "hear them read." The writer shows that the theory is to some extent supported by the preface to the Prayer Book of 1549, and by the "Injunctions" issued in the reign of Edward VI. In both these documents the instruction is that the people should hear the Scriptures read. On internal grounds the Pilot writer contends that the comma is better away, seeing that "mark" means to attend, and should logically follow the hearing. Whereas, in practice, mark has almost come to mean to mark with a pencil (vide How to Mark Your Bible, &c.). In any case, the discussion is now more curious than significant.

THE anonymous editor of Kinglake's Eothen, in the "Little Library" series (Methuen), has discovered a fine mare's-nest in the sixteenth chapter of that delightful book. Kinglake says of the Jordan: "All the pilgrims—men, women, and children—are submerged en chemise, and the saturated linen is carefully wrapped up and preserved as a burial-dress that shall ensure for salvation in the realms of death." On this the editor makes the surprising remark: "Some critical scholar of eminence should be called upon to emend or explain this mysterious passage. At least, if people are allowed to print such things in the nineteenth century, what right have we to emend the classical authors when they choose to be unintelligible." The critical scholar of eminence would merely invite the editor to open his dictionary, where the word enure (or inure), intransitively used, is defined as "to be applied," or "to become serviceable." Kinglake tells us that the people believed that garments saturated in the Jordan, and used as shrouds, would preserve the body after death.

SIR GEORGE M. SMITH's recollections of Charlotte Brontë in the December Cornhill make first-rate reading, although rather as a personal statement of things known than as a statement of things not known. The acceptance of Jane Eyre, the visit of Charlotte and Anne Brontë to London, and of Charlotte's later visits and meetings with Thackeray, are recounted in delightful detail. Charlotte Brontë's "high falutin," and her social awkwardness, were not pleasing to Thackeray, who laughed at the one manifestation and was depressed by the other. He greatly offended Miss Brontë by introducing her to his mother in a crowded lecture-room, and in a loud voice, with the words: "Mother, you must allow me to introduce you to Jane Eyre."

THE sequel to this affront, as Miss Brontë considered it, is related by Sir George Smith with spirit:

On the next afternoon Thackeray called. I arrived at home shortly afterwards, and when I entered the drawing-room found a scene in full progress. Only these two were in the room. Thackeray was standing on the hearthrug, looking anything but happy. Charlotte Brontë stood close to him, with head thrown back and face white with anger. The first words I heard were: "No, sir! If you had come to our part of the country in Yorkshire, what would you have thought of me if I had introduced you to my father, before a mixed company of strangers, as 'Mr. Warrington'?" Thackeray replied, "No, you mean 'Arthur Pendennis.'" "No, I don't mean Arthur Pendennis!" retorted Miss Brontë; "I mean Mr. Warrington, and Mr. Warrington would not have behaved as you behaved to me yesterday." The spectacle of this little woman, hardly reaching to Thackeray's elbow, but, somehow, looking stronger and fiercer than himself, and casting her incisive words at his head, resembled the dropping of shells into a fortress.

By this time I had recovered my presence of mind, and hastened to interpose. Thackeray made the necessary and half-humorous apologies, and the parting was a friendly one.

SIR GEORGE SMITH tells us that his mother and sisters complained that Charlotte Brontë seemed to be always noting and analysing people around her, and everything that happened; and that Vilette is full of scenes which he can trace to incidents which occurred during Miss Brontë's visits. Indeed, his mother was the "Mrs. Bretton" of the novel, and he himself stood for "Dr. John." The scene at the Brussels theatre was suggested by Rachel, whom the Smiths took her to see; and the scene of the fire sprang from an incident at one of Dickens's private theatricals at which she was present.

In an interesting article on "Rhyme" in the same magazine, Mr. Frank Ritchie gives some good examples of ingenuity in bringing about the needed jingle. There is Byron's

He loved his child, and would have wept the loss of her,
But knew the cause no more than a philosopher.

The Ingoldsby Legends are, of course, a museum of brilliant rhymes. Mr. Ritchie quotes these:

Should it even set fire to the castle and burn it, you're Amplly insured both for buildings and furniture.

The Times made it clear he was perfectly lost in his Classic attempt at translating Demosthenes.

There's Setebos storming because Mephistopheles
Dashed in his face a whole cup of hot coffee lees.

Browning was another far-fetcher of rhymes. In the "Glove" we have:

Oh, what a face! One by fits eyed
Her and the horrible pitside.

In the "Grammarians' Funeral":

He ventured neck or nothing—heaven's success
Found, or earth's failure,
"Wilt thou trust death or not?" He answered: "Yes!
Hence with life's pale lure."

This rhyme would be laughed to scorn in a minor poet, and what shall we say of the following from "Master Hugues"?

Three makes rejoinder, expansive, explosive;
Four overbears them all, strident and crepitan;
Five . . . O Danaides! O Sieve!

UNDER the heading "William Morris as a Man of Business" the following interesting note appeared in last week's Notes and Queries above the signature C. C. B.:

I am more than a little puzzled by a sentence in Mr. Mackail's Life of William Morris. Speaking of Mr. Morris as a man of business, Mr. Mackail says (vol. i., p. 221): "That neglect of detail which is one of the secrets of success came to him naturally." A little farther on he varies the phrase, and calls this neglect "detachment from routine." Surely this is mere confusion of terms. It is possible to be exact and systematic without being a slave of the machine; and is it not a fact that the most successful of men—nay, the greatest men—in every walk of life have, as a rule, been careful of detail? . . . It may be said that the director of great affairs may be careless of detail if he employs careful subordinates; but this is begging the question, and apparently is not what Mr. Mackail means, for he quotes in illustration of his remark this curious speech of Morris: "I keep fifteen clerks doing my accounts, and yet I cannot find out how much money I have got." His accounts cannot have been in very careful hands. . . .

It is worth while to ask how far this indifference to detail affected Morris's art work. We may attribute to it, I suppose, at least in part, the level monotonous character of much of his verse. He is said to have written 700 lines of The Earthly Paradise in one day. One may marvel at such fertility, but cannot help regretting that his habit of "letting things slide" in business should have invaded his literary workshop.

"IT HAS BEEN SAID."

[See article, "The Poloniad," in last week's ACADEMY for remarks on the introduction of quotations with phrases such as "It has been said."]

"It has been said" ? Oh! I'll declare
That I'm at present unaware
By whom the truth was stated so,
But as for finding out, you know
I've not sufficient time to spare;

Yet, when with readers I would share
Remembered scraps, what should I care
If I assert of each bon mot :
"It has been said" ?

And if (the trick become a snare)
I "quote" expressions found nowhere
But in my writing—well, I show
"The modesty that doth bestow
On wit more brilliance," as (I swear)
It has been said!

J. C. F.

It was certain that Mr. Dooley would, sooner or later, turn his attention to the American historical novel. He has done so, and he gives its genesis as follows:

"What's a historical novel?" Mr. Hennessy asked.

"Marry come off," said Mr. Dooley. "Don't ye know? Toddlones, if I had me cleaver on th' bar I wud smack thee f'r a ham-headed fluke. Idzims, I wud. Odswounds, egad, th' wench speaks th' thruth."

Mr. Hennessy moved cautiously away, and measured the distance to the door, but Mr. Dooley's fit was over. He smiled proudly, and resumed his ordinary speech: "Th' historical romance is a story, Hinnessy, about something that didn't happen before ye was bor-rrn. A few years ago Hogan, that does most iv me r-readin, was hurtin' his eyes over what he called reelism. That's where a modest sewin'-machine marries a rayspectable grocery store, an' they talk f'r th' r-rest iv th' book about who shall wind th' clock. Hogan says they was a revulsion again' this sort iv thing. It came with prosperity. Durin' hard times people r-read about Dinnis comin' home at night an' throwin' a plate iv warruned-over mutton at th' wife, an' they'd exclaim, 'Great Hivens, how thrue to nature!' But when people begun to get dividends fr'm th' busted banks, an' pay day became less jerky an' irreg'lar, they had to have a taste iv rayle rayfined life, an' th' historical novel come in."

At considerable length Mr. Dooley epitomises the typical historical novel of the day. The hero's principal exploit is riding Bucephalus "up Tottenham Court Road, beyon' the railroad tracks, across th' Liffey, over Parlymint, into Cinthral Park."

"Thim things cudden't happen," said Mr. Hennessy.

"Annything cud happen that far back, when they wore romantic clothes," said Mr. Dooley.

HAPPILY a literary paper is not called upon to take a side in Imperial affairs, except when such affairs touch literature. It behoves those who are not fighting in the arena to look at things with clear eyes undimmed by passion or prejudice. This certainly should be the attitude of the poet, who stands as the representative of the highest form of art and thought. He who wears the mantle of the seer should be just and tolerant, even if the bias of his feeling ousts generosity from his mind. We assert that no temperate observer of the unhappy, but what we consider to be the inevitable, state of affairs in South Africa, could feel anything but pain on reading the poem contributed by Mr. William Watson to the Speaker of last week. We quote the poem in full without further comment :

I hear a voice of murderous wrath :
 We have not burned enough, or slain ;
 Too little havoc marks our path ;
 Wherefore so gentle, so humane ?
 From countless roof-trees be there rolled
 The smoke of expiatory fires !
 More incense yet an hundredfold
 The unsated God of War requires.
 Blind from the first, blind to the end,
 Blind to all signs that ask men's gaze !
 In vain by lips of foe or friend
 The world cries shame upon your ways.
 Fulfil your mission ; spoil and burn ;
 Fling forth the helpless—babes as well ;
 And let the children's children learn
 To hate you with the hate of hell.
 From whatsoever taint remains
 Of lingering justice in our heart,
 Purge us : erase the poor last strains
 Of pity : such your noble part.
 So shall the god of war not lack
 His tribute ; and the long-foiled Light
 Be for the hundredth time thrust back
 Into the night, into the night.

A FEW days later another poet, Ibsen, gave his views to a representative of the Oerebladet on the subject of the Transvaal War. In the course of the interview Ibsen remarked that the Boers had themselves taken unrighteous possession of their territory, after driving out the original inhabitants. The Boers came as a semi-civilised people, and not with the intention of spreading civilisation. On the contrary, they had for a long time done much to hinder the spread of the higher civilisation. If, then, the British, who had a higher culture, came and wished to push their way into the country, that was no worse, and, indeed, not so bad as what the Boers themselves had done. "The British are only taking from the Boers what they themselves have stolen ; the Boers must put up with that. The Boers have defended themselves bravely, but they had also good positions to defend."

Bibliographical.

I MADE reference last week to Mr. A. H. Lawrence's Life-Story, Letters, and Reminiscences of Sir Arthur Sullivan. This was published last December by Mr. Bowden, and may fairly be accepted as the official biography, inasmuch as, in compiling it, Mr. Lawrence had Sir Arthur's "heartiest co-operation," the work being issued with its subject's "goodwill and sanction." "Sir Arthur," wrote Mr. Lawrence, "has placed in my hands the letters which he wrote home over a period of some thirty years, as well as letters which have been written to him, and the like. Moreover, Sir Arthur has revised and passed the proofs of those chapters dealing with incidents in his life." In a word, Mr. Lawrence's book was, and is, virtually Sir Arthur's autobiography, and very slight additions to it would bring it completely up to date. Next to it in interest and value may be placed the memoir of Sullivan with which Mr. Charles Willeby opened, in 1893, his Masters of English Music ; and it should not be forgotten that Sir Arthur contributed "a chapter of autobiography" to the M.A.P. series called "In the Days of My Youth."

Mr. W. H. Helm's Studies in Style turn out to be a series of imitations of the literary methods of some well-known fictionists, or schools of fictionists—thus at once recalling Thackeray's Novels by Eminent Hands, in which, however, there was a broader vein of caricature. In our own day the most successful things of this sort have been the Condensed Novels of Bret Harte, a separate edition of which came out, in a cheap form, in 1891. These parodies have, indeed, always been popular ; and Mr. Edgar Pemberton, we may be sure, will have something to say about them in the book about Mr. Harte which is to appear this week. An intelligent "appreciation" of Mr. Harte is, in truth, to be desired. He is one of the few well-known writers of our day who has not been "boomed."

Talking of parodies and parodists, I note the announcement of a volume of burlesque in verse by Mr. Anthony C. Deane. Mr. Deane (who figures so brightly in the Christmas number of the World) is running up quite a list of "works." I have on my own shelves his Frisolous Verses (1892), his Holiday Rhymes (1894), and his Leaves in the Wind (1896). He is also the author, I believe, of a book called A Poet's Choice (1898). Are there any more ?

Quite recently I had occasion to refer to Henry Russell and his famous songs, and now comes the news of his serious illness—serious, because he is in his eighty-seventh year. He has been one of the halest and heartiest of veterans, and, just five years ago, gave evidence of his mental activity by writing and publishing his autobiography, entitled, very appropriately, Cheer, Boys, Cheer! Memories of Men and Music. Some of us were disappointed with the book, which was, however, readable. Mr. Russell's musical talent, I may record, has descended to one of his sons, who is known in the professional world as Mr. Landon Ronald. His other son, Mr. Clark Russell, needs no introduction to the reader.

I announced some time ago that Colonel Prideaux was at work on a Bibliography of S. T. Coleridge, a list in chronological order of the publicly and privately printed works of that writer from 1793 to 1834, including his contributions to annuals, periodicals, and so forth. A bibliography of Coleridge was contributed by the late R. H. Shepherd to Notes and Queries, for May and June, 1895. Colonel Prideaux's work will, however, show a considerable advance upon Mr. Shepherd's, alike in the number of items and in accuracy of detail. It will be issued, by subscription, by Mr. Frank Hollings, Great Turnstile, W.C.

I understand that Mr. Theodore Wratishaw's book on Mr. Swinburne will be much more of a critical study than of a memoir. The biographical details, I gather, will be comparatively few, but I believe they will at least have the advantage of being absolutely correct, which is not always the case with the biographies of contemporaries. Even while a man is alive legends grow up around and about him, and they are apt to be repeated by successive scribes. I trust Mr. Wratishaw's volume will include a bibliography brought up to date. The Bibliography published by Mr. Redway is now thirteen years old.

The New Century Review is to have a new editor and a new publisher. Hitherto its title has been an anachronism, but in a few weeks it will be all right—which is more than we shall be able to say for Mr. James Knowles's review, unless he alters its name in January. As a nation, however, we are tolerant of anachronisms, as is proved by the continued existence in our midst of a Fortnightly Review issued monthly.

Occasionally one gets a sort of thrill. I remember experiencing one, some years ago, when I saw in the "contents" of a number of Macmillan's Magazine a poem "by William Wordsworth." Now I see that one of the December monthlies contains a contribution "by William Allingham." If only these were cases of re-incarnation !

To the little list of memoirs of George Eliot which I gave in this column the other day, a correspondent asks me to add the monograph on this subject which Mr. Oscar Browning contributed to the "Great Writers" series. I mention that little book with pleasure, though I had no intention to be exhaustive. THE BOOKWORM.

Reviews.

A Wilderness of Mediocrity.

An American Anthology. By E. C. Stedman. (Boston and New York: Houghton & Mifflin.)

IN this well-filled volume Mr. Stedman, one of the most eminent of American critics, has brought together specimens of every American poet with any claims on attention, from the beginning to the present day. It is thus a bird's-eye view of the whole range of American verse. The work could not have been done more carefully and conscientiously; it enables us to judge, with at least an approach to adequacy, what is America's claim to respect in the greatest of the literary arts.

It is clear that America has no distinctive national note in poetry: the time is gone by when people vaguely looked for something strikingly novel, gigantic, commanding, unprecedented, from the "young nation" of the vast territory. We know now that she is not young, but old—a transplanted England, born to age. And her verse is English verse, with all the matured and over-matured characteristics of later English verse, when her verse is at its best. The effect produced by this volume, it must frankly be said, is not satisfying, not impressive. It does not seem that in poetry America can, or will, find her own, and take rank by her mother-land, even by the later England of Tennyson and his successors. An anthology of the English poets since Tennyson would, we think, make a better show, on the whole, than this complete anthology of American poets. That is not a hopeful thing to say; an ungracious saying, perhaps, but necessary. The especially depressing conviction which the book forces on us is that the advance of American poetry has not been sustained. There seemed more than hope for a nation which had produced such a group as that of Poe, Emerson, Lowell, and Longfellow. If another Emerson were unlikely, or even another Poe, it seemed no unattainable ambition to advance beyond Longfellow. But America has not even maintained the level of Longfellow. Among the later poets none stands prominently forth but Lanier and, in a minor degree, the minute grace of Father Tabb. The overwhelmingly materialistic genius of America is, we fear, chilling, if not killing, to poetry. It looks strongly as though the poetic gift were flickering down, rather than spreading and broadening. Sad and strange that the wind of those free prairies and vastly splendid mountains cannot fan to greatness the flame which feeds on the souls of all great nations, from Palestine to England, from Italy to Persia and the Himalayas!

There seems no lack of singers, if there be a lack of great singers. From a survey of these voluminous pages one gets an impression that almost every cultivated man or woman in America must be writing poetry—and publishing it. But all these swallows will not make a summer. It is a democracy of song indeed, where no man is better—or much worse—than his neighbours. There is a fatal air of level accomplishment over these pages; mere accomplishment, uninspired and undistinguished. The bed-roll of names somehow has a depressing effect—Tudor Jenks, and Titus Munson Coane, and Edith Matilda Thomas, and so forth, and so forth. Mr. Stedman's necessity of being historically comprehensive has forced on him the inclusion of a host of names for which there is no other real justification; but the result is a frowning wilderness of mediocrity, which nowise improves as we near the present day; and the heart of the reviewer sinks in this waterless land. As to the influences governing American poetry, they are mostly those of the period from Wordsworth to Tennyson. There is no hint of influence from the Rossetti and Swinburne movement, so powerful in England; while Lanier is the only one who has gone back to the Elizabethans and the seventeenth century.

The poets of the early American days are decidedly old-fashioned, and mild, very mild. Though Mr. Stedman zealously champions him, we are not among those who are exhilarated by the chaste muse of William Cullen Bryant, the first considerable poet of America. Then you have specimens of James Gates Percival, who was called the American Somebody-or-other—they were all American Burnses or Shelleys or Miltons, &c., in these days—and was laughed at by Lowell. You have Nathaniel Parker Willis, whose stilted fame is now decently interred, and many another. But you come at last to the opulent season of Emerson, Longfellow, Whittier, Poe, and Holmes, and forget your journeying in the desert. How many, one wonders, read Emerson's poetry? It is often unworkman-like; save in special passages, it lacks the singing note, the metre is unpliant, unsensitive; few poems are good wholes. It is possible to deny his being a poet at all. Yet at his best, and nearly always in casual passages, his thought has a depth which forces the expression into rightness, and startles with its truth like Wordsworth's. Take this passage:

Nor knowest thou what argument
Thy life to thy neighbour's creed has lent,
All are needed by each one;
Nothing is fair or good alone.
I thought the sparrow's note from heaven,
Singing at dawn on the alder bough;
I brought him home, in his nest, at even;
He sings the song, but it cheers not now,
For I did not bring home the river and sky;
He sang to my ear—they sang to my eye.

Some of his best small poems are omitted by Mr. Stedman, while others are given of less merit. But we may quote, well-known though it is, the deep and paradoxical "Brahma":

If the red slayer think he slays,
Or if the slain think he is slain,
They know not well the subtle ways
I keep, and pass, and turn again.
Far or forgot to me is near;
Shadow and sunlight are the same;
The vanished gods to me appear;
And one to me are shame and fame.
They reckon ill who leave me out;
When me they fly, I am the wings;
I am the doubter and the doubt;
And I the hymn the Brahmin sings.
The strong gods pine for my abode,
And pine in vain the sacred seven;
But thou, meek lover of the Good!
Find me, and turn thy back on heaven.

It is not possible to quote from Whittier, whose best things are too long for insertion; and it were idle to quote poets whose finest work is so well known as Poe, Longfellow, and Wendell Holmes. Thoreau shows poorer in verse than prose, and Lowell seems to us very ill represented in this anthology as regards the character of the selections. Julia Ward Howe's stirring "Battle-Hymn" was lately cited in the ACADEMY. Parsons, restrained and classical, seems to us to have little to restrain, despite his reputation. Of his ode to Dante, the really fine part is the two opening stanzas, and they are common in English anthologies. The specimens of Walt Whitman are long. Let us rather take a poet little known here, Stoddard. His work is rather cultivated than original, his best piece being decidedly the ode on Lincoln. It is in the metre of Marvell's great Cromwell ode, and though decidedly too diffuse, and unequal, the finest stanzas are fine. The poem would be a notable one if it were subjected to judicious compression:

One of the people! born to be
Their curious epitome;
To share yet rise above
Their shifting hate and love,

Common his mind (it seemed so then).
His thoughts the thoughts of other men:
Plain were his words and poor,
But now they will endure!

No hasty fool, of stubborn will,
But prudent, cautious, pliant still;
Who since his work was good
Would do it as he could.

Doubting, was not ashamed to doubt,
And, lacking prescience, went without:
Often appeared to halt,
And was, of course, at fault;

Heard all opinions, nothing loath,
And, loving both sides, angered both;
Was—not like Justice, blind,
But watchful, clement, kind.

No hero this of Roman mould,
Nor like our stately sires of old:
Perhaps he was not great,
But he preserved the State!

That is excellent, and not far from classical. Thereafter we come to such more or less well-known names of the present day as Thomas Bailey Aldrich, Bret Harte, Joaquin Miller, Mrs. Piatt, Mrs. Chandler Moulton, and the dead Sidney Lanier. Lanier is by far the foremost of these names; a poet of true genius, but represented here by lengthy extracts. Thereafter things broaden progressively to level mediocrity. Let us take a few of the less-known names. We cannot share the Transatlantic admiration of Boyle O'Reilly. But we may choose a snatch from the delicate and miniature muse of Father Tabb:

THE WATER-LILY.

Whence, O fragrant form of light
Hast thou drifted through the night,
Swan-like, to a leafy nest,
On the restless waves, at rest?

Art thou from the snowy zone
Of a mountain-summit blown,
Or the blossom of a dream,
Fashioned in the foamy stream?

Nay—methinks the maiden moon,
When the daylight came too soon,
Fleeting from her bath to hide,
Left her garment in the tide.

Among a throng of more ambitious poets are a few who sing for the children, and they are welcome relief. Chief of such is Eugene Field, whose "Wynken, Blynken, and Nod" is, or should be, known in all households of children.

Let us take, finally, a specimen from a writer quite unknown here, who is an evident follower of Walt Whitman, but has matter of his own. It is "The Soul of the World," and the poet is Ernest Crosby:

The soul of the world is abroad to-night—

Not in yon silvery amalgam of moonbeam and ocean, nor in the pink heat-lightning tremulous on the horizon;

Nor in the embrace of yonder pair of lovers, either heart beating to heart in the shadow of the fishing-smack drawn up on the beach.

All that—shall I call it illusion? Nay, but at best it is a pale reflection of the truth.

I am not to be put off with symbols, for the soul of the world is itself abroad to-night.

I neither see nor hear nor smell nor taste nor touch it, but faintly I feel it powerfully stirring.

I feel it as the blind heaving sea feels the moon bending over it.

I feel it as the needle feels the serpentine magnetic current coiling itself about the earth.

I open my arms to embrace it as the lovers embrace each other, but my embrace is all inclusive.

My heart beats to heart likewise, but it is to the heart universal, for the soul of the world is abroad to-night.

We have purposely quoted from the authors unknown here; and many deserving notice among these have necessarily escaped us; but the general effect is as we have stated: a few poets of whom America may be proud, many of ephemeral merit, a large bulk for whose inclusion there is only historical excuse, and in the modern ranks scarcely that. Frankly, many poems are swept into Mr. Stedman's net which are only fitted for some popular—very popular—reciter.

The Tyranny of Love.

An Englishwoman's Love-Letters. (John Murray. 5s.)

BEFORE us lies as dainty an example of book production as we have seen for many a day. It is a slight, parchment-covered volume, bound after the style of the Morris books, tied with water-silk green ribbons, and it contains nothing but love-letters. They were written by a girl who died at the age of twenty-two, and they reveal an exquisite nature—that elected to surrender itself entirely to a passion for a man who tired of her. Instances of such hapless devotion are not common nowadays. The love-letters written by this unhappy girl have a quality, a literary finish, and a delicate abandonment that give distinction to the volume.

Why the book was published we do not know. Nor do we propose to discuss the ethics of the publication, except to say, that if the man to whom they were addressed be still alive, we may be spared the ordeal of meeting him. An "explanation," printed by way of preface to the book, includes the very obvious statement that "the woman by whom these letters were written had no thought that they would be read by any one but the person to whom they were addressed." Naturally. Then why were they published? This is the explanation given by the anonymous writer of the preface:

But a request, conveyed under circumstances which the writer herself would have regarded as all-commanding, urges that they should now be given to the world: and, so far as is possible with a due regard to the claims of privacy, what is here printed presents the letters as they were first written in their complete form and sequence.

It might be suggested that the letters are merely a tour de force by some clever woman who, in the tranquility of matronhood, remembers her ancient emotions. That may be. Our experience of love-letters has been meagre. But if these love-letters were written for the occasion, we can only say that the writer has a most remarkable gift of simulating sincerity, and revealing her innermost feelings in a way that makes even a reviewer blush to think that he has been peeping and prying into intimate confessions.

The thread of story is slight and soon told. She loves: he loves. Her love increases: his love diminishes. She idealises: the pinnacle upon which she has placed him supports her world: he consults his mother (there is always a mother): the mother disapproves. His love declines: he ceases to write: she takes ill: he refuses to see her: she dies. The gentleman does not come well out of the correspondence. Perhaps he intends to give the proceeds of his share in the sale of the book to a hospital for women.

For the girl one feels a great pity. Her love was of so fine a quality, her nature so rich, her humour so delicate, her abandonment so foolishly complete, her surrender so absolute. "I am wondering," she says, "whether this evening we shall see you walking quietly in and making everything into perfection that has been trembling just on the verge of it all day long." . . . "Though I reach and reach, and sadden if you are sad, I cannot make your sorrow my own." . . . "My heart goes to you like a tree in the wind, and all these thoughts are loose leaves that fly after you when I have to remain behind." . . . "You have swallowed up all my moral qualities, I have none left, when it is so sweet to beg. Give me back crumbs of myself." . . . "Every day your love binds me more deeply than I knew the day before: so that no day is the same now, but each one a little happier than the last." . . . For our own part we find the letters in bulk too cloying. They are personal to an almost inhuman degree. We miss the larger utterance, the interest in life itself, in life's crowded interests of which love, if the best and the most helpful, is but one. We miss the fine understanding of the proportions of things which distinguished the Browning love-letters. But it is only fair to remember that the writer of these was an inexperienced and untried girl who consistently idealised her lover, thus placing him in a position which (we understand) is almost unbearable to anybody with a knowledge of himself and a sense of honour. It is quite clear that this gentleman was not able to live up to the passion of his correspondent. One of his remarks she quotes. It was to the effect that her metaphors made him giddy. "I love you," she says on another occasion, "and me you like cordially." That was it, he liked her cordially, and under the strain of her undisciplined passion his love waned. It was strongest in the earlier letters, when the affair was new to him, when she wrote:

You and peace hold me so much a prisoner, have so caught me from my own way of living, that I seem to hear a pin drop twenty years ahead of me: it seems an event! Dearest, a thousand times, I would not have it be otherwise: I am only too willing to drop out of existence altogether and find myself in your arms instead. Giving you my love, I can so easily give you my life.

The end is tragedy lit by the fine, pure flame of her soul. She is dying, and he refuses to see her, which looks like sheer brutality. But no action of her beloved can bruise the loveliness of her nature:

How I suffer, how I suffer! If you could have dreamed that a human body could contain so much suffering, I think you would have chosen a less dreadful way of showing me your will: you would have given me a reason why I have to suffer so. Dearest, I am broken of every habit I ever had, except my love of you. If you would come back to me you could shape me into whatever you wished. I will be different in all but just that one thing.

Again:

I will die, because in no other way can I express how much I love you. I am possessed by all the despairing words about lost happiness that the poets have written. They go through me like ghosts: I am haunted by them: but they are bloodless things. It seems when I listen to all the other desolate voices that have ever cried, that I alone have blood in me. Nobody ever loved as I love since the world began.

And:

Oh, dear face, dear unforgettable lost face, my soul strains up to look for you through the blind eyes that have been left to torment me because they can never behold you. Very often have I seen you looking grieved, shutting away some sorrow in yourself quietly: but never once angry or impatient at any of the small follies of men. Come, then, and look at me patiently now! I am your blind girl: I must cry out because I cannot see you. Only make me believe that you yet think of me as, when you so unbelievably separated us, you said you had always found me—"the dearest and most true-hearted woman a man could pray to meet." Beloved, if in your heart I am still that, separation does not matter. I can wait, I can wait.

Soon she dies, with these last words: "Most dear, most beloved, you were to me and are. Now I can no longer hold together: but it is my body, not my love that has failed." The last letters, we are told, were not posted. They were found after her death and forwarded—what a word! She was a woman of parts: hers was a rare mind and a beautiful soul, but she loved too well, too unwisely well, and she paid for her excess. She paid with her life for her indifference to the poise of the laws that govern life.

The Peace of Nonentity.

The Riddle of the Universe at the Close of the Nineteenth Century. By Ernst Haeckel. Translated by Joseph McCabe. (Watts & Co. 6s. not.)

Now that the stake is uprooted, one seems to see it figuring retributively as a staff in the right hand of Science. On she goes, sublime in an immense sincerity, along the road that leads to Perfect Knowledge. And suddenly she pulls up, in the person of Prof. Haeckel, and tells us that she has travelled to the verge of the twentieth century without meeting God, and does not expect to meet Him. The beldame, with red though comely hands, confesses, moreover, that she has "finally destroyed the myth" that attributes immortality to the soul of man. Giordano Bruno is avenged.

Die Welträthsel is the title given to the scripture of this communication, which Germany has already absorbed in four editions. In translating it under the title of The Riddle of the Universe, Mr. McCabe, a conscientious interpreter, has assumed, inadvertently no doubt, that of a work by Mr. Edgar Douglas Fawcett, published in 1893. Prof. Haeckel perceives the universe filled with Substance, of which movement and sensation are innate and original properties. It is the nature, it is the law, of Substance to manifest itself continually in operations of growth and decline, of evolution and of devolution:

While the embryo of a new world is being formed from a nebula in one corner of the vast stage of the universe, another has already condensed into a rotating sphere of liquid fire in some far distant spot, a third has already cast off rings at its equator, which round themselves into planets.

And this is the end of worlds: first, all life is extinguished by the radiation of heat from its planetary domiciles; then the substance of the revolving spheres contract, the speed of their motion slackens, their orbits and that of their moons grow narrower. Anon—

The frozen moons fall on to their planets, the planets on to their suns. Two distant suns, perhaps already stark and cold, rush together with inconceivable force and melt away into nebulous clouds. And such prodigious heat is generated by the collision, that the nebula is once more raised to incandescence, and the old drama begins again.

It is to be noted that we catch our scientist dreaming. But "a dreamer lives for ever, and a toiler dies in a day," which, as regards the first half of the verse, is contrary to the Professor's philosophy.

That philosophy is, we opine, most noteworthy for its inclusion of the soul in the science of physiology. The soul of man is "merely a collective title for the sum-total of man's cerebral functions; and these are just as much determined by physical and chemical processes as any of the other vital functions, and just as amenable to the law of substance." Consequently, when the parts of the cortex by which those functions are discharged succumb to disease, the soul, as conceived by Prof. Haeckel, dies, and there's an end. He does not, like Mr. Fawcett, flirt with metempsychosis; he does not contemplate the re-arrangement of scattered atoms in some original order. In the privacy of the Unborn, man passes the ignoble fish-stage. Man and ape, dog and rabbit, pig and sheep, are indistinguishable from one another as embryos. "But man has a soul," says the Christian. Retorts Prof. Haeckel: "So have all animals."

In the Christian conception of soul, memory is the salient feature. By the possession of a high degree of conscious memory man has made experience the mother of civilisation. But his debt to unconscious memory is immeasurably greater; if it be true, as we understand from Prof. Haeckel, that the cell-soul erects itself, by memory, into the likeness of the generic type with such idiosyncracies as follow from the individuals to whom it owes existence. "Heredity is the memory of the plastidule, while variability is its comprehension." A statelier sentence no prophet ever penned. It deposits the god in the machine; it chambers him in the protist's unfinished shell and in the chrysalis. He is—or are we dreadfully unscientific?—the soul in action.

Of Prof. Haeckel's treatment of revealed religion it is enough to say that it is entirely free from reverence; it is even a little uncharitable and vulgar. He brushes spiritualism away with a wave of his hand.

This decidedly is a good way to avoid seeing ghosts, and ghosts are precisely the last phenomena that the Professor would desire to see. For The Riddle of the Universe denies the existence of spiritual shape apart from corporeal shape, or the life of spirit apart from body.

The book leads to the wholesome conclusion that we men, the brothers of fish and apes, owe to our relationship a kindly feeling towards our inferiors in the evolutionary scale who check our pride by surpassing us here and there in the good gifts of sight and smell, and by the fact that their ultimate oblivion is no deeper than our own. To complain of our futility were to rebuke that in ourselves which erected us as we are. We have lost God the Father. We have lost even Mr. Fawcett's "God of Absolutism . . . a unity of interpenetrative individuals who have bought their glory by suffering," and perhaps we could bear the loss. We have lost Spinoza's passionless Monad, who in thinking creates and in remembering eternises; and what have we gained? We have gained Substance; in effect we have gained the Universe itself, amorphous and unintelligible, an abyss full of revolving conflagrations in the midst of which we await disintegration—the peace of nonentity.

To such a glimpse, like one of Ivan the Terrible's punishments, chilling and scalding by turns, are we led at the close of the nineteenth century by the greatest living zoologist. But the hell of Michelangelo is merely horrible, and here is a touch of grandeur. Moreover, the annihilation of the ego will always be sugared by the optimist as atomic immortality. For ourselves we prefer to say that even atheism and thanatism are speculations. There is no end to the road that Science is diligently pursuing. She is tireless, but so might we imagine God to be, even "Our Father"; and if He walked before, she would not out-pace Him though her sandals were winged.

Three Good War Books.

In the Web of a War. By H. F. Prevost Battersby. (Methuen. 6s.)

How we Kept the Flag Flying. By Donald Macdonald. (Ward, Lock. 6s.)

The History of the Boer War. By F. H. E. Cunliffe. (Methuen. 15s.)

MR. BATTERSBY'S book reads almost like a budget of war pensées. The effect arises from his strong inclination to comment, and from the way in which his book is cut up into very short paragraphs—a relic, doubtless, of their first appearance in the Morning Post. Mr. Battersby was with Lord Roberts, and witnessed the surrender of Cronje and the re-making of the army at Bloemfontein. With all his sententiousness, he does not spare us the crude horrors of war. His description of the Boer laager at Paardeberg is as follows:

The chief feature of the laager was its smell. Camping on battlefields one becomes acclimatised to the scent of death. But no human soul could have grown used to the reek of that slaughter-house. It was appalling. Shrapnel had scattered the bodies of beasts; lyddite had turned them inside out. Cattle, twisted out of the likeness of kine, stripped to a red and skinless horror, rent into mounds of broken pieces, lay on every hand, and had lain there for a week, under a sun that turns meat sour almost between the plate and the mouth.

Mr. Battersby's obiter dicta are nearly always striking or interesting. We wonder whether his criticism of British officers is right. He says that the spirit of enterprise is no longer theirs. They have hot courage, love of country, and the desire to get on; and they will carry these to the length of dying on the field or in hospital. But all the time they are sick of the whole business, and long to see Hurlingham, and Cowes, and cricket, and shooting again. Thus, in staccato:

Their heart is not in enterprise, but in the little ways and plays of settled conditions.

They would, had it been their decision, have "left the cursed place to the Dutchmen."

Since it was not, they starve, and fight, and die with the best grace and most excellent courage possible.

But the change is there, from the spirit of the men who won the Indies and made America, and set our flag over the seas.

An individual book that makes us forget its late arrival—late as things go in the publishing which now follows an army as doggedly as its own commissariat.

In Mr. Macdonald's Ladysmith book we are agreeably disappointed. We expected "the same old thing," but we found freshness of view and a grip on what is interesting. Mr. Macdonald is an Australian, and represented the Melbourne Argus. "Siege Impressions," the title of the seventh chapter, might be the title of the book. Mr. Macdonald is great on shells. One shell tore to splinters the floor of a room in which breakfast had just been laid for Dr. Jameson, Colonel Rhodes, Lord Ava, and others. It entered the cellar below, and blew the floor up into a chaos of splintered timber and crockery. When a Ladysmith divine heard of it he said: "Good gracious! and Olive's violin is packed away in that cellar. Was anyone hurt?" Dodging shells is no use if you are fated to be smitten. There was a Doctor Starke in Ladysmith, an amiable tourist, a visitor from Torquay, who went every day to the river with an angler's basket, containing his luncheon, to be out of danger. He was a quiet man, a widower; he had fads, and several daughters in England, and in Ladysmith he befriended a homeless cat and took it every day with him to the river bank. He was nursing this cat one day at the door of the Royal Hotel, and chatting to Mr. M'Hugh, of the Daily Telegraph, when a shell came and cut him in two above the knees. Mr. M'Hugh was quite unhurt. This mild widower's death made the troops mad; "'e's a Devonshire man," said a Devon soldier between his teeth, "an' I'm Devonshire mesen'. Whoy doant they let us take yon gun?" Mr. Macdonald tells this: "One man was having a quiet bath on his own verandah when a shell struck a tree, cannoned off the side of the house without exploding, and rolling like a hoop along the verandah, upset the bath-tub and its occupant without hurting either." He has many such stories, and better ones about the physiology of heroism and the physiology of funk. There were volunteers whose nerve was simply unequal to fighting. "They were pitied rather than despised. Their colonel took them aside and appealed to them to pull themselves together and act like men, but . . . they were for the time being incapable of fighting, and pitiful as such an exhibition may be, none felt it so much as the men themselves." Some men funk'd shell and nothing else; concerning whom Mr. Macdonald tells a good story. "Early in the siege, an old major, whose fighting record is beyond question, was lecturing his men on the folly of ducking to shell. 'When you hear it, men, it's actually past, so that ducking your heads is quite useless.' Just then came a hissing shell from 'Silent Sue' close over the major's head. He ducked. The men laughed, and the major observed, 'Ah, well, I suppose it's just human nature.'"

Among other things Mr. Macdonald tells us why the flag that Sir George White kept flying over Ladysmith will never hang in St. Paul's Cathedral. On the night of the succour a crowd of officers gathered round the flag-pole, and, moved by a common impulse, pulled down the flag and tore it into a hundred heirlooms.

Mr. Cunliffe's history of the Boer War has been appearing in monthly parts, and the first of its two volumes is now issued. The excellence of this work is double; for the narrative is vivid and temperate, and the illustrations form a picture gallery of the war which is not likely to be rivalled. The history is planned on simple chronological lines, beginning with the Boer initiative and the battles of Talana Hill, Elands-laagte, Rietfontein, Lombard's Kop, Nicholson's Nek, and so on. Just because it is so evenly good and comprehensive Mr. Cunliffe's story does not call for quotation. Among the illustrations we notice an excellent drawing of a Pom-pom with the Pom-pom shell shown in its actual size; its length being that of a man's middle finger. On page 285 is the best photograph of the interior of an armoured train, packed with soldiers, that we have seen. Besides illustrations of all sizes, we have maps, plans of battlefields, sectional drawings of guns, &c., &c. An ideal gift for the Christmas of 1900, especially as it contains the promise of its other half—Volume II.

Some Jews in London.

The Jew in London: a Study of Racial Character and Present-Day Conditions. Being two Essays prepared for the Toynbee Trustees by C. Russell, B.A., and H. S. Lewis, M.A. (T. Fisher Unwin. 6s.)

THE title of this book is a misnomer. It should have been "Some Jews in London." No survey of the Jew in London, however cursory, could have omitted all consideration of the influence of cosmopolitan financiers on the happiness of the nation and the destiny of the Empire. The Jew of Maida Vale and of Hampstead is scarcely mentioned, while the Princes of Jewry who have gained entrance into the ranks of British aristocracy and are domiciled in London during a portion of the year are not so much as referred to. Of the marked difference between the Sephardim and the Ashkenazim—nothing is said. There is a contradiction between the claim in the title and the performance in the book. It inflames our desire: it fails to gratify our passion. Still, within the four corners of the area described by the authors the work they have performed is wholly satisfactory, and the spirit in which they have laboured is that of high-minded seekers after truth. The Jewish question is like the mariner's compass: there are 64 or even 360 points of view from which it can be approached. The present writer's humble labours in that field have taught him that generalisations about the Jew are like generalisations about women or the weather—futile, unscientific, and dangerous. Hence the value of this patient study of some Jews of London.

Prof. Bryce's preface is the least satisfactory portion of the book. He declares that the two Essays which form this volume are "primarily an attempt to describe the Jewish community in London." They are nothing of the kind. The book is devoted to the Jew of the East-End. Prof. Bryce declares, moreover, that "inter-marriage between Jews and Christians has already begun." If this is true it is important. But is it true? Mr. Russell, the writer of the first Essay, asserts, in reference to the question of amalgamation with the English race, that "the main obstacle is the rigid prohibition of inter-marriage, which is one of the articles of the Jewish religion." Mr. Lewis declares that mixed marriages are admittedly rare, and he does not think that mixed marriages are increasing among the working classes. Surely, if there were any real intention on the part of the leaders of the Jewish community to merge their race with ours, as the Huguenots and the Flemings merged theirs, we should have heard of it by this time. If, on the other hand, there is no such intention, the formation of an island of Orientals, isolated, self-concentrated, alien in idea and aim, can only be regarded with regret, even if the members of that community were not only superior to our own, but had attained the angelic standard of life and character. But the Jews are not angels. The commonly received opinion is that the standard of commercial ethics as recognised by too many Jews is lower than that acknowledged by the rest of the world. Jews admit it. Even Mr. Lewis, himself a Jew, admits that the bulk of the Polish immigrants have no sense of truth whatever, that "obvious perjury" on the smallest provocation is committed in case after case at an East-End police-court where the parties concerned are foreign Jews. Mr. Lewis, while condemning Judge Bacon's well-known remarks, declares that they are based on "a substantial substratum of truth." "I fear that it cannot be denied that their [foreign Jews] standard of business morality is often defective." An undue proportion of users of false weights and measures appear to be foreign Jews, if the return of convictions issued in the Minutes of the London County Council may be taken as evidence. With great fairness Mr. Lewis admits that the bankruptcy laws are evaded by persons who pass through the Courts and reappear in business with suspicious celerity and without apparent loss.

Admirably written as are the two Essays, we cannot but feel that in the desire to be fair and kindly the drawing of the subject of this book is somewhat out of perspective. The foundation of the British nation is character. Our chance of racial survival is intimately connected with our love of truth and with our continued aversion to crooked ways. If the fraudulent tendencies of the great majority of the destitute aliens who swarm in from Poland are inherent, is not the logical conclusion, first, that the facts should be accurately ascertained; and second, that if it be found that the character of these alien immigrants is, and remains, of a lower standard than is compatible with the mission of the Anglo-Saxon race, then the lesson the authors of this book desire to teach is not the one that we ought to learn?

Other New Books.

MEMORIES OF THE MONTHS. BY SIR HERBERT MAXWELL.

Sir Herbert Maxwell's manysidedness fits him peculiarly for the keeping of an interesting commonplace book. We know that he is not wholly represented here, that in addition to being a country gentleman, an ardent sportsman and accomplished naturalist, he is a politician, a leader in agriculture, and a man of books. With these latter his "memories" are not greatly concerned; but they may serve as material to future historians anxious to know how a Scottish laird passed his time towards the end of the nineteenth century. We learn from the preface that he has a habit of recording the day's deeds in written notes, that would grow too bulky if not occasionally reduced to print. Many of these brief chapters have already appeared in newspapers. Some are devoted to botany and ornithology, many to angling and a few to shooting. Not infrequently does he touch upon topics of controversy such as are lightly discussed in the smoke room of a country house, and on which considerable difference of opinion exists. One that particularly haunts him is the morality or mercy of sport, an argument that belongs to this questioning, self-conscious age. We do not propose to discuss it now further than to raise one point that has apparently escaped his attention. Most of his remarks are addressed to the stern opponents of all sport, who say that it is brutal and debasing and barbarous to make a pleasure and a pastime of killing. A man whose boast is that he has shot five hundred pheasants of a morning has been engaging in an amusement that may fairly be held up to reprobation. Not taking this extreme view, however, we believe the substantial objection to excessive game-preserving is that it leads to a jealous exclusion from the land of all but the owner's friends. To take one example from the Border country wherein Sir Herbert has gathered material for these charming essays, Flodden Hill is ruthlessly closed to the public for the sake of the pheasants. If there were no Game Laws there would be no temptation to shut up this favourite picnic ground. Many of our great landlords, it is true, do not worship "the sacred birds" quite so slavishly. Lord Salisbury, the Duke of Portland, the Duke of Buccleugh may be cited as examples of those who freely share their privileges with the public. It were easy, however, to draw up a Black List of others who adopt a quite opposite course, and, in consequence, are in the way of bringing about a severe agitation. Moderate men quite admit the value of field-sports, but they say that they may be purchased at too high a cost. It is a matter of increasing national importance that the poor be induced to return to the land, and if those who at present own it do not make concessions the end thereof will be what it was in Ireland. On the salmon question Sir Herbert avoids a similar point. It is advisable, even were sport to suffer a little, that pains should be taken to preserve all who work on the water, be it in salmon-tribble or herring-boat, because they and their children are material for the mercantile marine and the navy. Of course this subject holds but a small place in Sir Herbert's book; but we hope next time he goes a-fishing in the Tweed he will re-negotiate the Game Laws from our point of view, and put the result in a third volume of essays, to be as warmly welcomed as this one. (Arnold, 7s. 6d.)

A SHORT HISTORY OF ENGLISH

PRINTING: 1476-1898.

By HENRY R. PLIMMER.

Mr. A. W. Pollard, the general editor of "The English Bookman's Library," in which this volume appears, could hardly have put it in more capable hands than those of Mr. Plimmer, whose researches in the Record Office and elsewhere have thrown much light upon the dark period of English printing during the first half of the sixteenth century. Mr. Plimmer gives us a well-informed and well-arranged outline of his subject, starting from Caxton and ending with the Kelmscott Press, and the new Greek type designed by Mr. Selwyn Image for Messrs. Macmillan. We wonder how many readers are aware that the claim of Caxton to be the first English printer rests on an emendation. His first English printed book was the Letter and Sayings of the Philosophers, issued on November 18, 1477. But there exists a version of St. Jerome's Expositio of the Apostles' Creed, which, according to its colophon, was "Impressa Oxonie et data anno domini Mcccc.lxxvij. xviij die Decembris." Mr. Plimmer, and we believe, the majority of modern bibliographers, make the claim of Oxford by assuming that Mcccc.lxxvij is a misprint for Mcccc.lxxviii. They may be right, as other Oxford books of 1478 and 1479 are known, and some of them resemble the Expositio. Nevertheless, it seems a somewhat cavalier method of treating the evidence. Mr. Plimmer's book is itself a beautiful example of modern English printing, from the press of Messrs. Constable at Edinburgh. And it has some admirable illustrations, including facsimiles of Caxton's pages and of two specimens of Kelmscott Press work. Of the merit of the latter Mr. Plimmer has a very high opinion, and he lays especial stress on the care taken by Morris to make his union both of type arrangement and of decoration the double, not the single, page. Of the Yale Press in relation to the Kelmscott Press, Mr. Plimmer writes that its productions "have that rather irritating degree of likeness which makes every difference—and the differences are numerous—appear a wilful and regrettable divergence." (Kegan Paul.)

THE ORIGINS OF ART.

By YRJO HIRN.

The author is a lecturer at the Finnish University of Helsingfors. His valuable book, however, is not a translation, but an original work, written in excellent English. Metaphysics are out of fashion, and the "Aesthetik" of Herbart does not so much as find a mention in Mr. Hirn's bibliography. He approaches his subject from the side of anthropology and psychology, and sets himself to determine the nature of the primitive impulse lying at the root of art-production, asking himself whether it primarily satisfies practical and utilitarian ends in life, or whether it is "autotelic"—that is, finding its essential end in its own satisfaction. He concludes that the art-impulse is an independent one, arising out of the need for what Aristotle called "Katharsis," the purging of the moods and emotions.

All works of art have a common element notwithstanding their diversity. They express, each in their own medium, a mood or moods of the artist; they arise, that is, out of the impulse to expression, which is as primitive as feeling itself. Every man seeks automatically to heighten his feelings of pleasure and to relieve his feelings of pain. The artist is the man who finds that he can gain such enhancement or relief, not only by the direct action of giving expression to his feeling, but also by arousing a kindred feeling in others. Hence originates in him that desire to transmit his moods to an external audience which must be regarded as the simplest and most primordial inducement to artistic production.

But the art-impulse requires material to work upon, and this is provided by various non-aesthetic, sociological needs. Primitive man uses art to convey information, to propitiate a lover or a ruler, to stimulate and intensify vital energy, and to work magic by the creation of an illusion in which the distinction between subjective and objective is resolved. This thesis is expounded in a series of brilliant chapters, full of psychological subtlety, and stored with the results of a wide range of anthropological reading. It is an important contribution to a fascinating and progressive branch of inquiry. (Macmillan.)

THE STORY OF MY CAPTIVITY.

By ADRIAN HOFMEYER.

In judging it, it must be remembered that Mr. Hofmeyer is not an Englishman, and does not look at South African matters from a strictly English point of view, and that he is writing in a language which is not his own. This double disadvantage may, to the reader who is accustomed to conceal his feelings or who has never been in a position which aroused strong feelings, give Mr. Hofmeyer the air of being unnecessarily hysterical; but he has lost much and suffered much for the faith and loyalty that is in him, and allowance must be made for all these things, especially as the greater part of the story was written in prison under great difficulties. Mr. Hofmeyer is, we believe, the brother of Mr. Jan Hofmeyer, of the Afrikaner Bond, whose influence in South Africa has been so sinister. Adrian Hofmeyer, however, is a loyal Afrikaner, and because he was loyal he was seized by the Boers at Lobatse and imprisoned. The whole story is given here with much detail, for Mr. Adrian, being a Dutch pastor, is gifted with eloquence, and gives full rein to it. In the prison at Pretoria he came in contact with the English officers, and, as so many disgraceful falsehoods have been published of late about our officers, it is interesting to take the opinion of an Afrikaner who had every opportunity of judging for himself what the English officer is like. Here is a passage worth quoting:

And now I have for many months been a fellow-prisoner of the British officer. I have lived with him under the same roof, I have come in daily contact with him, and learnt to know him intimately. And from the very bottom of my heart I say I have learnt to value and respect and love him. The British officer is a gentleman, and a fine one withal. His self-restraint, his resourcefulness, his in many cases splendid intellectual development, his invariable courtesy, his kindness, his courage, have taught me honestly and fervently to admire him. What the officers were to me during my term of imprisonment I can never forget and never repay.

To those who know the British officer all this is nothing new, but it is pleasant testimony from a fellow-prisoner of a different race. (Edward Arnold. 6s.)

THE PRAYER OF ST. SCHOLASTICA.
AND OTHER POEMS.

BY LADY LINDSAY.

It is, perhaps, unfair to try these poems, modest and unpretending as they are, by too severe a test. They are essentially feminine; uniformly emotional, in a gentle, somewhat languorous way; diffuse, with a pretty level of cultivated expression: pure and high-minded in sentiment. They are not striking, though here and there is a graceful and attractive fancy. When a good and polished woman gives the sincere best that is in her for those who may sympathetically receive it, it is ungracious to complain that she is not a Sibyl nor even an Elizabeth Browning. Lady Lindsay shows at her best in a passage like this, from the poem which gives its title to the book:

To-day, this day most tender and serene.
When Winter's mask foretells the coming Spring.
While droops the earth, like to a tired child,
Within the arms of Evening, that calm nurse
Who croons in monotone her lullaby:
To-day pale memories throng to upward light
From out the dusky pictures wrought of years.

That is elegant and poetical; but the texture in the bulk of the verse is not close enough; the sentiment and expression come with too easy and copious a lullaby flow. Yet these poems will doubtless find their audience, especially among Lady Lindsay's own sex; and they will at least teach "nothing base." Kegan Paul.

SONGS AND LYRICS. BY CHARLES WENTWORTH WYNNE.

Mr. Wynne, who has already won some reputation as a poet, is far too facile. These lyrics suggest the indiscriminate contents of a commonplace-book of verse. There is little selection of thought, little condensation of expression. The following lyric is an average example of his book:

THE WHITE POPPY.

Like a shimmering poppy, robed in white,
With sashes and bows of golden green—
A very woman of soft delight,
Yet moulded as the dowers have been:
Within her eyes the palest blue
Bespoke a mind to calmness given,
A soul in which a man might view
The very sanctities of Heaven.
And when she smiled it seemed as tho'
Pale, shadowy moonbeams sought her lips,
And scatter'd there an argent glow
That never suffereth eclipse.
And those soft hands that lie apart
Upon the foldings of her gown,
O, beating heart, how can I curb
The folly they would make your own:
For I would hold them in despite
Of any protest she might make,
Until I felt their warmth requite
The thing I ventured for her sake.
Till, warm'd with secret fires, I feel
Her reddening lips droop nearer mine,
And life upon its axis reel
With kisses that are more like wine!

He can at times write a verse such as this:

Let me feel the warmth of Heaven
As it purely flows—
Let me feel that it is given
Straight from God's own brow!

But such instances of higher expression are, unfortunately, not frequent. Grant Richards.

SYLVANA'S LETTERS TO AN UNKNOWN FRIEND.

By E. V. B.

There is a tendency towards the overdoing of garden books: the fashion has been set, the cult of the garden grows. So far we have had some delicate and beautiful work upon a subject which requires a very special faculty of observation and a nice discrimination in sentiment. Fortunately, this volume, as was confidently to be expected from the author of the Garden of Pleasure, exhibits both. We tremble to think of the kind of thing that may be offered to us if there should be an exploiting of our haunts of peace.

These Letters of Sylvana make a series of garden chronicles from April to November. Some are addressed from "Home," some from a house in Aberdeenshire, others from a fishing lodge not, we gather, so far north. They breathe the true garden spirit—love of quietness, patience, delight in colour and form, the delicious sadness born of fading loveliness, the joyful appreciation of the glory of the year's prime. The heart of a wise dreamer is in them, interpreting, suggesting, consoling. The style fits the subject as neatly as an acorn fits into its cup. Even the so-often-ugly botanical nomenclature slips from the pen with grace, and takes some share in the music of the easy sentences. There is imagination, too, of peculiar sweetness, which perhaps is at its best in a letter devoted to Dream Houses—beautiful semblances that never were. And here is a bit of pretty observation which may be quoted as typical:

The cottage, with its smooth belt of dewy lawn, reminds me of a singular appearance sometimes visible before the dew is off the grass. The morning sun must be shining steadfastly behind you as you walk across the dew, and it may happen that a sainted shadow goes on before; that in some such lustrous hour your shadow's head may be encircled by a rainbow-tinted, radiant, nimbus. Yet be not too proud, Amaryllis! It does not mean that nature herself crowns you for a poet-priestess. . . .

Of such books as this we cannot have too many, but it is obvious that the many must be few. Macmillan. 3s. 6d. net.

There is no getting away from Omar Khayyam. Not only have Mr. H. M. Batson and Mr. E. D. Ross written a new book on The Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam (Methuen, 6s.), but Mr. Batson calls for more literature on the subject. Entirely rejecting the view that FitzGerald's paraphrase is an English poem to be enjoyed without reference to its Persian inspiration, he is avid of more exact knowledge about Omar himself; and particularly he hopes to see a judicious sifting of texts which might leave us a residuum of verse undoubtedly and unianiably Omar's. He himself gives us an orderly and careful work, containing "The Life and Times of Omar," FitzGerald's text (last edition), and a commentary filling more than half the volume. To those who are coming freshly to Omar, or who wish to clarify their knowledge of him, this book will be very useful.

Medical biography is nearly always interesting, and we find no exception in Mr. Alexander Macalister's James Macartney (Hodder & Stoughton, 6s.). The inspiration and character of the book are revealed in the first sentence of the Preface: "During my student days the name of Macartney was frequently used by my teachers as an authority for many of those unwritten statements which are so peculiarly characteristic of the Dublin School of Medicine; and I felt a natural curiosity to ascertain what manner of man he was who had bequeathed such a heritage of traditional lore." Mr. Macalister has met many of Macartney's friends and pupils, and it is easy to see that this memoir has been a labour of love.

Mr. Cyril Davenport is an unquestioned authority on bookbinding. As artist and antiquary by hobby, Mr. Davenport has now turned his attention to cameo art, and in Cameos (Seeley, 7s. net) he gives us a thorough exposition of the art, and a profusion of black-and-white and coloured illustrations. Mr. Davenport admits that cameo art is in abeyance, and that even private collections are passing rapidly to museums, where, however, they will be seen to the best advantage whenever a revival of the art comes. The finest private collections in this country are in the hands of the Duke of Devonshire; Sir Francis Cook, at Richmond; and Sir Charles Robinson, in Harley-street.

Sussex, by F. G. Brabant, is one of the charming pocket topographies, with illustrations by Mr. E. H. New, which Messrs. Methuen have begun to issue. The arrangement of places is alphabetical, and there are useful prefatory chapters on "General Physical Features," "Flora and Fauna," "Antiquities," &c. The equipment and appearance of this little volume are perfect. Shakespeare's Country, by Bertram C. R. Windle, is issued in the same series.

Mr. Richard Kearton's books on birds are of an acknowledged excellence, combining as they do an intimate knowledge of birds with wonderful achievements in ornithological photography. In Our Bird Friends (Cassell, 5s.) Mr. Kearton has written a book "for all boys and girls," and we recommend "all boys and girls" to look out for it this Christmas. It deals most entertainingly with eggs, flight and feathers, feeding habits, nesting eccentricities, songs and call-notes; and the photographs by the author's brother, Mr. Cherry Kearton, are fascinating.

The Rising of 1745, by Charles Sanford Terry (Nutt, 3s.) takes its place in the series of books illustrating "Scottish History from Contemporary Writers." No one who has a weakness for the most enlivening episode in Scottish history should fail to possess themselves of Mr. Terry's book, with its quaint documents, facsimiles, and maps; and its "Bibliography of Literature Relating to Jacobite History."

Mr. Anthony Wilkin's book, Among the Berbers in Algeria (Unwin, 6s.), is "intended to be a popular record of a journey undertaken with scientific objects." Mr. Wilkin is careful to warn the reader to expect some technical terms and discussions. The illustrations are photographic and excellent, though we think that the paper chosen for their advantageous printing is unnecessarily heavy. We should not ourselves call the book "popular," but it is a record which anyone interested in Algeria will do well to consult. Mr. Wilkin pays just compliments to the French, who have "cleansed one of the filthiest Augean stables in the modern world" without profit, but with persistence.

More "popular," without doubt, is Mme. Jean Pommerol's account of her searchings among Saharian domesticities, translated by Mrs. Arthur Bell under the title Among the Women of the Sahara (Hurst & Blackett, 6s.). The book is a succession of vivid word pictures of Negro and Arab interiors; it is also an interpretation of Oriental womanhood by a French woman of quick insight and, we may add, of conspicuous courage. Here is an example of the Saharian women's cajoling ways: "'Oh, Rūmīya,' said one woman to the author, 'give me that piece of tulle thou art wearing, and I will put it over my face that I may feel thy very presence about me.' Among themselves they say all manner of tender things like that." A vivacious, well illustrated travel-book.

Fiction.

The Hosts of the Lord. By Flora Annie Steel.
(W. Heinemann. 6s.)

In reviewing Mrs. Steel's last novel, Voices in the Night, we resigned ourselves to the sad certainty that this truly gifted writer would never learn properly either to construct a novel or to write it. We will not, therefore, dwell on the technical shortcomings of The Hosts of the Lord; they are multitudinous, but they present no novelty. The book, indeed, seems in most essential ways to be an imitation of Voices in the Night, just as Voices in the Night (now that we look at it again after the lapse of time) was an imitation of On the Face of the Waters. In The Hosts of the Lord it would appear that, by some default of inspiration, Mrs. Steel has given away the "trick" of her Indian novels. And this trick seems to be threefold:

(a) A melodramatic, sentimental plot gathering slowly out of vagueness into one "big" situation.

(b) A crude juxtaposition of East and West, done in a studiously blasé manner, as if to say, "These startling contrasts are nothing to me."

(c) The use of catch-phrases which may mean anything and nothing.

To touch briefly on these:

(a) He would be a clever man who after a single reading could describe at all lucidly the plot of The Hosts of the Lord, with its crowded figures and excrescent episodes. But the mere titles of the chapters give a clue to its nature—"Driftwood," "Undercurrents," "Alpha and Omega," "Wheels Within Wheels," "Echoes," "Adrift," "Trapped," "Foiled," "The Truth." Most of the trouble springs from the rivalry of an aristocratic native and a thoroughly Adelpic English jeune premier for the heart of an English girl whose grandmother was an Indian princess. Side by side runs another and simpler love-story between Lance Carlyon (note the "penny novelette" quality of that name) and a lady missionary. Looming over all there is an aged priest who speaks perfect Italian and fences better than the best fencer in the Indian army. Then, in the dim background, are the hosts of pilgrims going to witness the aqueous miracle of the "Cradle of the Gods," and the fifteen hundred malefactors of the big state prison where the "big situation" occurs—occurs to the accompaniment of the inevitable thunderstorm. What precisely are the "Hosts of the Lord" we cannot say.

(b) Sometimes Mrs. Steel contrasts East and West with considerable subtlety, as in the admirable description of the viceregal durbar on pages 56 and 57. But more often the feat has the look of an ad captandum dodge:

Faint and far they showed against the faint, far sky; but, as Father Nioian pointed to them, a ray of light from the still unseen sun below the visible horizon of this world, a ray of light seeking perhaps another world among the stars, found the heights of the holy hills in its path, and dyed their snowdrifts red—blood red!

At the sight a roar rose from the crowd.

"Jai Kālī Ma! She gives a sign! The sacrifice is there! She is appeased! He speaks the truth. Let us follow him and his God!"

"Ay! as my father did," cried one.

"And mine!"

"And mine!" assented some, while others forgot all save pilgrimage in the shout—

"Rām, Rām, Sita Rām!"

"Hārā! Hārī! Hārī! Hārā!"

So, on that babel of sounds, Pidar Narāyan's voice rose steadily as, preceded by that ambling figure—strangest of all acolytes—he walked on, chanting the 121st Psalm:

Levavi oculos meos in montes; unde veniet auxilium mihi.

The words were in an unknown tongue, the rhythm strange, but the spirit, the idea, were familiar. It was the song of someone seeking the "Cradle of the Gods," as they were.

There is a vast quantity of this kind of thing in The Hosts of the Lord, and we do not think it will bear examination.

(c) In Chapter X. the manipulation of the sentence, "Death and Birth are the Pivots of the Wheel of Life," said to be from the Sanskrit, forms a good example of Mrs. Steel's method of using a catch-phrase. The thing is turned over, pried into, gazed at from afar, repeated, almost chanted, until the reader is persuaded that this very ordinary idea contains the inmost meaning of the universe and a thousand meanings beside. "But above and through all, he seemed to hear a never-ceasing voice that said: 'The pivots of Life . . .'" A little further on Mrs. Steel juggles with another phrase in exactly the same way; but this time the phrase is "Oh! dem golden slippers." Before she has done with it, "Oh! dem golden slippers" is heavy with all the terrible messages of Fate. By employing the same method, a simple-minded man, having listened at the open window of an infants' school, might wander wisely through the world, seeing in every bush and stream, palace and square, the mystical proof of that august and dazzling truth: "Two and two are four."

We do not wish to depreciate the indubitable merits of Mrs. Steel's fiction. She has knowledge and imagination, and now and then she will surprise with some large poetical symbolism; but she is in danger of falling into a "manner." Handicapped as she is by an imperfect technical equipment, it behoves her to watch most jealously the workings of that part of her talent which is creative.

Rose Island. By W. Clark Russell.
(Arnold. 6s.)

MR. CLARK RUSSELL brings to this "strange story of a love adventure at sea" qualities too well known to need naming. One is struck by the genuineness of the sea-lore that is woven into the very fibre of the tale. Rose Island is not an island, but a beautiful girl who quietly tumbles out of her cabin window on the Eleuthera through leaning out of it when she ought to have been dressing for dinner. Her fall is neither seen nor heard. Picked up by the Charmer, she becomes the heroine of a tale in which storms and piracy and plague and murder bear their parts, and in which she is compelled to take the life of an infatuated negro in defence of her honour. There is no need to detail the story, so full of the elements of sea romance, or to assure the reader that it ends happily. Nor have we more than one simple criticism to offer. The story is told by Captain Tom Foster, to his passengers on the deck of the Australian clipper Suez. He has no part in the story, which he throws into the past, and relates in a style that would make us forget him altogether if it were not for an occasional interjected "Ladies and Gentlemen." When these words occur we are abruptly reminded that Mr. Russell has made Captain Foster talk like a book. It does not seem credible that a sea-captain, yarning to his passengers on deck, would say:

"It was still dark, but the brilliants of the night hovered with something of faintness in the wide field they tipped with silver points, as though the morning were not far distant; and the pallor of its face, fresh from the embrace of the hag Darkness, was rising upon the ocean line."

Or that on a given night he would take up the thread of his story in this manner:

"It is a soft, warm breeze this evening," said Captain Tomson Foster to the attentive company that had gathered round him, "and the ship sails fast. At this rate we shall soon have the jewels of the South dangling in our rigging, and the Suez will be heading off for the Cape of Good Hope. What a noble sunset has just disappeared—the red ruin of the stateliest pyre in the world!"

The fact is, that Captain Foster, and his Suez, and his passengers are not needed. The story of the Eleuthera and the Charmer would have stood better alone, and as coming from Mr. Russell's own pen. Even then we might have found it a trifle high-flown. But the gain in simplicity would have been great; and we should have been spared the improbable diction of a Quaker captain who says: "I have no turns of speech," and has a hundred. But this criticism is not one that we feel very deeply, for the story lives. (Arnold. 6s.)

Love in a Mist. By Olive Birrell.
(Smith, Elder. 6s.)

WE have a reminiscence of some of Miss Birrell's earlier novels as honest, thoughtful, if not exactly inspired, work, and the present one belongs to the same category. It contains some studies of life under modern social conditions, which give a touch of freshness. Sibylla Lincoln has her home—and endures it for the sake of her small brother, Pippin, although love is calling—in a curious, semi-socialistic household, composed of the most heterogeneous elements, under the ineffective control of her father, a wayward idealist and philanthropist. The humours and trials of such an existence are skilfully handled. More attractive is the picture of the flat subsequently inhabited by Sibylla and two girl friends, who lived on tea and eggs, with interludes of chocolate creams, in "a poetical kitchen, with curtains of Turkey red, and autotypes hanging on the walls." There is also much patient study of character. The hero, Keith Hamilton, is imperfectly convincing, but Sibylla is good, her father is better, and perhaps her self-suppressing and hopeless adorer, a city clerk called Hudson, is best of all.

The Duke. By J. Storer Clouston.
(Arnold. 6s.)

MR. CLOUSTON invites his readers to very tolerable comedy, breaking here and there into farce. The central idea is ancient. Lambert Haselle returns from the Colonies to find himself unexpectedly Duke of Grandon. He is unknown in London, and for a freak lets a wild Irishman, Jack Kavanagh, take his place, himself masquerading as a private secretary. Kavanagh's notion of a dukedom is a continuous spree, and, with the congenial assistance of Lord Chrysanthemus or Chrissy Stagger, he carries it out so successfully that on the day when his allotted term expires his engagements to two rival brides are simultaneously announced, and he is glad to resign the coronet to its lawful owner and disappear. Meanwhile, Lambert Haselle, in a subordinate position, has also found a bride and learnt the hollowness of London society. The book is mostly froth, but it is froth lightly whipped, and here and there is a deeper touch. Indeed, the ancient and unselfish Sir Pursuivant Debrette is rather a pleasing figure.

Yolande the Parisienne. By Lucas Cleeve.
(Long. 6s.)

IN forwarding this book for review, the publisher is kind enough to inform us that "it is a daring and original piece of work, and can hardly be compared to any other similar work, if we except Marie Corelli's The Sorrows of Satan, so weird and fantastic are the principal personages, and so fascinating are the conversations." This he calls "Literary Gossip." Actually it is a morbid, unpleasant, and ill-constructed romance, in which Death plays a terrene part as the Marchese di Vall' Ombra, and Satan as the Duca de Solferino. Through their agency the hero is introduced to Eve, now a recluse in the Sphinx, and is permitted to further complicate the destinies of a harlot who has (or has not) committed suicide for his sake. The conversations are "weird and fantastic," with the weirdness and fantasy of a Bloomsbury medium. Lucas Cleeve's novel is entirely without distinction of any kind.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the week's Fiction are not necessarily final.
Reviews of a selection will follow.]

ON THE WING OF OCCASION.

BY JOEL C. HARRIS.

The author of Uncle Remus is so great a favourite, and holds such a warm place in the heart, that when we opened this, the latest book from his pen, we referred to Who's Who to refresh our memory with the tale of his works. There we came upon his Recreations. They are: "Thinking of things and tending his roses. Lives in the suburb of West End, where he has had a comfortable house built to a verandah, on a five-acre lot full of birds, flowers, children, and callards." The present volume contains five stirring stories. One is called "The Kidnapping of President Lincoln," and two are built about the surrender of Lee's army in 1865. (Murray. 6s.)

FOES IN LAW.

BY RHODA BROUGHTON.

A new novel by Rhoda Broughton is something to many. Long may it be so! The titles of her former novels—we cannot bring ourselves to call them old—smile from the "facing title-page," and what pleasant hours they recall. Cometh Up as a Flower begins the list, Nancy ends it. And Foes in Law? Well—it is from the same mould. It begins thus: "The morning room is comfortable, but so are not its occupants—only two—of whom the one has within the last five minutes sprung a mine upon the other." Yes, we know those two! (Macmillan. 6s.)

PHARAOH'S DAUGHTER.

BY W. W. ASTOR.

Twelve stories by the proprietor of the Pall Mall Gazette and Pall Mall Magazine, in which periodical these flights of Mr. Astor's imagination first appeared. The tales are illustrated, the frontispiece being an ornament executed in colour with this description by the author: "And he gave her for a memorial and as a Talisman of Joy, a sapphire ram's head set in a fillet of gold, even the diadem of the King of the Gods." (Macmillan)

A CABINET SECRET.

BY GUY BOOTHBY.

On page 125 Woolwich Arsenal is blown up; a few pages later the Prime Minister is assassinated, and, according to Mr. Boothby, other awful things happen to England owing to the "machinations" of a "powerful yet mysterious foe." Mr. Boothby seems in the end to have stood affrighted at the edifice of his invention, for he appends a note saying that while the war between England and the South African Republics forms the basis of the story, "the characters and incidents described are purely fictional, and have no sort of resemblance, either intended or implied, with living people." Mr. Boothby never made a truer remark. (White. 6s.)

SPRINGTOWN ON THE PIKE.

BY J. URI LLOYD.

A conscientious and capable tale of Northernmost Kentucky, with illustrations, and many pages of negro dialect. The narrator is Samuel Drew: "My name is Samuel Drew, and I am now Professor of Chemistry in the University on the Hill. When I think of my boyhood, memories of the Kentucky pike arise, and I recall the experiences of Sammy Drew, a barefoot child." (Hodder & Co. 6s.)

SON OF JUDITH.

BY JOSEPH KEATING.

A sympathetic tale of the Welsh mining villages. The end is tragic, crowned by the usual last paragraph of bliss, which has such a strange fascination for novelists: "They stood hand in hand, illumined by the little lamp's rays, bound in a circle of light that burned steadily, bright as a symbol of the happiness which should bind them to each other for ever." (Allen. 6s.)

THE SWAY OF PHILIPPA.

BY J. B. PATON.

A long, well-written story of the lives of people, their joys and their woes, in easy circumstances, by the author of Bigli the Dancer. Book III. is called "Philippa's Suitors," and it should be good reading to judge by the author's clever treatment of Philippa in Book I. (George Allen. 6s.)

FREE TO SERVE.

BY E. RAYNER.

A tale of Colonial New York planned during the author's residence in a Dutch community, which had not become sufficiently modernised to lose its early flavour. Miss E. Rayner, a native of Cambridge, after spending several years in Canada, returned to England to study at the North Hall, Newnham College, gaining honours in the Mathematical Tripos, and returning soon afterwards to America.

THE OUTCAST EMPEROR. BY THE LADY HELEN CRAVEN.

A long novel of society and adventure, the kind of adventure that revolves around an Eastern jewel. The story is told in the first person by one who, in his own words, "suffered from the usual complaint of the unnecessarily rich man—that of not knowing what to do with my time." One of his expedients was to take a party of friends in his yacht to the Far East. There he meets Wu-Chow, and things happen to the Emperor of Cathay and others. (Hutchinson. 6s.)

BROUGHT TO BAY.

BY R. H. SAVAGE.

"'Same old dun for funds, same raven croakings,' cried the ex-captain of the Ninth Lancers, hurling a blue cloth envelope across the room. . . . 'Those Temple Bar cornerants must think that I own Aladdin's lamp.'" The author of My Official Wife is not a stylist. But he can rattle you off a story with the best of the yarning novelists. Let us add that our author is not obtrusively psychological. "Laure is a devil," moodily mused Sir Raoul, as he walked the terrace. . . . "Fool that I did not think of offering her money. She might have been silenced." (White. 6s.)

WAR AND ARCADIA.

BY BERTRAM MITFORD.

A bustling story of fighting, but—shade of Fenimore Cooper!—the enemy are Indians. "Travel back!" he bellows in stentorian tones, with his hand to his mouth, speaking-trumpet fashion, as he whirls by. "Travel back! The Sioux are out." And the frontispiece shows Kennion trying to enter a shanty, while "the girl, a gleam of light in her blue eyes, faces the Indians, her weapon gripped and ready." (White. 6s.)

BRITAIN'S GREATNESS

FORETOLD.

BY MARIE TREVELYAN, &c.

The contents of this fat book are as follows:

1. A picture of Thorneycroft's Boadicea group.
2. Cowper's Ode to Boadicea.
3. A preface, wherein Miss Marie Trevelyan tells the reader how Boadicea entered into the dreams of her girlhood as the embodiment of noble and pure womanhood.
4. An introduction, fifty pages long, by the author of China's Present and Future, &c.
5. The story of Boadicea, three hundred and eighty-three pages long, by Miss Marie Trevelyan. (Hogg. 6s.)

We have also received: The Worldly Hope, by H. Schwartz; Through Life's Rough Way, by Bertha Minniken; The Daringfords, by Mrs. Lodge; A Great Temptation, by Dora Russell (Digby, Long), and London's Peril, by F. M. Allen (Downey).

THE ACADEMY.

Editorial and Publishing Offices, 43, Chancery-lane.

The ACADEMY will be sent post-free to every Annual Subscriber in the United Kingdom.

Price for One Issue, Threepence; postage One Halfpenny Price for 52 issues, Thirteen Shillings; postage free.

Foreign Rates for Yearly Subscriptions 20s. including postage.

American Agents for the ACADEMY: Brentano's, 31, Union-square, New York.

The Songs of the Sanctuary.

THE death of the Rev. S. J. Stone removes one more of the rapidly lessening band of contemporary hymn-writers who have achieved real distinction. Like Bishop Walsham How, he was the author of innumerable hymns; yet his memory, as a writer of sacred songs, will rest upon not more than two or three of them, and perhaps only upon the most familiar, "The Church's one foundation." It is, indeed, one of the striking curiosities of the difficult and elusive art of writing lyrics of worship, that even its most successful and voluminous followers fail nine times out of ten. The bulk of their work is forgotten. Most practised hymn-writers count their efforts by scores, and often by hundreds; yet it is only now and again, and, as it were, by a happy accident, that they produce something which appeals at once to the devotional sense and to the rudimentary literary perception which are brought to the testing of hymns. Nor is it always easy to perceive literature even in those efforts which have become consecrated by the affection of generations of church-goers. After all, the success of a hymn as a composition, intended primarily for use "in quires and places where they sing," is determined, to a very great extent, by its music. Some terrible doggerel has been fitted to sweet and really appropriate tunes; but, given a simple and easily remembered setting, the hymns which survive are those that touch the inmost chords of feeling. This is so because simplicity is an essential of good Christianity, as it is an essential of good literature. Were there any doubt of this we need only turn to Toplady's "Rock of Ages," probably the greatest favourite of its class in English. The simplicity of that hymn verges upon nakedness; yet it expresses the eternal cry of the human heart, and suffices from generation to generation.

Much of our English hymnology is necessarily borrowed from the Latin and the Greek, those eternal creditors which no literature, however national, can altogether avoid. A large proportion of the hymns which treat Jerusalem as the prototype of heaven are derived from the Latin hymnaries of the Middle Ages, and unquestionably some of them, music and words alike, are of great antiquity. In their English form one or two of them, notably Dr. Neale's "Jerusalem the Golden," have a vigour and a lilt which atone for the occasional halting line, the weak or commonplace phrase, which too often spoil the finish even of the most admirable hymns. The modern facility of writing has endowed us with much devotional song that we could have done very well without. The old examples are few and soft, imaginative if you will, but always with a direct and immediate appeal. Take, for instance, the mellifluous fervour of the lines which have, not improbably, been sung oftener than any other of their kind:

Jesu dulcis memoria
Deus vera cordis gaudia,
Sed super mel, et omnia,
Ejus dulcis præsentia.

Many translators have tried their hands upon this "Hymn of St. Bernard"; but, so far as we are acquainted with their versions, none of them equals Caswall's

Jesu, the very thought of Thee
With sweetness fills the breast, which is not only exceedingly faithful to the original, but is, in some respects, more expressive, and has been adopted by almost every form of the Christian religion in this country. The same simplicity is the "note" of the old

Veni Creator Spiritus.

which was Englished by Bishop Cosin as

Come, Holy Ghost, our souls inspire.

Here, again, there are many versions, mainly unsuccessful.

It is a little odd that, with a few significant exceptions, the really great writers have either not attempted to produce hymns at all, or have failed in the endeavour. Perhaps it may, without irreverence or impropriety, be suggested that lyrics of this kind require a certain touch of feminine and imaginative softness which is, in the main, alien to the literary temper. This is why the most successful hymn-writers have usually been ecclesiastics and women. Indeed, it is highly improbable that a great, or even a popular, hymn could be written except by one penetrated by the devotional spirit. The great names of literature which are appended to familiar hymns may be counted on very few fingers—Addison ("The spacious firmament on high"), Cowper ("Hark my soul, it is the Lord"), Cardinal Newman ("Lead, kindly Light"). There are others, no doubt, which might, at a stretch, be included—Keble, for instance, who was a highly successful hymn-writer, and Bishop Ken, whose "Morning" and "Evening" hymns have been classics for two centuries. Even Sir Walter Scott produced an echo of the "Dies Iræ" in the hymn beginning

That day of wrath, that dreadful day;

but we fancy it is rarely used. And, despite Macaulay's terrible essay, the muse of the egregious James Montgomery survives to this day in the hymn-books, which contain several of his pieces that are popular and constantly sung—such as "For ever with the Lord." There is nothing in these verses, but they live in psalmody for reasons which have nothing to do with literature. It is, of course, not to be supposed that we have exhausted the devotional poetry of the great English writers, but we have confined our survey to work that is familiar to other than the students. Even Richard Baxter's "Ye holy angels, bright," which still appears in some of the collections, has little more than an antiquarian interest.

One of the most conspicuous defects of modern hymns, after their rather sensuous imagery, is their lack of spontaneity. Unless it be a cry of the soul, or a touching and melodious rendering of a universal longing, a hymn is hardly likely to fulfil any purpose whatever; and it is precisely those that have been called forth by some real need, or some pressing occasion, which have most surely and swiftly struck the right note. There is no better instance of this than Mr. Baring-Gould's "Onward, Christian soldiers," which someone has called, by no means inaptly, "the battle-cry of the Church Militant." In its way, and for its purpose, the song is perfect; but its fine martial spirit is greatly helped by the late Sir Arthur Sullivan's stirring setting. It was written for an open-air procession, and was meant to be sung to an old Gregorian tune; and much of its success is owing to its having been prepared ad hoc, and more or less on the spur of the moment. Everybody knows the story of how Reginald Heber wrote "From Greenland's icy mountains," still the most popular and appropriate of missionary hymns. His father-in-law, Shipley, Dean of St. Asaph, asked him to "write something for them to sing in the morning," when a sermon was to be preached in Wrexham Church in aid of the Asiatic work of the Society for Propagating the Gospel; and in an hour or two he obeyed the call, writing in a corner of a room where people were talking. Cardinal Newman's "Lead, kindly Light," appears to have been an equally sudden inspiration, although there was no particular purpose in the author's mind. An idle hour at sea produced this very favourable example of what a literary mind, deeply coloured by personal devoutness, can do in the way of a song of the sanctuary.

The greatly enhanced popularity of congregational singing has, no doubt, been the principal cause of the large number of hymns that have been written within the last half century. Keble and Neale and Faber gave a considerable impetus to a branch of literature which, as we have seen, has not, on the whole, attracted the same class of mind as most other departments of letters. Since then most hymns that have lived have, as has already been suggested, come from the clergy, like Bishop Walsham How, whose "For all the saints who from their labours rest" has, in its song of triumph over death, consoled thousands of sorrowing hearts; or from women, like Mrs. Alexander, who in "Once in David's royal city," and "The roseate hues of early dawn," and, indeed, in some less familiar pieces, has made real additions to English hymnody. But although the bulk of our hymn-books has been added to so considerably within the last generation or so the old numbers have not lost their favour—we still sing the Wesleys, and Toplady, and even Tait and Brady. "Let us sing unto the Lord a new song" is a laudable aspiration; but it were better not to sing it if it be mere doggerel or vapid jingle. There is at least this consolation, that when, upon sparse occasions, a fine new hymn is written, "the Churches," however much they may detest each other's theology, are all eager to adopt it. Free trade in hymns has, in fact, become an established principle—the Church of England and the Protestant sects take the modern Father Faber's "O Paradise, O Paradise" with the same freedom that they use one or other of the forty translations of the "Adeste Fideles." Yet one sometimes doubts whether exercises such as those of Faber will stand the test of generations. They are highly coloured, full of imagery, occasionally a trifle tawdry, or aggressively sentimental. Simple in means, immediate in effect, pathetic in its appeal—that is the type of hymn which lives. In literature a touch of austerity always makes for immortality—tinsel is bound to wear off. But austerity in psalmody is not exactly in favour at present. For the matter of that, indeed, it is obvious that the temptations to lose sight of the fabric in the applied ornament are peculiarly powerful when it comes to writing songs of praise.

Epigrams.

DISPARITY.

My eyes have seen you, yet they know you not,
Our toils how similar, how wide apart!
You labour in a healthy garden plot,
I plough bare furrows in the fields of Art!

HAPPINESS.

He loved, when weary threw his love away,
Nor ever found it more, but every day
Happier he grew, light-hearted, sound, and whole,
For with his love he cast aside his soul.

LOVE.

You gave me what you had; the gift was small
And worthless, yet though one more worthy came,
I, when he gave me his tremendous all,
Kept yours, and cast his treasure to the flame.

FAME.

A poet sang, "All hail"; the world said, "Stay,
We crown you"; yet still feeble, more dim,
His worn-out life consumed itself, and they,
Finding but ashes, scarcely buried him!

Things Seen.

Sympathy.

THE public tea-room was light, warm, and hospitable. A little, middle-aged man closed his umbrella, hurried in, gave his order, deposited a leather bag and the umbrella beside him, spread an evening paper upon the marble table, and gazed around. Two ladies were seated nearly opposite. Mother and daughter? Aunt and niece? Who shall say?

Suddenly the little man sneezed; not the sneeze that admits of due preparation, but the sudden sneeze which scatters you like the bursting of a shell. Something happened: the little man put his hand quickly to his mouth, adjusted his spectacles, looked upon the floor, upon the seat beside him, underneath it, groped in likely corners with the point of his umbrella, unbuttoned his coat, searched his pockets, and wore a look of painful anxiety.

The girl's face rippled all over with a smile, and her colour rose as she made strenuous efforts to preserve her gravity.

Her older companion looked at her, glared round the room, never noticed the anxious search of the little man, but failing to observe any objectionable person whom she could wither at a glance, rose ponderously, gathered up her belongings, and swept towards the pay desk. The girl passed her pocket-handkerchief across her lips and followed. Half way to the door she paused, turned, and walked quickly back to the little man. There was not a shadow of mirth upon her face, but just the expression one might look for in the thrower of a rope to an exhausted swimmer.

"You will find them in your umbrella," she whispered.

The Mourners.

THE sunlight of a mild afternoon had lured me out into the country. My destination was the cottage of a friend in a near village. I had not seen her for several months, this private, unadvertised Mrs. Poyser of my own. In talk as humorous as George Eliot's creation, to my mind she seemed always more sympathetic and lovable in character.

The door was opened by the eldest girl, tall and handsome as we grow them in Gloucestershire. She wore a black dress, and her face told me I had come too late. The illness had been sudden, and that very morning the grave had closed over my friend. But the girl, Molly, pressed me to take the cup of tea her mother would have offered.

In the cheerless parlour sat a "genteel" cousin from the South, rustling in black silk, and at once hinting, by the assumed elegance of her manners and speech, the slenderness of the tie which bound her to "poor dear Lizzie" who was gone. When Molly brought in the tea, after the homely fashion endeared by memory, I did my best to accept the unchangeable change, and lent a polite ear to the "genteel" cousin.

Then the door opened, and the husband came in. Just a word of greeting, and he sank loosely in a chair by the empty grate. "I had mer breakfast at Gran'ma's," he droned out, "and mer dinner here; and I've had mer tea at Gran'ma's, and I wonder where I'll get mer souper."

The cousin rustled more loudly, to drown (as I thought) the shameless rustic accent, and then, with caustic importance, bade Molly "provide the lady with a napkin." The girl's eyes met mine, and, reading them, she took her cousin's rebuke without resentment and silently obeyed.

The old man sat silent in his chair, and my own words at last failed. But that rustling cousin could have chattered elegantly with Lord Death himself.

Technique and the Artist.

TECHNIQUE and the artist: that is a question, of interest to the student of every art, which was brought home to me with unusual emphasis the other afternoon, as I sat in the Queen's Hall, and listened to Ysaye and Busoni. Are we always quite certain what we mean when we speak of an artist? Have we quite realised in our own minds the extent to which technique must go to the making of an artist, and the point at which something else must be super-added? That is a matter which I often doubt, and the old doubt came back to my mind the other afternoon, as I listened to Ysaye and Busoni, and next day, as I turned over the newspapers.

I read, in the first paper I happen to take up, that the violinist and the pianist are "a perfectly matched pair"; the applause, at the concert, was even more enthusiastic for Busoni than for Ysaye. I hear both spoken of as artists, as great artists; and yet, if words have any meaning, it seems to me that only one of the two is an artist at all, and the other, with all his ability, only an executant. Admit, for a moment, that the technique of the two is equal, though it is not quite possible to admit even that, in the strictest sense. So far, we have made only a beginning. Without technique, perfect of its kind, no one is worth consideration in any art. The rope-dancer or the acrobat must be perfect in technique before he appears on the stage at all; in his case, a lapse from perfection brings its own penalty, death perhaps; his art begins when his technique is already perfect. Artists who deal in materials less fragile than human life should have no less undeviating a sense of responsibility to themselves and to art. But the performance comes afterwards, and it is the performance with which we are concerned. Of two acrobats, each equally skilful, one will be individual and an artist, the other will remain consummately skilful and uninteresting; the one having begun where the other leaves off. Now Busoni can do, on the pianoforte, whatever he can conceive; the question is, what can he conceive? As he sat at the piano playing Chopin, I thought of Busoni, of the Bechstein piano, of what fingers can do, of many other extraneous things, never of Chopin. I saw the pianist with the Christ-like head, the carefully negligent elegance of his appearance, and I heard wonderful sounds coming out of the Bechstein piano; but, try as hard as I liked, I could not feel the contact of soul and instrument, I could not feel that a human being was expressing himself in sound. A task was magnificently accomplished, but a new beauty had not come into the world. Then the Kreutzer Sonata began, and I looked at Ysaye, as he stood, an almost shapeless mass of flesh, holding the violin between his fat fingers, and looking vaguely into the air. He put the violin to his shoulder. The face had been like a mass of clay, waiting the sculptor's thumb. As the music came, an invisible touch seemed to pass over it; the heavy mouth and chin remained firm, pressed down on the violin; but the eyelids and the eyebrows began to move, as if the eyes saw the sound, and were drawing it in luxuriously, with a kind of sleepy ecstasy, as one draws in perfume out of a flower. Then, in that instant, a beauty which had never been in the world came into the world; a new thing was created, lived, died, having revealed itself to all those who were capable of receiving it. That thing was neither Beethoven nor Ysaye, it was made out of their meeting; it was music, not abstract, but embodied in sound; and just that miracle could never occur again, though others like it might be repeated for ever. When the sound stopped, the face returned to its blind and deaf waiting; the interval, like all the rest of life probably, not counting in the existence of that particular soul, which came and went with the music.

And Ysaye seems to me the type of the artist, not because he is faultless in technique, but because he begins to create his art at the point where faultless technique leaves off. With him, every faculty is in harmony; he has not even too much of any good thing. There are times when Busoni astonishes one; Ysaye never astonishes one, it seems natural that he should do everything that he does, just as he does it. Art, as Aristotle has said finally, should always have "a continual slight novelty"; it should never astonish, for we are astonished only by some excess or default, never by a thing being what it ought to be. It is a fashion of the moment to prize extravagance and to be timid of perfection. That is why we give the name of artist to those who can startle us most. We have come to value technique for the violence which it gives into the hands of those who possess it, in their assault upon our nerves. We have come to look upon technique as an end in itself, rather than as a means to an end. We have but one word of praise, and we use that one word lavishly. An Ysaye and a Busoni are the same to us, and it is to our credit if we are even aware that Ysaye is the equal of Busoni.

ARTHUR SYMONS.

A Cheerful Sisyphus.

THE dreams of librarians are of an Arabian scope and glitter. Thus Mr. Cotgreave, the well-known and thrice efficient librarian of the West Ham public libraries, is dreaming of a State-aided Subject Index, keeping pace with all that is written, and running to many volumes a year. Of this more anon. By way of foretaste of such a work, he gives us A Contents-Subject Index to General and Periodical Literature (Stock). It is concerned with incidental contents of books and periodicals, not with such contents as are declared in the title of the book. For example, under Dr. Johnson you are referred to many articles on him, to Mr. Birrell's essay in Obiter Dicta, and to Macaulay's essay, but you are not referred to Mr. Leslie Stephen's monograph in the "English Men of Letters" series, because that book is professedly and wholly about Johnson. We all know that any subject in which we are interested has been treated a score of times in odd corners, in books of essays, in periodicals, in reviews; and it is sometimes very desirable to discover these articles, especially those of recent date. Mr. Cotgreave comes to our rescue. With great patience and no little discrimination he has shown us where to put our finger on much fugitive or concealed matter. Every entry is a piece of special information, and as there are many thousand entries in this book, we consider that Mr. Cotgreave has done a great service to literary workers and students.

At the same time, it is necessary to define, as well as declare, the usefulness of a book like this. It is one man's effort to dig a prairie, to bail a sea out of its bed, or to count the leaves in Epping Forest. Mr. Cotgreave knows this; and we are not sure that he comforts us when he says that his chief aim is "to cover as many subjects as possible, and give a few references to each one." That is rather like summoning multitude on multitude to share two loaves and five small fishes—an excellent idea if the miracle keeps pace. But it does not; and, accepting Mr. Cotgreave's confessed limitations, we are in some doubt as to the success of his work. Useful it certainly is to the man who wants to get up China, or Torpedoes, or Ruskin, or the United States, or the Navy, and a hundred other big subjects. But suppose he has, for the first time, been tickled by the name and fame of Joubert. Alas, Joubert is not here; and the light of Matthew Arnold's essay is withheld from the searcher. Take François Villon. Everyone wants to look up Villon at some time in his life, and such a one ought assuredly to be referred to Robert Louis Stevenson's essay; but Mr. Cotgreave refers him only to the section on Villon in Sir Walter Besant's Early French Poetry—a good reference, but not enough. William Cobbett is another man that is always lighting curiosity in men's minds. Mr. Cotgreave gives several references to him, but we think that Hazlitt's contemporary portrait of him in The Spirit of the Age should not have been omitted. Samuel Richardson, again, is unilluminated by any mention of Mr. Leslie Stephen's essay in his Hours in a Library—perhaps the best reference that could have been made. Similarly, the London-lover who wants information about Lincoln's-Inn-Fields is referred to Thorubury's Haunted London, and to a paper in the Antiquary. But a mention of six or seven scholarly articles by Mr. Edward Ward in Notes and Queries, a few years back, would have been worth both of these references. Under St. Martin's-lane Mr. Austin Dobson's capital essay is forgotten. We do not make these remarks captiously. Nothing can alter the fact that this book is a mine of useful references. But, of course, you must take your chance. Mr. Cotgreave has tried to make his book—729 closely printed pages—go round; and, in any case, the book is based on West Ham material and West Ham requirements. In short, the West Ham equation is to be allowed for, as well as those obvious conditions which we have named, and which make us think of Mr. Cotgreave, down there in West Ham, as the cheerful Sisypheus of the Library Act.

Mr. Cotgreave's larger scheme affrights us. He wishes the Government to undertake the work of indexing all current literature—all. Authors are to furnish synopses of their books before publication, and the contents of magazines and periodicals are to be brought into this Gargantuan register. Mr. Cotgreave confesses that many volumes of index would be needed for one year's literary work. We believe him; and we see those volumes multiplying with time, and under the cataloguers' loyalty to the Catalogue, until it becomes an organised chimera. Say twenty volumes for the first year. In ten years there would be two hundred. Think of the fatuity of this back-breaking tabulation of uninspired writing, multiple statement, infinite re-hash of made subjects, articles to order, and all the combinations and permutations of over-worked words and vulgar ideas. Who is to consult an index of hundreds of volumes, in yearly sets, each crammed to its end-papers with an alphabetical array of good and bad, new and derivative, valuable and cheap? It puts us in mind of those drear tracts,

Where Alph, the sacred river, ran Through caverns measureless to man
Down to a sunless sea.

No, no, Mr. Cotgreave. The Index of which you dream would be an inert and tiresome ogre. Let us hear no more of him; or turn him into a fairy tale of modern literature. Put him into a fairy tale, Mr. Cotgreave; so may it not be said to an excellent librarian, "The zeal of thy house hath eaten thee up."

Correspondence.

Ada Negri.

SIR,—Ada Negri, known to fame as the poetess of Italian democracy, was a poor little village schoolmistress when her first volume of verse was published by Fratelli Treves of Milan in 1894. It ran through six editions in less than a year. Dedicated to her mother, who had slaved in a factory at starvation wages to earn bread for her child, this extraordinary production of a young girl's muse breathes the spirit of red-hot revolution. In it all the pent-up bitterness, the tragedy of a sunless childhood, breaks forth in lines of piercing pathos. No pretty sentiment is here. Ada Negri sings not of roses and nightingales and moonlit gardens, but of the wrongs of humanity, gnawing hunger, grinding poverty, carking care. Her poems stir the blood to revolt against oppression and incite to riot and arsen. They have the call to arms, the true ring of the Marseillaise in them. Then this slight, pale girl, with dark hair and beautiful eyes, was the Jeanne d'Arc of the modern Italian canaille, the prophetess of scenes of violence and bloodshed and martial law, which really came to pass not many years ago in the fair streets of Milan. But now her voice is silent. The fierce clarion note of the maiden democrat and revolutionary is heard no more. Since the publication of her second book, Fatalita, which was as successful and more musical than her first, nothing has come from her pen. And why? Because Ada Negri is married, and not only that, she has married a wealthy capitalist, one of the denounced class, hatred of whose injustice and tyranny was the chief inspiration of her remarkable poetry. Perhaps when she writes again she will give the history of her apostasy.

The poems of Ada Negri have been translated into German, and in Germany and Austria have enjoyed a greater vogue than in Italy. It is unnecessary to say that one of her distinguished compatriots, Gabriele D'Annunzio, regards them with abhorrence.—I am, &c.,

BEATRICE MARSHALL.

SIR,—If "H. T. T.," who writes to you from Bedford, will refer to the Athenaeum of April 11, 1896, he will find the following paragraph at page 479:

"Signorina Ada Negri, whose volume of poems was reviewed by us last week, was married on the 28th of last month at Milan to a manufacturer of Biella."

As the originator of this report of the marriage of the poetess, I may now briefly add that she was formerly one of many national schoolmistresses who live on the scanty pay of her class, and that her poetry consequently is steeped in the actual knowledge of penury derived from personal suffering. The verses given are unquestionably translated from the Italian into English.—I am, &c.,

WILLIAM MERCER.

[We have also received a long letter on Ada Negri from Miss May Tomlinson, for which we hope to find room next week.]

Sins of the Mighty.

SIR,—Famous romancers who display a fine disregard of syntax or recall to life a character whom they have already killed make good stock subjects for the literary gossipier. We have all made our little discoveries in this line, but the doubt may reasonably be expressed whether the present generation of writers has not materially depressed the standard of carefulness in particulars. I speak, it should be unnecessary to say, of the eminent and educated, not of the diligent multitude whose business is merely the manufacture of marketable goods.

It was said by them of old time that you should verify your quotations. The rule is a counsel of perfection still. Coventry Patmore's biographer mutilates the most familiar stanza in "In Memoriam," Mr. Zangwill misquotes "Lycidas," Mrs. Humphry Ward—herself an Arnold—stumbles over two lines in "Obermann Once More." Such things are not excusable, though the reader may pardon Mrs. Ward for giving Lucy Foster black hair while making Eleanor lay her hand caressingly on the "brown head," or for writing a sentence like this:

Will, I grant you that particular group may have pure hands, and isn't plundering their country's vitals like the rest.

I have mentioned Mr. Zangwill. His case is really quite serious. An aristocratic daily, which prides itself on the excellence of its literary page, said of The Mantle of Elijah that it was written with "that conscientious attention to detail which Mr. Zangwill never allows to flag." In the interests of criticism the point is worth a little examination.

The first part of Mr. Zangwill's exceedingly clever novel is mid-Victorian. Allegra, the heroine, is called a child of the Great Exhibition. All kinds of incidental references forbid us to place Book I. later than the early 'sixties. I suggest to Mr. Zangwill that a man of the 'sixties would not address his friend as "My dear chap." A Cabinet Minister of the period could not possibly make use of such an insufferable vulgarism as "Guessed it in once"; nor could a slangy duchess say: "You look hipped, my dear." I wonder why Mr. Zangwill makes his duchess drop her final g's. She is the daughter of a hundred earls, and therefore not illiterate, for all her bad manners. It was only in the 'nineties that the dropped g became a fashionable affectation. These examples might be multiplied indefinitely.

Between the first and second parts of the story, apparently, some fifteen years elapse. If Mr. Zangwill were less concerned with particulars, Allegra might be allowed to discuss Nietzsche with her lover, and to put express stamps on her letters; but I protest that her creator's indiscriminate allusions to motor-cars, kodaks, "the smart set," "the latter-day Tolstoi," and so forth, would have no meaning for Allegra while she is still not much past thirty. And I submit that a novelist distinguished for conscientious attention to detail ought not to write "Would I like to fight?" ought not to mis-spell the name of Izaak Walton, and ought to be incapable of penning the description of Allegra's first party.—I am, &c.,

S. K. RATCLIFFE.

Mr. Augustine Birrell on Coventry Patmore.

SIR,—Mr. Birrell's article on which you comment appeared in the Pilot, not in the Speaker. In the short extract which you quote occur the following phrases: "Had had lain upon him"; "equanimity of his mind." The former recalls Byron's notorious solecism; for the latter, "tautology" seems too feeble a term. "Superior" though he is, Mr. Birrell can scarcely claim to be supra grammaticam. This censor fails to find in Patmore's writings or recorded sayings any example of "illuminated wisdom," while he dwells on his "ill-natured comments." May I recommend to his notice the following passage from the ode, "Let Be" (printed in facsimile of MS. in Patmore's biography), which, besides its special applicability, seems to me to show not merely wisdom, but magnanimity; "magnanimity of mind," I suppose Mr. Birrell would call it:

And grace will sometimes lurk where who could guess!
The censor of his kind,
Dealing to each his share
With easy humour, hard to bear,
May not impossibly have in him shrined,
As in a gossamer globe or padded pod,
Some small seed dear to God.

—I am &c.,

CENSOR CENSORIS.

"The Poloniad"

SIR,—In your article, "The Poloniad," you speak of Colton as if he were a comparatively, if not absolutely, unknown writer. Yet, surely, Colton's Lacon—a work that reminds me much of Selden's Table Talk—is celebrated enough. Mr. Morley, if you will remember, descants at length on Colton and his writings in a most interesting essay on Aphoristic Lore.—I am, &c.,

ARCH. GIBBS.

Roger Bacon's "Opus Majus."

SIR,—In reply to the letter of Mr. J. Calder Ross, I shall be glad if you will allow me to state that the supplementary volume (which, be it said in passing, contains more than corrections of the text) may be had gratis on application to Messrs. Williams & Norgate by purchasers of the first two volumes, many of whom have already been so supplied.—I am, &c.,

J. H. BRIDGES.

Mr. Davidson's Plays.

SIR,—Will you allow me to assure "Bookworm," whose mournful note on my unacted plays seems to call for consolation, that "Godfrida" and "Self's the Man" will both be performed, if not now, then later. It is only, as always in matters of opinion, a question of the fulness of time.

With regard to any other unacted plays, four of them, as I have said in the introduction to "Godfrida," have no claim upon the stage. The fifth, my pantomime, "Scaramouch in Noxos," should be tried, I think, as part of a programme. I am afraid, however, it is not likely to be acted until I can stage it myself. When I have a theatre of my own I shall produce it at Christmas time, with a new order of harlequinade to follow, as a holiday matinée entertainment.—I am, &c.,

JOHN DAVIDSON.

Our Weekly Competition.

Result of No. 62 (New Series).

LAST week we offered a prize of One Guinea for the best Literary Riddle. We award it to Mr. F. B. Doveton, Karsfield, Torquay, for the following:

How would you describe in two words the theory that Bacon wrote Shakespeare's plays?—All gammon!

Other riddles are as follows:

What two famous deceased authors may be said to have rivalled the Mint?—Charles Reade and Bulwer Lytton; for the former produced Gold and the latter Money night after night, while the former also coined Very Hard Cash. [A. G., Cheltenham.]

My first is the name of an English king, whose valour is known through the world;

My second consists of a word often used by "Froggy," all scented and curled;

My third is slang for a girl; but if you should like it not, You have only to add my fourth to get the name of a certain pot; Pronounce my fifth with your tongue, you will find it the end of all pain,

The end of all reason and men, and the end of Ex-President Steyn! Then add the whole together and, almost before you know it, You will get the patronymic of a very modern poet.

—Richard-Le Gal-li-enne

[H. A. M., London.]

Why might Browning's Sordello take the prize?—Because it is a literary riddle.

[C. S., Brighton.]

What's the difference between the dramatic critics of the Free-lance and the World when they discuss melodrama?—One is Clement Scott, the other's an inclement Scott.

[W. P., Chelsea]

What internal evidence is there in Conan Doyle's Story of Waterloo to prove he is a medical man?—The allusions to "Gregory (s) powder."

[M. P. F., Birmingham.]

Riddles also received from: A. A., Southport; A. S. W., London; E. L. A. G., London; E. M. H., London; Mrs. T., Bexhill; B. P., Blackheath; R. St. J. C., Shrewsbury; E. L. C., Redhill; R. F. McC., Whitby; W. C., Edinburgh; J. W. H., Longport; C. A. C., Bagshot; M. H., London; J. S. M., Addiscombe; S. C., Brighton; E. L., Didstury; K. E. T., Bristol; M. A. W., London; and E. P., London.

Competition No. 63 (New Series).

IN our "Literary Week" columns will be found a paragraph on ingenious rhymes. We offer a prize of One Guinea for the best verses on "Rhyme," which shall themselves contain rhymes of an ingenious character. Not to exceed sixteen lines.

RULES.

Answers, addressed "Literary Competition, THE ACADEMY, 43, Chancery-lane, W.C.," must reach us not later than the first post of Wednesday, December 5. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found on the second page of Wrapper, or it cannot enter into competition. Competitors sending more than one attempt at solution must accompany each attempt with a separate coupon; otherwise the first only will be considered.

SOCIETY FOR PROMOTING CHRISTIAN KNOWLEDGE.

THE BIBLE ATLAS of MAPS and PLANS to ILLUSTRATE the GEOGRAPHY and TOPOGRAPHY of the OLD and NEW TESTAMENTS and the APOCRYPHA. With Explanatory Notes by the late Rev. SAMUEL CLARK, M.A.; also a Complete Index of the Geographical Names in the English Bible, by Sir GEORGE GROVE. Sixth Edition. Revised by Sir CHARLES WILSON, K.C.B., K.C.M.G., F.R.S. Royal 4to, cloth boards, 10s. 6d.

[This work has been almost entirely Rewritten by Sir Charles Wilson, and brought up by this competent authority to date.]

EARLY CHURCH CLASSICS—ST. AUGUSTINE'S TREATISE on the CITY OF GOD. By the Rev. F. R. MONTGOMERY HITCHCOCK, M.A., B.D. Small post 8vo, cloth boards, 1s. 6d.

EARLY CHURCH CLASSICS—THE LITURGY of the EIGHTH BOOK of "THE APOSTOLIC CONSTITUTIONS," commonly called the Clementine Liturgy. Translated into English, with Introduction and Notes, by the Rev. R. H. CRESSWELL, M.A. Small post 8vo, cloth boards, 1s. 6d.

TWENTY-FIVE AGRAPHA; or, Extra Canonical Sayings of our Lord. Annotated by the Rev. Prebendary BLOMFIELD JACKSON, M.A. Crown 8vo, cloth boards, 1s.

REFLECTED LIGHTS from CHRISTINA ROSETTI'S "THE FACE of the DEEP." Selected and Arranged by W. M. L. JAY. Small post 8vo, cloth boards, 2s. 6d.

LEADING IDEAS of KEBLE'S "CHRISTIAN YEAR." By the Rev. CLEMENT PRICE. Imperial 32mo, cloth boards, 6d.

THE PRE-CHRISTMAS ANTIPHONS. Beautifully printed in Gold and Colours. Paper cover, 6d.
[Will serve as an instructive Christmas Card.]

NON-CHRISTIAN RELIGIOUS SYSTEMS: Studies of Non-Christian Religions. By ELIOT HOWARD. Fcap. 8vo, cloth boards, 2s. 6d.

* Nine other Volumes have already appeared in this Series.

TOWARDS the LAND of the RISING SUN; or, Four Years in Burma. By SISTER KATHERINE. With 4 Illustrations. Crown 8vo, cloth boards, 2s.

FIFTY YEARS in WESTERN AFRICA. Being a Record of the Work of the West Indian Church on the Banks of the Rio Pongo. By the Rev. A. H. BARROW, M.A. With Map. Crown 8vo, cloth boards, 2s.

THE CHURCH of CYPRUS. By the Rev. H. T. F. DUCKWORTH. Small post 8vo, cloth boards, 1s.

HELPS TOWARDS BELIEF in the CHRISTIAN FAITH. By the Rev. C. G. GRIFFITHOPE, M.A. With a Preface by the Most Rev. the Lord Archbishop of ARMAGH. Crown 8vo, cloth boards, 3s.

A REVIEW of "CHRISTIAN SCIENCE." By MARGARET BENSON. Small post 8vo, paper cover, 2d.

THE PRAYER-BOOK PSALTER for CHURCH and SCHOOL. With Renderings of Difficult Passages from the Revised Version, and Short Explanations. By the Rev. ARTHUR CARR, M.A. Crown 8vo, cloth boards, 7s.

A FIRST BOOK on the BIBLE. By the late Rev. Canon GARNIER. Small post 8vo, cloth boards, 2s.

THE PRIVATE DEVOTIONS of LANCELOT ANDREWES, Bishop of Winchester. Newly Done into English from the Recently Discovered Autograph given by Andrewes to Laud. By the Rev. Canon P. G. MEDD, M.A. Small post 8vo, cloth boards, 4s.

MEDIÆVAL CHURCH HISTORY: a Sketch of By the Ven. S. CHEETHAM, D.D., Archdeacon of Rochester. Fcap. 8vo, cloth boards, 1s. 6d.

HISTORICAL CHURCH ATLAS. Illustrating the History of Eastern and Western Christendom until the Reformation, and that of the Anglican Communion until the Present Day. By EDMUND MCCLURE, M.A. Containing 18 Coloured Maps, besides some 50 Sketch Maps in the Text. 4to, cloth boards, leather back, 16s.

"Both the readers of ancient Church history and of modern missionary records will find abundant materials in it for their assistance."—Guardian.

"A great deal of labour and sound scholarship has gone to the making of this atlas."—Academy.

THE ROMANCE of SCIENCE: Sounding the Ocean of Air. Being Six Lectures delivered before the Lowell Institute of Boston in December, 1898, by A. LAWRENCE ROTCH, S.B., A.M. Small post 8vo, with numerous Illustrations, cloth boards, 2s. 6d.

THE ROMANCE of SCIENCE: The Machinery of the Universe. Mechanical Conceptions of Physical Phenomena. By A. B. DOLBEAR, A.B., A.M., M.E., Ph.D., Professor of Physics, Tufts College, U.S.A. Small post 8vo, with several Diagrams, cloth boards, 2s.

MATTER, ETHER, and MOTION: the Factors and Relations of Physical Science. By A. E. DOLBEAR, Ph.D., Professor of Physics, Tufts College, U.S.A. English Edition, Edited by Prof. ALFRED LODGE. Illustrated. Crown 8vo, cloth boards, 5s.

"Every page shows that the author is alive to the far-reaching consequences and implications of modern science. Prof. Dolbear's pages are eminently readable, and his presentation of the philosophy of modern physics is lucid, interesting, exhaustive, and for the most part convincing."—Literature.

AMONG the BIRDS. By Florence Anna Fulcher. Crown 8vo, cloth boards, 3s. 6d.

BUDDHISM in CHINA. By the late Rev. S. Beal. With Map. Fcap. 8vo, cloth boards, 2s. 6d.

CONFUCIANISM and TAOISM. By Prof. Robert K. DOUGLAS. With Map. Fcap. 8vo, cloth boards, 2s. 6d.

CHINA. By Prof. Robert K. Douglas. Post 8vo, with Map and numerous Illustrations, cloth boards, 5s.

THE HISTORY of INDIA, from the EARLIEST TIMES to the PRESENT DAY. By Capt. L. J. TROTTER. Revised Edition, brought up to date. With Map and numerous Illustrations. Demy 8vo, cloth boards, 6s.

THREE MARTYRS of the NINETEENTH CENTURY. Studies from the Lives of Gordon, Livingstone, and Patteson. By Mrs. RUNDLE CHARLES. Crown 8vo, cloth boards, 3s. 6d.

MARTYRS and SAINTS of the FIRST TWELVE CENTURIES. Studies from the Lives of the Black-letter Saints of the English Calendar. By Mrs. RUNDLE CHARLES. Crown 8vo, cloth boards, 5s.

THE BIBLE in the LIGHT of TO-DAY. By the Rev. CHARLES CROSLIGH, D.D. Demy 8vo, cloth boards, 6s.

CHURCH SERVICES and SERVICE BOOKS BEFORE the REFORMATION. By the Rev. HENRY BARCLAY SWETE, D.D., Litt.D. With Facsimiles of MSS. Crown 8vo, buckram boards, 4s.

THE PASSING of the EMPIRES. 850 B.C. to 330 B.C. By Prof. MASPERO. Edited by the Rev. Prof. SAYCE. Translated by M. L. MCCLURE. With Maps, 3 Coloured Plates, and numerous Illustrations. Demy 4to (approximately), cloth, bevelled boards, 25s.; half-morocco (bound by Riviere), 50s.

"Scholars, as well as unlearned seekers after unbiased facts, owe M. Maspero and Mrs. McClure a deep debt of gratitude."—St. James's Gazette.

"An interesting book, and one which will give the reader a good general view of a most eventful period in the history of the world."—Nature.

"For some time it must form the standard work upon the subject."—Pall Mall Gazette.

"The work is beautifully produced, and the hundreds of illustrations are in the highest style."—Daily Chronicle.

ARUNDEL SOCIETY'S PUBLICATIONS.

The Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge have on Sale the Publications of the Arundel Society. The stock includes a large selection of superb Reproductions in Colours and Monochrome of Masterpieces by GIOTTO.

MASACCIO.
FRA ANGELICO.
BOTTICELLI.

GHIRLANDAIO.
PERUGINO.
MICHAEL ANGELO.
RAFFAELLE.

VAN EYCK.
MEMLINC.
DURER.

And numerous other great Artists.

Hitherto these Reproductions have, on account of their price, been beyond the reach of persons of moderate means; many are now offered at much reduced prices. The stock is quickly approaching exhaustion, and these pictures, when out of print, are sure to increase in value.

With but few exceptions, these pictures deal with religious subjects.

A Catalogue may be had on application.

LONDON: NORTHUMBERLAND AVENUE, W.C.; 43, QUEEN VICTORIA STREET, E.C.
BRIGHTON: 129, NORTH STREET.

CHATTO & WINDUS'S NEW BOOKS.

NEW SIX-SHILLING NOVELS.

THE INIMITABLE MRS. MASSINGHAM :

A Romance of Botany Bay. By HERBERT COMPTON.
"A capital novel. It is very long since we read so delightful a story."
Daily Graphic.

"AS a WATCH in the NIGHT": a Drama of Waking and Dream. By Mrs. CAMPBELL PRAED.

"It is powerful, interesting, and well-proportioned."—Daily News.

AS LUCK WOULD HAVE IT. By William

WESTALL, Author of "With the Red Eagle," &c.
"An ingenious story, very well worked out, and told in an agreeable style."
Athenæum.

PHILIP WINWOOD. By R. Neilson

STEPHENS. With 6 Illustrations by E. W. Hamilton.
"A bright and spirited story. The plot is ingenious, and maintains its interest unflagging to the end."—Bookman.

THE FOURTH GENERATION. By Walter

BESANT, Author of "The Orange Girl." SECOND EDITION.
"Arrests the attention, and holds it from first to last."—Daily News.

THE MAN that CORRUPTED HADLEY-

BURG, &c. By MARK TWAIN. SECOND EDITION.
"Shows Mark Twain at his very best."—Black and White.

THE BAG of DIAMONDS, and THREE

BITS of PASTE. By GEORGE MANVILLE-FENN.
"All highly sensational, and all excellently told."—Scotsman.

IN a CATHEDRAL CITY. By Bertha

THOMAS. SECOND EDITION.
"A pretty story. There is some very charming work in Miss Thomas's volume."—Athenæum.

NEW THREE-AND-SIXPENNY BOOKS.

THE SMALL-PART LADY, &c. By George

R. SIMS (DAGONER).
"It requires no slight skill to write a really short story, and Mr. Sims possesses it in an eminent degree."—Pall Mall Gazette.

THE ADVENTURES of TYLER TATLOCK,

PRIVATE DETECTIVE. By DICK DONOVAN.
"The volume is good from end to end—full of fresh, well-written, and enterprising matter."—Scotsman.

THE WATERS of EDERA. By Ouida,

Author of "Under Two Flags," &c.

THE "PRETTY POLLY": a Voyage of Incident. By W. CLARK RUSSELL. With 12 Illustrations. Small 8vo, cloth gilt, 5s.

"As thoroughly enjoyable as any sea-loving lad can wish for."
Glasgow Herald.

THE CLOISTER and the HEARTH By

CHARLES READE. A LARGE TYPE, FINE-PAPER EDITION.
Pott 8vo, cloth, 2s. net; polished leather, 3s. net.

HANDLEY CROSS; or, Mr. Jorrocks's

Hunt. By ROBERT SURTEES. With 79 Illustrations by JOHN LEECH. Post 8vo, cloth, 2s.

LONDON MEMORIES: Social, Historical, and Topographical. By C. W. HECKETHORN, Author of "London Souvenirs," &c. Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 6s.

"Will both satisfy and stimulate the general reader's interest."—Academy.

A HISTORY of OUR OWN TIMES. from 1880 to the Diamond Jubilee. By JUSTIN MCCARTHY. A NEW EDITION. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

A CATALOGUE of FICTION, with Descriptive Notices and Reviews of over 900 Novels, will be sent free by Messrs. CHATTO & WINDUS upon application.

THE STRANGE EXPERIENCES of MR.

VERSCHOYLE. Told by Himself, and Edited by T. W. SPEIGHT.
"This Story forms the GENTLEMAN'S ANNUAL. Demy 8vo, 1s."

THE GENTLEMAN'S MAGAZINE.

ONE SHILLING MONTHLY.

Contents for DECEMBER:—"WITHOUT are DOGS." By Mary Bradford-Whiting.—DIALECTS. By Ralph H. Bratherton.—A BRACE of WORTHIES. By S. M. Crawley-Boevey.—WEST-PYRENEAN FUNERALS. By A. R. Whiteway.—A SPRIG of ROSEMARY. By Penley Reid.—THE CREEDS of TZARLAND. By Ernest W. Lowry.—SNUFF and SNUFF-TAKERS. By Emily Hill.—UNDER the WESTERN PINES. By Harold Bindloss.—WEATHER "CAUSERIE." By William Allingham.—THE DYING CENTURY. By E. M. Rutherford.—THE CIRCUS in IMPERIAL ROME. By Sylvanus Urban.

London: CHATTO & WINDUS, 111, St. Martin's Lane W.C.

BLACKIE & SON'S NEW BOOKS.

By G. A. HENTY.

With Buller in Natal: or, a Born Leader. With 10

Page Illustrations by W. Rainey, R.I., and a Map. 6s.
"One of the most powerful of Mr. G. A. Henty's annual instalments of boys' books."—Pall Mall Gazette.

In the Irish Brigade: A Tale of War in Flanders and Spain. With 12 Illustrations by Charles M. Sheldon, and 2 Maps. 6s.

"A noble tale. The chapters concerning the war in Spain are particularly full and interesting."—World.

Out with Garibaldi: A Story of the Liberation of Italy. With 8 Page Illustrations by W. Rainey, R.I., and 2 Maps. 5s.

"The practised author tells his story well."—Athenæum.
"A breathless story."—Bookman.

By KATHARINE TYNAN.

Three Fair Maids: or, The Burkes of Derrymore.

With 12 Page Illustrations by G. Demain Hammond, R.I. 6s.
"A lively and varied narrative."—World.

By ROSA MULHOLLAND (LADY GILBERT).

Cynthia's Bonnet Shop. With 8 Page Illustrations

by G. Demain Hammond, R.I. 5s.
"This very charming story."—Punch.

By CAPTAIN F. S. BRERETON.

With Rifle and Bayonet: A Story of the Boer

War. With 8 Illustrations by Wal Paget. 5s.
"The story is full of incident, and is capitally told."—Westminster Gazette.

By CAPTAIN F. S. BRERETON.

In the King's Service: A Tale of Cromwell's Invasion of Ireland. With 8 Page Illustrations by Stanley L. Wood. 5s.

"An excellent story. Moves along with unflagging interest."
Daily Telegraph.

By ALICE STRONACH.

A Newnham Friendship. With 6 Page Illustrations

by Harold Copping. 3s. 6d.
"A sympathetic tale of student life."—Bookman.

By GORDON STABLES.

In Far Bolivia: A Story of a Strange Wild Land.

With 6 Illustrations by J. Finnemore, R.I. 3s. 6d.
"A stirring narrative."—Pall Mall Gazette.

By LÉON GOLSCHMANN.

Boy Crusoes: A Story of the Siberian Forest. Adapted from the Russian. With 6 Page Illustrations by J. Finnemore, R.I. 3s. 6d.

"Its freshness and sustained interest mark it out as above the average."
Daily Telegraph.

By MEREDITH FLETCHER.

Every Inch a Briton: A School Story. With 6

Illustrations by Sydney Cowell. 3s. 6d.
"May be recommended as a capital school story."—Athenæum.

By HARRY B. NEILSON.

Droll Doings. Illustrated by Harry B. Neilson, with

Humorous Verses by the COCKIOLLY BIRD. 23 Full-Page and 18 Vignettes in full colour. Royal 4to, picture boards, cloth back. 6s.
"Mr. Harry B. Neilson's comic animals are irresistibly funny, and the verses are full of verve."—Literature.

By JUDGE PARRY and Illustrated by WALTER CRANE.

The Story of Don Quixote. Retold by His Honour Judge PARRY. Illustrated by Walter Crane, with 11 Coloured Full-page Plates, 19 Half-page Plates, a Title-page, and Cover. Royal 8vo, cloth. 6s.

"An exquisite book is Judge Parry's version of 'Don Quixote.' Mr. Walter Crane's illustrations are most delightful."—Echo.

"* Also an Edition of 100 Copies, printed on Japanese Vellum and suitably bound, price 25s. net. Each Copy of this Edition is signed by the Author and numbered."

NEW CHILDREN'S PICTURE BOOKS.

Our Darling's First Book. Bright Pictures and

Easy Lessons for Little Folk. 4to, 10½ in. by 7½ in., picture boards, 1s.; cloth, gilt edges, 2s.

"Contains some really clever sketches."—Athenæum.
"Excellent pictures, graduated lessons—a good example of a modern educational book."—Outlook.

Story-Book Time. With 38 Colour Pages, over 40

Full-page Black-and-White Illustrations, and a large number of Vignettes. Picture boards, 2s. 6d.; cloth, gilt edges, 3s. 6d.

"Everything, whether serious or funny, is wholesome, and the illustrations are uncommonly good."—Spectator.

Complete Illustrated Catalogue Post Free on Application.

London: BLACKIE & SON, Limited, 50, Old Bailey.

GEORGE NEWNES, Ltd.

NEW BOOKS.

- GARDENS OLD AND NEW: the Country House and its Garden Environment. Illustrated. £2 2s. net.
- THE SHAKESPEARE COUNTRY ILLUSTRATED. By John LEYLAND. Illustrated by over 130 Photographs, showing every feature of interest in connection with the Shakespeare Country and the surrounding Districts, so noted for their wonderful beauty of scenery. 4to, cloth, gilt leaves, 10s. 6d. net.
- DADDY'S GIRL. By L. T. Meade, Author of "Daddy's Boy." With Illustrations by Gordon Browne. Crown 8vo, cloth extra, 3s. 6d.
- IN NATURE'S WORKSHOP. By Grant Allen. With Illustrations by Frederick Enock. Crown 8vo, cloth extra, 3s. 6d.
- EASY FRENCH DISHES FOR ENGLISH COOKS. By Mrs. PRAGA. Crown 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d.
- THE STORY OF THOUGHT AND FEELING. By F. Ryland. Cloth, 1s.
- CELEBRITIES OF THE ARMY. Containing 72 magnificent Coloured Photos of some of the most distinguished Generals of the British Army. Imperial 4to, 118 pages, 15s. net.
- THE CENTURY BOOK OF GARDENING. Edited by E. T. COOK. A comprehensive work for every lover of the Garden. With about 720 Illustrations. Specially designed cover. Large 8vo, gilt leaves, 21s. net.
- GOLDEN DEEDS OF THE WAR. By A. T. Story. With many Portraits of Heroes. Crown 8vo, cloth extra, 6s.
- KHAKI IN SOUTH AFRICA: an Album of Pictures and Photographs illustrating the Chief Events of the War under Lord Roberts. 5s.
- CHINA OF TO-DAY: the Yellow Peril. An Album of Pictures and Photographs illustrating the Principal Places, Incidents, and Persons connected with the Crisis in China. 6s.
- A PEEP INTO "PUNCH." By J. Holt Schooling. With about 450 Pictures from "Punch." Crown 8vo, 5s. net.
- WHAT SHALL I BE? A Guide to Occupations for Men and Women, in which Incomes can be made ranging from £100 to £1,000 a year. By E. H. COUMBE, B.A. (Lond.). Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d. net.
- ENGLISH CATHEDRALS ILLUSTRATED. By Francis BOND, M.A., F.R.S., Hon. A.R.I.B.A. With 180 Illustrations from Photographs. Second Edition. Crown 8vo, cloth extra, 6s.
- THE CAPTAIN: a Magazine for Boys and "Old Boys." Vol. III. Containing 675 pages, with 611 Illustrations. Crown 4to, cloth, gilt edges, 6s.
- THE STRAND MAGAZINE. Vol. XX. Containing 808 pages, with over 1,000 Illustrations. Royal 8vo, cloth, gilt edges, 6s. 6d.
- THE WIDE WORLD MAGAZINE. Vol. V. Containing 668 pages, with 958 Illustrations. Crown 4to, cloth, gilt edges, 6s. 6d.
- THE SUNDAY STRAND. Vols. I. and II. Containing the whole of IAN MACLAREN'S "NEW LIFE OF CHRIST." Royal 8vo, cloth, gilt edges, 6s. 6d. each volume. 720 pp., with over 700 Illustrations.
- THE NAVY AND ARMY ILLUSTRATED. Vol. X. Containing 648 pages and 1,851 Pictures. Cloth, gilt edges, 18s.
- THE TRAVELLER, for Whom the World is a Playground. Vol. I. Containing 624 pages, with 824 Pictures. Cloth, gilt edges, 10s. 6d. net.
- COUNTRY LIFE ILLUSTRATED. Vol. VII. Containing 898 pages, with 1,151 Illustrations, beautifully printed on Art paper, and bound in cloth, gilt edges, 21s.; or in half-morocco, 25s.
- THE KING OF ILLUSTRATED PAPERS. Vol. I. Containing 832 pages, with over 3,000 Pictures. Cloth, gilt edges, 18s.
- CELEBRITIES OF THE STAGE. Containing 48 beautiful Coloured Portraits of some of the most famous Actors and Actresses. Handsomely bound in cloth, gilt edges, 10s. 6d. net.
- ASSOCIATION FOOTBALL. By N. L. Jackson. With 20 Illustrations. Second Edition. 6s.
- THE TRANSVAAL WAR ALBUM: the British Forces in South Africa. 272 pages, beautifully illustrated with 133 Pictures. 12s. 6d. net.
- THE SIEGE OF LADYSMITH. A handsome Souvenir, containing 120 Photographs taken by a Resident Photographer during the Siege. With Explanatory Text by H. St. J. TUGMAN, an eye-witness. Handsomely bound in morocco, gilt leaves, oblong 4to, 21s. net.
- THE INTERNATIONAL GEOGRAPHY. By 70 Authors. Edited by Dr. MILL. With 118 Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 15s.

7-12, SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, LONDON, W.C.

HURST & BLACKETT'S CHRISTMAS LIST.

Now Ready, in 1 vol., crown 4to. Fully Illustrated by Drawings by A. D. McCormick (from Sketches made by E. S. Crogan), Original Drawings by E. S. Crogan, Photographs and Photogravure Portraits of the Authors, Maps, &c. Price One Guinea net.

FROM the CAPE to CAIRO, the First

Traverse of Africa from South to North. By EWART S. CROGAN and ARTHUR H. SHARP. With Introductory Letter from the Right Hon. Cecil Rhodes.

THE BOOK OF THE MOMENT.

In 1 vol., crown 8vo, with Map, price 6s.

THE RENASCENCE of SOUTH

AFRICA. By ARCHIBALD R. COLQUHOUN, Author of "China in Transformation," formerly Administrator of Mashonaland, South Africa.

NEW AND INTERESTING BOOK OF TRAVEL.

In 1 vol., demy 8vo, with 90 Illustrations, after Drawings and Photographs by the Author, price 12s. net.

AMONG the WOMEN of the SAHARA.

By Madame JEAN POMEROLL. Translated by Mrs. ARTHUR BELL (N. D'Anvers), Author of the "Elementary History of Art," &c.

A SPLENDID BOOK ON SPORT IN INDIA.

New Ready, in 1 vol., demy 8vo, with 59 Illustrations and 3 Maps, 16s. net.

WILD SPORTS of BURMA and ASSAM. By Colonel POLLOCK (late Staff Corps), and W. S. THOM (Assistant Superintendent of Police, Burma).

CHARMING CHRISTMAS BOOKS.

MARY'S MENAGERIE. Written and Illustrated by ARTHUR LAYARD. In 1 vol., oblong 4to, price 2s. 6d.

GOLDEN HAIR and CURLY HEAD. A Poem by ALLEN UPWARDS. With Illustrations by Harold Copping. In 1 vol., crown 4to, with Frontispiece in Photogravure, price 2s. 6d.

THE WONDER WORKERS. A Dream of Holy Flowers. By A. O'D. BARTHOLEYS, Author of "The Legend of the Christmas Rose." Illustrated by 11 Full-page Pictures in Colour and Half-Tone, drawn especially for this Work by Delapoeer Downing. In 1 vol., crown 4to, price 6s.

THE PINK HEN. A Fairy Tale for Children.

By CUTHBERT SPURLING. With 11 Illustrations by Duncan Tate. In 1 vol., crown 8vo, with Cover in Colours, gilt edges, price 3s. 6d.

THE LEGEND of the CHRISTMAS ROSE

By A. O'D. BARTHOLEYS. Illustrated by Delapoeer Downing. In 1 vol., 4to, with special Cover Lithographed in 9 Colours, price 2s. 6d.

EDNA LYALL'S NOVELS.

In special binding, extra superfine cloth, gilt edges. Complete in Case, price 30s. net, containing—

DONOVAN. A HARDY NORSE-
WE TWO. MAN.

IN the GOLDEN WON by WAITING.
DAYS. TO RIGHT the KNIGHT ERRANT. WRONG.

These novels can also be obtained in green cloth binding, price 3s. 6d. each volume.

BEATRICE WHITBY'S NOVELS.

Each in 1 vol., crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

THE AWAKENING of MARY FENWICK.	MARY FENWICK'S DAUGHTER.
PART of the PRO- PERTY.	IN the SUNTIME of HER YOUTH.
A MATTER of SKILL and other Stories.	ONE REASON WHY. SUNSET.

NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION.

In 1 vol., crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. each.

DR. GEORGE MACDONALD'S NOVELS.

DAVID ELGINBROD. SIR GIBBIE.

ROBERT FALCONER. ALEC FORBES.

SALTED WITH FIRE.

HURST & BLACKETT, LTD., 13, Great Marlborough Street.

ILLUSTRATED STANDARD AND POPULAR WORKS ON NATURAL HISTORY.

CONCHOLOGIA ICONICA; or, Figures and Descriptions of the Shells of Mollusks, with Remarks on their Affinities, Synonymy, and Geographical Distribution. By LOVELL REEVE, F.L.S., and G. B. SOWERBY, F.L.S. Complete in 20 vols. 4to, with 2,727 Coloured Plates, half-calf, £178 net.

A detailed List of Monographs and Volumes may be had.

ELEMENTS of CONCHOLOGY: an Introduction to the Natural History of Shells, and of the Animals which form them. By LOVELL REEVE, F.L.S. 2 vols., 62 Coloured Plates, £2 16s. net.

FOREIGN FINCHES in CAPTIVITY. By Arthur G. BUTLER, Ph.D., F.L.S., F.Z.S., F.E.S. With 60 Plates, beautifully Coloured by Hand. Royal 4to, cloth, £4 14s. 6d. net; half-morocco, £5 5s. net.

TERACOLUS: a Monograph of the Genus. By E. M. BOWDLER SHARPE. Parts I. to VIII., 4to, each with 4 Coloured Plates, 7s. 6d. net.

Part LXXVI., with 4 Coloured Plates, 5s. net.

THE LEPIDOPTERA of the BRITISH ISLANDS. By CHARLES G. BARRETT, F.E.S. Vols. I. to VI., each 12s.; Large Edition, Vol. I., with 40 Coloured Plates, 53s.; Vols. II. to VI., each with 48 Coloured Plates, 63s. net.

THE LARVÆ of the BRITISH LEPIDOPTERA, and their FOOD PLANTS. By OWEN S. WILSON. With Life-sized Figures Drawn and Coloured from Nature by Eleanora Wilson. 40 Coloured Plates, 63s. net.

THE BUTTERFLIES of EUROPE. Described and Figured by H. C. LANG, M.D., F.L.S. With 82 Coloured Plates, containing upwards of 900 Figures. 2 vols., £3 18s. net.

Part XLVIII., with 8 Coloured Plates, 15s. net, and Vol. IV., £9 5s. net.

LEPIDOPTERA INDICA. By F. Moore, F.Z.S., F.E.S. Vols. I. and IV., each with 94 Coloured Plates; Vols. II. and III., each with 96 Coloured Plates, £9 5s. cloth; £9 15s. half-morocco.

THE LEPIDOPTERA of CEYLON. By F. Moore, F.Z.S. 3 vols., medium 4to, 215 Coloured Plates, cloth, gilt tops, £21 12s. net. Published under the auspices of the Government of Ceylon.

The HYMENOPTERA ACULEATA of the BRITISH ISLANDS. By EDWARD SAUNDERS, F.L.S. Complete, with 3 Plates, 16s.; Large-Paper Edition, with 51 Coloured Plates, 68s. net.

The HEMIPTERA HETEROPTERA of the BRITISH ISLANDS. By EDWARD SAUNDERS, F.L.S. Complete, with a Structural Plate, 14s. Large Edition, with 31 Coloured Plates, 48s. net.

The HEMIPTERA HOMOPTERA of the BRITISH ISLANDS. By JAMES EDWARDS, F.E.S. Complete, with 2 Structural Plates, 12s. Large Edition, with 23 Coloured Plates, 43s. net.

THE COLEOPTERA of the BRITISH ISLANDS. By the Rev. Canon FOWLER, M.A., F.L.S. Complete in 5 vols., with 2 Structural Plates, 44. Large Edition, with 180 Coloured Plates, £14 net.

BRITISH INSECTS. By E. F. Staveley. 16 Coloured Plates and Woodcuts. 12s. net.

BRITISH BUTTERFLIES and MOTHS. By H. T. STAINTON. 16 Coloured Plates and Woodcuts. 9s. net.

BRITISH BEETLES. By E. C. Rye. New Edition. Revised by the Rev. Canon FOWLER, M.A., F.L.S. 16 Coloured Plates and Woodcuts. 9s. net.

BRITISH BEES. By W. E. Shuckard. 16 Coloured Plates and Woodcuts. 9s. net.

BRITISH SPIDERS. By E. F. Staveley. 16 Coloured Plates and Woodcuts. 9s. net.

BRITISH ZOOPLYTES. By A. S. Pennington, F.L.S. 24 Plates. 9s. net.

CURTIS'S BRITISH ENTOMOLOGY. Illustrations and Descriptions of the Genera of Insects found in Great Britain and Ireland. 8 vols., royal 8vo, 770 Coloured Plates, £21 net.

THE PHYSIOLOGY of the INVERTEBRATA. By A. B. GRIFFITHS, Ph.D., F.R.S. (Edin.), F.C.S. Demy 8vo, with 81 Illustrations, 15s. net.

RESPIRATORY PROTEIDS: Researches in Biological Chemistry. By A. B. GRIFFITHS, Ph.D., F.R.S.E. 6s. net.

METEORS, AEROLITES, and FALLING STARS. By Dr. T. L. PHIPSON, F.C.S. Crown 8vo, 25 Woodcuts and Lithographic Frontispiece, 6s. net.

Parts I. to XIV., each 7s. 6d. Coloured, 5s. Uncoloured, net.

THE HEPATICÆ of the BRITISH ISLES. By W. H. PEARSON. Issued to Subscribers for the Complete Work only, in 28 Monthly Parts, each with 8 Plates, 7s. 6d. Coloured, 5s. Uncoloured, net. Prospectus on application.

FLORA of TROPICAL AFRICA. By D. Oliver, F.R.S. Vols. I. to III., 20s. each net. The Continuation Edited by Sir W. T. THISELTON-DYER, F.R.S. Vol. VII., 27s. 6d. net. Vol. V., 25s. 6d. net. Published under the authority of the First Commissioner of Her Majesty's Works.

FLORA CAPENSIS: a Systematic Description of the Plants of the Cape Colony, Caffraria, and Port Natal. Vols. I. to III., by W. H. HARVEY and O. W. SONDER, 18s. each net. The Continuation Edited by Sir W. T. THISELTON-DYER, F.R.S. Vol. VI., 24s. net. Vol. VII., 33s. net. Published under the authority of the Governments of the Cape and Natal.

FLORA of BRITISH INDIA. By Sir J. D. Hooker, C.B., G.C.S.I., F.R.S., &c., assisted by various Botanists. 7 vols., £12 net. Sections I. to III., containing Parts I. to IX., royal 4to, each with 12 Plates, 15s. Plain, 21s. Coloured, net.

THE POTAMOGETONS (Pond Weeds) of the BRITISH ISLES. By ALFRED FRYER, A.L.S. Illustrated by Robert Morgan, F.L.S.

HANDBOOK of the BRITISH FLORA. By G. BENTHAM, F.R.S. Seventh Edition. Revised by Sir J. D. HOOKER, C.B., K.C.S.I., F.R.S. 9s. net.

ILLUSTRATIONS of the BRITISH FLORA. Drawn by W. H. FITCH, F.L.S., and W. G. SMITH, F.L.S. 1,315 Wood Engravings. Fourth Edition. 9s. net.

BRITISH GRASSES. By M. Plue. 16 Coloured Plates and Woodcuts. 9s. net.

BRITISH FERNS. By M. Plue. 16 Coloured Plates and Woodcuts. 9s. net.

BRITISH SEAWEEDS. By S. O. Gray. 16 Coloured Plates. 9s. net.

SYNOPSIS of BRITISH MOSSES. By C. P. Hobkirk, F.L.S. Revised Edition. 6s. 6d. net.

HANDBOOK of BRITISH MOSSES. By the Rev. M. J. BERKELEY, M.A., F.L.S. Second Edition. 24 Coloured Plates, 21s. net.

BRITISH FUNGOLOGY. By the Rev. M. J. BERKELEY, M.A., F.L.S. With a Supplement of nearly 400 pages by WORTHINGTON G. SMITH, F.L.S. 2 vols., 24 Coloured Plates, 36s. net. Supplement only, 12s.

BRITISH FUNGI, PHYCOMYCETES, and USTILAGINEÆ. By GEORGE MASSEE. 8 Plates. 6s. 6d. net.

BRITISH WILD FLOWERS, familiarly described in the Four Seasons. By THOMAS MOORE, F.L.S. 24 Coloured Plates, 14s. net.

THE NARCISSUS: its History and Culture. By F. W. BURBIDGE, F.L.S. With a Scientific Review of the entire Genus by J. G. BAKER, F.R.S., F.L.S. With 49 beautifully Coloured Plates, 30s. net.

THE BRITISH FERNS. Coloured Figures and Descriptions of the Ferns of Great Britain and Ireland. By Sir W. J. HOOKER, F.R.S. 66 Coloured Plates, 36s. net.

GARDEN FERNS. Coloured Figures and Descriptions. A Selection of Exotic Ferns adapted for Cultivation in the Garden, Hothouse, and Conservatory. By Sir W. J. HOOKER, F.R.S. 64 Coloured Plates, 36s. net.

PHYCOLOGIA BRITANNICA; or, History of British Seaweeds. By Dr. W. H. HARVEY, F.R.S. New Edition. Royal 8vo, 4 vols., 360 Coloured Plates, £7 10s. net.

PHYCOLOGIA AUSTRALICA: a History of Australian Seaweeds. By Dr. W. H. HARVEY, F.R.S. Royal 8vo, 5 vols., 300 Coloured Plates, £7 13s. net.

The RHODODENDRONS of SIKKIM-HIMALAYA: being an Account, Botanical and Geographical, of the Rhododendrons recently discovered in the Mountains of Eastern Himalaya by Sir J. D. HOOKER, F.R.S. By Sir W. J. HOOKER, F.R.S. Folio, 20 Coloured Plates, £4 14s. 6d. net.

Vol. LVI. (1900), 42s. net.

THE BOTANICAL MAGAZINE: Figures and Descriptions of New and Rare Plants. By Sir J. D. HOOKER, F.R.S., &c. Third Series. Vols. I. to LV., each 42s. net. Published Monthly, with 6 Plates, 3s. 6d. Coloured. Annual Subscription, 42s. A complete Set from the commencement, 126 vols., £126.

LOVELL REEVE & CO., LIMITED, Publishers to the Home, Colonial and Indian Governments,
6, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, W.C.

SWAN SONNENSCHN & CO.

BOOKS FOR PRESENTS.

A FASCINATING BOOK ON THE FAIR SEX.

WOMEN OF the RENAISSANCE. By DE MAULDE LA CLAVIERE. 8vo, 521 pp. and Index, 10s. 6d. [Second Edition ready.

"A most intricate and masterly analysis of the great feminine Revolution or Renaissance of the 16th century. There are chapters which we find ourselves wishing that everybody might read—the admirable essay, for instance, on 'The Embroidery of Life,' and that other discussing the influence of Platonism on conversation. It is a book to be much pressed on every young woman who thinks she 'knows life,' but perhaps to be kept back from the one who modestly confesses that she would rather not know it."—Spectator.

"Quite the most interesting book of the moment."—Leeds Mercury.

"Not only an exhaustive study of the life, occupations, aims, and character of woman, but also a fascinating portrait of the 'eternal feminine,' written with an extraordinary sympathy."—Telegraph.

"Its lively pages teem with references to the customs, feminine ideals, and the famous women of that time."—World.

"Its fascination baffles analysis. It presents one of the happiest conjunctions of artist and scholar. Many-sided and penetrative, it is equally notable for its exquisite lightness of touch and brilliancy of execution."—St. James's Gazette.

"Illustrated with an unceasing flow of anecdote and citation. The book will attract a wide circle of readers."—Athenaeum.

AN ABSORBING COURT BIOGRAPHY.

AUGUSTA, EMPRESS OF GERMANY. By CLARA TSCHUDI. With Coloured Portrait. 7s. 6d. "We see a cultured sensitive princess thrown amongst uncongenial surroundings, where she is misunderstood and slighted and unloved, her husband irrevocably estranged from her, absorbed in his passion for military greatness, and dominated by his masterful Chancellor. A valuable contribution to history."—Telegraph.

"Will be read with great interest. The references to the present Emperor will be read with much interest."—Daily News.

TWO UNIFORM VOLUMES.

(1) THE ANTARTIC: its Geography, Exploration, Structure, Climate, Flora, Fauna. By Dr. FRICKER. Large Map. Plates, and Bibliography. 8vo, 7s. 6d. "Most seasonable."—World.

"A good, honest piece of work."—Daily Chronicle.

"An exhaustive account."—Academy.

"A fascinating history."—St. James's Gazette.

"As good an account as we could wish to have."—Pall Mall Gazette.

(2) MADAGASCAR, MAURITIUS, and the other EAST AFRICAN ISLANDS. By Dr. C. KELLER. 3 Coloured Maps and 64 Illustrations. Large 8vo, 7s. 6d. [This day.

SPECIALLY SUITABLE FOR ANGLO-INDIANS.

(1) A FORGOTTEN EMPIRE. By R. SEWELL. 18 Plates and 3 Coloured Maps. Royal 8vo, 15s. "Authentic history has no more impressive illustration of Prospero's famous speech than the story of the sudden rise, amazing grandeur, and complete disappearance of the Hindu Kingdom of Vijayanagar.... Mr. Sewell's contribution to the history of India is of unquestionable value. An admirable history."—Scotsman.

(2) FORT ST. GEORGE, MADRAS. By Mrs. FRANK PENNY. With Pen-and-Ink Sketches. 8vo, 10s. 6d. "A useful and readable book."—Athenaeum.

"Cannot fail to find many readers. The account of the early days of the East India Co. is deeply interesting."—Westminster Review.

"Traces the history with admirable lucidity."—Spectator.

"Must rank as the standard book."—Madras Mail.

ARCHITECTS of ENGLISH LITERATURE: Biographical Sketches of Great Writers, from Shakespeare to Tennyson. By R. FARQUHARSON SHARP, of the British Museum. With a Series of Autograph MSS. from the British Museum. 5s. net. [This day.

BOOKS FOR BOYS AND GIRLS.

GIRLS' CHRISTIAN NAMES: their History, Meaning, and Association. By HELENA SWAN. Printed throughout in red and black. Thick small 8vo, fancy cloth, 2s. 6d. net.

"A very interesting little volume, containing a great amount of informal tuition, collected with no small pains and research. The etymology of the name, its variants and derivatives, sometimes not a little remote, its use, historical, associations, &c., make up an interesting account under each name."—Spectator.

"Miss Swan has done her work very prettily."—Academy.

TWO CHILDREN'S BOOKS BY WELL-KNOWN NOVELISTS.

(1) THE ADVENTURES of TOD, WITH and WITHOUT BETTY. By G. ARDELLA, Author of "A King's Daughter," "For the Life of Others," &c. Illustrated by Photographs from Life. 2s. 6d.

"An excellent child's book. . . a sort of rambling history of Tod and Betty for a year or two."—Journal of Education.

"There is an ample provision of pictures, cleverly produced from photographs of children."—Athenaeum.

"Simply and most winningly written."—Glasgow Herald.

(2) A POOR BUFFER. By HELEN SAVILE, Author of "Love the Player." With Illustrations by Nancy Ruxton. 3s. 6d.

"A very natural and a very touching narrative, well told and exceedingly interesting."—Glasgow Herald.

"A pretty story about a lovable and larkly little Irish girl."—Scotsman.

HOW to MAKE and HOW to MEND. By AN AMATEUR MECHANIC. 292 pages, 277 Illustrations. 2s. 6d. net.

[Second Edition next week.

Full directions for making and mending articles, implements, &c., of the household, playroom, workshop, garden, poultry yard, kennel, country, field, river, cycles, electricity, photography, glass-work, leather-work, varnishes, glues, cements, paints, stains, dyes, cleaning, joints, knots, fireworks, and hundreds of other subjects.

AN ADMIRABLE INTRODUCTION TO PHYSIOGRAPHY.

THE ROMANCE of the EARTH. By Prof. A. W. BICKERTON. With 56 fine Illustrations. 2s. 6d. [This day.

Chap. I. The Earth's Motions. II. Beginning of the Earth. III. Making of the Earth's Crust. IV. Earth-Sculpturing. V. Ice Ages. VI. Land and Sea. VII. Origin of Life. VIII. Plants and Animals. IX. Life of the Body. X. The Eye and the Ear. XI. Evolution. XII. Order of Strata. XIII. The Dawn of the Present. XIV. Embryology. XV. Organic Ascent. XVI. Procession of Animal life.

SWAN SONNENSCHN & CO., Ltd., London.

CHAMBERS'S ENCYCLOPÆDIA.

If you propose purchasing an Encyclopædia, the undernoted facts regarding Chambers's Encyclopædia will interest you.

CHAMBERS'S ENCYCLOPÆDIA

The present edition, although dated 1895, has been reprinted and revised since that date, and is, in fact, thoroughly abreast of the times in Science, Literature, Biography, Travel, &c., &c.

CHAMBERS'S ENCYCLOPÆDIA

Is the only important work of this character to which the foregoing statement can be applied. For proof of the up-to-date character of the work, call upon your bookseller and consult such articles as SOUDAN, ACETYLENE, ARGON, BISMARCK, JAMESON, KITCHENER, &c., &c.

CHAMBERS'S ENCYCLOPÆDIA

The Ten Volumes are published at £5 in cloth, and £7 10s. half-morocco, but booksellers give the usual discount off above prices. Your bookseller or the Publishers will supply you with a prospectus giving full particulars of CHAMBERS'S ENCYCLOPÆDIA.

CHAMBERS'S

NEW CHRISTMAS BOOKS FOR BOYS AND GIRLS.

BEAUTIFULLY ILLUSTRATED AND ARTISTICALLY BOUND.

Price 6s. Gilt Edges.

SEVEN MAIDS. By L. T. Meade.

"A sweetly-written and graceful story of girl life."—Scotsman.

Price 5s.

MISS NONENTITY. By L. T. Meade.

Punch says:—"My Baroness informs me that she has not the slightest hesitation in advising everybody young enough to enjoy the story to make the acquaintance of 'Miss Nonentity,' by L. T. Meade. She will be found a very delightful person, who proves herself to be a 'Miss Somebody,' and of considerable importance too."

CHARGE! or Briton and Boer.

By G. MANVILLE FENN.

"Bids well to be the most popular boys' book of the year."—Scotsman.

VENTURE and VALOUR. Being Stories told by G. A. HENTY, A. CONAN DOYLE, G. M. FENN, W. W. JACOBS, TOM GALLON, GORDON STABLES, &c.

"Will be a favourite with boys of spirit."—Dundee Advertiser.

TOM'S BOY. By the Author of "Laddie,"

"TIP-CAT," &c.

"The publishers may expect 'Tom's Boy' to enjoy the same vogue as 'Tip-Cat.' Few comprehend better than this author the heart and understanding of a child."—Daily Telegraph.

Price 3s. 6d.

THE THREE WITCHES.

By MRS. MOLESWORTH.

To-day says:—"If you want a charming book for the children, get Mrs. Molesworth's 'Three Witches,' illustrated by that delightful humourist in 'line,' Lewis Baumer."

THE STORY of a SCHOOL CONSPIRACY.

By ANDREW HOME.

"Telling of a deep-laid plot and of hairbreadth escapes! All guaranteed to fill the heart of every schoolboy with keenest joy. 'Tolle lege, Tolle lege!' O Schoolboy! or irreparable will be thy loss."—The Baron de B.-W., in Punch.

Price 2s. 6d.

CELIA'S CONQUEST. By L. E. Tiddeman.

"A capital book for girls."—Scotsman.

W. & R. CHAMBERS, LIMITED, 47, Paternoster Row, London; and Edinburgh.

CHARLES GRIFFIN & CO.'S LIST.

A USEFUL BOOK IS A BETTER GIFT THAN A USELESS TRINKET.

FOR OUR YOUNG FRIENDS.

THE STORY OF THE BIBLE,

Sixth Edition. Cloth Elegant. 4s. 6d.

FROM GENESIS TO REVELATION.

Including the Historical Connection between the Old and New Testaments. Told in Simple Language.

By CHARLES FOSTER.

With Maps and over 250 Engravings.

"The work needs only to be known to make its way into families."—Scotsman.

OPEN-AIR STUDIES IN GEOLOGY.

An introduction to Geology Out of Doors. By Professor GRENVILLE A. J. COLE, M.R.I.A., F.G.S. With 12 Full-Page Plates after Photographs, and Illustrations, 8s. 6d.

OPEN-AIR STUDIES IN BOTANY.

Sketches of British Wild Flowers in their Homes. By R. LLOYD PRAEGER, B.A., M.R.I.A. Illustrated by Drawings from Nature, and Photographs. Cloth, 7s. 6d.; gilt, 8s. 6d.

THE THRESHOLD OF SCIENCE.

Simple and Amusing Experiments. By C. H. ALDER WRIGHT, D.Sc., F.R.S. Presentation Edition. Gilt edges, 7s. 6d.; also in handsome cloth, 6s. Second Edition.

Second Edition, Revised. Crown 8vo. With Illustrations. Price 16s.

With Bibliography, Appendices and Indices (Greek and English.)

FOR OUR LITERARY FRIENDS.

A MANUAL OF GREEK ANTIQUITIES.

BY PERCY GARDNER, M.A., Litt.D., AND F. B. JEVONS, M.A., Litt.D.,

Prof. of Class. Archaeology and Art in the University of Oxford.

Principal of Hatfield Hall in the University of Durham.

"A work which, although crammed full of information, is everywhere readable."—Athenaeum.

ROMAN ANTIQUITIES (A Manual of). By WILLIAM RAMSAY, M.A., late Professor of Humanity, University of Glasgow. Revised and Edited by RODOLFO LANCIANI, D.C.L., Oxon., LL.D. Sixteenth Edition. 10s. 6d.

A HISTORY OF ROMAN LITERATURE.

By the Rev. C. T. CRUTTWELL, M.A., Hon. Canon of Peterborough Cathedral. From the Earliest Period to the Times of the Antonines. Sixth Edition. 8s. 6d.

A HISTORY OF GREEK LITERATURE.

From the Earliest Period to the Death of Demosthenes. By FRANK B. JEVONS, M.A., D.Litt., Principal of Hatfield Hall, Durham. Third Edition. Cloth, 8s. 6d.

JUST OUT. Large 8vo. Handsome Cloth. With Numerous Plates, Diagrams, and Illustrations. 21s.

ROAD MAKING AND MAINTENANCE.

A PRACTICAL TREATISE FOR ENGINEERS, SURVEYORS, AND OTHERS.

With an Historical Sketch of Ancient and Modern Practice.

By THOMAS AITKEN, Assoc. M.Inst.C.E., Surveyor to the County Council of Fife, Cupar Division.

"Should be on the reference shelf of EVERY MUNICIPAL and COUNTY ENGINEER OR SURVEYOR throughout the United Kingdom, and of every Colonial Engineer."—The Surveyor.

THE PRINCIPLES AND CONSTRUCTION OF PUMPING MACHINERY (Steam and Water Pressure).

By HENRY DAVEY, M.Inst.C.E., M.Inst.Mech.E., F.G.S., &c. Just Out. In Large 8vo. Handsome Cloth. With Frontispiece, several Plates, and over 250 Illustrations. 21s.

A MANUAL OF CIVIL ENGINEERING.

Comprising Engineering Surveys, Earthwork, Roads, Railways, Canals, Harbours, &c. By Professor RANKINE. With Tables and Illustrations. Crown 8vo, Cloth, 16s. Twentieth Edition.

GAS, OIL AND AIR ENGINES. A PRACTICAL TEXT-BOOK ON INTERNAL COMBUSTION MOTORS WITHOUT BOILER.

By BRYAN DONKIN, M.Inst.C.E., M.Inst.Mech.E. Now Ready. Third Edition, Revised and Enlarged. Large 8vo. Handsome cloth. 25s.

NOW READY, Handsome Cloth, Beautifully Illustrated with 36 plates, comprising 167 Figures (many in colours). 18s.

FOR OUR MEDICAL FRIENDS.

ATLAS OF URINARY SEDIMENTS.

Edited and Annotated by SHERIDAN DELÉPINE, M.B., C.M. Edin.

Professor of Pathology in the Owens College and Victoria University, Manchester.

Translated from the German of Dr. HERMANN RIEDER, of the University of Munich, by F. C. MOORE, M.Sc., M.B. (Vict.). "Will be welcomed by student and teacher. Has gained immensely through Prof. Delépine's Editorship."

Glasgow Medical Journal.

CLINICAL DIAGNOSIS: the Bacteriological, Chemical, and Microscopical Evidence of Disease.

By Dr. RUDOLF V. JAKSCH, Professor of Special Pathology and Therapeutics, Prague. FOURTH ENGLISH EDITION. Edited, with Additions, by Prof. R. von JAKSCH. With many Illustrations (some in colour). 24s.

CLINICAL MEDICINE. For Practitioners and Students.

By JUDSON BURY, M.D., F.R.C.P., Physician to the Manchester Royal Infirmary. With chapters on Skin Diseases, Laryngoscopic Examination, and "Röntgen Rays" in Surgery. SECOND EDITION, with numerous Illustrations (several coloured). 21s.

MENTAL DISEASES: with Special References to the Pathological Aspects of Insanity.

By W. BEVAN LEWIS, L.R.C.P. Lond., M.R.C.S. Eng., Medical Superintendent and Director of the West Riding Asylum, Wakefield. Second Edition, with Illustrations and 26 Plates. 30s.

FOR OUR FRIENDS
ABROAD.

NEW VOLUME OF GRIFFIN'S "NEW LAND SERIES." Edited by Prof. GRENVILLE A. J. COLE, M.R.I.A., F.G.S.

With numerous Maps Specially Drawn and Executed for this Work. Just Out. Large crown 8vo, handsome cloth, 5s.

NEW LANDS:

THEIR RESOURCES AND PROSPECTIVE ADVANTAGES.

By HUGH ROBERT MILL, D.Sc., LL.D., F.R.S.E. Librarian to the Royal Geographical Society.

"We cannot recommend a more useful book for perusal than Dr. Mill's."—Financial News.

PROSPECTING for MINERALS. A Practical Handbook for Prospectors, Explorers, Settlers, &c. By S. HERBERT COX, Assoc. R.S.M., M.Inst.M.M., F.G.S. Crown 8vo. Fully Illustrated. Second Edition. Handsome cloth, 5s.; leather, 6s. 6d.

"This ADMIRABLE LITTLE WORK.....CLEAR and LUCID."—Mining Journal.

FOOD SUPPLY. By Robert Bruce, Agricultural Superintendent to the Royal Dublin Society.

With Appendix on PRESERVED FOODS by C. A. MITCHELL, B.A., F.I.C. With many Engravings from Photographs illustrating the chief Breeds of Cattle, Sheep, Pigs, Poultry, &c. 4s. 6d. "BRISTLES with information."—Farmers' Gazette.

FOR ALL
OUR FRIENDS.

THE MOST ACCEPTABLE OF GIFT BOOKS.

Each Series complete in itself, and sold separately. First Series, Thirty-fifth Edition. Second Series, Ninth Edition.

MANY THOUGHTS OF MANY MINDS.

A Treasury of Reference, consisting of Quotations and Selections from the most celebrated Authors. Compiled and analytically arranged by HENRY SOUTHGATE. In square 8vo, toned paper. Presentation Edition, cloth elegant, 12s. 6d. each vol.; Library Edition, Roxburghe, 14s. each vol.; ditto, morocco antique, 21s. each vol.

"A magnificent gift book, appropriate to all times and all seasons."—Freemasons' Magazine.

Full Catalogue post free on application.

London: CHARLES GRIFFIN & CO., Limited, Exeter Street, Strand.

THE GRESHAM PUBLISHING COMPANY'S NEW BOOKS.

130, Bath Street,
GLASGOW.

25, Farringdon
Avenue,
LONDON.

HISTORY of the LODGE of EDINBURGH. Mary's Chapel, No. 1. (Tercentenary Edition.) Embracing an Account of the Rise and Progress of Freemasonry in Scotland. By D. MURRAY LYON, Cor. M.S.A.S., Grand Secretary to the Lodge of Scotland. Profusely Illustrated. Crown 4to, 30s. net.

"Since 1873 quite a number of Histories of Old Scottish Lodges have appeared, which throw a flood of light on the Laws and Customs of the Craft during the Seventeenth and Eighteenth Centuries; each, however, almost exclusively dealing with purely local or provincial organisations. The Author, however, for the production of his great work, had before him the oldest Lodge Records in the world, dating from 1599, besides still earlier Regulations; and after a most exhaustive examination of the ancient minutes, he wrote his famous History, which, at one bound, placed him in the front rank of Masonic Authors, and has made his name known and respected wherever the Fraternity of Free and Accepted Masons flourishes, and its eventful past is studied as it deserves to be."—The Masonic Illustrated, Nov., 1900.

THE GARDENER'S ASSISTANT: a Practical and Scientific Exposition of the Art of Gardening in all its Branches. By ROBERT THOMPSON, of the Royal Horticultural Society's Gardens, Chiswick, &c. New Edition, revised and entirely remodelled under the direction and general editorship of WILLIAM WATSON, F.R.H.S., Assistant Curator, Royal Gardens, Kew, with contributions from Dr. M. T. MASTERS, F.R.S., EDWARD MAWLEY, F.M.S., G. MASSEE, F.L.S., F. W. BURBIDGE, M.A., F.L.S., J. FRASER, F.L.S., E. T. WILLIS, and many other eminent specialists. Illustrated by numerous engravings in the Text, and a series of Coloured Plates. In 6 divisional volumes, imperial 8vo, bound in cloth, price 8s. each, net.

In aim the book is comprehensive. Its purpose is to form a complete compendium of all the operations of the garden—flower-garden, fruit-garden, and vegetable-garden. It covers the whole subject, from the laying out of the ground to the packing of flowers, fruits, and vegetables for market.

THE BOOK of the HOME: a Practical Guide to General Household Management. Produced under the general editorship of H. C. DAVIDSON, assisted by over one hundred specialists. Copiously illustrated by Coloured Plates and Engravings in the Text. In 8 divisional volumes, super-royal 8vo, bound in cloth, coloured edges, price 5s. each net.

The "Book of the Home" is intended to form a complete work of reference on all subjects connected with household management. No efforts have been spared to ensure that every matter bearing upon the Home and Home Life shall receive full and sufficient treatment, and that the information given shall be reliable and, in the best sense of the phrase, up-to-date.

MESSRS. MACLEHOSE'S PUBLICATIONS

THIS DAY, crown 8vo, with 16 Illustrations, price 5s. net.
MEMORIES OF THE TENNYSONS.

By the Rev. H. D. RAWNSLEY,
Hon. Canon of Carlisle.

"The personal reminiscences which occupy the larger part of this little volume will be welcome to all admirers of the poet. The intimate friendship between the Tennyson and the Rawnsley families, extending over several generations, gives a peculiar interest to their impressions of the poet in 'the old Lincolnshire days' and long afterwards."—Daily News.
"All lovers of Tennyson may thank the author for some pleasant and interesting reading. ... It was well that occasional notes here given were made of Tennyson's invariably interesting conversation. Thus we have allusions to Homer, Burns, Wordsworth, Browning, Matthew Arnold, and other men, as well as various matters which unquestionably deserved preservation. ... The pleasure we have derived from much that he gives us will be lasting."—Daily Chronicle.

THIS DAY, crown 8vo, price 7s. 6d. net.

KANT'S COSMOGONY, as in his Essay on the "Retardation of the Rotation of the Earth," and his "Natural History and Theory of the Heavens." With Introduction, Appendices, and a Portrait of Thomas Wright, of Durham. Edited and Translated by W. HASTIE, D.D., Professor of Divinity, University of Glasgow.

"Prof. Hastie's introduction to the German masterpieces in the literature of natural philosophy is a superb accomplishment in scholarly and thoughtful exposition."—Scotsman.

THIS DAY, crown 8vo, price 6s. net.
SUPERSTITIONS of the HIGHLANDS and ISLANDS of SCOTLAND.

Collected entirely from Oral Sources.

By JOHN GREGORSON CAMPBELL,

Minister of Tirree, Joint Author of "Waifs and Strays of Celtic Tradition."

"The volume is in its way singularly interesting and forms a rich mine for the folklorist. Some of the stories may be met with under other versions, but most of them appear here for the first time, and are wonderfully varied. The light they throw upon the Highlanders' ways of thinking is remarkable."—Scottish Review.

THIRD THOUSAND. Post 8vo, 2 vols., with New Portrait, 12s. net.
THE FUNDAMENTAL IDEAS of CHRISTIANITY.
Being the Gifford Lectures on Natural Theology delivered to the University of Glasgow in Sessions 1892-3 and 1895-6.

By JOHN CAIRD, D.D., LL.D.,

Late Principal and Vice-Chancellor of the University of Glasgow.

With a Memoir by EDWARD CAIRD, D.C.L., LL.D., Master of Balliol.

JAMES MACLEHOSE & SONS, Glasgow.

Publishers to the University.

London and New York: MACMILLAN & CO., Limited.

J. B. Lippincott Company.

NOW READY.

2 vols., 8vo, pp. 1226. Price £1 10s. net.

HISTORY OF AMERICA BEFORE COLUMBUS,

According to Documents and Approved Authors.

By P. DE ROO.

VOL. I.—AMERICAN ABORIGINES.

VOL. II.—EUROPEAN IMMIGRANTS.

The most complete and authoritative work which has yet appeared on this fascinating subject. It is illustrated throughout by Maps, Plans, and Engravings.

8vo, cloth, pp. 392. Price 10s. 6d.

THE TRUE WILLIAM PENN.

By SYDNEY G. FISHER.

With 24 Full-page Illustrations.

What is now demanded in biography is the simple truth—and all of it. This book supplies it.

Post 8vo, cloth, pp. 235. Price 6s.

LITERARY RAMBLES
AT HOME AND ABROAD.

By THEODORE F. WOLFE, M.D.

ILLUSTRATED.

"His (Wolfe's) books are an anthology of literary visions and memories and associations which it is a delight to read, and a joy to cherish."—Boston Herald.

LONDON: 36, SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND.

DAVID NUTT, 57-59, Long Acre. LATEST PUBLICATIONS.

A COMPANION VOLUME TO MISS HURLL'S MADONNA IN ART.

HEROINES of the BIBLE in ART. By

CLARA ERSKINE CLEMENT. Crown 8vo, 331 pages. Printed on Hand-made Paper. With Photogravure Frontispiece and 27 Full-Page Reproductions from Masterpieces of all Schools. Cloth, gilt top, edges trimmed, net 3s. 6d.

THE WILD ANIMAL PLAY for CHILDREN.

By ERNEST SETON THOMPSON, Author of "Wild Animals I have Known," &c. With Music by D. G. MASON, and 19 Illustrations by the Author. Crown 8vo, cloth, 2s.

* * * Introduces the various characters of "Wild Animals I have Known," and the other works of the Author which have had such a marvellous success, and weaves them into a delightful little extravaganza which can be acted in any schoolroom or nursery.

THE LAWS and PRINCIPLES of VINT.

Stated and Explained, and its Practice Illustrated, by E. HOFFMANN and A. von RENNENKAMPFF. Edited by F. W. HADDAN. With numerous Diagrams. Square 16mo, cloth, 2s. 6d.

* * * VINT, the Russian National Card Game, is declared by good judges to be much superior to either Whist or Bridge.

"THE ONLY EFFECTUAL MEANS OF COMBATING HOOLIGANISM."

THE BOYS' CLUB in THEORY and PRACTICE.

A Manual of Suggestions for Workers. By B. PAUL NEUMAN. With Supplementary Chapters by A. F. JENKIN, President of the Amateur Gymnastic and Fencing Association; E. M. S. PILKINGTON, Manager of the St. Andrew's Boys' Club, Westminster; and T. E. GRAY, Instructor to the St. John's Gymnasium, Holloway. Crown 8vo, 130 pp., cloth, 2s. 6d.

CONTENTS:—Existing Organisations (Continuation Schools, Boys' Brigades, &c.); The Theory of the Boys' Club (Membership, Government, &c.); The Cost of the Boys' Club (Maintenance, Premises, &c.); How to Secure Workers; How to Start a Club.

A WOMAN TENDERFOOT. By Grace

GALLATIN SETON-THOMPSON. Square crown 8vo, 355 pp., 7 Full-Page Plates, and over 150 Marginal Illustrations by Ernest Seton-Thompson, G. Wright, E. M. Ashe, and S. N. Abbott. In art linen cover, specially designed by Author, top gilt, edges trimmed, net 6s.

* * * Of the above work, issued in the United States a month ago, a First Edition of 5,000 Copies has already been sold out. Mrs. Thompson has accompanied her husband, the Author of "Wild Animals I have Known," in his explorations of the wildest districts of North America.

LYRA HEROICA. A Book of Verse for Boys. Selected and Arranged by W. E. HENLEY. School Edition, with a New Appendix (80 pp.) of Notes and Elucidations by L. COPE CORNFORD and W. W. GREG. 12mo, cloth, 3s.

* * * The Notes and Elucidations may be had separately at 1s. by purchasers of previous issues of the School Edition.

POPULAR STUDIES IN MYTHOLOGY, ROMANCE, AND FOLK-LORE.

Each 6d. net (7d. post free).

No. 7.—MYTHOLOGY and FOLK-TALES;

their Relation and Interpretation. By E. SIDNEY HARTLAND.

No. 8.—CUCHULAINN, the IRISH

ACHILLES. By ALFRED NUTT.

No. 9.—THE RIG VEDA. By E. Vernon

ARNOLD, Professor of Latin in the University College of North Wales.

* * * A full List of the Series sent on application.

SCOTTISH HISTORY FROM CONTEMPORARY WRITERS. Vol. III.

THE RISING of 1745. With a Bibliography of Jacobite History, 1689-1788. By C. SANFORD TERRY, M.A., University Lecturer in History in the University of Aberdeen. 16mo, xiv. 322 pp. With Portrait of Prince Charles Edward, Facsimile of His Handwriting, Map of Scotland Showing the Clan Territories in 1745, and other Maps and Illustrations. Cloth, cut edges, 3s.; or in handsome cloth, gilt, edges trimmed, top gilt, with Marker, 4s.

CHRISTMAS GIFT BOOKS.

JUST PUBLISHED. Price 9s.

REMINISCENCES OF OXFORD.

By the Rev. W. TUCKWELL, M.A.

With 16 Full-Page Illustrations.

The Record says: "A more entertaining volume of its kind, or one dealing with a greater variety of personalities, has rarely been issued."

JUST PUBLISHED. Price 6s.

CAMPAIGN PICTURES OF THE WAR IN SOUTH AFRICA, 1899-1900.

Letters from the Front. By A. G. HALES.

"Will be read with avidity. . . . Pictures full of purple patches. . . . real pathos, simple, tear-compelling."—Daily News.

THIRD IMPRESSION NOW READY.

THE BOOK OF THE SEASON.

THE TALE OF A FIELD HOSPITAL.

By FREDERICK TREVES, F.R.C.S.

Price 6s., handsomely bound in leather. With 14 Illustrations.

The Athenæum says: "Mr. Treves, who has seen, easily surpasses Zola, who had only inquired, and as a picture of war this 'tale' may almost rank with 'The Red Badge of Courage.'"

JUST PUBLISHED. Price 3s. 6d.

CHINESE PICTURES.

Notes on Photographs Made in China.

By Mrs. BISHOP, F.R.G.S. (ISABELLA BIRD).

With 60 Illustrations from Photographs by the Author.

THE FINE ART GIFT-BOOK.

SONGS OF NEAR AND FAR AWAY.

By E. RICHARDSON.

With numerous Coloured and other Illustrations. Price 6s.

JUST PUBLISHED. Price 7s. 6d.

BRITAIN'S SEA-KINGS AND SEA-FIGHTS.

By POPULAR WRITERS.

Illustrated by Leading Artists.

QUEEN VICTORIA: A Personal Sketch.

By Mrs. OLIPHANT.

With 3 Rembrandt Photographures and other Illustrations. Price 3s. 6d.

JUST PUBLISHED. Price 5s.

OUR BIRD FRIENDS.

By R. KEARTON, F.Z.S.

With 100 Illustrations from Photographs by C. Kearton.

"Mr. Kearton's book, the very thing for a Christmas present, will send many a young reader out into the fields to watch and listen for himself. The book is most beautifully illustrated."—Daily News.

JUST PUBLISHED. Price 6s.

TOMMY AND GRIZEL.

By J. M. BARRIE.

"For spiritual beauty there is Grizel, as true and lovable a woman as novelist ever created. Grizel's saga is not to be read without tears."—Times.

TWO NEW VOLUMES FOR GIRLS.

A GIRL WITHOUT AMBITION.

By ISABEL SUART ROBSON.

With 8 Plates. 3s. 6d.

SISTERS THREE.

A Story for Girls.

By JESSIE MANSERGH (Mrs. G. DE HORNE VAIZEY).

With 8 Plates. 3s. 6d.

THREE NEW VOLUMES FOR YOUNG PEOPLE.

THE JUNGLE SCHOOL; or, Dr. Jibber-Jabber

Burchell Academy. By S. H. HAMER. With Four Coloured Plates and other Illustrations by Harry B. Neilson. 1s. 6d.

PETER PIPER'S PEEPSHOW; or, all the Fun of the Fair. By S. H. HAMER. With Four Coloured Plates and other Illustrations by Harry B. Neilson and Lewis Baumer. 1s. 6d.

ANIMAL LAND for LITTLE PEOPLE. By S. H.

HAMER. Illustrated from Photographs and Original Drawing, and containing Four Coloured Plates. 1s. 6d.

CASELL & COMPANY, LTD., Ludgate Hill, London.

Books Suitable for Christmas Presents, FROM MR. MURRAY'S LIST.

THE WORKS OF LORD BYRON.

A New Text, Collated with the Original MSS. and Revised Proofs, which are still in existence, with many hitherto unpublished Additions. This will be the most complete Edition of Lord Byron's Works, as no other Editors have had access to the original MSS. With Portraits and Illustrations. To be completed in 12 vols. Crown 8vo, 6s. each.

POETRY. Edited by Ernest Hartley
COLERIDGE. Vol. I. The Early Poems.—Vol. II. Child Harold.—
Vol. III. The Giaour, Bride of Abydos, Corsair, &c. [Ready.
Vol. IV. Prisoner of Chillon, Manfred, Beppo, Mazeppa, Vision of Judgment, Marino Faliero, &c., &c. [In the press.

LETTERS. Edited by Rowland E.
PROTHERO. Vol. I. 1788 to 1811.—Vol. II. 1811 to 1814.—Vol. III.
1814 to 1816.—Vol. IV. 1816 to 1820. [Ready.
Vol. V. 1820 to 1822. [In progress.

POPULAR EDITION.

POETICAL WORKS.

Royal 8vo, 7s. 6d.

POCKET EDITION.

POETICAL WORKS.

8 vols., in a case, 21s.

THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF ABDUR RAHMAN, AMIR OF AFGHANISTAN.

Edited by MIR MUNSHI SULTAN MOHAMMAD KHAN, Secretary of State of Afghanistan. With Portrait, Maps, and Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 2 vols., 32s.

LORD MONBODDO, and some of his Contemporaries. By Professor KNIGHT, of St. Andrews, Author of "A Life of Wordsworth," "The Philosophy of the Beautiful," &c. With Portraits. Demy 8vo, 10s.

Lord Monboddo was a distinguished Scottish Judge, and a prominent if not the central member of a brilliant literary circle in Britain during the eighteenth century.

LIEUTENANT-COLONEL JOHN HAUGHTON, COMMANDANT of the 36th SIKHS; a Hero of Tirah. A Memoir by Major A. C. YATE, 2nd (Duke of Connaught's Own) Baluch Battalion; F.R.G.S.; Author of "England and Russia Face to Face in Asia," &c. With Portraits, many Illustrations, and 3 Maps. Demy 8vo, 12s. net.

CHRISTMAS in FRENCH CANADA. By LOUIS FRECHETTE. With Illustrations by Frederick Simpson Colburn. Large crown 8vo, 6s.

"With Christmas so close upon us, with its petty tyranny in the manner of gifts, we can suggest no better present for young readers than these stories..... The illustrations are admirable."—Weekly Register.

PARIS OF TO-DAY.

THE LIFE of PARIS. By Richard Whiting, Author of "No. 5, John Street," &c. Large crown 8vo, 6s.

A NEW and CHEAPER EDITION of WHYMPER'S SCRAMBLES. SCRAMBLES AMONGST the ALPS. In the Years 1860-69. Including the History of the First Ascent of the Matterhorn. By EDWARD WHYMPER. Fifth Edition. With 135 Illustrations and Maps. Medium 8vo, 15s. net.

THE ITALIAN SCHOOLS of PAINTING.

Based on the Handbooks of Kugler. Sixth Edition. Thoroughly Revised, and in part Rewritten by AUSTEN HENRY LAYARD, G.C.B., D.C.L. With a new Photogravure Frontispiece of the Academy Leonardo Cartoon. In 2 vols., with nearly 250 Illustrations. Square demy 8vo, 30s.

OLD ENGLISH PLATE. Its Makers and

Marks. By WILFRED J. CRIPPS, C.B. Sixth Edition, Revised and Enlarged. With 123 Illustrations and upwards of 2,600 Facsimiles of Plate Marks. 8vo, 21s.

A GLIMPSE at GUATEMALA. And some Notes on the Ancient Monuments of Central America. By ANNIE CARY MAUDSLAY and ALFRED PERCIVAL MAUDSLAY. With Map and Plans, 74 Photogravures, 2 Chromo-lithographs, 4 Lithographs, and other Illustrations. 4to, £4 4s. net.

TWO BOOKS ON ENGLISH COUNTRY LIFE.

THE NEW FOREST. Its Traditions, Inhabitants, and Customs. By ROSE DE CRESPIGNY and HORACE HUTCHINSON. With a Photogravure Frontispiece and other Illustrations, and a Map. Second Impression. Crown 8vo, 7s. 6d.

A COTSWOLD VILLAGE; or, Country

Life and Pursuits in Gloucestershire. By J. ARTHUR GIBBS. New and Cheaper Edition. With Portrait and many Illustrations. Large crown 8vo, 6s.

An ENGLISH WOMAN'S LOVE-LETTERS.

Bound after the style of the Morris Books, 5s. net.
"We have not for a long time seen anything as pathetic as an 'An English woman's Love-Letters'.....a tragedy and a record too sacred and too piteous for publication.....so great is their charm.....a tragedy, without plot, story, action, or incident—it needs none of them.....this is not a book to quote or to review, but to read."—Literature.

POINT and PILLOW LACE. A Short

Account of the Various Kinds, Ancient and Modern, and How to Recognise them. By A. M. S. With Photogravure Frontispiece and more than 40 other Facsimile Illustrations of Specimens of Lace. 4to, 10s. 6d.
"Altogether a better handbook of lace certainly has not been, and, we think, could not be, written, and those who collect lace will find in 'A. M. S.'s' book the most valuable help in naming and dating these specimens."—Guardian.

GIFT BOOKS FOR THE YOUNG.

PUSS in BOOTS. Illustrated with 12 Woodcuts in Colours. Royal 16mo, paper boards, 1s.

AMONG the FARMYARD PEOPLE. By

CLARA DILLINGHAM PIERSON, Author of "Among the Meadow People," and "Among the Forest People." Illustrated by F. C. Gordon. Crown 8vo, 1s.

AMONG the FOREST PEOPLE. By

CLARA DILLINGHAM PIERSON. Illustrated by F. C. Gordon. Crown 8vo, 5s.

POPULAR ISSUE.

EILEEN'S JOURNEY. A Fairy Tale for Children and Young Readers. By ERNEST ARTHUR JELF. With Illustrations. 8vo, gilt edges, 6s.

THE LAND of the LONG NIGHT. By

PAUL DU CHAILLU, Author of "The Viking Age," "In the Viking," "The Land of the Midnight Sun," "Exploration in Equatorial Africa," &c. Illustrated by M. J. Burns. Crown 8vo, 7s. 6d.

BOYS' BOOKS.

A NEW STORY FOUNDED ON FACT.

A SEA KING'S MIDSHIPMAN. An

Episode in the Life of the famous Lord Cochrane (afterwards Lord Dundonald). By A. LEE KNIGHT. With Illustrations by Monro S. Orr. Large crown 8vo, 6s.

A CENTURY of OUR SEA STORY. By

WALTER JEFFERY, Author of "The King's Yard," &c. With a Photogravure Frontispiece of Lord Nelson. Crown 8vo, 6s.

LIVINGSTONE'S FIRST EXPEDITION

to AFRICA, 1840-1856. With Notes by F. S. ARNOT. Containing many new Illustrations and a Map of South Africa at the time of Livingstone, and another of that country at the present time. Cr. 8vo, 5s.

JOHN MURRAY, Albemarle Street, W.

The Academy

A Weekly Review of Literature and Life.

No. 1492. Established 1869.

8 December, 1900.

Price Threepence
[Registered as a Newspaper.]

The Literary Week.

THIS week we make an attempt to cope with the array of Christmas books of which the preparation has employed so many writers and artists during the year. The child is indeed well catered for in these times. There is no better Christmas present than a book, but there should be meaning in the gift. Some labour and thought should be given to the choice. It should be a reminder—a constant reminder—of some intellectual interest, some spiritual or material correspondence between giver and receiver.

Nor all books are suitable for Christmas presents. For instance, Tolstoi's The Corpse, in twelve scenes.

WE have noted a few developments in the art of book advertising. Pedestrians in the London streets have been confronted by strings of sandwich-men telling all and sundry that a certain poem is "the poem of the year." The enterprising author has also been blazoned in advertising pages to an extent that must make other minor poets very envious. He has also been prodigal of extracts, on the principle that if you like the sample, prithee, try the poem.

THEN one publisher—Mr. Heinemann—has adopted the American plan of printing a eulogy on the paper wrapping of some of his new volumes. It is the humour of another publisher—Mr. Grant Richards—to unbend as follows. In an advertisement of Mr. Frank Harris's new volume of stories he whispers in large type:

Here we have short stories that the best critics tell me are the best short stories in the language. Will they sell? I say "Yes"; the author says "No." It is for the public to decide.

Yes; the public has a way of deciding such questions in its own way.

WHEN Mr. Murray's new blue Monthly Review, edited by Mr. Henry Newbolt, was announced, we refrained, in these staid pages, from making the obvious joke about the new Bolt in the Blue. But wits in full practice are not so reticent. Twice has the joke been made in the past week. The offenders are Mr. L. F. Austin and Mr. "Arthur Pendennys."

MR. KIPLING's new story, "Kim," the longest he has written, will begin in the January number of Cassell's Magazine. "Kim," we are informed, contains "an exposition of Buddhism which even the man in the street can understand."

MRS. WARD has been accused of changing the colour of Lucy Foster's hair (in Eleanor). But there is a more amusing slip than that. On page 279 Mrs. Ward makes Manisty throw away his cigarette, and on page 281 relight it. Manisty may have been wilful, impulsive, selfish; but he would never have lighted again a cigarette once thrown away.

WHEN the readers of the Figaro opened that journal last Friday they were confronted by a poem of fifty-one stanzas. In big letters at the top were the words "A Kruger," the signature at the foot was that of M. Edmond Rostand. As the poem fills half the front page of the Figaro, it is to be supposed that the editor judged that M. Rostand's vapourings are the sort of reading his readers wanted. Modern poets are seldom happy when they sing of affairs. The Muse is the only party to which a poet should belong. Apart from the sentiments of "A Kruger," to which the ordinary Briton can hardly be asked to subscribe, M. Rostand does not shine as a prophet. Events move so quickly that a few hours will spoil the prophetic fancy of a stanza. Thus:

Mais maintenant, Vieillard, les rois doivent attendre :
Ne fais pas attendre les rois.
Pour être bien reçu comment vas-tu t'y prendre ?
Oh ! si tu crains les accueils froids

Pars pour le doux pays des Bibles et des pipes ;
Ses fils ressemblent à tes fils ;
Pars pour le doux pays de brume où les tulipes
Ont pour petite reine un Lys !

Les rois ne pourront pas vous refuser leur porte ;
Vous entrerez dans leurs palais.
Elle, elle parlera. Faible, elle sera forte.
Toi, ne dis rien : regarde-les.

Je dis que l'Empereur aux moustaches en pointes
Sourira quand cet être clair
Paraîtra sur le seuil en disant, les mains jointes :
"Mon cousin, c'est Monsieur Kruger."

M. Rostand's advice in the final stanzas is sound:

Mais si la Reine échoue—hélas ! tout est possible !—
Et si toi, vieillard malheureux,
Tu ne rapportes rien que sur ta grosse Bible
Une larme de ses yeux bleus !

Ayant sur ton chemin vu trop de laides choses,
Aperçu trop de cœurs pourris,
Si tu reviens avec des paupières plus closes,
Des regards plus endoloris...

J'espère, à ton retour, qu'après ce long martyre
Tu déclineras les clameurs ;
Tu ne permettras pas que l'Europe s'en tire
Avec quelques gerbes de fleurs !

Tu diras, en rendant aux fillettes, je pense
Les gros bouquets aux nœuds flamants :
"Je n'étais pas venu demander à la France
Des mots écrits sur des rubans."

Je compte que ton poing fermera la fenêtre,
Que si la foule crie en bas
Pour s'amuser encore à te faire paraître,
Kruger, tu ne paraîtras pas !

So ! And yet in the hands of a great poet—wise, tolerant, just—inspired by a large pity for human things, undisturbed by the cries of partisans, sentimentalists, and featherbrains, what a subject for an epic is this passing of a brave nation, this pilgrimage of an arrogant, broken old man, to an ever-receding goal.

THE Lawyer, a new penny paper, sufficiently described by its title, has published a long letter purporting to have been written by Charles Lamb to his doctor at Edmonton. Our contemporary prints the letter without a word of evidence to show that Lamb wrote it. Yet the letter is itself pretty strong evidence that it could never have proceeded from his pen. An apology to the doctor and his wife for having got drunk in their house is wrapped up in a flippant and almost vulgar account of the manner of the writer's homeward progress. That this letter could not have been written by Lamb is our conviction; but if we had possessed it, and known it to be genuine, we should not have permitted its publication.

THE Oxford University Press is as zealous to make its publications outwardly beautiful as it is to fill them with sound scholarship; indeed, of the three Grands Prix won by this famous Press at the Paris Exhibition two were for externals—India paper and bindings. The catalogues of its three exhibits—Binding, Paper, and Higher Educational Publications—are in themselves interesting. From the first we give an illustration of a binding for Wordsworth's poems, issued in four volumes, in green levant morocco.

IN the current Fortnightly are two interesting dramatic items. Count S. C. de Soissons gives an account of Maeterlinck's latest play, published as yet only in a German translation, entitled "Blue Beard and Aryan; or, Useless Liberation." It is in three acts. The original is likely to be published shortly. The other item is the text of Mr. J. M. Barrie's play, "The Wedding Guest," printed in full as a Literary Supplement. It reads prettily in many parts, as witness this between Paul and Mrs. Ommaney:

PAUL: I lived too much in my art, and my solitary thoughts. I shrank from men's free talk of women, and yet when I left them it was to brood of the things they spoke of; theirs was a healthier life than mine. "It is not good for man that he be alone." I know the meaning of those words; the preachers too often don't. And then you came into my life, and you rang through it like a peal of bells in a lonely house. At first I only meant to be your friend. Ah, Kate, those Bohemian days, when you and I were only comrades!

MRS. O.: The dear old studio fire!

PAUL: How poor I was!

MRS. O.: How happy we were!

PAUL: Ah! but Kate!

MRS. O.: Yes, it was soon over.

PAUL: The end came. Our friends were looking on and smiling, Kate. They called me a lucky dog. At first I could have struck them, for they did not disguise their meaning; but they had put the idea into my head, and it flourished there and grew apace.

MRS. O.: [passionately] It was not only that? Speak, you loved me!

PAUL: You took possession of every chamber of my mind. There was no one in the world to me but you.

AN interesting, if controversial, critique is Mr. H. W. Massingham's article on Tolstoi in the Contemporary Review. Mr. Massingham points to the complete unity of Tolstoi's life and his intellectual work. That is in itself a rather original view, for we have been accustomed to think of several men in Tolstoi. But Mr. Massingham points out that he has "followed a single clue which runs equally through his artistic and his philosophical writings," and, inquiring the secret of Tolstoi's attraction, he answers in like manner: "It is that Tolstoi has lived the life, and that his work in fiction and criticism traces, step by step, the road of his own pilgrim's progress; and, secondly, that he associates himself with an eternally interesting topic. His Pierre, his Levin, his Nekhludoff, pass before our eyes chiefly that one may see through them the passage of Tolstoi's own soul, and of all human souls, from death to life."

BUT Mr. Massingham specialises. His article resolves itself into an analysis of one work of Tolstoi's—Life; a book which he identifies as the best key to Tolstoi's method and belief. "It is concerned purely with what Mr. Morley has called 'the bright dawn of life in the soul,' and in its arrangement is a continuous treatise on human nature, without regard either to religious dogma or to earlier philosophical conceptions. In a word, it is a thoroughly original and powerful work of self-examination, with consequences that seem to me to be of the deepest importance to the life of our times." From this point the article cannot be easily summarised; but it is likely to interest many.

NOT everyone knows that Victor Hugo had very remarkable gifts as an artist; but that such was the case is proved beyond dispute by M. Benjamin-Constant in an appreciation written for the Christmas number of Harper's Magazine. The illustrations accompanying the essay are so remarkable that the reader absorbs M. Benjamin-Constant's eulogy without any shock of surprise. Yet he goes so far as to say: "It is no stretch of imagination to say that these sketches or souvenirs of nature recall the little etchings of Rembrandt; certain faces, very roughly drawn, remind us of Callot and of Goya; and the larger compositions in the style of 'Burg de la Croix' might bear, not unworthily, the signature of Turner. To be convinced of what I say, it is only necessary to spend a morning at the house of Paul Meurice, the life-long friend of Victor Hugo, who was—together with Vacquerie—the great man's confidant, and the executor of his last wishes." We are glad to know that other drawings are to be reproduced and discussed. Meanwhile, we recommend even the purely literary student of Victor Hugo to inform himself concerning these weird and striking drawings, which suggest that Victor Hugo would have been the only possible illustrator of Poe's tales and poems. We like to think of the drawings he would have done for "The Fall of the House of Usher" or "The Bells."

AGAINST Hugo as artist let us put Mr. Hardy as poet. One of his singularly individual poems appeared in last Friday's Morning Post, and as it may have escaped many of our readers we quote two out of its four stanzas. It is a "Song of the Soldiers' Wives," and it concludes thus:

Some told us we should meet no more,
Should meet no more;
Should wait and wish, but greet no more
Your faces by our fires:
That, in a while, uncharily
And drearily,
Men gave their lives—even wearily,
Like those whom living fires.
And now you are nearing home again,
Dears, home again:
No more, may be, to roam again
As at that bygone time,
Which took you all away from us
To stay from us:
Dawn, hold not long the day from us,
But quicken it to prime!

In an essay on Stevenson in his new volume of Prose Fancies, with which we shall deal shortly, Mr. Richard Le Gallienne remarks, that "more than any of our recent writers he realised 'the mysterious face of common things.' When a man like Maeterlinck makes just the same discoveries, but in a more oracular and less brilliant style, he is saluted with awe as a mystic." He might have added, that on a still more every-day plane Dickens preceded Stevenson in the effort to realise "the mysterious face of common things." To "dwell on the romantic side of familiar things" was, indeed, his expressed aim in Bleak House, which novel is now issued in Messrs. Methuen's admirable "Rochester" edition of Dickens, with an introduction by Mr. George Gissing.

MR. GISSING'S Introduction strikes us as a sound piece of criticism. He points out that Bleak House was written under a desire to eschew the haphazard narration with which Dickens had been sometimes reproached, and to produce a story with an ingenious and complex plot. Ingenuity and complexity he achieved, but we agree with Mr. Gissing that the result is not good in art; "there is an almost total disregard of probability; the fitting of incidents suggests a mechanical puzzle rather than the complications of human life; arbitrary coincidence takes the place of well-considered motive, and at times the motive suggested is glaringly inadequate." Mr. Gissing makes other strictures, and endorses the opinion of Lord Denman that it was too much Dickens's habit to find "delicacy of virtuous sentiment in the lowest depths of human degradation," adding on his own account: "If one fact can be asserted of the lowest English it is that, supposing them to say or do a good thing, they will say or do it in the worst possible way. Does there, I wonder, exist in all literature a scene less correspondent with any possibility of life than the description of Jo's last moments?" We need hardly say that these criticisms float on a sea of appreciation of the more admirable elements in this immortal satire on the Law. But we could have wished that Mr. Gissing had said that he found the love passages and love sentiment of Bleak House as tedious as we thought it in a recent re-perusal. This edition is illustrated by Miss Beatrice Alcock with manifest care, but not with entire success. The long drawing-room at Rockingham Castle, Chesney Wold, was a subject beyond her technical powers, and the same may be said of other subjects; it seems possible that she has been hampered by instructions to adopt the style of Mr. Edmund H. New, who illustrated the Pickwick in the same series. Mr. Kitton's notes are interesting. He reminds us that as late as 1895 a motion connected with the cause célèbre on which "Jarndyce

v. Jarndyce" was founded, came before Mr. Justice Kekewich, whose name, one cannot help thinking, would have struck Dickens as highly usable in the story.

THESE reproductions of two book-covers, which have been crowded out of our Christmas Supplement, may be permitted to hold an overflow meeting in this column—the more so as they are not the least dainty products of the season's book-cover art. Miss Alice B. Gomme is an authority on old English singing games; and what could be more appropriate than the design following?

Miss Gomme's book is issued by Mr. Allen. A kind of quaint variant on the above cover is furnished in Miss S. Rosamond Praeger's The Tale of the Little Twin Dragons (Macmillan).

MR. DOOLEY as a pensee writer has, perhaps, yet to be appreciated. That his works are full of detachable observations is known to everyone who has laughed himself happy over them; but we observe that Mr. Dooley's Philosophy (his latest work) ends with a number of "Casual Observations" written as such. Many of them are as wise and witty as they could be. These, for example:

If ye live enough before thirty ye won't care to live at all after fifty.

'Tis no job to find out who wrote an anonymous letter. Jus' look out iv th' window whin ye get it. 'Tis harder to do evil thin good be stealth.

No man was iver so low as to have rayspict f'r his brother-in-law.

I care not who makes th' laws iv a nation if I can get out an injunction.

An Englishman appears resarved because he can't talk.

What China needs is a Chinese exclusion act.

A nation with colonies is kept busy. Look at England! She's like wan iv th' Swiss bell-ringers.

An autocrat's a ruler that does what th' people wants an' takes th' blame f'r it. A constitutionnal ixecutive, Hinnissy, is a ruler that does as he dam pleases an' blames th' people.

Thrust ivrybody—but cut th' ca-arads.

A man that'd expiet to thrain lobsters to fly in a year is called a loonytic; but a man that thinks men can be turned into angels be an illiction is called a rayformer, an' remains at large.

Dhressmakers' bills siuds women into lithraehoor an' men into an early decline.

People tell me to be frank, but how can I be whin I don't dare to know mesilf?

'Tis a good thing th' fun'ral sermons ar're not composed in th' confessional.

MR. FRANK RITCHIE's article on "Rhyme," which we quoted last week, appeared in Longman's Magazine, not, as we implied, in the Cornhill.

Bibliographical.

A TRULY laudable contribution to the literature of bibliography is that which has just been made by Mr. Charles Gross, professor at Harvard University. That gentleman now publishes, through Messrs. Longmans, a volume of 618 pages on The Sources and Literature of English History from the Earliest Times to about 1845. It is a very elaborate and highly useful work, comprising "a systematic survey of the printed materials relating to the political, constitutional, legal, social, and economic history of England, Wales, and Ireland." Scotland is omitted from this list, "because in the Middle Ages her government and institutions were foreign to those of England"; and yet she has not been wholly ignored, for, "so far as she influenced the current of English history, she has received consideration." Materials in MS. are dealt with incidentally only. The printed materials noticed include not only books and pamphlets, but papers found among collected essays, in journals, and in the transactions of learned societies. Prof. Gross does not profess to set forth everything bearing on his subject; the merely worthless has no record. And for the rest, an excellent feature of the book is the Professor's frequent characterisation of the volumes mentioned. This should be of great service to the student, as guiding his steps along a path beset with pitfalls. The Professor's entries are very carefully sub-divided; perhaps, indeed, there are too many sub-divisions. There is, however, a thoroughly exhaustive index, extending to sixty-two closely-printed pages; and a reference to this will at once remove any difficulty the reader may experience in finding any particular sub-division. Altogether, this substantial work is a monument of intelligent and instructed industry.

Whatever one may think of the unhappy man who died in Paris the other day, what he did in literature still remains in witness for or against him. His career in letters may be said to have been confined to a decade—namely, that which began in 1888. He had published in 1881 a volume of Poems, but after that there was silence until 1888, when he brought out The Happy Prince and Other Stories, in which there was much to admire. In 1891 came The Picture of Dorian Gray, Lord Arthur Savile's Crime, &c., and Intentions (a volume of essays), likewise The House of Pomegranates (with illustrations). To 1893 belongs Salome, a drama, in French, of which an English version was issued in the following year. Then, in 1898, came the Ballad of Reading Gaol, to which a tragic interest attaches. All of his four plays were published—Lady Windermere's Fan in 1893, A Woman of No Importance (1894), The Importance of Being Earnest in 1899, and An Ideal Husband in the same year. The first of these was dedicated "To the Dear Memory of Robert, Earl of Lytton"; the last "To Frank Harris, a slight tribute to his power and distinction as an artist, his chivalry and nobility as a friend." The first two were issued with the writer's name on the title-page; the last two were announced as "by the author of Lady Windermere's Fan." The paper on Shakespeare's sonnets, contributed to Blackwood's Magazine, has not, I think, been reprinted.

Mr. John Payne, it appears, has completed a metrical version of the collected poems (or Divan) of Hafiz, and it is about to be published by subscription. It will be in three octavo volumes, printed on hand-made paper, and bound in vellum gilt. We have had of late years Mr. J. H. McCarthy's Ghazels from the Divan of Hafiz (1893), Miss Gertrude Bell's Poems from the Divan of Hafiz (1897), and Mr. Walter Leaf's Versions (1898). Mr. Payne, however, is to give us a complete translation of the Divan; and we are told that he has "endeavoured, by a system of metrical reproduction representative of the exceedingly characteristic and varied scheme of rhyme and rhythm of the original, combined with the utmost possible fidelity in the matter of sense and diction, to present Hafiz to English readers in some sort as he may be supposed to have appeared to his countrymen." It will be remembered that Mr. Payne produced a version of the quatrains of Omar two years ago. At one time he was an active writer of original verse.

It is said that the forthcoming edition of R. L. Stevenson's Letters not only will contain new matter, but has been revised throughout. Intrinsically, therefore, it should be better worth having than the original edition, the possessors of which have, probably, read the above announcement with some little annoyance. They must find consolation in the fact that, whatever may be the attractions of the new issue, they rejoice in a copy of the original one, which for many is a satisfaction in itself. Meanwhile, the poor bibliographer will have to compare the two issues and record the differences between them.

Bibliophiles will be glad to know that Mr. Stephen Phillips's Herod, as published by Mr. Lane, ranges with the same writer's Paolo and Francesca in size, as well as in style and colour of binding. The type in Herod is a shade larger than that in Paolo, and the paper used in the former is rather thicker than that in the latter; but that is of no consequence. The larger type in Herod accounts for its running to 128 pages, as compared with the 120 of Paolo.

Glancing at some quotations from a much-advertised new work in verse, I have come across the following couplet:

But with each Spring a deeper feeling flows,
Lights with the lily, reddens with the rose.

This collocation of the rose and the lily seems a favourite with the bards. Long ago Mr. Dobson wrote of his "Phyllida":

Her colour comes and goes;
It trembles to a lily,—
It wavers to a rose.

And we all remember Mr. Watson's distich:

Pluck'd by his hand, the basest weed that grows
Towers to a lily, reddens to a rose.

I note the announcement of a novel by Miss S. E. Hall, to be called The Interlopers. But is this not a little too like The Interloper, the title of a tale published by Miss F. M. Peard only six years ago?

THE BOOKWORM.

MESSRS. LONGMANS & CO.'S LIST

SECOND EDITION. 8vo. Cloth, gilt top, 18s. net.

With a Supplement to the Text (124 pp.) and additional illustrations.

HISTORY OF MODERN ITALIAN ART.

By ASHTON ROLLINS WILLARD.

With Frontispiece in Photogravure and 39 Plates in Half-Tone.

CONTENTS.

PART I. SCULPTURE. Chapter I. The Revival of the Classic Style by Canova and his Contemporaries. Chapter II. Lorenzo Bartolini, the Leader of the Reaction against Classicism. Chapter III. The Transition from Classicism to Naturalism. Chapter IV. The Development of Naturalism in the Work of Vincenzo Vela. Chapter V. Recent Sculptors of Southern Italy. Chapter VI. Recent Sculptors of Central Italy. Chapter VII. Recent Sculptors of Northern Italy.

PART II. PAINTING. Chapter VIII. Vincenzo Camuccini, the Leading Painter of the Classic Movement. Chapter IX. Other Classic Painters. Chapter X. Pre-Raphaelitism and Romanticism. Chapter XI. Other Phases of the Reaction against Classicism. Chapter XII. The Leaders of the Modern Neapolitan School. Chapter XIII. Recent Painters of Southern Italy. Chapter XIV. Recent Painters of Central Italy. Chapter XV. Recent Painters of Northern Italy.

PART III. ARCHITECTURE. Chapter XVI. Architects of the Classic Movement, and their Contemporaries and Successors. Chapter XVII. Recent Architects.

SUPPLEMENT—INDEX.

The BARONESS DE BODE, 1775-1803.

The Strange Experiences of an English Lady during the French Revolution. By WILLIAM S. CHILDE-PEMBERTON. With 4 Photogravure Portraits and other Illustrations. 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

"This book must be accounted among the most remarkable among the many records of the kind that illustrate the disruptive effects of the French Revolution. . . . Altogether a most fascinating history."—London Times.

The SOURCES and LITERATURE of ENGLISH HISTORY, from the Earliest Times to about 1845. By CHARLES GROSS, Ph.D., Harvard University. 8vo, 18s. net.

The GREAT FAMINE and ITS CAUSES.

By VAUGHAN NASH. With 8 Illustrations from Photographs by the Author, and a Map of India showing the Famine Area. Crown 8vo, 6s.

HOW the GARDEN GREW. By MAUD

MARYON. With 4 Illustrations by Gordon Browne. Crown 8vo, 5s. 1 net.

"The story of years in this modest pleasure is brightly told, and with enough practical experience to be of some value. There are studies of humanity as well as of flowers. The old gardener is sketched with vivacity and humour, and a pleasant vein of nature runs through the pages."—The Scotsman.

SHAKESPEARE SERMONS. Preached in the Collegiate Church of Stratford-on-Avon on the Sundays following the Poet's Birthday, 1891-1900. By Dean FARRAR, Dean STUBBS, the Rev. ALFRED ALINGER, the Rev. G. ARBUTHNOT, &c. Edited by the Rev. GEORGE ARBUTHNOT, M.A., Vicar of Stratford-on-Avon. Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

NEW NOVEL BY MRS. WALFORD.

ONE of OURSELVES. By Mrs. L. B. WAL-

FORD, Author of "Mr. Smith," "Lady Margot," &c. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"Mrs. Walford's fertile pen has produced another sprightly story, full of keen strokes of observation and lively touches of comedy."—Scotsman.

TWO STORIES OF IRISH LIFE.

By E. E. SOMERVILLE and MARTIN ROSS, Authors of "Some Experiences of an Irish R.M."

THE REAL CHARLOTTE.

NEW and CHEAPER IMPRESSION. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

THE SILVER FOX.

RE-ISSUE. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

STANDARD BOOKS.

A HISTORY of the PAPACY, from the Great Schism to the Sack of Rome, 1378-1527. By MANDELL CREIGHTON, D.D., Lord Bishop of London. 6 vols., crown 8vo, 6s. each.

HISTORY of CIVILISATION in ENGLAND.

FRANCE, SPAIN, and SCOTLAND. By HENRY THOMAS BUCKLE. 3 vols., crown 8vo, 24s.

THESAURUS of ENGLISH WORDS and PHRASES, Classified and Arranged so as to Facilitate the Expression of Ideas and Assist in Literary Composition. By PETER MARK ROGET, M.D., F.R.S. Recomposed throughout, Enlarged and Improved, partly from the Author's Notes, and with a full Index. Crown 8vo, 10s. 6d.

WORKS BY JOHN STUART MILL.

A SYSTEM of LOGIC. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

POLITICAL ECONOMY. Popular Edition.

Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. LIBRARY EDITION. 2 vols., 8vo, 3s.

LONGMANS, GREEN & CO., London, New York, and Bombay.

SEELEY & CO.'S NEW BOOKS.

"THE PORTFOLIO" MONOGRAPHS.

No. 41.

CAMEOS. By Cyril Davenport, F.S.A., of the British Museum. With 65 Illustrations, including several in Colours. Super royal 8vo, sewed, 5s. net; or cloth, gilt top, 7s. net.

"A handsome volume. . . . The subject is treated in an exhaustive manner. The illustrations are excellently chosen and as excellently prepared."—Daily Graphic.

No. 40.

GREEK TERRACOTTA STATUETTES. By C. A. Hutton. With a Preface by A. S. MURRAY, LL.D. With 17 Examples printed in Colour and 36 in Monochrome, cloth, gilt top, 7s. net.

"Sure of a welcome from art lovers. The illustrations are of the choicest quality."—Liverpool Courier.

JUST PUBLISHED.

THE CELESTIAL COUNTRY. Hymns and Poems on the Joys and Glories of Paradise. With 10 Copper-Plates after the Early Italian Masters. Super-royal 8vo, cloth gilt, 12s. 6d.

"A really charming volume. . . . should form a dainty Christmas gift."—Pall Mall Gazette.
"A book in every way beautiful."—Church Times.

JUST PUBLISHED.

EMMA MARSHALL. A Biographical Sketch. By Beatrice MARSHALL. With Portraits and other Illustrations, 6s.

"The daughter's work has many of the mother's qualities; indeed, a worthy tribute to a pure, unselfish memory."—Daily Chronicle.

SECOND EDITION.

MADAME. A Life of Henrietta, Daughter of Charles I. and Duchess of Orleans. By JULIA CARTWRIGHT (Mrs. Ayr), Author of "Sacharissa," &c. With 5 Portraits. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d.

"Feldom has a more charming portrait been given to the world than in this history of the youngest daughter of Charles I."—Morning Post.

PROF. CHURCH'S NEW BOOK.

HELMET and SPEAR. Stories from the Wars of the Greeks and Romans. By the Rev. A. J. CHURCH, Author of "Stories from Homer," &c. With 8 Illustrations by G. Morrow. 5s.

"Capitally illustrated, and forms an exceptionally strong book for boys."—Scotsman.

THE WIND FAIRIES, and other Stories. By Mary

DE MORGAN, Author of "On a Pincushion," "The Necklace of Princess Fiorinonde," &c. With many Illustrations by Olive Cockerell. Cloth, gilt edges, 5s.

"Gracefully told, quite original, and apparently written with such ease that at every turn we find ourselves wondering why more stories of this kind are not written. That, however, is the story-teller's art."—Athenaeum.

THIRD EDITION.

WILD ENGLAND of TO-DAY and the WILD LIFE in IT.

By C. J. CORNISH. Author of "Life at the Zoo," "Animals at Work and Play," &c. With 16 Illustrations. 6s.

"Even more fascinating than its predecessor. Everybody will find something to his taste in this choice volume of natural lore."—World.

MOUNTAIN STREAM and COVERT. By A. Innes Shand,

Author of "General John Jacob," "The War in the Peninsula," &c. With 16 Illustrations. 6s.

"A most delightful volume of essays on country life and sport and charming studies of wild life."—Spectator.

THE SPECTATOR in LONDON. Essays by ADDISON and and STEELE. With 56 Illustrations by Ralph Cleaver. 3s. 6d.

"Excellent printed, illustrated in a delightful way, and altogether makes as charming a gift-book as could be desired."—Spectator.

COUNTRY STORIES. By Mary Russell Mitford. With many Illustrations by George Morrow. 3s. 6d.

"There is no wearying of these sketches of old-world life and manners in country and country towns."—Manchester Guardian.

London: SEELEY & CO., LTD., 38, Great Russell Street.

PORTRAIT SUPPLEMENTS

TO

"THE ACADEMY."

Consisting of Thirty-seven Portraits of Old and New Celebrities in Literature, may still be obtained, singly, or in complete sets for 3s. 6d., on application to the Office, 43, Chancery Lane, W.C.

NOW READY.

“BLACK & WHITE”

Christmas Number

1900.

FORTY-FOUR PAGES IN COLOURED WRAPPER,

AND IN ADDITION

THREE SUPERB SUPPLEMENTS

(TWO IN COLOUR),

“One of the Boys”

(Military).

“Chums”

(Collotype Picture).

“The Poor Relation”

(Colour).

~~~~~
Price ONE SHILLING, Post Free 1s. 3d.Published every Friday.Price Twopence.

BLACK & WHITE BUDGET

THE BIJOU ILLUSTRATED WEEKLY,

HAS ATTAINED AN ENORMOUS CIRCULATIONand is, without exception, absolutely the most popular weekly of the age.

The unparalleled success of the BLACK AND WHITE BUDGET has enabled the proprietors to issue at twopence a neat, handy, and concise newspaper, containing all the features of the best sixpenny illustrateds in a condensed form. A publication of the class and character which has hitherto been quite unobtainable at so low a price.

It is the ideal paper for a railway journey, and has no rival in the home circle.

All the most important news of the week will be found in its pages: war and peace, at home and abroad, sport and the stage, every-day life, in fact everything of general interest, profusely illustrated from cover to cover.

There are approximately over one hundred pictures every week.

BLACK AND WHITE BUDGET is, in fact, a great journalistic innovation which the general public has not been slow to recognise and appreciate.

Reviews.

The Spiritualised Fairy Tale.

Fairy Tales. By Hans Christian Andersen. Newly Translated by H. L. Brackstad. With an Introduction by Edmund Gosse. 2 vols. (Heinemann. Each 10s. net.)

"I ALWAYS say 'good night' to it before going to bed."
"It" was a watch, and the speaker was an honest, un-

Between this watch and that adult existed the friendship of an association from which the inanimate had caught a breath of life. All around us the inanimate has been vivified like this watch. It is because man does in a measure vivify his environment and possessions by reflecting his personality upon them, and becomes conscious of some sort of echo or reverberation as a result, that he is prepared to believe in articulate birds, trees, lakes.

Yet there are fairy tales and fairy tales. The baldly

"A PALACE ALMOST A MILE LONG, WITH ONE COLONNADE DARINGLY PILED ABOVE ANOTHER."

(From "Fairy Tales," by Hans Christian Andersen. Illustrated by Hans Tegner.)

affected, and sensible person of over fifty. We treasured up the confession because, considering the source, it suggested an explanation of the origin of much folk-lore.

stated miracle offends the educated ear. Mass without intention or design wearies the educated eye. The fairy tale may have the licence of the supernatural, but it must have the shape of literature and the breath of dramatic life.

Enter Andersen, who flooded the world with a new elfin beauty. Here was a rationale of magic, an order in the miraculous. Mundane satire, religious feeling, fairy nimbleness, mingled and not in discord. Food for babes in the cauldron of this white wizard became also manna for sages. Before us, offered in golden vessels, are forty-two of his stories. At last Andersen has found an illustrator deserving more than an ephemeral connexion with his genius. For the sake of his drawings we can forgive the choice which included the coarse picaresqueness of "Little Claus and Big Claus," the laboured satire of "The Storm Shifts the Sign Boards," and the inferior buffoonery of "The Jumpers," in a collection uninhabited by "The Girl who Trod on a Loaf," "The Marsh King's Daughter," and "The Portuguese Duck." Through the courtesy of the publisher we are enabled to reproduce the drawing of the palace of Fata Morgana. It was no mean feat to rear those spectral colonnades in that abyss of cloud, and to limn the impossible, in the shape of those enchanted swans, without degrading it. Mr. H. L. Brækstad's translation has great merit. We have compared it with three, including the standard one by Mrs. Paull, and applaud its superiority in vigour and eloquence. It is amusing to note that on two separate occasions Mrs. Paull refuses to mention a spittoon which harmlessly appears in the original and in Mr. Brækstad's translation. In 1872 Mr. Gosse had the privilege of hearing Andersen read "The Cripple"—the last story but one that Andersen wrote. The story-teller's voice "sank to almost a hoarse whisper," and "his amazingly long and bony hand" grasped the listener's shoulder. It is a pity that Mr. Gosse did not hear him read "The Travelling Companion," for it is then probable that he would not have founded some interesting criticism upon an inaccurate recollection of a fascinating story.

To obtain a preliminary idea of Andersen's special gifts it is well to compare one of his stories with a standard variant. Take "The Wild Swans." It is "The Six Swans" of Grimm, but with what a difference! In the first place, the artist gets rid of secondary matter which enlarges the story without yielding the stuff of literature—i.e., humour, poetry. He then makes the stepmother a woman before he makes her a witch. That is how we have the bit about her denying the children their cakes, and giving them "sand in a tea-cup." "They might pretend it was something nice," she said. And here is one of those bubbles of humour whereby Andersen anticipates Lewis Carroll. Later on we owe to Andersen a touch of poetry. The stepmother bids Elisa bathe in water which contains three toads. They settle on her. What follows?

As soon as she stood up, three red poppies were floating on the water; had the animals not been poisonous, and had they not been kissed by the queen, they would have been turned into red roses; but they became flowers, however, through resting on her head and near her heart.

But Andersen is most himself when he opens the mouths of dumb animals and things. Their quaint and appropriate sayings smite the stoniest mind till it breaks into gushing laughter. "Tweet, tweet, what a terrible snow-storm!" ejaculates the canary when a handkerchief is thrown over its cage. "Fie! she looks like a human being," exclaim the cockchafers of Thumbeline. "Isn't there a delicious smell here?" asks the mouse; "the whole passage has been rubbed with bacon-rind." "Bone for bone, thought I," remarks the yard-dog, who has been chained up for biting the leg of a boy who kicked away the bone he was gnawing. "We have houses from our birth, and the burdocks are planted for our sake. I should like to know . . . what there is beyond them?" says Mother Snail. "There is nothing beyond," says Father Snail. "It could not be better anywhere than here with us, and I have nothing to wish for." But Mother Snail thinks there is. "I should like to . . . be boiled and placed on a silver-dish, just like all our ancestors," says she.

The power of Andersen to animate the inanimate is a paradox of his genius. Who can forget the satire of "The Nightingale"? The people preferred the machine to the living songster; the song that came because it had to come, to the song that changed as life changes. Who, again, can forget the princess who exclaimed "Fie! it's a real rose," and gave the Swineherd ten kisses for a machine for smelling other people's dinners? Yet the satirist of "The Swineherd" and "The Nightingale" added to the immortals, not for ridicule but for love, toy men and toy women. "The Constant [or Gallant] Tin Soldier" and "The Shepherdess and the Chimney Sweep" have a gentle pathos that upbraids real life for its violent rapine of our tears. "I cannot bear it! The world is too big." Who would not spend a gentle emotion for the china shepherdess as she sits on the chimney-top gazing piteously over the roofs, "the sky with all its stars" above her head?

It was a wonderful man, this Hans. It may well be that he yearned to write novels of real life. Why not? Did he not compress in the tale of Valdemar Daa and his daughters a sternness of realism which even on the authority of the wind we are forced to accept? Had he not morbidity? If you doubt it, read "Aunt Toothache," the last of all his stories. Read even "The Shadow." The poet and the learned mau move in a dark enough domain. There one sees not fairies but fears. An overwrought brain alone at night might evoke such, and reel.

But Andersen has the freedom of a brighter region, and that he glories in. Had his fairy tales been buried one might have said, in his own words, that "the flowers must have known of it, and the coffin would have been aware of it, the soil around it would have noticed it, every little blade of grass that shot forth would have told of it. For fairy tales never die." But they have not been buried. They roam abroad lifting children's glances skyward and dropping them grassward. And in the embrasures of frozen streets matches struck by him illumine every winter the face of want and guide the steps of charity. We can conceive of no better present for a child than this beautiful edition of Hans Andersen's Fairy Tales.

What Shall We Do Now?

What Shall We Do Now? By E. V. and E. Lucas.
(Grant Richards. 6s.)

What Shall We Do Now? is the title given by Mr. and Mrs. Lucas to this comfortable looking volume, and if the children who become its fortunate possessors ever again ask the question, they deserve — well, they deserve to have it taken away from them. Its sub-title, "A Book of Suggestions for Children's Games and Employments," explains its aim and scope, and though books on the same plan have been compiled before—we remember, for instance, The Young Ladies' Book and The Boy's Companion, which ranged from crochet to conjuring tricks—none of them have possessed the zest, spirit, and humour which make this book delightful reading in itself, apart from the nature of the subjects with which it deals.

"Games for a Party," "Picnic Games," "Out for a Walk," "In the Train," are some of the headings of chapters which, unless we are false prophets, many an anxious mother, many a harassed governess will peruse with thankfulness. Think, for instance, how a long railway journey may be robbed of anxiety for the grown-up people in charge, when the children are so occupied in playing "railway competitions" that they forbear to cry, fidget, or even to put their feet on the cushions or seats of the carriages!

But the most delightful parts of the book, after all, are those which appeal most strongly to the children themselves, and among these are hints for "playing alone" and "Games in Bed." There are, of course, as the preface admits, "many fortunate girls and boys who do not require any help whatever, who always know what to do, and do it." And much of the pleasure and interest we as grown-up children have derived from these hints and suggestions lies in the recognition of the fundamental likeness of childish minds. "We used to play that!" is the constant comment of grown-up readers, as they come across one familiar "pretence" after another. Not to everyone, however, is it given to sympathise, understand, and remember like the writer of the chapter on "Playing Alone" or "Dolls' Houses":

Another little girl, who lived in the country, used to pretend to be some sort of a god. If she stepped in a puddle and caused a commotion among the water-beetles, she was a god causing an earthquake. If she dragged a stick along wet ground, she was making a new river. If she trod on long grass she was trampling down whole continents. If she disturbed an ant-hill she imagined herself to be sharing the contemptuous feelings of the gods towards mortals.

Of course! Don't you remember?

Good, also, is the Dolls' House chapter. Nothing seems to have been forgotten. There are the pictures for the walls which are made out of scraps, or tiny photographs pasted on a piece of cardboard larger than itself, and edged with a strip of gold paper for frame; there are the miniature books with their invented titles; there, too, are the beds made of cardboard boxes (with the match-box size for the doll-children). "Ah! but there used to be lovely little cradles made of walnut shells in our dolls' house," we exclaim, with proud superiority, and a moment later, see that "for cosy little cots for babies there are walnut shells!"

What reader who has ever had a German governess will pass the pictured page on Paper Dolls without a thrill? Can we ever forget Adolph, aged nine, with his rosy painted cheeks, his parted hair, his half-dozen suits of Teutonic cut, and his peaked cap? Or Fraulein Minna, the smiling paper young lady, whose ball dresses were always garlanded with forget-me-nots?

But lest it should seem that our praise is reserved too exclusively for the purely feminine interests to which the volume ministers, let us turn to the chapter on "Pets," which is interesting to both sexes, or to that devoted to "Kites," "Toy-boats," "Skip-jacks," and "Watercutters."

Of larks in cages we read, after advice as to diet and roomy cages: "But remember that the lark is a bird that does not perch, and is always longing to rise up and up in the sunshine and blue air; and if you have any doubt about it let him go." And we commend the wisdom of this temperate appeal to the humanity of his captors, probably infinitely more effective than pages of invective against the cruelty which is here only implied.

In conclusion, we cannot resist quoting a few lines from "At the Seaside":

Wet clothes.—When paddling it is just as well not to get your clothes wet if you can help it. Clothes that are made wet with sea water, which probably has a little sand in it, are as uncomfortable as crumbs in bed. Sitting among the rocks, running through the water, and jumping the little crisping waves are the best ways to get soaked. . . . Burying one another in the sand is good at the time, but gritty afterwards.

Donkeys.—Donkey rides are rarely quite so good as you hope they will be. It is only now and then that the saddle is comfortable, or the reins of the least use, or the stirrup the right length; and the donkey scrapes your leg against the wall, or a post, much too often. In hiring donkeys, the donkey boy's idea of what the time is should always be compared with a clock or watch, and the difference pointed out to him.

Niggers.—Now and then niggers ought to have a penny.

We must not omit to mention the interesting Appendix to What Shall We Do Now? It consists of a number of blank sheets, destined to be filled by young readers "with notes of any game, hobbies or other matters belonging to the scheme of this book which either are original, or have been over-looked by the authors." For the best-filled Appendix, a prize is offered, and the girl or boy who wins it will be lucky; for twenty volumes selected by authorities possessed of such intimate knowledge of youthful tastes and feelings as the authors of this book should be a prize worth having.

A New Poet.

The Wild Knight, and Other Poems. By Gilbert Chesterton. (Grant Richards. 5s. net.)

MR. CHESTERTON is a true poet; his philosophy is not deep—somewhat crude and juvenile, but he has the gift of expressing his ideas of things unexpectedly, so that they come home with a sudden thrill; and that is the gift of the poet. Open the book where you will, you encounter something vivid in expression and unforeseen in conclusion. Sometimes, perhaps, Mr. Chesterton pushes it too far. In his hatred of the obvious he creates wanton difficulty by striking out his connexions to a perverse degree, and casting a needless burden upon the reader's understanding. Compression and suggestion are excellent things, but they need judgment. There should be a depth in the matter not to be conveyed but through the winking lightning flashes of suggestion. Mere avoidance of connexions as a mannerism is an irritating trick. Still, this is the result of young inexperience. In most poems Mr. Chesterton shows that he has the root of the matter in him. Take his prologue, for example:

Another tattered rhymester in the ring,
With but the old plea to the sneering schools,
That on him too, some secret night in spring,
Came the old frenzy of a hundred fools.
To make some thing: the old want dark and deep,
The thirst of men, the hunger of the stars,
Since first it tinged even the Eternal's sleep,
With monstrous dreams of trees and towns and wars.
When all He made for the first time he saw,
Scattering stars as misers shake their pelf;
Then in the last strange wrath broke His own law,
And made a graven image of Himself.

There is plenty as good as or better than this in the book. Particularly one may note what is shown here—a certain Heinesque gift of bringing his poem down upon some unexpected, it might be said epigrammatic, turn at the conclusion. Take, again, the following poem:

THE BEATIFIC VISION.

Through what fierce incarnations, furred
In fire and darkness, did I go,
Ere I was worthy in the world
To see a dandelion grow?
Well, if in any woes or wars
I bought my naked right to be,
Grew worthy of the grass, nor gave
The wren, my brother, shame for me.
But what shall God not ask of him
In the last time when all is told,
Who saw her stand beside the hearth,
The firelight garbing her in gold?

Such fresh and original turns seem part of Mr. Chesterton's very mental fibre, so profusely are they strewn through his volume. It affords us good hope that he may be a coming man.

Eighteenth Century Art.

French Architects and Sculptors of the XVIIIth Century.

By Lady Dilke. (George Bell & Sons. 25s. net.)

THE rehabilitation of the eighteenth century is due to what R. L. Stevenson's cheerful little boy calls "a number of things," among which are probably the motive of general reaction and contradiction, and certainly that motive of contention against Ruskin that has not lost its power in the course of fifty years. Lady Dilke is so resolute in the propaganda as to take consent for granted, and to assume the artistic eminence of that age. She would commend its undoubted merits, nevertheless, with more effect upon the sympathies of the reader if she proposed all this clever work (we mean chiefly the sculpture) to our admiration as entirely work of the second or third order.

Having taken a definite step into the second class of the historical society of European art—that single step downwards and aside that brings us into so numerous, so busy, so content a company—we have nothing but praise for the extreme industry with which Lady Dilke has laboured within her field. Hers is expert work; and if the faculties of sight appear more brightly there than the faculties of insight, why, so much the more appropriate is her method to a criticism of the tomb of Marshal Saxe by Jean Baptiste Pigalle, of the Louis Quatorze of Edmé Bouchardon, or of the Flore Baigneuse of Jean Baptiste Lemoyne. The precision with which she follows the work, the strife, the trade of the sculptors of the century may seem disproportionate when we compare all this with the records of the great schools; but that is the fault of the age, in two senses. It was not a great age, and it has left the biographer an abundance of material.

The first part of this splendid volume is architectural. It is, perhaps, critically the most valuable division of the work. Lady Dilke finds in the building and design signs of a definite task—the solving of "problems connected with the creation of the modern house, remodelling old palaces, erecting official monuments, and creating pleasant dwelling-places, the charm of which still hangs about the walls of the Petit Trianon and the lovely Hôtel de Salm." In her study of those works of power, dignity, and grace, the Maison Louis XV. in the Rue de l'Arbre Sec, Paris, the Garde Meuble, Place de la Concorde, and that noble and modest building the Hôtel Roger, Champs Elysées, with many others, the author proves her learned appreciation of construction and of aspect, of the mechanics and of the picture. She has a liberal love of the art as it grew, as it lived, as it was French, takes the modern classical seriously, and does not disturb her view of its admirable decorum by those futile regrets—looking back, looking south, looking north, looking towards something simpler, more authentic, more original, more spirited—which few English historians of architecture can ever be quite rid of. Needless to say, architecture is, for her, distinct from sculpture, the eighteenth century having made the divorce complete, and she celebrates the coming together as friends and partners of the two arts that were once something nearer.

The book, as we have said, is a fine one. It is amply illustrated by the photograph and the photogravure plate, carefully adapted to the subject. The type is well fitted to Lady Dilke's large appreciations, but it is, perhaps, a little too noble for some of the details of Court patronage and commercial emulation: and it is certainly too grave and grand for double-hinged sentences such as "Exaggerations which resulted in that stiff imitation of classic monuments which was pushed to its utmost limits," &c. It is too grand, also, for such phrases as "lukewarm attitude"; as "It is clear that this work was . . . destined to fill the place which it still occupies, though misled," &c. (which may mean that a chronicler who may have said something to the contrary was misled, but the poor man is nowhere within grammatical reach); as "By the absence of any projections which might break the range of line, and which has forced the architect to give relief to his surface," &c. (and which means something which the author did not intend); and as that other double joint, "Those individualist tendencies which corresponded to the social movement which culminated," &c. These sentences, stumbled upon in page after page, show the English of the book to be somewhat corrupt. As to the French, a mistake of gender ("ce main") is graver than an accent astray, but even an accent ought to be right in a volume to which so much care has been given. We had a moment of pleasure in finding "Liège" written aright, and then on the same page came "Liège" and "Liégeois."

The last chapter, on medals, is good, and treats felicitously of good work. But the last sentence deals somewhat extravagantly with a century that after all might take its chance with its fellows:

These are the main lines on which we may proceed in trying to estimate those apparently conflicting developments . . . which, taking their departure from the School of Versailles, correspond to the diverse movements that agitated the social and intellectual life of a century than which there is no other richer in elements of human interest.

We would be bound to say as much for the elements of human interest, whatever these may be precisely, in the seventeenth century and the nineteenth.

Fencing without Tears.

Secrets of the Sword. Translated from the French of Baron de Bazancourt by C. F. Clay. With Illustrations by F. H. Townsend. (Bell & Sons. 7s. 6d. net.)

FOR men and women who feel the need of regular exercise of a somewhat more violent character than driving in the Park there is nothing better than fencing. To those who favour the suggestion we recommend this attractive volume. There is nothing of the dry, technical manual about it. Baron de Bazancourt, the author, was described in the Badminton book on fencing as "a very expert literary dodger." The phrase is a hard one: at any rate, the Baron is readable. His work, Les Secrets de l'Epée, of which this volume is a bright and competent translation by Mr. C. F. Clay, was first published in 1862. The Baron imagines himself to be staying at an old manor house. "At my friend's house there were no poets, but there was instead a large shooting party." In the smoking room after dinner the Baron discoursed on fencing, with such effect that his friends permitted—nay, encouraged—him to continue his talk for eleven evenings on end. Hence this book.

Corps à Corps.

His discourse is like a side wind from the France of Dumas. He treats fencing and duelling with all the seriousness of a modern editor urging a London citizen to vote at School Board elections. The Baron's friends, we need hardly say, are of his order. They include the Comte de R—— and the Marquis de G——. Here is a specimen of their talk :

"If you would be an accomplished swordsman, you will certainly require years of hard work, close application, and incessant practice. But do you need this recondite skill? What would you do with it? You would find it embarrassing. All that you need as men of leisure, is to be able to use a sword as you do a horse, for your amusement, and when you have occasion for it. And observe I say for your amusement, for no sport is so attractive for its own sake, or so engrossing as the practice of arms."

"You are of opinion, then," remarked the Comte de C——, "that a man can learn to use a sword without devoting to it more time and trouble than he does to riding?"

Apart from the fact that the volume is really a most able exposition of the Baron's theory of fencing, the gravity with which he and his friends regard the art is a delight in itself. With them duelling is still an incident of ordinary life, neither common nor rare, but something (we opine) between changing a servant and marrying a wife. Although we have fought no duel ourselves, we can feel for the Baron in the predicament to which "unconsidered action" once brought him. He had been discussing the case of a second "who, acting on the spur of the moment, instinctively intercepts a blow."

I was once acting for a friend in an affair of honour; I was thoroughly on the alert and carefully following the play of the points with that close attention, and perhaps I may say with that sureness of eye, which one acquires from some familiarity with sword-play, when I saw the opponent's point coming straight at my friend's body. Before I could think, I saw in an instant, as no one accustomed to fencing could fail to see, that the wound would be mortal. I knocked up the swords, and as the two men had got to close quarters, I called out: 'On guard.' But I had hardly done so, when I realised the full extent of my unconsidered action, and I felt—well. Luckily for me, my friend, who was no less clumsy than brave, was not the man to leave me long in this cruel position. He fell a few seconds later seriously wounded.

The book gains distinction by reason of Mr. F. H. Townsend's drawings. We know Mr. Townsend as a clever and capable black-and-white artist; he is also, evidently, a fencer. His pictures aid the text: a rare thing in the art of book illustration.

A Very Old Trick.

Voodoo.

Where Black Rules White. By Hesketh Prichard. (Constable & Co. 12s.)

A LAND whose vast mineral and agricultural wealth is neglected, where the buildings once reared by white settlers are falling down and replaced by straw huts, where no white man can obtain justice, and where (paper constitutions notwithstanding) all forms of government are slipping back into the irresponsible rule of the President for the time being—such is the Black Republic of Hayti as presented by Mr. Prichard. Yet there remains one Haytian institution so entirely unique, and so difficult to be understood by Western minds, that it is worth while to wade through any number of accounts of Haytian squalor to get at anything that may throw a fresh light upon it. This is the celebrated Voodoo, or snake-worship, that Mr. Prichard thinks the first black settlers of Hayti brought with them from their African home, which now exercises a greater power than even the President in the Haytian State.

The rites of Voodoo, as Mr. Prichard witnessed them at Port-au-Prince, are simple enough. The initiated are summoned by the beat of a drum, which, according to Mr. Prichard, sounds faint and low when close to you, but can yet be heard at more than a mile's distance. When a sufficient number of worshippers are gathered together offerings are made to the snake, and the proceedings begin with a monotonous chant, with drum accompaniment, joined in by all present. In the midst of these the Mamaloi, or priestess of the snake, dances between the rows of worshippers until the excitement of the audience becomes uncontrollable, when a cock is handed to her by the Papaloi, or priest, who is generally, but not always, her husband. She kills the cock with circumstances of great cruelty, and smears herself and the congregation with its blood, and this process is repeated with a goat and, in extreme cases, a child. In every case the sacrifice is shared and eaten by the worshippers, who then give themselves up to a promiscuous orgie that is said generally to last for three days. During this, as we know from other sources, the faithful address questions to the god, who renders answers through the mouth of the Mamaloi, and proffer requests for vengeance and the like, which are granted or refused in strict accordance with the value of the offerings with which they are accompanied. The whole scene represents a very respectable imitation of the legendary accounts of the Witches' Sabbath, the ecstatic phenomena being in both cases apparently due to a sort of voluntarily-produced hysteria. It is curious to notice that Christians, Gnostics, Jews, and even certain Protestant sects, have been each in turn accused of committing similar atrocities.

Whatever be the origin of Voodoo, as to which we are not exactly in accord with Mr. Prichard, there can be no doubt of its disastrous effect upon the community. He says that he met with it everywhere in his journey through the island, although it was less in evidence in the northern parts, which alone, it may be noted, show some signs of persistence in civilisation. Elsewhere, he tells us the orders of the Papaloi are obeyed with a great deal more thoroughness than were ever those of the Vehmgericht during the Middle Ages, and neither the Government nor the Catholic priesthood dare interfere with a system which is rapidly undermining their authority. This state of affairs he attributes to the possession by the Voodoo priests of several unknown poisons of singular efficacy with which they can at once work the private revenges of their adherents and take off anyone who opposes them. Of these poisons he once had a slight experience himself, and he mentions one drug which he asserts is given to the child marked in advance for the Voodoo sacrifice, with the effect that it passes into a death-like sleep in which it can be buried and dug up, to be resuscitated in the Voodoo temple before being finally slain. If half the stories he tells about this and similar matters are true—and they are abundantly borne out by West Indian gossip—the sooner Hayti is handed over to European control the better it will be for civilisation. Perhaps when the Kaiser has finished with China he may be persuaded to take it in hand, for the few whites still lingering in the three towns of Hayti are reported by Mr. Prichard to be Germans.

Other things there are in Mr. Prichard's book—amongst them an interesting account of the "Black Napoleon," or Emperor Christophle. But the note common to them all is that the negro cannot govern.

Other New Books.

ANNALS OF A DOSS HOUSE.

BY SYDNEY HALLIFAX.

Mr. Hallifax writes from first-hand knowledge of a typical doss-house which he calls the "Phoenix," located in "a turning out of Ratcliff-highway." Each of the ten chapters is concerned with a separate story; nearly all are sad, and nearly all end with death. Perhaps this was inevitable; yet we feel that a book of this description, having in view a very definite humanitarian object, would have gained in force by some presentment of the brighter side. The festivities of a doss-house are certainly as educational as its squalor, its degradation, its inevitable immorality. But it must not be supposed that Mr. Hallifax has produced a book on lines too common in such records. There is no narrowness of outlook, no inability to take the larger view. Mr. Hallifax has sympathy, humour, and also a healthy and confident optimism. One never doubts for a moment the truth of the facts stated: there they are, set down broadly, clearly, and on the whole convincingly. Parson Drew, the "Dossier's" Bishop, "Tear 'em, Liza," and "Gentleman Jack" are all alive. But we think the fictional form which Mr. Hallifax has chosen detracts from their force. So handled, they make better reading, no doubt; but for philanthropical and reformatory purposes a bare statement of facts would better have served the author's purpose. These "annuals," however, are a worthy contribution to the sociology of a subject which has been tinkered at for many years. It is good for us to be presented with such narratives from the pen of a man who has both seen and understood. (George Allen. 2s. 6d.)

SILENCE ABSOLUTE,
AND OTHER POEMS.

BY F. EMLEY WALROND.

Mr. Walrond does not, as a whole, display any very pregnant or distinguished power in these poems; but he has at times a certain quality of fancy enough to redeem him from commonplace. As in this from the "Ode to the Evening Star":

Fair Star of Evening, thou who tremblest first Full-rounded from the mellow throat of night,
When o'er the darkling Earth she 'gins to pour,
Sweet as the fall of rain on flowers athirst,
Her slumbrous song: oh, thou melodious light,
Ray-scattering angel-tone, that from the shore
Of darkness gleamest on the rippled stress
Of undulating twilight, like a thought
New-kindled in a waste of barrenness:
Hear me, O hear! thou all of beauty wrought!

Lo! when the curtains of the Sun shook out
In shining folds o'er Heaven, and one by one
The eyes of night were shut before the blaze,
I thought of thee. And when a time of drought
Fell on the flowers at noon-day, and the Sun
Beat down upon the Earth his fiercest rays,
I sent my thought upon the wing to scour
The plains of Heaven and find thee 'mid the gloom:
And fell to trembling lest in that same hour
Some peril of the void might bring thee doom.

Better than this Mr. Walrond cannot do; worse he often achieves. On the whole, a book of poems of average mark. (Elkin Mathews. 1s. net.)

SONGS FROM THE BOOK OF JAFFIR.

ANON.

This little book, by an anonymous author, professes to be "adapted from the Persian translation of Jamshid of Yezd, the Guebre." The original is supposed to be the traditional song-book of an unnamed Eastern people. Each cycle of songs refers to some event in their history and is preceded by a prose account of that event. Whatever be the case in the Persian (assuming that the Persian version is not a fiction of the anonymous author), in English these poems make but average songs and ballads. There is more literary quality in the prose arguments which preface them. Here is a fairly representative stanza from the "Song of the Sword":

The Earth is its mother, the fire is its brother;
And woe to the hand, and a curse on the land,
If a traitor has worn it, a coward has drawn it.
O say who will dare it? My friend, is it you?
Who is worthy to wear it? The brave and the true.

Whether the book has an Oriental interest depends on that Persian version of which we are told nothing. (Macmillan.)

THE PROBLEM OF ASIA.

BY CAPT. A. T. MAHAN.

Captain A. T. Mahan is an officer in the United States Navy, but he is also a D.C.L. and an LL.D., and these letters will, perhaps, account for the donnish style in which he writes. But whether he be a well-travelled don or a well-read sea captain, what he has to say is always well worth hearing, and has an additional value from the fact that he necessarily writes from the point of view of an outsider or onlooker. In the present volume he gives us five essays reprinted from American magazines, three of them on the Problem of Asia and its effect upon international policies; one upon the effect of Asiatic Conditions upon world policies; and the last on the merits of the Transvaal Dispute. Captain Mahan treats the Asiatic problem from the standpoint of sea and land power, and points out that the Slav has the advantage on land and the Teutonic nations the advantage on sea. He groups England, Germany, and the United States together, because he holds that they have interests in common, and seems inclined to assign Manchuria and Northern China to Russia and the Yangtze Valley to the Teutonic nations, Russia having, he holds, a right to proper access to the Eastern seas. Every page is full of thought and of valuable suggestion; the only pity is that his style is not a trifle lighter. Captain Mahan's pen might be less ponderous without his arguments losing anything of their weight. As regards the Transvaal it is satisfactory to learn that he holds our action thoroughly justified on every score. The essays are sound and valuable contributions to the problems of the day, and contain less matter to be skipped than any books written of late about China and the Transvaal. Being one of those lookers-on who proverbially see most of the game, Captain Mahan is able to write without any prejudice or unconscious bias. (Sampson Low. 10s. 6d. net.)

DANIEL O'CONNELL.

BY ROBERT DUNLOP.

It is more than a little surprising to find Daniel O'Connell included in the "Heroes of the Nations" series, among such giants as Nelson, Gustavus Adolphus, Pericles, Napoleon, Alexander the Great, and so on. In these days of the unification of Italy and the consolidation of Germany it is only by courtesy that the term nation can be applied to Ireland, for the sister island only deserves the title as Naples used to before Italy was freed and united. But there seems even less cause for calling Daniel O'Connell a "hero." He was a lawyer and a demagogue, with a rough-and-ready wit and a foul tongue, and his insolent abuse of Disraeli, and such phrases of insult as calling Peel "a scented fop," Sir Henry Hardinge "a one-armed miscreant," and the Duke of Wellington "a stunted corporal," have nothing of the heroic about them. "The habit," says Mr. Dunlop, "grew upon him in ordinary conversation till such words as 'rogue,' 'villain,' 'scoundrel,' at last lost all precise significance for him." This volume gives a good account of O'Connell's life from the point of view of an admirer, and is as well written as it should be if it were worth writing at all. (Putnam's. 5s.)

In the "World's Epoch-Makers" series Messrs. T. & T. Clark have included William Herschel and His Work, by Mr. James Sime, this being the second volume.

The Book of the Home: an Encyclopædia of All Matters

Connected with the Home and Family Life is a title none too long for eight handsome five-shilling volumes, issued by the Gresham Publishing Company. The contents of The Book of the Home may be grouped under four heads. First, the House itself is dealt with, and everything appertaining to it, from the choice of its site to the least of its internal decorations. Secondly, the vexed question of Servants is treated. The methods of obtaining them, the proper arrangement of their work, their wages, their leisure and pleasures, all are discussed. Thirdly, the conduct of the Family is considered in all its details, down to advice on diet, clothing, exercise, &c. We have never seen a book of home management so packed with expert and abundant information; while the illustrations, many of which are in colour, surpass anything that has yet been applied to a work of this class. The five volumes already issued make an ideal Christmas present.

One by one the lives that have spent themselves on the North-West Frontier of India and during the Mutiny get themselves recorded. Such a life is described in the Memoirs of Edward Hare (Richards. 5s. net.). Edward Hare originally went out to the East as an assistant-surgeon in the East India Company's service. He served through the Afghan War of 1840-42, he was present throughout the whole of the siege of Delhi in 1857, and he served in the Second Burmese War of 1852. It was owing to experiments he carried out that quinine was recognised as essential to the successful treatment of malarial fevers. This book, admirably put together by Mr. E. C. Hare, consists mainly of Hare's racy letters to his parents and his wife. In one hundred and sixty pages we have a genuine portrait.

In Khurasan and Sistan (Blackwood, 21s.) Lieut.-Col. C. E. Yate, of the Indian Staff Corps, continues the narrative of travel in the East begun in his Northern Afghanistan. He now carries the description into Persia, and describes the districts of Khurasan and Sistan in detail, from the "Kurd and Turkoman country, along the Russian frontier, on the north, to the confines of Baluchistan, on the Indian frontier, to the south." The trade conditions of these districts, and the contrast between British and Russian administration which presented themselves to the traveller, are important elements in a book which is essentially an expert record, of value alike to the ethnologist and the publicist.

George H. C. Macgregor: a Biography, is the life-story of a devoted minister of the Free Church, a man with the frame of an athlete, and a zealous in the ministry. "A true soul-winner," his biographer calls him. (Hodder & Stoughton. 6s.)

To the "Leaders in Science" series Messrs. Putnam have added Thomas Henry Huxley, by M. P. Chalmers Mitchell. It is admittedly neither intimate nor authorised, but is simply an outline of the external features of his life, and an account of his contributions to the sum of knowledge.

The "Cathedral" series (Bell & Sons) now includes Worcester, by Mr. Edward F. Strange; and to the same publishers' "Continental Cathedrals" series Rouen, by the Rev. Thomas Perkins, is added.

Messrs. C. Arthur Pearson, Ltd., have issued Pilgrim's Progress, illustrated by Mr. E. M. Brock—a six-shilling-looking volume for two shillings.

Mr. Henry Atwell is our most accomplished selector of pensées. He has now turned his attention to the writings of Ruskin, from which he has extracted a number of ethical passages "which represent Ruskin rather as a teacher of the Good and the True than as a painter of the beautiful."

Three new editions: Borrow's The Bible in Spain (Lane, 2s. and 3s. net); Surtees's Handley Cross (Chatto & Windus, 6s.).

The Temple Primers multiply exceedingly. We now have Plant Life and Structure, by Dr. E. Dennert; and The Civilisation of the East, by Dr. Fritz Hommel (Dent, 1s. net each).

Fiction.

The Lady of Dreams. By Una L. Silberrad.
(W. Heinemann. 6s.)

ALTHOUGH less striking, this is an advance upon Miss Silberrad's first book, The Enchanter, and that was more than tolerably good. In the present novel Miss Silberrad renders the atmosphere of a narrow slum in the western half of London with a touch of real imaginative power. She can poetise without departing from a fairly strict factual naturalism. The hero, who quite overshadows the heroine and every other character, is Dr. Jim Tancreed—one of the tribe of giant-hearted, untidy, happy-go-lucky men not infrequently found in slum fiction.

"That is the best way to live," Tancreed assured her. "What is the good of asking how and why? It is not worth while when there is such a lot to do."

"You do yourself," she said, "else how is it that you trouble about the crookedness of the world?"

"I don't trouble about the whys and wherefores; I don't even try to cure the crookedness at all; I only do what I can to patch up the bad places. How the folks acquired them is not my concern. I don't ask and they don't always tell, and when they do I am no better off. I can't solve problems; patching is the only work I am equal to."

Certainly he is by no means an original creation, but Miss Silberrad has realised him vividly. We first meet the "Lady of Dreams" (whose title is scarcely accounted for) in the household of her uncle, who is dying from delirium tremens, and who more than once attempts murder on his very death-bed—and once succeeds. By an unfortunate accident Agnes kills him. The dreadful existence of Agnes with "D. T. Steele" is the best part of the book, sombre and tragic, yet lighted by gleams of poetry. Afterwards she marries Tancreed (without loving him) and falls in love with another man, Dick Orpingham. The end is a tragedy—reticently and strongly done. Technically, the principal fault of the book is that the mysterious business of Dick's parentage, passable enough in itself, has no bearing on the main theme. A number of minor sketches of character have distinct merit—notably that of Maurice Orpingham, who would be an actor. There is a sympathetic quality in the The Lady of Dreams which tempts the critic to over-praise. But one may say, very judiciously, that it shows singular promise, and that beauty is definitely achieved in it.

The Story of Ronald Kestrel. By A. J. Dawson.
(William Heinemann. 6s.)

THERE is an enigmatic "advertisement" to this book (in verse, and by the author) which leaves us in doubt whether or not Mr. Dawson wrote it merely to live. We should say probably not. But it is not as good as Mr. Dawson's best. Like all, or most, of his books, it is evidently based to some extent on personal experiences. It is the biography of a man of letters, as Daniel Whyte was the biography of a man of letters. One may be quite sure, by the way, that Mr. Dawson's very genuine talent will never come to full fruition until he lifts himself from the personal groove, and begins to observe from the outside, not from the inside. He has always drawn too much on his own adventures. The present novel opens in Morocco for no essential reason, but simply because Mr. Dawson can "do" the Mauresque local colour with effectiveness. Ronald Kestrel appears to us to be a true type of the modern novelist—the sort that "succeeds" suddenly and then discovers that he has not succeeded. Much of the observation is authentic, and though many pages concerning the literary trade may bore the general public, the profession will find satisfaction in them. Who that has ever published a book will not appreciate the "actuality" of this: "Then an enterprising newspaper-clipping agency sent him cuttings of the two first reviews of his book. Both were from Scotch daily papers. Both were written in tired journalese." On the other hand, Mr. Dawson's notion of reviewers is ludicrous—to reviewers.

The least satisfactory part of the book is the concluding chapters, which are fantastic and feebly sentimental. The wifeliness of Ronald's wife is mawkish. It is surprising how innate sentimentality "will out." And despite all pretences to the contrary, Mr. Dawson is a born sentimentalist.

A Gentleman. By the Hon. Mrs. Walter R. D. Forbes.
(John Murray. 6s.)

By way of being modern, the characters in A Gentleman sit down to "a perfectly chosen dinner," not at the Savoy, but at the Carlton. There is, further, that old acquaintance of the novel-reader's, the smart society woman whose lunches are the most exclusive thing in London. The hero, however, Raymond White, obtained admittance to those lunches with extraordinary ease. The fact is that he began well by rendering a service to a duke. Through the duke he saw the best society in Italy, England, and Australia. It was not till he fell in love with an earl's daughter that Raymond's troubles commenced. His mother allowed him a couple of thousand a year, and would settle thirty thousand on his wife; but this munificence was not sufficient for the earl. The earl wanted to know who Raymond's "people" were. Now Raymond had none of these absolutely indispensable "people." He certainly possessed a mother, but she lived at Wimbledon, and was very mysterious about herself. She would sooner give cheques to her son than information; and one day the youth was extremely annoyed to discover, by chance, that she was no other than Mélisse, the famous dressmaker—a fond woman with the ambition to make her son a "gentleman." After that the earl's daughter receded towards the impracticable; but Raymond went forth doggedly, and made a career and a name for himself, and won her. He ultimately rose so high that a certain Lady Effington said: "Yes, the Government can make him a duke; but Nature can do more, she can make him a gentleman." Despite the Carlton, this novel really belongs to the 'sixties. It has dignity and sobriety: it is free from the cheap tricks of sensationalism; it never offends; and sometimes it diverts.

Straight Shoes. By G. G. Chatterton.
(John Long. 6s.)

MR. CHATTERTON is a man of talent. Some of his previous work has won our esteem; but we are bound to say that Straight Shoes shows no advance—indeed, it shows a retrogression. In this new novel Mr. Chatterton sinned badly when he made an artist the causa causans of the plot. The following passage will explain what we mean:

Had Philip Brabazon never lighted on so exquisite a dryad he would, all the same, next day, have gone again to the wood to paint. So, with complacency, he might assure himself, even whilst wondering whether he would again be privileged to meet her there. The bare ten minutes they had stood together had been ample to impress him with her altogether unusual appearance. The slender, graceful, swaying figure; the face, framed in a glory of burnished hair, with its beauty both of colouring and form. The wild rose complexion and great deep-blue eyes; the fine chiselling of nose and chin which gave such charm of delicacy to the profile—and all lit up by a peculiar brilliancy which gave an effect as of having their beauties flashed upon him.

We should have credited Mr. Chatterton with wit enough to know that that particular situation, described in those particular words, simply cannot be used any more by any self-respecting novelist. One would not argue over it; the situation is done for; and when, at the close, he drags the pair together again, Philip being now Sir Philip, and cuts a more than Gordian knot by a fatal stroke of lightning, the author fills up the calendar of his iniquity. In the matter of plot, Straight Shoes ought to bring a blush to the cheek of Mr. Chatterton. We speak plainly because he is a writer of parts. In other respects the book is nicely done.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the week's Fiction are not necessarily final. Reviews of a selection will follow.]

MONTES, THE MATADOR.

BY FRANK HARRIS.

Three books stand to Mr. Frank Harris's name, Elder Conklin, and Other Stories, which was received with considerable favour; Mr. and Mrs. Davenport, in the press; and the present volume, which is a collection of five stories. The title of the first, "Montes, the Matador," explains itself—"Yes! I'm better, and the doctor tells me I've escaped once more—as if I cared! . . . And all through the fever you came every day to see me, so my niece says, and brought me the cool drink that drove the heat away and gave me sleep." "First Love" (cloaks, many and strange, are employed to cover the nakedness of the little god) is called "a confession," and a confession it certainly is. "Sonia" is a tale of passion, Nihilism, and assassination. (Richards.)

NUMBER ONE AND NUMBER TWO.

BY F. M. PEARD.

A bright, readable novel. Miss Bride Kennedy, the heroine, comes to the conclusion, on page 311, that "Life is a dreadfully complex affair," but no doubt she found it easier when Number One and Number Two had taken their proper places in her affections. The story passes among people in easy circumstances in Egypt (Miss Kennedy sat outside the New Continental Hotel at Cairo—reflecting), the period being two months after the fight at Omdurman. (Macmillan. 6s.)

THE IVORY BRIDE.

BY THOMAS PINKERTON.

A romance, told with spirit by the head of his house. His grandfather had taken up with the losing side in 1745, and in the downfall of their fortunes that resulted "nothing but the old castle and a few acres of poor land remained." It used to be said of the Chieftains of Ulpha that "they are all poets, and they marry princesses." That is enough for the intelligent novel reader. The story is written in a clean, pleasant style, and should find a public. (Long. 6s.)

A PRINCESS OF ARCADY.

BY ARTHUR HENRY.

This story is of the rural variety, and would be described by Mr. Mudie's clients as pretty. Mr. Alexander, "honourable and rich, cold and reserved," a solitary and a lover of the country, proposes to adopt "a little girl—a child of the fields. She is as fresh from the heart of nature as the tender pink and white anemones she was gathering." Certainly much of the freshness and the spirit of the country have been captured by Mr. Henry. (Murray. 6s.)

THE GOBLIN.

BY CATHERINE AND FLORENCE FOSTER.

Had the title-page not borne the sub-title "a novel" we should have classed this story as a welcome recruit to Mrs. L. T. Meade's juvenile public. In the beginning of the book the goblin is a boy. "And what's your name, my little fellow?" asked the bishop. "The goblin," answered Archie promptly. "I'm not a goblin really; I'm quite ordinary, only father says I'm one." "And what are you going to be when you're a man?" "A butcher," replied the Goblin without a second's hesitation. (Wells Gardner. 6s.)

Christmas Supplement.

MACMILLAN & CO.'S BOOKS SUITABLE FOR CHRISTMAS PRESENTS.

SYLVANA'S LETTERS TO AN UNKNOWN FRIEND.

By E. V. B.

With numerous Full-Page and other Illustrations. Extra crown 8vo, 8s. 6d. net.

THE ROMANCE OF SPAIN.

By CHARLES W. WOOD, F.R.G.S.

Illustrated. 8vo, 10s. net.

St. James's Gazette.—"The zeal of an enthusiast and the pen of a cultured and keen observer."

STAGE-COACH AND TAVERN DAYS IN AMERICA.

By ALICE MORSE EARLE.

Illustrated by the Author. Crown 8vo, buckram, gilt top, 10s. 6d.

THE WORKS OF RUDYARD KIPLING THE NEW UNIFORM EDITION.

In Thirteen Volumes. Extra crown 8vo, bound in scarlet cloth, with gilt tops, price 6s. each volume.

PLAIN TALES from the HILLS. With Portrait.
LIFE'S HANDICAP. Being Stories of Mine Own People.

MANY INVENTIONS.

THE LIGHT THAT FAILED.

WEE WILLIE WINKIE, and Other Stories.

SOLDIERS THREE, and Other Stories.

CAPTAINS COURAGEOUS. With Illustrations.

STALKY & CO.

THE JUNGLE BOOK. With Illustrations.

THE SECOND JUNGLE BOOK. With Illustrations.

THE DAY'S WORK.

FROM SEA to SEA, &c. In 2 vols.

IN SPECIAL BINDINGS FOR PRESENTATION.

Cloth elegant, gilt edges, 6s. per volume.

THE JUNGLE BOOK. With Illustrations by J. Lockwood Kipling, W. H. Drake, and P. Frenzeny.

THE SECOND JUNGLE BOOK. With Illustrations by J. Lockwood Kipling.

SOLDIER TALES. With Illustrations by A. S. Hartrick.

CAPTAINS COURAGEOUS. With Illustrations by I. W. Taber.

THE JUNGLE BOOK, and THE SECOND JUNGLE BOOK, in a box, 12s.

THE JUNGLE BOOK, THE SECOND JUNGLE BOOK, SOLDIER TALES, and CAPTAINS COURAGEOUS, in a box, 21s.

SECOND IMPRESSION NOW READY. LIFE AND LETTERS OF THOMAS HENRY HUXLEY.

By his Son, LEONARD HUXLEY.

With Portraits and Illustrations. 2 vols., 8vo, 30s. net.

F. MARION CRAWFORD'S NEW WORK. RULERS OF THE SOUTH. Sicily, Calabria, and Malta.

Illustrated by 28 Photographs and 91 Illustrations in the Text by Henry Brokman. In 2 vols., 8vo, 21s. net.

* * A Companion to "Ave Roma Immortalis."

SECOND IMPRESSION NOW READY. OLIVER CROMWELL.

By JOHN MORLEY.

With Portrait, 8vo, 10s. net. Illustrated Edition, extra crown 8vo, 14s. net.

By LORD ROBERTS. FORTY-ONE YEARS IN INDIA. From Subaltern to Commander-in-Chief.

Containing 14 Illustrations and Plans. 30th Edition. Extra crown 8vo, 10s. net.
LIBRARY EDITION. With Portraits on Steel. 2 vols., 8vo, 36s.

SHORT HISTORY OF THE ENGLISH PEOPLE.

By JOHN RICHARD GREEN, M.A.

Edited by Mrs. J. R. GREEN and Miss KATE NORGATE.

With 1,400 Illustrations. New Edition in 3 vols. Super royal 8vo, half-leather binding, 40s. net.

HIGHWAYS AND BYWAYS SERIES.

Profusely Illustrated. Extra crown 8vo, gilt tops, flat backs.
In uniform binding, 6s. per vol.

NORTH WALES. By A. G. Bradley. Illustrated by Hugh Thomson and Joseph Pennell.

DEVON and CORNWALL. By A. H. Norway. Illustrated by Joseph Pennell and Hugh Thomson.

NORMANDY. By Percy Dearmer, M.A. Illustrated by Joseph Pennell.

DONEGAL, &c. By Stephen Gwynn. Illustrated by Hugh Thomson.

YORKSHIRE. By Arthur H. Norway. Illustrated by Joseph Pennell and Hugh Thomson.

GIFT BOOKS FOR CHILDREN.

THE NECKLACE OF PRINCESS FIORIMONDE.

By MARY de MORGAN.

With 25 Illustrations by Walter Crane. Globe 8vo, 3s. 6d.

By MRS. MOLESWORTH.

THE HOUSE that GREW. Illustrated by Alice B. Woodward. Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d.

Pilot.—"One of the most pleasant story-books in Mrs. Molesworth's long list."

By THE AUTHOR OF "ELIZABETH AND HER GERMAN GARDEN."

THE APRIL BABY'S BOOK of TUNES.
With Coloured Illustrations by Kate Greenaway. Small 16o, 6s.

World.—"One of the most charming of this year's books for the young..... Full of the delicate humour and tenderness which have made the author's earlier books so deservedly popular."

* * ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUE SENT POST FREE ON APPLICATION.

MACMILLAN & CO., LIMITED, London.

With Coloured Illustrations by S. ROSAMOND PRÆGER.
THE TALE of the LITTLE TWIN
DRAGONS. Oblong 16o, picture boards, 6s.

Standard.—"Certainly one of the most humorous books of the season."

WRITTEN AND PICTURED BY MABEL DEARMER.

A NOAH'S ARK GEOGRAPHY. Globe
16o, picture boards, 6s.

World.—"Mrs. Dearmer's is an excellent scheme, and she has worked it out with much skill and no little humour. Her illustrations are as clever as her letterpress, and her book should be a much-prized addition to a nursery library."

GEORGE ALLEN'S LIST.

READY DECEMBER 10th.

TURNER AND RUSKIN.

An Exposition of the Work of Turner, with Descriptive and Critical Passages from the Writings of John Ruskin.

Edited and Arranged, with a Biographical Note on J. M. W. Turner, by

FREDERICK WEDMORE.

Illustrated with 87 Reproductions in Photogravure of the Artist's greatest Pictures and 4 Portraits.

In 2 vols., Imperial 4to, 16 in. by 11 in.

The issue for GREAT BRITAIN is limited to

A SPECIAL EDITION of 150 Copies, on Arnold Hand-made Paper, containing Two Sets of Plates, one on India Paper, and another Set in Portfolio on ordinary Paper, £15 15s. net.

Also an EDITION of 750 Copies, with all the Plates, £7 7s. net.

THE STORY OF MY LIFE (1870-1900).

By AUGUSTUS J. C. HARE.

Recollections of Places, People, and Conversations, chiefly from Letters and Journals. These three concluding volumes (IV. to VI.) are a sequel to those issued in 1896. Illustrated with 12 Portraits in Photogravure and 217 Wooden s. Crown 8vo, cloth, 41 11s. 6d.

ÆSCHYLUS: the Orestean Trilogy.

Translated into Verse, with Commentaries and Essays, and an Introduction on "The Rise of Greek Tragedy." By Prof. WARR. Illustrated with 13 Reproductions of Ancient Sculpture and Painting.

Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 7s. 6d. net.

NEW SIX-SHILLING NOVELS.

A BOER OF TO-DAY. By GEORGE COSSINS.

St. James's Budget.—"Enjoyable reading to those who have followed the war through its varying fortunes."

British Weekly.—"The hero died as he had lived, unexplained; but in his career we find a splendid history."

A TRAGEDY OF ERRORS. By GERALDINE HODGSON.

Glasgow Herald.—"Distinctly out of the common run, and we commend it warmly to the attention of the novel-reading public."

Manchester Guardian.—"A faithful and pathetic study."

Leeds Mercury.—"Quiet power and unusual originality."

SON OF JUDITH: A Tale of the Welsh Mining Valleys. By JOSEPH KEATING.

A powerful and original study of the strenuous life of Southern Wales, written from knowledge, and involving not only a picturesque completeness of detail uncommon in modern fiction, but also the gradual unfolding of a romantic love-story.

THE SWAY OF PHILIPPA: A Romance. By J. B. PATTON, Author of "Biji the Dancer."

Deals with many brilliant and delightful phases of life among clever, cultured, and charming people; its descriptive passages are full of life, colour, and beauty; and its love-interest is sustained from the first page to the last.

ANNALS OF A DOSS-HOUSE.

By SYDNEY HALLIFAX.

Crown 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d.

[Just out.

The material upon which this book is founded was collected by the author during a residence extending over more than 130 years in the East End of London.

London: GEORGE ALLEN, 156, Charing Cross Road.

J. M. DENT & CO.

MY BIRDS IN FREEDOM AND CAPTIVITY.

By the Rev. HUBERT D. ASTLEY.

With 22 Photogravures from Drawings by the Author and numerous Headpieces.

Medium 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 12s. 6d. net.

There is also a Large Paper Edition, limited to 100 copies, printed on Hand-made Paper, and with Duplicate Prints of some of the Photogravures in Tints and others on India Paper. The price of this Edition may be obtained from the Booksellers.

*.* This book is not intended to be a scientific treatise on ornithology, but embodies the author's personal experiences of the pleasure that the study and keeping of various birds can give.

FLORENCE.

By EDMUND G. GARDNER.

(Forming a Volume in the Mediæval Town Series.)

With Illustrations by NELLY ERICHSEN, and a Map. Third Thousand. Fcap. 8vo, cloth gilt, gilt top, 1s. 6d. net.

Spectator.—"We recall few, if any, works of a similar kind which contrive to display so complete a picture of an historic city—its history, politics, art, literature, and its spiritual life."

NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION.

RICHARD WAGNER By Houston Stewart CHAMBERLAIN. Translated from the German by G. AINSLIE HIGHT, and revised by the AUTHOR. With Photogravure Frontispiece and many Illustrations in the Text. Crown 4to, 10s. 6d. net.

*.* This Edition contains all the Illustrations, with the exception of the Photogravures and Facsimiles of Music, as in the original edition, which can still be obtained, price 25s. net.

Westminster Gazette.—"Anyone on the look-out for a handsome gift-book could find no more suitable work than this luxurious volume."

ALFRED TENNYSON. By Dr. R. F. Horton.

With Portraits and Illustrations. Crown 8vo, 1s. 6d. net.

Spectator.—"A very able criticism of the poet's life and work, and sets forth appreciatively, but without exaggeration, his great service to human faith and morals. We strongly commend this volume to our readers. It is a valuable contribution to the Tennyson literature."

THE HOLLY TREE & THE SEVEN POOR TRAVELLERS. By CHARLES DICKENS.

With Photogravure and Text Illustrations by C. E. Brock. Crown 8vo, 1s. 6d. net.

A NEW STORY BY THE AUTHOR OF "STUDIES IN LOVE."

THE CONVERSION OF MISS CAROLINE EDEN.

By MAUDE EGERTON KING. With a Photogravure Frontispiece by C. E. Brock. Fcap. 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

THE CHRISTMAS BOOK OF THE SEASON THE TRUE ANNALS OF FAIRYLAND.

Edited by WILLIAM CANTON. Part I.

THE REIGN OF KING HERLA.

With Frontispiece and Title-Page in Colours, and about 150 Illustrations by CHARLES ROBINSON. Crown 8vo, gilt edges, 4s. 6d. net.

Westminster Gazette.—"A very beautiful volume. ... Stories and pictures together make up one of the prettiest children's books of the season."

THE ADVENTURES of ODYSSEUS. Told for children. By F. S. MARVIN, R. J. G. MAYOR, and F. M. STAWELL. With Illustrations and Coloured Illustrations by Charles Robinson. 5s. net.

Outlook.—"The substance of the Odyssey is simple and admirably chosen words, such as children may understand and enjoy."

LULLABIES and BABY SONGS. A Posy for

Mothers. Compiled by A. L. J. GOSSET. With 35 Illustrations by Eva Roos. Demy 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

THE SCOTTISH CHIEFS. By Jane Porter. With

60 Illustrations and Coloured Frontispiece by T. H. Robinson. Large crown 8vo, 5s. net.

TALES for TOBY. By Ascott R. Hope. With

Illustrations by W. H. Robinson and S. Jacobs. Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

AN ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUE WILL BE SENT ON APPLICATION.

J. M. DENT & CO., 29 and 30, Bedford Street, W.C.

Christmas Books Supplement.

SATURDAY: 8 DECEMBER, 1900.

Christmas Books.

Art and Gift Books.

Sir Joshua Reynolds, First President of the Royal Academy. By Sir Walter Armstrong, Director of the National Gallery of Ireland. With seventy-eight photogravures and six lithographic facsimiles in colour. (Heinemann. £5 5s.)

THE wealth of pictures, the fine printing, and the quality of Sir Walter Armstrong's text, combine to make this the handsomest gift-book of the season. It is a splendid monument to the painter whose national supremacy grows daily more assured. It is forty years since Ruskin wrote the last word of his praise:

The work of other great men is hidden in its wonderfulness—you cannot see how it was done. But in Sir Joshua's there is no mystery; it is all amazement. No question but that the touch was so laid; only that it could have been so laid is a marvel for ever. So also is no painting so majestic in sweetness. He is lily-sceptred: his power blossoms, but burdens not. All other men of equal dignity paint more slowly; all others of equal force paint less lightly. Tintoret lays his line like a king marking the boundaries of conquered lands; but Sir Joshua leaves it as a summer wind its trace on a lake; he could have painted on a silken veil, where it fell free, and not bent it.

And his production was simply astonishing. Everyone knows, for instance, the Trafalgar-square portrait of Johnson; how many know that, replicas apart, Reynolds painted him seven times? A fine specimen of the perfection to which the photograving process has been brought fronts the title-page in the portrait—gazed upon by more eyes during the last six months than during the previous century and a half of its existence—"Nelly O'Brien," which is the principal treasure of the Wallace Collection. With regard to it Sir Walter Armstrong points out that Rubens' famous "Chapeau-de-paille," a comparison with which inevitably institutes itself, was not seen by Reynolds till his visit to Belgium in 1781, when he admired its "wonderful transparency," but judged the breasts to be "as ill-drawn as they are finely coloured." Of Sir Walter Armstrong's biography and appreciation—to which we shall return on another occasion—we can only say here that admirers of the painter are not encouraged to extravagance, nor lovers of the man to intemperate fondness.

Characters of Romance. By William Nicholson. (Heinemann. 42s. net.)

THESE sixteen imaginary portraits are not in method to be distinguished from the admirable and original work that Mr. Nicholson has applied to the portraiture of living people and to his London Types. Upon the familiar brown ground are laid massive patches of black, which touches of bright colour accentuate and interpret. The first effect of a portrait of a familiar character in fiction is almost always a shock, and it is necessary to wipe out many a fond imagination if we are to appreciate Mr. Nicholson's work at its true value. Don Quixote, one of the most successful of these clever attempts, we reproduce on another page. Among the rest, Porthos is a splendid example of the kind of subject specially suitable to Mr. Nicholson's methods. The figure is massive, heavy, and poised. In John Silver, the Stevensonian "like a ham" seems to have carried the artist a little off his feet. In fact, that which shines beneath the three-cornered hat is so like a ham that it requires an effort of detachment to see in it anything else. Of the rest—of Miss Haversham, Mr. Weller, Rochester, Sophia Western, Chicot, Munchausen, Miss Fotheringay with Captain Costigan, Madge Wildfire, "Krishna" Mulvaney (the maddest thing), Jorrocks, Gargantua, Mr. Vanslyperken, and Commodore Trunnion—we have only to say that, whether you like them or not (one or another probably everyone will hate), the more you look at them the more you must wonder at the originality and resource of the artist.

Pompeii: the City, its Life and Art. By Pierre Gusman. Translated by Florence Simmonds and M. Jourdain. (Heinemann. 36s. net.)

ALTHOUGH the volumes dealing with the buried cities of Campania number over a thousand, no one fortunate enough to acquire M. Gusman's handsome book is likely to look upon it as a superfluous addition to the list. It breathes throughout the spirit of an artist upon whom these unearthed mysteries of an arrested life have laid their spell. To such an one the interests of the trivial living world are dead. To turn these pages, to glance at the illustrations (there are 500 of them and twelve coloured plates), is for a moment to realise what must be the witchery of actual investigation. For the work still goes on. Of the nine districts into which for the purposes of excavation the city has been divided, only three have been fully searched and catalogued; while three are altogether untouched. Day by day are brought to light new inscriptions, new works of art, portraits, statues—many of them even with their glazing of wax intact—and a thousand notes of the Hellenistic culture of the Augustan age. Then, "as in the days of Noe"—

Here on earth they bore their fruit, mirth and folly were the crop:

What of soul was left, I wonder, when the kissing had to stop!

The Later Work of Aubrey Beardsley. (Lane. 42s. net.)

AN obsession of beauty and terror was Beardsley's lot. In almost all he did these elements, closely interwoven, may yet be distinguished. Lines most beautiful in themselves are directed, as it were, by some masterful demon to the expression of all that the less tainted soul shrinks from. Cruelty, hatred, pride, imbecile vanity, abject selfishness trip and mince and strut and swagger; degradation smirks out of the gorgeous page; every decorative adjunct is over-ruled for evil by this alien Will. Well, perhaps everybody knows all that. What it is our impartial business to say here is, that this second volume of the later work falls not behind its predecessor in such morbid charm as was to be found there. But the charming Christmas Card—a Madonna and Child—with a few others in a less familiar kind, stands apart as the expression of the sweeter, saner mood that dominated the last days of that tormented life.

The Celestial Country: Hymns and Poems on the Joys and Glories of Paradise. With Illustrations after Fra Angelico, Ghirlandajo, Botticelli, Lippi, Bernardino Luini, Benozzo Gozzoli, and Carpaccio. (Seeley. 12s. 6d.)

To turn the pages of this lovely volume is to breathe a sweeter air. In the poems there is nothing that is cheap or common. From the Greek and the Latin the anonymous compiler has culled flowers of spiritual verse—the great hymns conceived by the simplicity of the saints, which through the ages have been cherished in the hearts of the faithful. Many of them are familiar, at least in part, in their English dress; and those who love the fragments commonly sung in English churches will rejoice the more to possess them entire. The sweet lines, the fresh grace of the early Italian painters, give beautiful significance to the liturgical hymns of East and West, and not less to the meditations of Milton, Vaughan, Cowper, and Newman.

Confessions of Saint Augustine. Edited by Temple Scott, with an Introduction by Alice Meynell. "Religious Life" Series. (Grant Richards. 3s. 6d.)

"STRIPPED of this"—the secondary love that, more than heresy, more than a will unsacrificed, had kept him for a while from the First and Only Fair—"St. Augustine stood alone with the end of his search, alone in the great sincerity, one of the greatest sincerities of the human race." For it is the entire sincerity of a great nature that marks—nay, that makes—a great man. That is why the Confessions come to us over and over again—this time in a beautiful dress that would suit the shelves of a monastic library. Principally, however, this edition has a differential value in the Introduction from which we have quoted, wherein, with her firm and gentle hand, Mrs. Meynell preludes so just an accord.

The Poems of Edgar Allan Poe. Illustrated and Decorated by W. Heath Robinson. With an Introduction by H. Noel Williams. (Macmillan.)

ANY admirer of Poe's uncanny genius will be glad to possess this edition of his poems. For in Mr. Heath Robinson's illustrations there is nothing to wound the most sensitive preconceptions. He has known how to touch very sympathetically the fantastic notions of his author, and, in the pure lines of decorative drawing, to keep far enough from the gross and the obvious. Mr. Williams's Introduction, if not particularly distinguished, may serve its purpose in guiding the explorer of a younger generation to a just appreciation of a poet who, whatever may be said as to his limitations, does rank among

The bards sublime,
Whose distant footsteps echo
Through the corridors of time.

Along French Byways (Macmillan, 8s. 6d. net), by Mr. Clifton Johnson, "is a book of strolling, a book of nature, a book of peasant life, intermingled with the chance experiences of the narrator." The impressions recorded are those of a man who keeps a pleasantly open mind. There are particularly interesting chapters on "French Child Life" and "French Thrift," and those dealing with Lourdes and Barbizon treat with some freshness subjects which we have come to regard as almost threadbare. The volume is fully illustrated with many well-selected and characteristic photographs, those of field and village life being especially good.

Mrs. Seton-Thompson, in A Woman Tenderfoot (Nutt, 6s. net), has given us her experiences as a huntress "out West," and very entertaining experiences they are. The adventures are described with much humour and light-heartedness, the instinct of the woman often clashing with the sterner realities of sport. Mrs. Seton-Thompson's first elk gave her no joy. "I sat on the ground where I was and made no attempt to go near him. So that was all. One instant a magnificent breathing thing, the next—nothing." A good gift-book either for boys or athletic girls.

We have recently mentioned Messrs. Macmillan's (3s. 6d. net) "Library of English Classics." This series is so particularly excellent both in form and matter that we refer to it again at this season of gifts. The set would make a handsome contribution to any library, containing, as it does, such classics as Bacon's Essays, Malory's Morte d'Arthur, Fielding's Tom Jones, and Shelton's Don Quixote. We contemplate with pride our row of tall red volumes along which just sufficient gold glitters to please the eye.

We have received new editions of Penelope's English Experiences and Penelope's Experiences in Scotland (Gay & Bird), by Miss Kate Douglas Wiggin. The popularity of these books is attested by the fact that they have reached respectively their eighth and ninth editions. Their quaint humour reads as briskly as ever, and Mr. C. E. Brock in his illustrations has happily caught the spirit of

The English Butler.

Miss Wiggin's work. We reproduce two of these drawings.

We have from Mr. John Leyland, in the "Country Life Library," a volume devoted to The Shakespeare Country (Newnes, 10s. 6d. net). The book is very fully illustrated from photographs, and contains a large amount of topographical detail. Stratford is exhaustively dealt with.

In the latest volume of the "Medieval Towns" series (Dent) Mr. W. H. Hutton deals with Constantinople. He refers to his work as "the holiday task, very pleasant to him, of a College don." The volume takes its place worthily in an excellent series.

"The Little Library" (Methuen, 1s. 6d. net) has been increased by seven volumes—Tennyson's Maud and Early Poems, Kinglake's Eothen, the first part of The Vision of Dante, A Little Book of English Prose, and John Halifax (2 vols.).

The first volume of Mr. Buxton Forman's new complete edition of the Works of John Keats (Gowans & Gray, 1s. net.) contains the poems published in 1817 and Endymion. There are numerous footnotes—too numerous, perhaps—and a prefatory memoir.

It would be impossible to deny the key of the win cellar to a being so steeped in snuggles.

Don Quixote.

(From "Characters of Romance," by William Nicholson.)

The latest volumes of "The Chiswick Shakespeare" (Bell) are Coriolanus, Much Ado about Nothing, and Antony and Cleopatra. This is a most charming series, and Mr. Byam Shaw's illustrations, although not everybody's taste, really add to its value, which can be said of few Shakespeare illustrations. Mr. Shaw's work has intellectual and imaginative qualities of a high order. He does not narrow his subjects by endeavouring to individualise character too strongly; he gives us symbols rather, with rigorous decorative effects. We reproduce a drawing from Antony and Cleopatra.

We may also mention Messrs. Newnes's neat and convenient edition of Shakespeare, now nearing completion, and the edition edited by Mr. Gollancz (Dent). The latter has many antiquarian and topographical illustrations, some of which possess considerable interest.

A second edition of Mr. Stopford Brooke's study of Tennyson (Isbister) has been issued, with portraits, in two pretty volumes.

Beckford's Fathek (Gibbings, 2s. 6d.) has turned up once more, this time with an Introduction by Dr. Garnett. A pleasant volume to handle, with half-a-dozen clever etchings by Mr. Herbert Nye.

From Mr. John Lane comes a booklet of Rossetti's, Blessed Damsel (1s. net), and Browning's Love Poems in "The Lovers' Library" (1s. 6d. net). The illustrations to the Blessed Damsel, by Mr. Percy Bulcock, are extremely Rossettian in artistic manner.

We have already referred to the appearance and form of Mr. Quiller-Couch's Oxford Book of English Verse, and we now receive from the publishers (The Clarendon Press) a copy beautifully printed on India paper. This edition is so excellent, suitable alike for shelf or pocket, that the earlier volume seems outshone by its smaller sister.

Books for Children.

"CHILDREN'S books" is a phrase that covers, perhaps, too much ground. It means, used in the ordinary way, alike such stories as Mr. Henty writes, such stories as Mr. Lang collects, such stories as Mrs. Molesworth writes, such medleys of rhyme and picture as the adventures of the Golliwogg, and also those highly-coloured publications that are known to the trade as "toy-books."

Obviously there must be some attempt at distinction. As a convenient, if not final, classification, we are, in the articles that follow, calling those books which make their principal appeal through their pictures, and are aimed at quite small children, "Picture Books"; those books aimed at children between (say) seven and thirteen, which consist of stories and illustrations, the principal appeal being through the story, "Story Books"; and those books which make the story everything, and give the artist only a minute opportunity, or none at all—aiming to fill the gap between "Story Books" and romance proper—"Tales for Boys and Girls."

The great number of children's books now published annually makes it impossible to do more than mention by name a large proportion; but in order that this mention should have more than a mere catalogue meaning, we have arranged the books in each division in the order of merit which seems to us right.

The Best "Picture Books."

An illustrator who understands the needs of the nursery as well as anyone now drawing is Mr. Harry B. Neilson, who is represented this year by two books: Droll Doings (Blackie) and The Jungle School (Cassell). Mr. Neilson has a positive genius for making animals comic: his naughty elephants and foolish rabbits, his domestic lions and indisposed bears, are practically perfect. They have not the rich humour of Oberlander's drawings (in the Fliegende Blätter), but for the nursery they go as far as need be.

Beasts and birds seriously drawn—of great fascination to the young observer—are to be found in Mr. Percy J. Billingham's One Hundred Stories of Animals (Lane). This book is to be recommended very highly.

The return of Miss Kate Greenaway to the Christmas book is an event which calls for celebration. Miss Greenaway does not, however, belong this year properly to the section "Picture Books," because she is allied with the charming author of Elizabeth and Her German Garden in a work—The April Baby's Book of Tunes (Macmillan)—which everyone will, of course, read. The pictures are only a detail. None the less we place it here. Miss Greenaway does not quite recapture the delicious innocencies and quaintnesses of her earlier manner, but it is very pleasant to see her at work again.

Little, if any, less satisfying to the child's eye are the pictures by an artist new to us—Miss Edith Harwood—in Mrs. Gomme's Old English Singing Games (Allen). Miss Harwood, who has a very agreeable, if rather sombre, sense of colour, and a winsome fancy, is a worthy addition to the ranks of the illustrators.

Miss Florence K. Upton, the inspired creator of the Golliwogg, is another artist who precisely comprehends what children want. The new volume of that great epic—the Golliwoggiad—The Golliwogg's Polar Adventures (Longmans), has pictures as ingeniously coloured and profoundly moving as any of the series.

Miss Praeger's Tale of the Little Twin Dragons (Macmillan) is a happy exercise in humorous-grotesque, carried out with much skill and spirit. The work shows throughout the mind really eager to amuse its chosen audience.

Mr. F. D. Bedford, the artist of Four and Twenty Toilers (Richards), has the root of the matter. Drama, which, of course, is of the highest importance, does not come easily

SMITH, ELDER & CO.'S BOOKS FOR PRESENTS.

JUST PUBLISHED.—A VOLUNTEER'S EXPERIENCES IN THE BOER WAR.—With a Frontispiece, crown 8vo, 6s.

NOTICE.—The FIRST IMPRESSION having been sold out before publication, a SECOND IMPRESSION is in the press, and will be ready immediately.

IN THE RANKS OF THE C.I.V. A Narrative and Diary of Personal Experiences with the C.I.V. Battery (Hon. Artillery Company) in South Africa. By "Driver" ERSKINE CHILDERS, Clerk in the House of Commons.

NEW VOLUME BY DR. W. H. FITCHETT.—On DECEMBER 18. Crown 8vo, 6s.

WELLINGTON'S MEN. Some Soldier-Autobiographies.

[Kincaid's "Adventures in the Rifle Brigade"; "Rifleman Harris"; Anton's "Military Life"; Mercer's "Waterloo." Edited by W. H. FITCHETT, M.A., LL.D., Author of "Deeds that Won the Empire," "Fights for the Flag," "How England Saved Europe," &c.]

*.* This work describes war as seen by the man in the ranks. There is enough reality about it to give it historical value, with sufficient personal incident to make it readable as a novel.

A LIFETIME IN SOUTH AFRICA: being the Recollections of the First Premier of Natal. By the Hon. Sir JOHN ROBINSON, K.C.M.G., Author of "George Lindon," "The Colonies and the Century," &c. Large crown 8vo, 10s. 6d.

Pall Mall Gazette.—"Few could write a South African book carrying so much authority as one by Sir John Robinson, and these reminiscences constitute one triumphant testimonial to the persistence for good of British men. It is a story to make every Briton proud of his race, of Natal, and of Sir John Robinson, and a story for every Briton to read."

SKETCH.—"Unquestionably the most striking book the War has produced. A masterly piece of work, a real contribution to historical writing."

SIXTH IMPRESSION NOW READY.

SEVENTH IMPRESSION (SECOND EDITION) IN THE PRESS.

With Maps, large crown 8vo, 7s. 6d.

THE GREAT BOER WAR.

By A. CONAN DOYLE.

AUTHOR OF "THE WHITE COMPANY," "RODNEY STONE," "UNCLE BERNAC," "THE TRAGEDY OF THE KOROSKO," "THE GREEN FLAG, AND OTHER STORIES OF WAR AND SPORT," &c.

Queen.—"Whatever histories of the War in South Africa are written, Dr. Conan Doyle's 'Great Boer War' must remain the history.... It is a wonderful piece of writing, painstakingly accurate, and as brilliantly picturesque as any of the novels which have made Dr. Doyle's name a household word. Marvellously exciting, admirably lucid, scrupulously just."

BY THE SAME AUTHOR.

On DECEMBER 18. NEW AND CHEAPER ILLUSTRATED EDITION (the TWENTY-THIRD EDITION).

THE WHITE COMPANY. By A. Conan Doyle.
With 8 Full-page Illustrations. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

MORE POT-POURRI from a SURREY GARDEN.
By Mrs. C. W. EARLE, Author of "Pot-Pourri from a Surrey Garden." FOURTH IMPRESSION. Large crown 8vo, 7s. 6d.

BY THE SAME AUTHOR.

POT-POURRI from a SURREY GARDEN. By Mrs. C. W. EARLE. With an Appendix by Lady CONSTANCE LYTON. TWENTY-THIRD IMPRESSION. Crown 8vo, 7s. 6d.

THE MEN of the MERCHANT SERVICE: being the Polity of the Mercantile Marine for 'Longshore Readers' By FRANK T. BULLEN, F.R.G.S., Author of "The Cruise of the 'Cachalot,'" "The Log of a Sea Waif," &c. Large post 8vo, 7s. 6d.

BY THE SAME AUTHOR.

THE CRUISE of the "CACHALOT" ROUND the WORLD after SPERM WHALES. By FRANK T. BULLEN, First Mate. The Volume includes a Letter to the Author from Rudyard Kipling. SIXTH EDITION. With 8 Illustrations and a Chart. Large post 8vo, 8s. 6d.

THE LOG of a SEA WAIF: being Recollections of the First Four Years of my Sea Life. By FRANK T. BULLEN, F.R.G.S., Author of "The Cruise of the 'Cachalot,'" "Idylls of the Sea," &c. SECOND IMPRESSION. With 8 Full-page Illustrations specially drawn by Arthur Twiddle. Large post 8vo, 8s. 6d.

HOW ENGLAND SAVED EUROPE: the Story of the Great War (1793-1815). By W. H. FITCHETT, M.A., LL.D., Author of "Deeds that Won the Empire," "Fights for the Flag," &c. 4 vols., crown 8vo, with Portraits, Facsimiles, and Plans, 6s. each.

BY THE SAME AUTHOR.

FIGHTS for the FLAG. Second Edition. With 16 Portraits, 13 Plans, and a Facsimile Letter of the Duke of Marlborough. Crown 8vo, 6s.

DEEDS that WON the EMPIRE. Twelfth Edition. With 16 Portraits and 11 Plans. Crown 8vo, 6s.

T LEAVES. A Collection of Pieces for Public Reading. By EDWARD F. TURNER. Seventh Edition. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

BY THE SAME AUTHOR.

MORE T LEAVES: A Collection TANTLER'S SISTER, and other of Pieces for Public Reading. Untruthful Stories. Third Edition. Second Edition. Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

UNWRITTEN LAWS and IDEALS of ACTIVE CAREERS. Edited by E. H. PITCAIRN. Large crown 8vo, 7s. 6d.

THE POETICAL WORKS of ROBERT BRIDGES. Vols. I. and II. Small post 8vo, 6s. each.

A TREASURY of IRISH POETRY in the ENGLISH TONGUE. Edited by the Rev. STOPFORD A. BROOKE and T. W. ROLLESTON. Crown 8vo, 7s. 6d.

Among the Contributors to the volume are Mr. Lionel Johnson, Mr. A. P. Graves, Professor W. McNeill Dixon, Dr. George Sigerson, Dr. Douglas Hyde, Mr. D. J. O'Donoghue, Mr. W. B. Yeats, and Mr. George Russell ("A. E.").

LORD LILFORD (THOMAS LITTLETON, FOURTH BARON, F.Z.S., President of the British Ornithologists' Union. A Memoir by his Sister. With an Introduction by the Bishop of London. With a Portrait, 16 Full-page Illustrations, and a Facsimile Letter. Large crown 8vo, 10s. 6d. [On December 11.]

DOMESTICITIES. A Little Book of Household Impressions. By E. V. LUCAS. Small fcap. 8vo, 3s. [On December 10.]

CONFERENCES on BOOKS and MEN. Reprinted from the Cornhill Magazine. By the Author of "Pages from a Private Diary." Crown 8vo, 6s.

BY THE SAME AUTHOR.

PAGES from a PRIVATE DIARY. Reprinted from the Cornhill Magazine. FOURTH EDITION. Crown 8vo, 6s.

A LIFE of WILLIAM SHAKESPEARE. By Sidney LEE, Editor of "The Dictionary of National Biography." FOURTH EDITION. With a Portrait of Shakespeare, a Portrait of the Earl of Southampton, and Facsimiles of Shakespeare's known Signatures. Crown 8vo, 7s. 6d.

*.* Also the ILLUSTRATED LIBRARY EDITION, in 1 vol., medium 8vo, profusely illustrated with Photogravures, Topographical Views, &c., 16s.; and the STUDENT'S EDITION, with Photogravure Plate and 4 Full-page Illustrations. Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d.

THE ETCHINGHAM LETTERS. By Mrs. Fuller MATTLAND, Author of "Pages from the Day-Book of Bethia Hardacre," &c., and Sir FREDERICK POLLOCK, Bart. FOURTH IMPRESSION. Crown 8vo, 6s.

THE COMPLETE WORKS of ROBERT BROWNING. Edited and Annotated by AUGUSTINE BIRRELL, Q.C., M.P., and FREDERIC G. KENYON. 2 vols., large crown 8vo, bound in cloth, gilt top, with a Portrait Frontispiece to each volume, 7s. 6d. per volume.

THE POEMS of ELIZABETH BARRETT BROWNING. Complete in 1 vol., with Portrait. Large crown 8vo, bound in cloth, with gilt top, 7s. 6d.

A SELECTION from the POETRY of ELIZABETH BARRETT BROWNING. First Series, crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.; Second Series, crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

A SELECTION from the POETICAL WORKS of ROBERT BROWNING. First Series, crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.; Second Series, crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

NOVELS OF THE SEASON.

THIRD IMPRESSION. With Illustrations by Albert Sterner. Crown 8vo, 6s.

ELEANOR. By Mrs. Humphry Ward, Author of "Robert Elsmere," "Marcella," "Sir George Treasady," &c.

St. James's Gazette.—"The character of Lucy Foster is beautifully drawn. The struggle between jealousy and friendship in Mrs. Burgoyne is exceedingly true to life. The situation is intensely dramatic... Mrs. Humphry Ward has realised it with subtle insight, and handled it with a refined and feeling touch which no contemporary writer could surpass... The whole book shows a great writer at her very best."

A DAUGHTER of the FIELDS By Katharine TYNAN, Author of "The Dear Irish Girl," "She Walks in Beauty," &c. Scotsman.—"As pretty and pleasing an Irish story as ever Miss Tynan has written."

THE BRASS BOTTLE. By F. Anstey, Author of "Vice-Versa," "The Giant's Robe," "A Fallen Idol," &c. SECOND IMPRESSION. With a Frontispiece, crown 8vo, 6s.

Daily Telegraph.—"A decided success.... Mr. F. Anstey's quaint conceit is in his best manner. It is quietly humorous from start to finish, and invariably bright."

THE ISLE of UNREST. By Henry Seton MERRIMAN, Author of "The Sowers," "In Kedar's Tents," "Roden's Corner." With 6 Full-page Illustrations, crown 8vo, 6s.

Third Impression nearly sold out.

Fourth Impression in the Press.

Times.—"Capital reading, absorbing reading.... An exciting story, with 'thrills' at every third page."

MESSRS. SMITH, ELDER & CO. will be happy to send a copy of their CATALOGUE post free on application.

London: SMITH, ELDER & CO., 15, Waterloo Place, S.W.

to him: but detail he understands and gives. The value of this book lies in its fidelity to that kind of life which interests children profoundly. Our own opinion is that Mr. Bedford's art will wear better than that of many of his competitors, on account of its sincerity.

From Mr. Richards also comes A Trip to Toyland, by Mr. Henry Mayer, which has the quality of interest well developed. A child cannot but want to know what happens on the next page; and that is half the battle. Mr. Mayer is perhaps over exuberant, over sophisticated; but his drawings are full of spirit and vigour, and his subject is a right one. The first half of the book could hardly be better.

Mr. Walter Crane won his spurs many years ago. New generations, however, arise who do not know him, and the reprint, in one volume, of his Beauty and the Beast, and two other books (Lane), may be considered as new. Mr. Crane has grave faults of stiffness and angularity; but his colour atones for much. He also understands detail, though in the spirit of a decorative artist rather than as a friend of the nursery. None the less, he prevails.

Anything more different than the toy-book methods of Mr. Crane and Mr. J. A. Shepherd, the artist of A Frog He Would—and Who Killed Cock Robin? (Richards), could not be imagined; but Mr. Shepherd prevails too. Mr. Shepherd might, we think, have put more care into his work (the nursery is as well worth drawing for as the Strand Magazine); but his pen and spirits carry him through.

So much for the more self-conscious of the new Picture books—the Picture books in which the artist's temperament has play. There remain a number of excellent toy-books in colours, issued by Messrs. Nelson, where we have pictures of a more realistic character and less personality, really fine pictures, well coloured and full of recognisable life. These are The Red, White, and Blue, A Week at the Farm, and By Rail, treating respectively of ships, the country, and the railway-train. All are first-rate.

Other "Picture Books."

Many of the books which we have put into the second class of "Picture Books" suffer from lack of thought; others from lack of material; and others from inferior workmanship or mistaken choice of subject.

Mr. J. Hassall's pictures in Barbara's Song Book (Allen) have great qualities and are most successfully coloured, but too little happens.—Mrs. Farniloe's book Piccallilli (Richards) is open to the same objection. Mrs. Farniloe has a delightful touch, and to the adult eye her pictures are charming, but it is difficult to believe that before deciding upon a drawing she asks herself the question: "How can I make this most interesting to a child?" There is no other way, if success is to be reached.—A similar fault is to be urged against A Child's London (Sands), by Mr. Carton Moore Park, where the artist has sacrificed nothing of his art in the interests of the nursery.—In The Little Boy Book (Lane) Mr. Frank Verbeck, the artist, has given too much rein to a tendency to the grotesque.—A very pretty illustrator is Miss Grace A. May, the author of some delicate little scenes in Proverbs Improved (Lane), but we cannot praise it as we should like on account of a certain lack of interest in the general subject. A picture should tell its own tale rather more clearly than these do.—Another illustrator with a very soft pencil and a pleasant sense of fun is Miss Rosamund Praeger, author of The Child's Picture Grammar (Allen), as well as of the Dragon book mentioned below. But—think of it!—a picture grammar. It is almost a contradiction in terms.—Mistaken subject is also the objection to The Tremendous Twins; or, How the Boers Were Beaten (Richards), by Mrs. Ernest Ames. It is an error to falsify history of so recent a date for the amusement of children. They are not deceived, and are therefore bewildered. Mrs. Ames is, however, very good fun: a remark we cannot extend for a moment to the T'n Little Boer Boys (Dean & Son) of Mr. A. S. Forrest, which is an outrage on good taste.

Among other books of the season are Fiddlesticks (Pearson), by Miss Hilda Cowham, a lady with a skilful pencil, but too undisciplined a fancy. The real wants of the nursery can never have been considered by her. The humour of spiral legs, we would point out, is soon exhausted.—Mr. W. T. Horton, the author of Grigs (Moffatt & Paige), has also thought too little, and has, moreover, been too sparing of his drawing.—Mr. Arthur Layard's Mary's Menagerie (Hurst & Blackett) errs against good taste too often to be recommended. Pictures of animals in padded rooms and of birds overcome by whiskey are out of place in books for children.—The Bunkum Book (Warne) has a wealth of colour and fantastic incident, but we cannot recommend it. Children are far more interested in what is normal, unless the abnormal has sympathetic pains behind it.—Of Mother Goose Cooked (Lane), by J. H. Myrtle and R. Rigby, we cannot find anything good to say.—Mr. Forrest's John Gilpin (Dean) reproduces too closely for our taste the idea of Caldecott's treatment of the same theme, without his imagination, grace, or quality of humour.

The Best "Story Books."

High in this section we would put Granny's Wonderful Chair, by Frances Browne (Griffith & Farran), which, though an old book reprinted, is to this generation quite new; and certainly no really new book of this present season contains a better sense of story-telling.

Edward Lear's Nonsense Songs (Warne) is also an old book, and a book, too, that is fairly well known; but Mr. Leslie Brooke's admirable drawings, quite in the Lear spirit, give it a fresh character. His treatment of the Dong with the Luminous Nose is most satisfactory. This book, by the way, may also be had in two volumes—The Jumbies and The Pelican Chorus.

Mr. Andrew Lang, in the search for colour by which to name his annual collections, has this year come to grey, which has hardly a Christmassy sound. But The Grey Fairy Book (Longmans) is grey only in name. The quality of story is naturally getting less rich; but Mr. Lang does not make mistakes in these matters.

Mr. William Canton, who is best known for his writings about children, is now writing for them. In The True Annals of Fairy Land (Dent) he blends with considerable skill and charm a new story with several of the old ones. His title makes perhaps too large a claim; but the book is always pleasant, if unnecessarily archaic now and then. Some of Mr. Charles Robinson's illustrations are involved to a point of bewilderment. "Simplify, simplify," we would say to him, in Thoreau's phrase.

For admirable illustrations joined to good story there is no better book this year than Mr. Seton Thompson's Biography of a Grizzly (Hodder & Stoughton). The story might be fuller, one feels—more exciting, more picturesque; but, as far as it goes, it is deeply interesting. Mr. Nutt is also publishing for Mr. Seton Thompson a selection of four stories from Wild Animals I Have Known (which is now a classic in America), entitled Raggybug the Rabbit.

From America come also The Dream Fox Story Book, by Mabel Osgood Wright (Macmillan), embodying in the Dream Fox (who rides a Night Mare) a new and useful addition to nursery mythology; and In the Deep Woods (Heinemann), by Albert Bigelow Paine, a sufficiently successful attempt to reap in Uncle Remus's fields. Mr. Paine's especial heroes are Mr. Possum and Mr. Coon. The illustrations are many and agreeably circumstantial.

The lady who writes under the name of E. Nesbit last year delighted children with The Treasure Seekers. This year she has put forth The Book of Dragons (Harpers), which, though commanding attention, has not quite the right touch. The reader is not convinced that the author is in earnest—a grave fault. The illustrations, by Mr. H. R. Millar, are admirable.—Mr. Millar is also happy in The Ruby Fairy Book (Hutchinson), a collection of modern fairy tales.—Other collections of fairy or magical stories are Fairy Tales from Afar (Hutchinson), a translation from the Danish of Grundtvig, and Wonder Stories from Herodotus (Harpers), by Messrs. G. H. Boden and W. B. D'Almeida, in which, perhaps for the first time, children may learn the moving histories of Cæsus and Astyages, Ladronius and Polycrates. To serve up Herodotus thus was a happy thought. Mr. Granville Fell's illustrations lack sympathy, but are decoratively effective. That, however, is not what the nursery wants.

Some Christmas Book Covers.

In this section we would also place Mrs. Dearmer's A Noah's Ark Geography (Macmillan), which, though its story might be still better—more concentrated and amusing—easily conquers. Mrs. Dearmer's coloured plates are not to be resisted by any small child.—The Tales Told in the Zoo (Unwin), by F. C. Gould and F. H. C. Gould, belong to a more permanent category. One can imagine these interesting legends—in which so many animal mysteries are accounted for—being read for many years to come. It is a pity that Mr. F. C. Gould did not take the work of illustrating more seriously. A man who can do so much to amuse politicians might have toiled a little more to make attractive pictures for children.

The real novelty of the season is a book published by Mr. Fisher Unwin, called The Home of Santa Claus, the author of which, Mr. George A. Best, has illustrated the books by photographs. This sounds a difficult process; but ingenuity will overcome most obstacles, and ingenuity has been at play here. Dolls and dolls'-houses have been arranged to make citizens and cities, and, with the wig-maker's help, a real Father Christmas has been contrived. After these preparations the production of the pictures was simple. The narrative is a matter-of-fact account of the wonderful country, fairly well done.

Lastly, we would recommend the new illustrated edition of The Scottish Chiefs which Mr. Dent publishes.

Other "Story Books."

We cannot recommend so readily some of the remaining books in the division of "Story Books." Mr. Gelett Burgess's The Lively City of Ligg (Methuen), for instance, though filled with very unusual fancy, does not satisfy us as a children's book. Grand pianos that are in love with windmills, ships that rush over the land, lamp-posts that go for trips on a steamer, are a little too much, unless they have more fun to fortify them than Mr. Burgess possesses. Invention alone cannot stand.

Mr. Burgess is the author and artist also of Goops (Methuen), the verse of which is very happy. The drawings, however, have monotony, and Mr. Burgess's idea of a small child is so unfinished as to be positively unpleasant. But altogether we are disposed—remembering that children can hardly share this view—to class Goops with the best books of its class.—Mr. E. H. Cooper, the author of Wyandottus and The Mountain Fairies (Duckworth & Co.), commits the error of being too satisfied with his narrative gifts. There is about this book an air of "Fairy stories! Bless your heart, they're as easy as talking," which is dead against the rules of the game.—Mr. G. E. Farrow's Mandarin's Kite (Skeffington) also suffers a little from its author's apparent content, but Mr. Farrow has done his best to make every page amusing.—In the same class as Mr. Farrow's, but less nimble and mercurial, is Mr. H. E. Inman's Gobbo-Bobo, The Two-Eyed Griffin (Warne), a story of the adventures in London—on Alice-in-Wonderland principles—of certain children. Gog and Magog, John Gilpin, and the Griffin at Temple Bar, all play a part. The book baffles criticism, but its intentions are sound, and children may find it good.—Judge Parry, abandoning his own invention, has this year retold Don Quixote (Blackie) for children, with pictures by Mr. Walter Crane. The result is a handsome book, but we cannot admire the Judge's effort. Don Quixote may well wait.—Nor can we esteem very highly The Adventures of Odysseus (Deut) as told by F. S. Martin, R. T. C. Mayor, and F. M. Stawell. They seem to us to have no advantages whatever over Lamb's Adventures of Ulysses.—From Mr. Dent come also capital illustrated editions of Marryat's Peter Simple and Dickens's Holly Tree Inn, but these are not exactly for children.

Tales for Boys and Girls.

EIGHTY-EIGHT stories for growing boys and girls. Eighty-eight separate efforts to charm and stimulate the mind of young England. And this is the crop of one autumn; the commissariat train, so to speak, following the great army of youngsters which is about to encamp round the Christmas fireside. Piled in great heaps on our office-table, these books laugh at our efforts to deal with them. We can at least catalogue and classify.

Home.

|                                                          |                    |     |
|----------------------------------------------------------|--------------------|-----|
| Bell (M.), A Work-a-Day World .....                      | (S.P.C.K.)         | 2/0 |
| Taldeman (L. E.), Celia's Conquest .....                 | (Chambers)         |     |
| Meade (L. T.), The Beaufoots .....                       | (Griffith)         | 2/6 |
| Molesworth (Mrs.), The Three Witches .....               | (Chambers)         | 3/6 |
| Evans (F. B.), The Squires of Karrondale .....           | (C.E.T.S.)         | 3/6 |
| Orr (E.), The Overtons .....                             | (Nelson)           | 1/0 |
| Austin (S.), Tib and Sih .....                           | (Wells)            | 2/6 |
| Jackson (A. F.), Over the Garden Gate .....              | (S.P.C.K.)         | 2/6 |
| Elrington (H.), The Adventures of Roly .....             | (Blackie)          | 2/0 |
| Robson (L. S.), The Girl without Ambition .....          | (Cassell)          |     |
| Haverfield (E. L.), Rhoda .....                          | (Nelson)           | 2/6 |
| 52 Stirring Stories for Girls (Ed. A. H. Miles.) ...     | (Hutchinson)       |     |
| Lagh (M. H. C.), Gold in the Furnace .....               | (Relig. Tract Soc) |     |
| Author of "Laddie," Tom's Boy .....                      | (Chambers)         | 5/0 |
| Green (E. E.), The Wooing of Val .....                   | (Hutchinson)       | 3/6 |
| Mulholland (R.), Cynthia's Bonnet Shop .....             | (Blackie)          | 5/0 |
| Mansergh (J.), Sisters Three .....                       | (Cassell)          | 3/6 |
| Marchant (B.), From the Scourge of the Tongue .....      | (Melrose)          | 3/6 |
| Reade (F. G.), A Daughter-in-Law .....                   | (S.P.C.K.)         |     |
| Mallandaine (C. E.), The Shadow of the Cliff .....       | (S.P.C.K.)         | 3/0 |
| Leslie (E.), Arthur's Inheritance .....                  | (Blackie)          | 2/0 |
| Hayward (G. M.), The Other One .....                     | (Pearson)          | 5/0 |
| Molesworth (Mrs.), The House that Grew .....             | (Macmillan)        | 4/6 |
| Tynan (K.), Three Fair Maids .....                       | (Blackie)          | 6/0 |
| Swan (A. S.), An American Woman .....                    | (Hutchinson)       |     |
| Gaye (D. T. S.), Ivy and Oak .....                       | (Nelson)           | 2/0 |
| Chappell (J.), A Little Ray of Sunshine .....            | (Nelson)           | 1/0 |
| Velvin (E.), and Haverfield (E. L.), A Terrible Feud ... | (Nelson)           | 2/0 |
| Meade (L. T.), Seven Maids .....                         | (Chambers)         | 6/0 |
| Green (E. E.), A Fiery Chariot .....                     | (Hutchinson)       |     |

Historical Fighting.

|                                                     |              |     |
|-----------------------------------------------------|--------------|-----|
| Brereton (Capt. F. S.), In the King's Service ..... | (Blackie)    | 5/0 |
| Henty (G. A.), In the Irish Brigade .....           | (Blackie)    | 6/0 |
| Henty (G. A.), Out With Garibaldi .....             | (Blackie)    | 5/0 |
| Pollard (E. F.), My Lady Marcia .....               | (Nelson)     | 5/0 |
| Green (E. E.), After Worcester .....                | (Nelson)     | 5/0 |
| Eady (K. M.), Adventures All .....                  | (Nelson)     | 2/6 |
| Hayens (H.), The Red, White and Green .....         | (Nelson)     | 5/0 |
| Green (E. E.), A Gordon Highlander .....            | (Nelson)     | 2/6 |
| Neufeld (C.), Under the Rebel's Reign .....         | (Wells)      | 6/0 |
| Moore (H. C.), Britons at Bay .....                 | (Wells)      | 3/6 |
| Hollis (G.), The Son of Ella .....                  | (S.P.C.K.)   | 2/0 |
| Green (E. E.), The Silver Axe .....                 | (Hutchinson) |     |
| Ellis (E. S.), Red Jacket .....                     | (Cassell)    | 2/6 |
| Church (Rev. A. J.), Helmet and Spear .....         | (Seeley)     | 5/0 |

Travel, Hunting, &c.

|                                                     |              |     |
|-----------------------------------------------------|--------------|-----|
| Smith (G. B.), The Romance of the South Pole .....  | (Nelson)     | 2/0 |
| Shirley (E.), Up the Creeks .....                   | (Nelson)     | 1/6 |
| Marchant (B.), Held at Ransom .....                 | (Blackie)    | 2/6 |
| Stables (Dr. G.), In Far Bolivia .....              | (Blackie)    | 3/6 |
| Nisbet (H.), Hunting for Gold .....                 | (Warne)      | 3/6 |
| Stables (Dr. G.), Travels by the Fireside .....     | (Warne)      | 3/6 |
| 52 Stirring Stories for Boys (Ed. Miles, A. H.) ... | (Hutchinson) | 5/0 |
| 52 Stories of the British Empire (Ed. Miles, A. H.) | (Hutchinson) | 5/0 |
| Golschmann (L.), Boy Crusoes .....                  | (Blackie)    | 3/6 |
| MacIlwaine (H. C.), The White Stone .....           | (Wells)      |     |
| Senior (B.), Paid in Gold .....                     | (Griffith)   | 5/0 |

FREDERICK WARNE & CO.'S CHRISTMAS LIST.

Children's Classics and Books for the Little Ones.

New Illustrated Editions of Mr. Edward Lear's world-famed "Nonsense Songs."

Crown 4to, cloth gilt, coloured edges, 6s.

NONSENSE SONGS.

By EDWARD LEAR. With Illustrations by L. Leslie Brooke.

14 Full-Page Coloured Plates and numerous Black and White Engravings.

Small crown 4to, attractive picture boards, coloured edges, each 3s. 6d.

THE PELICAN CHORUS.

And other Nonsense Verses.

By EDWARD LEAR.

With 8 Full-Page Coloured Plates and numerous Black and White Engravings by L. Leslie Brooke.

THE JUMBLIES,

And other Nonsense Verses.

By EDWARD LEAR.

With 8 Full-Page Coloured Plates and numerous Black and White Engravings by L. Leslie Brooke.

Royal 4to, oblong, varnished picture boards, cloth back, price 6s.

THE BUNKUM BOOK:

A Tale of Topsy Turvy Land.

32 Full-Page Pictures in Colours by Mand Tre-lawny. With Descriptive Verses by AUBREY HOPWOOD.

NEW FAIRY BOOK.

Demy 8vo, cloth gilt, gilt top, 6s.

GOBBO BOBO: the Two-Eyed Griffin.

By H. ESCOTT INMAN.

Mr. Inman introduces his readers to "Gobbo-Bobo," otherwise "The Temple Bar Griffin," who keeps guard over London, opposite the Law Courts. Wonderful adventures follow, and we come across notabilities of the town—real and mystical personages of old time and to-day being jumbled up in the most delightful manner, such as the Aldermanic Turtle, who refuses to be made into soup, the Dandy Lion, the Welsh Rabbit, Gog and Magog, &c. Mr. Inman's illustrations are very happy in expressing the author's queer fancies, and help to complete a charming children's volume.

NEW ILLUSTRATED BOOKS FOR BOYS AND GIRLS.

In large crown 8vo, cloth gilt, price 3s. 6d. each.

HUNTING for GOLD: Adventures in the Klondyke.

By HUME NISBET. With 6 Illustrations by Hal Hurst.

A CHASE ROUND THE WORLD.

By Robert Overton.

With numerous Illustrations. "Mr. Overton has written a thoroughly entertaining story, worthy of his best efforts, and his exciting narrative has been capitally illustrated by A. Moure."

TRAVELS by the FIRESIDE: a Book for Winter

Evenings. By GORDON STABLES, M.D., C.M. With Original Illustrations by Gordon Browne.

KINGS of the SEA: a Story of the Spanish Main.

By HUME NISBET. With Illustrations by J. B. Greene.

A capital story of adventure on the Spanish Main.

THE FORTUNES of CLAUDE.

By Edgar Pickering. With 6 Full-Page Plates and Initial Letters specially designed by Lancelot Speed. Large crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 3s. 6d.

RECENT

WOMAN and ARTIST.

By Max O'Rell. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 3s. 6d.

"Anything from the pen of the clever Frenchman, whose acute yet amiable criticisms of things English have amused us all, is sure to be interesting. The present story is more than that, for it is an admirable and fascinating piece of fiction, the underlying aim of which would seem to be the glorification of English womanhood. The book sparkles with bright phrases and sayings."—Lloyd's News.

IN CONNECTION with the DE WILLOUGHBY CLAIM.

By FRANCES HODGSON BURNETT. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 6s.

"The De Willoughby Claim" shows the gifted authoress at her best. The novel is one of the most human that has been published this year, and is full of that sweetness and pathos we have come to look for in Mrs. Hodgson Burnett's work. The characters are all lovable. It is the biggest thing Mrs. Hodgson Burnett has attempted, and she has been rewarded with conspicuous success."—Weekly Sun.

A Complete Catalogue will be sent Post Free on Application.

London: FREDERICK WARNE & CO., Chandos House, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C.

WORKS BY WALTER CRANE.

WALTER CRANE'S PICTURE BOOK. Comprising "The Baby's Opera," "The Baby's Bouquet," and "The Baby's Own Æsop," With the Original Designs in Colour by WALTER CRANE. Printed by EDMUND EVANS. Edition de Luxe. Large 4to, vellum back, cloth sides, gilt top, uncut, £2 2s.

Ditto, ditto, on India paper, £3 3s.

POPULAR RE-ISSUES.

PAN PIPES: a Book of Old Songs. Newly arranged with Accompaniments, by THEO. MARZIALS, and set to pictures by WALTER CRANE. With Coloured Plates, oblong 4to, varnished picture boards, cloth back, 5s.

In small 4to, varnished picture boards, 3s. 6d. each.

THE BABY'S OPERA: a Book of Old Rhymes with New Dresses. With Coloured Pictures.

THE BABY'S BOUQUET: a Fresh Bunch of Old Rhymes and Tunes. With Coloured Pictures.

THE BABY'S OWN ÆSOP: being Fables Condensed in Rhyme, with Portable Morals. With Coloured Pictures.

WALTER CRANE'S PAINTING BOOK. Containing 12 Outline Pictures to Paint, and a Coloured Example for each. Small 4to, sewed, picture cover, 1s.

RANDOLPH CALDECOTT'S PICTURE BOOKS.

Issued in Three Styles.

Style I.—In 2 vols., large square 4to, cloth gilt, coloured edges and bevelled boards, 6s. each.

COLLECTIONS of PICTURES and SONGS. First Series.

COLLECTIONS of PICTURES and SONGS. First Series.

Style II.—In Four Sections, large square 4to, art linen, red edges, 2s. 6d. each.

1. R. CALDECOTT'S PICTURE BOOK. No. 1.

2. R. CALDECOTT'S PICTURE BOOK. No. 2.

3. THE HEY DIDDLE DIDDLE PICTURE BOOK.

4. THE PANJANDRUM PICTURE BOOK.

Style III.—In 16 Parts, square 4to, picture covers, sewed, 6d. each.

"As with the writings of Mr. Edward Lear, so it is with the drawings of Randolph Caldecott. No healthy-minded man, woman, or child can look at them without laughing; their humour is simply irresistible."

Price 6s. each.

STORIES from SHAKESPEARE.

By M. Surtees Townesend.

With upwards of 120 Illustrations. Large crown 8vo, cloth gilt, gilt top.

"Here we have a book that is in every way a tempting one. The stories are written in a simple and unaffected style. It is just the book to put into the hands of a growing boy or girl, for whom it will form a most useful introduction to the study of the plays themselves."

Lloyd's News.

THE NURSERY RHYME BOOK.

With upwards of 100

Drawings by L. LESLIE BROOKE, and an Introduction and Notes by ANDREW LANG. In medium 8vo, cloth gilt, gilt edges, 6s.

"The Nursery Rhyme Book," edited by Mr. Lang, is likely to prove a blessing to mothers, a mine of wealth to nurses, and a caucus belli in nurseries to unrecorded time; for its poetry and its pictures are jointly and severally 'distinctly precious.'—The World.

"The Nursery Rhyme Book," edited by Mr. Lang, is likely to prove a blessing to mothers, a mine of wealth to nurses, and a caucus belli in nurseries to unrecorded time; for its poetry and its pictures are jointly and severally 'distinctly precious.'—The World.

"The Nursery Rhyme Book," edited by Mr. Lang, is likely to prove a blessing to mothers, a mine of wealth to nurses, and a caucus belli in nurseries to unrecorded time; for its poetry and its pictures are jointly and severally 'distinctly precious.'—The World.

"The Nursery Rhyme Book," edited by Mr. Lang, is likely to prove a blessing to mothers, a mine of wealth to nurses, and a caucus belli in nurseries to unrecorded time; for its poetry and its pictures are jointly and severally 'distinctly precious.'—The World.

"The Nursery Rhyme Book," edited by Mr. Lang, is likely to prove a blessing to mothers, a mine of wealth to nurses, and a caucus belli in nurseries to unrecorded time; for its poetry and its pictures are jointly and severally 'distinctly precious.'—The World.

"The Nursery Rhyme Book," edited by Mr. Lang, is likely to prove a blessing to mothers, a mine of wealth to nurses, and a caucus belli in nurseries to unrecorded time; for its poetry and its pictures are jointly and severally 'distinctly precious.'—The World.

"The Nursery Rhyme Book," edited by Mr. Lang, is likely to prove a blessing to mothers, a mine of wealth to nurses, and a caucus belli in nurseries to unrecorded time; for its poetry and its pictures are jointly and severally 'distinctly precious.'—The World.

"The Nursery Rhyme Book," edited by Mr. Lang, is likely to prove a blessing to mothers, a mine of wealth to nurses, and a caucus belli in nurseries to unrecorded time; for its poetry and its pictures are jointly and severally 'distinctly precious.'—The World.

"The Nursery Rhyme Book," edited by Mr. Lang, is likely to prove a blessing to mothers, a mine of wealth to nurses, and a caucus belli in nurseries to unrecorded time; for its poetry and its pictures are jointly and severally 'distinctly precious.'—The World.

"The Nursery Rhyme Book," edited by Mr. Lang, is likely to prove a blessing to mothers, a mine of wealth to nurses, and a caucus belli in nurseries to unrecorded time; for its poetry and its pictures are jointly and severally 'distinctly precious.'—The World.

"The Nursery Rhyme Book," edited by Mr. Lang, is likely to prove a blessing to mothers, a mine of wealth to nurses, and a caucus belli in nurseries to unrecorded time; for its poetry and its pictures are jointly and severally 'distinctly precious.'—The World.

"The Nursery Rhyme Book," edited by Mr. Lang, is likely to prove a blessing to mothers, a mine of wealth to nurses, and a caucus belli in nurseries to unrecorded time; for its poetry and its pictures are jointly and severally 'distinctly precious.'—The World.

"The Nursery Rhyme Book," edited by Mr. Lang, is likely to prove a blessing to mothers, a mine of wealth to nurses, and a caucus belli in nurseries to unrecorded time; for its poetry and its pictures are jointly and severally 'distinctly precious.'—The World.

"The Nursery Rhyme Book," edited by Mr. Lang, is likely to prove a blessing to mothers, a mine of wealth to nurses, and a caucus belli in nurseries to unrecorded time; for its poetry and its pictures are jointly and severally 'distinctly precious.'—The World.

"The Nursery Rhyme Book," edited by Mr. Lang, is likely to prove a blessing to mothers, a mine of wealth to nurses, and a caucus belli in nurseries to unrecorded time; for its poetry and its pictures are jointly and severally 'distinctly precious.'—The World.

"The Nursery Rhyme Book," edited by Mr. Lang, is likely to prove a blessing to mothers, a mine of wealth to nurses, and a caucus belli in nurseries to unrecorded time; for its poetry and its pictures are jointly and severally 'distinctly precious.'—The World.

"The Nursery Rhyme Book," edited by Mr. Lang, is likely to prove a blessing to mothers, a mine of wealth to nurses, and a caucus belli in nurseries to unrecorded time; for its poetry and its pictures are jointly and severally 'distinctly precious.'—The World.

"The Nursery Rhyme Book," edited by Mr. Lang, is likely to prove a blessing to mothers, a mine of wealth to nurses, and a caucus belli in nurseries to unrecorded time; for its poetry and its pictures are jointly and severally 'distinctly precious.'—The World.

"The Nursery Rhyme Book," edited by Mr. Lang, is likely to prove a blessing to mothers, a mine of wealth to nurses, and a caucus belli in nurseries to unrecorded time; for its poetry and its pictures are jointly and severally 'distinctly precious.'—The World.

"The Nursery Rhyme Book," edited by Mr. Lang, is likely to prove a blessing to mothers, a mine of wealth to nurses, and a caucus belli in nurseries to unrecorded time; for its poetry and its pictures are jointly and severally 'distinctly precious.'—The World.

"The Nursery Rhyme Book," edited by Mr. Lang, is likely to prove a blessing to mothers, a mine of wealth to nurses, and a caucus belli in nurseries to unrecorded time; for its poetry and its pictures are jointly and severally 'distinctly precious.'—The World.

"The Nursery Rhyme Book," edited by Mr. Lang, is likely to prove a blessing to mothers, a mine of wealth to nurses, and a caucus belli in nurseries to unrecorded time; for its poetry and its pictures are jointly and severally 'distinctly precious.'—The World.

"The Nursery Rhyme Book," edited by Mr. Lang, is likely to prove a blessing to mothers, a mine of wealth to nurses, and a caucus belli in nurseries to unrecorded time; for its poetry and its pictures are jointly and severally 'distinctly precious.'—The World.

"The Nursery Rhyme Book," edited by Mr. Lang, is likely to prove a blessing to mothers, a mine of wealth to nurses, and a caucus belli in nurseries to unrecorded time; for its poetry and its pictures are jointly and severally 'distinctly precious.'—The World.

"The Nursery Rhyme Book," edited by Mr. Lang, is likely to prove a blessing to mothers, a mine of wealth to nurses, and a caucus belli in nurseries to unrecorded time; for its poetry and its pictures are jointly and severally 'distinctly precious.'—The World.

"The Nursery Rhyme Book," edited by Mr. Lang, is likely to prove a blessing to mothers, a mine of wealth to nurses, and a caucus belli in nurseries to unrecorded time; for its poetry and its pictures are jointly and severally 'distinctly precious.'—The World.

"The Nursery Rhyme Book," edited by Mr. Lang, is likely to prove a blessing to mothers, a mine of wealth to nurses, and a caucus belli in nurseries to unrecorded time; for its poetry and its pictures are jointly and severally 'distinctly precious.'—The World.

"The Nursery Rhyme Book," edited by Mr. Lang, is likely to prove a blessing to mothers, a mine of wealth to nurses, and a caucus belli in nurseries to unrecorded time; for its poetry and its pictures are jointly and severally 'distinctly precious.'—The World.

"The Nursery Rhyme Book," edited by Mr. Lang, is likely to prove a blessing to mothers, a mine of wealth to nurses, and a caucus belli in nurseries to unrecorded time; for its poetry and its pictures are jointly and severally 'distinctly precious.'—The World.

"The Nursery Rhyme Book," edited by Mr. Lang, is likely to prove a blessing to mothers, a mine of wealth to nurses, and a caucus belli in nurseries to unrecorded time; for its poetry and its pictures are jointly and severally 'distinctly precious.'—The World.

"The Nursery Rhyme Book," edited by Mr. Lang, is likely to prove a blessing to mothers, a mine of wealth to nurses, and a caucus belli in nurseries to unrecorded time; for its poetry and its pictures are jointly and severally 'distinctly precious.'—The World.

"The Nursery Rhyme Book," edited by Mr. Lang, is likely to prove a blessing to mothers, a mine of wealth to nurses, and a caucus belli in nurseries to unrecorded time; for its poetry and its pictures are jointly and severally 'distinctly precious.'—The World.

"The Nursery Rhyme Book," edited by Mr. Lang, is likely to prove a blessing to mothers, a mine of wealth to nurses, and a caucus belli in nurseries to unrecorded time; for its poetry and its pictures are jointly and severally 'distinctly precious.'—The World.

"The Nursery Rhyme Book," edited by Mr. Lang, is likely to prove a blessing to mothers, a mine of wealth to nurses, and a caucus belli in nurseries to unrecorded time; for its poetry and its pictures are jointly and severally 'distinctly precious.'—The World.

"The Nursery Rhyme Book," edited by Mr. Lang, is likely to prove a blessing to mothers, a mine of wealth to nurses, and a caucus belli in nurseries to unrecorded time; for its poetry and its pictures are jointly and severally 'distinctly precious.'—The World.

"The Nursery Rhyme Book," edited by Mr. Lang, is likely to prove a blessing to mothers, a mine of wealth to nurses, and a caucus belli in nurseries to unrecorded time; for its poetry and its pictures are jointly and severally 'distinctly precious.'—The World.

"The Nursery Rhyme Book," edited by Mr. Lang, is likely to prove a blessing to mothers, a mine of wealth to nurses, and a caucus belli in nurseries to unrecorded time; for its poetry and its pictures are jointly and severally 'distinctly precious.'—The World.

"The Nursery Rhyme Book," edited by Mr. Lang, is likely to prove a blessing to mothers, a mine of wealth to nurses, and a caucus belli in nurseries to unrecorded time; for its poetry and its pictures are jointly and severally 'distinctly precious.'—The World.

"The Nursery Rhyme Book," edited by Mr. Lang, is likely to prove a blessing to mothers, a mine of wealth to nurses, and a caucus belli in nurseries to unrecorded time; for its poetry and its pictures are jointly and severally 'distinctly precious.'—The World.

"The Nursery Rhyme Book," edited by Mr. Lang, is likely to prove a blessing to mothers, a mine of wealth to nurses, and a caucus belli in nurseries to unrecorded time; for its poetry and its pictures are jointly and severally 'distinctly precious.'—The World.

"The Nursery Rhyme Book," edited by Mr. Lang, is likely to prove a blessing to mothers, a mine of wealth to nurses, and a caucus belli in nurseries to unrecorded time; for its poetry and its pictures are jointly and severally 'distinctly precious.'—The World.

"The Nursery Rhyme Book," edited by Mr. Lang, is likely to prove a blessing to mothers, a mine of wealth to nurses, and a caucus belli in nurseries to unrecorded time; for its poetry and its pictures are jointly and severally 'distinctly precious.'—The World.

"The Nursery Rhyme Book," edited by Mr. Lang, is likely to prove a blessing to mothers, a mine of wealth to nurses, and a caucus belli in nurseries to unrecorded time; for its poetry and its pictures are jointly and severally 'distinctly precious.'—The World.

Sea Adventure.

|                                                      |                           |     |
|------------------------------------------------------|---------------------------|-----|
| Hayens (H.), Ye Mariners of England .....     | (Nelson)                  | 6/0 |
| Knight (A.), " Craddles " .....               | (Nelson)                  | 1/0 |
| Nisbet (H.), Kings of the Sea .....           | (Warne)                   | 3/6 |
| Becke (L.), Tom Wallis .....                  | (Religious Tract Society) |     |
| Knight (A. L.), A Sea King's Midshipman ..... | (Murray)                  |     |
| Fenn (G. M.), Uncle Bart. .....               | (S.P.C.K.)                | 5/0 |
| Kingsley (C.), Westward, Ho! .....            | (Sunday School Union)     |     |
| Wright (W. P.), An Ocean Adventurer .....     | (Blackie)                 | 2/6 |
| Russell (W. C.), The Pretty Polly .....       | (Chatto)                  |     |

School Stories.

|                                                          |            |     |
|----------------------------------------------------------|------------|-----|
| Fletcher (M.), Every Inch a Briton .....          | (Blackie)  | 3/6 |
| Stronach (A.), A Newnham Friendship .....         | (Blackie)  | 3/6 |
| Edwardes (C.), Jones the Mysterious .....         | (Blackie)  | 2/0 |
| Avery (H.), Heads or Tails .....                  | (Nelson)   | 5/0 |
| Avery (H.), A Tost Fag .....                      | (Nelson)   | 1/6 |
| Meade (L. T.), Miss Nonentity .....               | (Chambers) | 5/0 |
| Home (A.), The Story of a School Conspiracy ..... | (Chambers) | 3/6 |
| Cule (W. E.), Barfield's Blazer .....             | (Melrose)  | 2/6 |
| Chandler (A.), Tom Andrews .....                  | (Stock)    |     |

Miscellaneous.

|                                                                    |            |     |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------|------------|-----|
| McIlwraith (J. N.), A Book about Longfellow .....           | (Nelson)   | 2/0 |
| Synge (M. B.), Life of General Charles Gordon .....         | (Nelson)   | 1/0 |
| Avery (H.), and Others, Gunpowder Treason and Plot (Nelson) |            | 2/0 |
| Allen (P.), A Pennyworth of Kindness .....                  | (S.P.C.K.) |     |
| Weigall (C. E. C.), Gunner Jack and Uncle John .....        | (S.P.C.K.) |     |
| Farmiloe (G.), Chapel Street Children .....                 | (Richards) | 2/6 |
| Henty (G. A.) and Others, Venture and Valour .....          | (Chambers) | 5/0 |
| Barr (Amelia), Trinity Bells .....                          | (Unwin)    |     |

The Boer War.

|                                                             |            |     |
|-------------------------------------------------------------|------------|-----|
| Brereton (Capt. F. S.), With Rifle and Bayonet ..... | (Blackie)  | 5/0 |
| Henty (G. A.), With Buller in Natal .....            | (Blackie)  | 6/0 |
| Meade (Mrs. L. T.), A Sister of the Red Cross .....  | (Nelson)   | 3/6 |
| Johnston (W.), One of Buller's Horse .....           | (Nelson)   | 3/6 |
| Fenn (G. M.), Charge! .....                          | (Chambers) | 5/0 |
| Whishaw (F.), Three Scouts .....                     | (Griffith) | 3/6 |
| Finnemore (J.), Two Boys in War Time .....           | (Pearson)  | 5/0 |

This tabulation suggests many thoughts. What becomes, for instance, of the "Hundred Best Books for Children," compiled last year with so much zest and skill, and with such pleasing airs of authority, by the reader of the Daily News? Eighty-eight books are only twelve short of one hundred, yet our eighty-eight are as new as shiny paper and the untarnished gold on their covers can prove them. Not here do we find Robinson Crusoe, Tom Brown's School Days, Ivanhoe, Treasure Island, or the Jungle Book. All is new, all is untried; and yet the conviction comes home that here, at all events, will be found no halting experiment or open failure. It may be that in the whole table-load there is not a single book which will be reprinted next year; nevertheless, we are impressed by the general closeness of touch between the writers of these books and the lads and lasses for whom they are written. We have opened book after book, we have dived at random, we have dragged little books from under big ones, and in every way played the part of Jack Horner, but always with Jack Horner's luck: we have pulled out a respectably large and succulent plum. Hardly once have we found a book which we thought a boy or girl would pitch aside, or drop asleep over, provided the giver of the book had made a fairly intelligent adaptation of book to boy or book to girl. That these books present every variety of subject is sufficiently shown by the rough classification in which we have grouped their titles above this article. It will be found on examination that the numbers of books in the various sections are as follows:

|                           |    |
|---------------------------|----|
| Home .....                | 30 |
| Historical Fighting ..... | 14 |
| Travel, Hunting, &c. .... | 11 |
| Sea Adventure .....       | 9  |
| School Stories .....      | 9  |
| Miscellaneous .....       | 8  |
| Boer War,.....            | 7  |
| —                         | —  |
| —                         | 88 |
| —                         | —  |

On the whole, the above totals present few surprises. That stories of English home-life in all its varieties should largely preponderate is quite as it should be. In a year of war and rumours of war, it is natural that stories of a martial character should be numerous. No fewer than twenty-one such books are in the list, and it is interesting to note that one-third of these are immediately concerned with the Boer War. We are certainly rather alarmed by the very moderate proportion which sea stories bear to the total, not so many as one-tenth falling under this description. Are we to think that the scarcity of British seamen is being followed by a scarcity of British sea-writers?

Home.

We are not attempting the impossible in this article, and therefore we shall make no pretence to treat critically the amazing mass of literature before us. Our observations must be casual, and may well seem capricious. Taking first the English stories, a similarity of plot in a number of the best strikes us very oddly. No fewer than six of these stories open with financial disaster affecting the future lives of the young people in the homes thus clouded. In Mrs. L. T. Meade's Seven Maids we find a good rector losing his invested money and turning his rectory into a school, whereby his three girls are suddenly asked to share their home with four other girls of somewhat superior birth, the future relations of the seven making the story. Miss Katharine Tynan, in her story of nearly the same name, has adopted nearly the same plot; the well-to-do Burkes, of Derrymore, suffer financial misfortune, and it is a question of receiving "paying guests" in the humbler home which they are driven to occupy. Of course, Elizabeth and Joan Burke meet their fates in those dreaded guests; and Uncle Peter, who had caused all the trouble by disinheriting their father, is placated. In passing, let us add that Miss Tynan's style, and the Irish setting of her story, easily distinguish her book from many of its neighbours. An author of equal charm and greater experience, Mrs. Molesworth, uses the same idea of a money loss to draw out the characters of the children in her story, The House that Grew (Chambers). Rhoda, another tale for girls, by E. L. Haverfield (Nelson), begins in the correct vein: "I am exceedingly distressed, my dear young ladies, to be the bearer of such bad news. . . . All of which your father died possessed means comparatively nothing—er—er—that is to say, next to nothing as compared with what you had every right to expect." The financial thunderbolt is just as loud and dreadful in The Girl without Ambition (Cassell), where a coal mine lets in water, and is not worth pumping; it is, of course, the heroine's part to piece together a shattered home and bear troubles bravely. Nothing so violent as a fall in the stocks is the motive of Mrs. L. T. Meade's The Beauports (Griffith) where the girls have only to face the desperate situation of dependence of a father who writes unmarketable poetry, and calls it his "affairs." Surely, this monotony of leading motive is not a little curious; and we can only surmise that our nursery and playground moralists find something fresh and unfamiliar in enforced poverty at a time when poverty in any rank of society is unusually scarce.

Were we to summarise all the stories of English home life, their plots would, of course, be found to be sufficiently various, and perhaps even as miscellaneous as the Fifty-two Stirring Stories for Girls (Hutchinson), which, according to his annual custom, Mr. Alfred H. Miles has edited. A book fairly typical of many is M. H. Cornwall Legh's Gold in the Furnace, published by the Religious Tract Society. Its little heroine, Mary Copeland, is discovered watering her plants daily, and setting apart a solid quarter of an hour every Saturday to preparing for the Communion. The adventures of Mary are sufficiently desperate, including, as they do, false imprisonment; but wherever she goes the Sunday morning service and the Collects and

Some Christmas Book Covers.

Communion are Mary's solace. In short, the story is consistently improving and Anglican.

Somewhat alone in kind and quality stands, among domestic stories, Amelia E. Barr's tale of family life in New York one hundred years ago, called Trinity Bells (Unwin). It is a fragrant story, and we reproduce its decorative cover.

THE BOER WAR.

The next section in which we are disposed to make any stay is the one consisting of seven stories of South African fighting. No fewer than three of these stories are concerned with General Buller, and one of them takes us back to the Zulu campaign in which he won the Victoria Cross, an achievement described in the story. Mr. G. A. Henty's With Buller in Natal (Blackie) follows the fortunes of Buller's force, though it is more concerned with a little band of youthful volunteers than with the main force. It would be strange if English girls were not provided with a story of nursing at the front, and in Mrs. L. T. Meade's A Sister of the Red Cross (Nelson) they have their fill of lint and love, with other interests thrown in. Captain F. S. Brereton, the author of With Rifle and Bayonet (Blackie), is actually at the front, whence he sends home the spirited story of one Jack Somerton, who does great things as a despatch rider. Yet surely Captain Brereton is too generous to his boy readers when he adds the excitement of killing lions to the excitement of killing Boers.

SEA ADVENTURE.

Coming now to sea stories, we find the usual varieties of salt-water narrative. There is the naval side, well represented by Mr. Herbert Hayens's Ye Mariners of England (Nelson). This is an admirably conceived boy's book of naval history and construction; not only are the great battles of the past described, but the boy is kept in touch with the types of vessels used and their peculiar qualities. Three of the last chapters are, indeed, devoted to naval ship-building, the training of blue-jackets, and the functions of cruisers, torpedo boats, destroyers, and sub-marines, and the information is conveyed in exactly the way likely to interest boys in our first-arm of defence. We can hear them arguing about barbettes and collision mats on their way to school. A purely salt-water story, displaying the sea in all its moods, and shipboard life in all its routine and variety, is Mr. W. Clark Russell's The Pretty Polly, in which young Martin Daniell, following the example of Charles Dana, goes to sea in order to overcome a defect in his eyesight. The story is simply, and quite sufficiently, concerned with the ordinary incidents of a voyage to Calcutta in a fine sailing brig. We said ordinary incidents, but they are not therefore dull, and one is nothing less than a shipboard wedding recounted with great humour. A boy on his first voyage is also the hero of Mr. Louis Becke's Tom Wallis: a Tale of the South Seas (Religious Tract Society). But in this case the voyage is taken unwillingly, and is beset with even more incident than altogether suited Tom's taste. When we say that he passed from ship to ship on the South Seas, and that one of these ships was captained by that arch-pirate bully Hayes, we shall have indicated the possibilities of such a story in the hands of Mr. Becke, who has brought to it his incomparable knowledge of South Sea islands and ships. For downright marine melodrama, varied by shore melodrama, commend us to Mr. Walter P. Wright's An Ocean Adventurer (Blackie). The young hero, Frank Pingle, is early in possession of one of those delightful letters, written by a dead hand (his father's), printed throughout in italics, charged with secrecy, and unfolding to the straining eyes of the reader a very round-about way to a hidden treasure. The story that follows is cayenne-peppered with a chained skeleton, a trip under the sea, a ruined temple, and a frontal attack on a boat by octopuses. In quality and variety of adventure the sea books of the year are certainly not wanting.

TRAVEL, HUNTING, &C.

The nine books of travel and hunting adventure might well detain us if space permitted. Mr. A. H. Miles has built up two fat scarlet and gold fifty-two storied volumes, one containing Stirring Stories for Boys and the other Stories of the British Empire. These books, issued by Messrs. Hutchinson, can be safely recommended for any English boy. Dr. Gordon Stables, a mighty writer of boys' books before the Lord, has given us a story of South American hunting and fighting, Indian life and Amazonian life, called In Far Bolivia (Blackie). Paid in Gold, by Bertie Senior (Griffith), is a capital blend of school life and treasure hunting.

SCHOOL STORIES.

School life is itself represented by nine stories, of which an excellent example is the story of A School Conspiracy, by Mr. Andrew Home (Chambers), in which ropes are let down from dormitory windows by night, and ducking is resorted to when required to punish unpopularity. In Heads or Tails, by Mr. Harold Avery, we have the story of a school friendship, with any amount of incident, including a kind of Guy Fawkes' plot in a schoolroom; no school boy will fail to enjoy this story. A Newnham Friendship, by Alice Stronach (Blackie), is explained by its title to be a picture of life at Newnham College. Carol Martin, a third-year student, befriends a "fresher," Elspeth Macleod, a shy, sensitive Highland girl, who has worked her way from a Board school to college. The enmity of a fellow-student and a mystery about some parodies cloud Elspeth's happiness for a time. But the clouds clear. After the tripos excitements, some of the students leave their dream-world of study and talk of "cocoas," and debates, and athletics, to begin their work in the real world. Men students play their part in the story, and in the closing chapters, which describe the work of some of the girls as "social settlers" in the east of London, it is suggested that marriage has its place in a girl graduate's life.

HISTORICAL STORIES.

We have little space for the stories of battles long ago. The Rev. A. J. Church's Helmet and Spear (Seeley) is one of his well-known adaptations of Greek and Rome heroic narratives, and can be warmly recommended. Miss Gertrude Hollis's The Son of Ælla takes us back to the conversion of Northumbria to Christianity; the author's descriptions of Anglo-Saxon customs are particularly careful. Mr. G. A. Henty's In the Irish Brigade is concerned with the wars in Spain and Flanders at the beginning of the last century, and is a thoroughly well-realised picture of the times, and healthy from cover to cover. Mrs. E. Everett-Green's After Worcester is, of course, based on the incidents of Charles the Second's six weeks' flight from that fatal field. Mr. Charles Neufeld, whose long imprisonment under the Khalifa ended with the relief of Khartoum, has written a thrilling story, called Under the Rebel's Reign, of the revolt which led to the bombardment of Alexandria.

We are left wondering who the writers of tales for boys and girls are. Some of them seem to write six to ten long stories a year for the Christmas market. Do they write them all at once—a touch to this one, and a touch to that one, until all are finished together? And how does an author, living, say, in Gower-street, prepare to meet a demand for stories of the wilds of Nicaragua? And do his MSS. ever get mixed, so that a lion that leapt from a Cawnpore jungle fades into a Milchester drawing-room? This juvenile business is a speciality, of which the results are plainer to see than the processes.

CHRISTMAS GIFT BOOKS.

"A charming gift-book."—Daily News.

WOOTINGS AND WEDDINGS
IN MANY CLIMES.

By LOUISE JORDAN MILN,

Author of "When We Were Strolling Players in the East," &c.

With 4s Full-page Illustrations, demy 8vo, price 16s.

"Fascinating text. . . Fascinating pictures."—Tall Mall Gazette.
 "In 'Wootings and Weddings in Many Climes,' Mrs. L. J. Miln pleasantly and cleverly describes matters of world-wide interest."
 Extract from leading article in the Standard.
 "A beautiful volume and an interesting work on an interesting subject."
Glasgow Herald.
 "A collection of brilliant essays on a universally popular subject."
Morning Post.

IN THE DAYS OF MY YOUTH.

With an Introduction by T. P. O'CONNOR, M.P., containing the Autobiography of the Youth of Thirty-four Famous Men and Women. Fully Illustrated, with gilt top, deckle-edge paper, square crown 8vo, price 7s. 6d.

SIX OF THE THIRTY-FOUR AUTOBIOGRAPHIES ARE OF
 EARL OF HOPETOUN. SIR ARTHUR SULLIVAN. DUKE OF ARGYLL.
 EDNA MAY. JUSTIN MCCARTHY. HIRAM MAXIM.

"Cannot fail to provide plentiful entertainment."—Daily Mail.
 "Interesting throughout."—Punch.

BOOKS FOR JUVENILES.

ROY. A Story of the Peninsular War. By Agnes GIBBERNE. A Copy of this Book has been accepted by the Queen. Crown 8vo, cloth, with Illustrations, price 5s.

"An interesting and well-studied romance of military adventure."
Scotsman.

"The illustrations are good, the writing is pithy, and the tone well calculated to inspire youthful readers with lofty ambitions."—Morning Advertiser.

TWO BOYS in WARTIME. A Story of the War on the Veldt. By JOHN FINNEMORE. Crown 8vo, cloth, with 8 Illustrations, price 5s.

"The book is certainly one that may be heartily recommended to those who like their fill of fighting and exciting episode."—Daily Telegraph.

A CHILD of the SUN. By C. E. Banks. Crown 8vo, cloth, with 16 beautiful Three-colour Illustrations, price 6s.

This is a pretty story of a young North American Indian who sets out to slay a dragon, and in the course of his quest he meets a young white girl with whom he falls in love. The book is illustrated with 16 superb coloured pictures, and is charmingly bound in green and gold.

CHILDREN'S BOOKS.

THE OTHER ONE. By Gertrude M. Hayward. Crown 8vo, cloth, 5s. Illustrated by Cecil Aldin.

"Would make a delightful present."—World.

"In its blue dress, its clear type, and fine illustrations, the book is a delight to the eye as the quaint setting of the story will delight every young reader."
Bradford Observer.

FIDDLESTICKS. By Hilda Cowham. Boards, cloth back, price 3s. 6d. Profusely illustrated in Colour.

"The drawings are full of spirit, and there is a wealth of suggested detail about the pictures which will make young children linger long and lovingly over so fascinating a book."—Westminster Gazette.

NEW AND SUCCESSFUL 6s. NOVELS.
SECOND LARGE EDITION.

CONSCIENCE OF CORALIE. FRANKFORT MOORE.

THE WHITE BATTALIONS. FRED. M. WHITE.

JOAN BROTHERHOOD. BERNARD CAPES.

A SUBURBAN VENDETTA. JOHN K. LEYS.

BRAND OF THE BROAD ARROW. MAJOR GRIFFITHS.

THE PLUNDER SHIP. HEADON HILL.

SPELL OF THE SNOW. C. GUISE MITFORD.

SHADOWS FROM THE THAMES. EDWARD NOBLE.

GOD'S LAD. PAUL CUSHING.

WOMAN OF DEATH. 5s. Second Edition. GUY BOOTHBY.

THE PHANTOM ARMY. 3s. 6d. MAX PEMBERTON.

London: C. ARTHUR PEARSON, LTD.

ARCHIBALD CONSTABLE &amp; CO., LTD.

SOME POCKET VOLUMES.

WITH PHOTOGRAPHURE FRONTISPICES.

MEN AND WOMEN,

By ROBERT BROWNING.

2 vols. 6s. net.

THE GEORGE MEREDITH
BIRTHDAY BOOK. 4s. 6d.

"A storehouse of epigrams and bright thoughts."—Daily Mail.

By GEORGE MEREDITH. 3s. 6d. net each Volume.

THE TALE OF CHLOE.

THE STORY OF BHANAVAR.

SELECTED POEMS.

THE PRINCESS'S STORY BOOK.

With many Illustrations by HELEN STRATTON. Crown 8vo, 6s.

Uniform with

THE KING'S STORY BOOK.

THE QUEEN'S STORY BOOK.

THE PRINCE'S STORY BOOK.

TALES FROM TENNYSON.

By Rev. G. C. ALLEN, M.A., Head Master of Cranleigh School.

Two Photogravures. One after Mr. G. F. Watts' famous picture of Sir Galahad, and the other a picture of Astolat (Guildford). Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

"Mr. Allen has done for 'Idylls of the King' what Lamb did for Shakespeare."—Saturday Review.

A BEAUTIFUL GIFT-BOOK,

Bound in Full Leather Gilt.

NATIONAL WORTHIES:

A Selection from the National Portrait Gallery. With Biographical Notes. About 150 Illustrations, crown 4to, £2 2s. net. Only 750 copies printed, of which 250 have been reserved for America.

"To Messrs. A. Constable & Co. has come the happy thought of issuing in a volume entitled 'National Worthies' reproductions of 151 of the pictures in the National Portrait Gallery. They have been judiciously selected. They are followed by notes on each, consisting of concise biographical sketches, with suitable quoted comments on each."—Globe.

CONSTABLE'S LIBRARY OF TRAVEL AND
BIOGRAPHY.

DEMY 8vo, 6s. PER VOLUME.

NOW READY IN THIS SERIES.

FARTHEST NORTH.

By FRIDTJOF NANSEN.

Fully Illustrated. A new unabridged edition of this famous work.

THE WATERLOO CAMPAIGN, 1815. By Captain WILLIAM SIBORNE. Fully Illustrated with Portraits, Maps, and Plans.

AMONG THE HIMALAYAS. By Major L. A. WADDELL, L.L., Author of "The Buddhism of Tibet." With over 100 Illustrations.

THE ALPS from END to END. By Sir William MARTIN CONWAY. With a Supplementary Chapter by the Rev. W. A. B. COOLIDGE. With 52 Illustrations by A. D. M'CORMICK.

THE KINGDOM of the YELLOW ROBE—SIAM. Being Sketches of the Domestic and Religious Rites and Ceremonies of the Siamese. By ERNEST YOUNG. Fully Illustrated by E. A. NORBURY, R.C.A., and from Photographs.

RUPERT, PRINCE PALATINE. By Eva Scott, late Scholar of Somerville College, Oxford. With Photogravure Frontispiece.

THE HOUSEHOLD of the LAFAYETTES. By EDITH SICHEL. With Photogravure Engravings.

2, WHITEHALL GARDENS, WESTMINSTER.

MR. WM. HEINEMANN'S CHRISTMAS LIST.

ART AND BELLES LETTRES.

SIR JOSHUA REYNOLDS, P.R.A. By Sir Walter Armstrong, Director of the National Gallery, Ireland. With 70 Photogravures and 6 Lithographs in Colour. An Edition limited to 1,000 Copies for Sale in Great Britain. Imperial 4to, gilt top, £5 5s. net.

BY THE SAME AUTHOR.—UNIFORM WITH THE ABOVE.

GAINSBOROUGH, AND HIS PLACE IN ENGLISH ART. With 62 Photogravures and 10 Lithographs in Colour, £5 5s. net. Only a few copies of this magnificent work remain.

Dedicated to H.R.H. the Princess of Wales.

HANS ANDERSEN'S FAIRY TALES. A New Translation from the Danish Original by H. L. BRÆKSPAD. With an Introduction by EDMUND GOSSE. With 240 Wood Engravings by FANS TEGNER. 2 vols., 10s. net each; or 1 vol., £1 net.

CHARACTERS OF ROMANCE. By William Nicholson. A Portfolio of 16 Pastels reproduced in Colours, £2 2s. net.

A LITTLE TOUR IN FRANCE. By Henry James. With 12 Photogravures, 32 Full-page Engravings, and 40 Illustrations in the Text, reproduced from Original Drawings by Joseph Pennell. 1 vol., 10s. net. Also a Limited Edition on Japanese Paper, £2 net.

POMPEI: The City, its Life and Art. An Artistic Survey of Archeological Achievements. By PIERRE GUSMAN. Translated by FLORENCE SIMMONDS and M. JOU RDAIN. With 500 Illustrations in the Text and 12 Coloured Plates. 1 vol., 36s. net.

ROMAN ART: Some of its Principles and their Application to Early Christian Painting. By FRANZ WICKHOFF. Translated and Edited by Mrs. ARTHUR STRONG, LL.D. With 14 Plates and numerous Text Illustrations. 1 vol., £1 16s. net.

RUBENS: His Life, his Work, and his Time. By Emile Michel. Translated by ELIZABETH LEE. With 40 Coloured Plates, 40 Photogravures, and 272 Text Illustrations. 2 vols., imperial 8vo, £2 2s. net.

REMBRANDT: His Life, his Work, and his Time. By Emile Michel. With 76 Full-page Plates and 250 Illustrations in the Text. In 1 vol., gilt top; or in 2 vols., imperial 8vo, £2 2s. net.

LEONARDO DA VINCI, Artist, Thinker, and Man of Science. From the French of EUGENE MUNTZ. With 45 Plates and 252 Text Illustrations. 2 vols., imperial 8vo, £2 2s. net.

ANTONIO ALLEGRI DA CORREGGIO: His Life, his Friends, and his Time. By CORRADO RICCI. With 16 Photogravure Plates, 21 Full-page Plates in Tint, and 190 Illustrations in the Text. Imperial 8vo, £2 2s. net.

MEISSONIER: His Life and his Art. By Vallery C. O. Gréard. With 38 Full-page Plates, 20 in Photogravure and 18 in Colour, and 200 Text Illustrations. Imperial 8vo, £1 16s. net.

BRITISH CONTEMPORARY ARTISTS. Critical Studies of Watts, MILLAIS, ALMA-TADEMA, BURNE-JONES, ORCHARDSON, LEIGHTON, and POYNTER. By CO-MO MONKHOUSE. In 1 vol., royal 8vo. Illustrated. Price £1 1s. net.

TRAVEL AND BIOGRAPHY.

THROUGH THE FIRST ANTARCTIC NIGHT: a Narrative of the Belgian Expedition, 1898-99, to the South Pole. By FREDERICK A. COOK, Surgeon and Anthropologist to the Expedition. With 4 Coloured Plates and over 100 Illustrations from Photographs and Drawings. 1 vol., £1 net.

THE AWAKENING OF THE EAST: Siberia—China—Japan. From the French of PIERRE LEROY-BEAULIEU. Translated by RICHARD DAVEY. Edited, with a special Introduction, by HENRY NORMAN. 1 vol., 6s.

WILLIAM COTTON OSWELL, HUNTER AND EXPLORER. The Story of his Life, with certain Correspondence and Extracts from the Private Journal of David Livingstone, hitherto unpublished. By his Son, W. EDWARD OSWELL. With an Introduction by FRANCIS GALTON, D.C.L., F.R.S., F.R.G.S., &c. 2 vols., with Portraits, Maps, and Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 25s. net.

FROM CROMWELL TO WELLINGTON. Twelve Soldiers. Edited by SPENSER WILKINSON. With an Introduction by LORD ROBERTS. With Portraits, Maps, and Plans. 1 vol., 10s. 6d.

FROM HOWARD TO NELSON. Twelve Sailors. Edited by J. K. LAUGHTON. With Portraits, Maps, and Plans. 1 vol., 10s. 6d.

THE PAGEANTRY OF LIFE. A Book of Dandies. By Charles WHITLEY. With a Frontispiece. 1 vol., 7s. 6d.

A BOOK FOR THE COUNTRY.

NATURE'S GARDEN. An Aid to Knowledge of Wild Flowers and their Insect Visitors. By NELLIE BLANCHAN. With Coloured Plates and many other Illustrations, photographed direct from Nature, by HENRY TROTH and A. R. DUGMORE. 1 vol., 12s. 6d. net.

WIT AND HUMOUR.

MR. DOOLEY'S PHILOSOPHY. With Illustrations by W. Nicholson, E. W. KEMBLE, and F. OPPER. 1 vol., 3s. 6d.

STUDIES IN STYLE. By W. H. HELM. 1 vol., 3s. net.

PHILOLOGY.

SEMANTICS—THE SCIENCE OF MEANING. From the French of M. BRÉAL. Translated by Mrs. HENRY CUST. With an Introduction by Professor J. P. POSTGATE. 1 vol., 7s. 6d. net.

NOVELS AND STORIES.

Six Shillings each.

MR. ZANGWILL'S NEW NOVEL.

THE MANTLE OF ELIJAH.

By I. ZANGWILL.

The Athenæum.—"Contains cleverness of a very varied kind; traits of free imagination, of high spiritual feeling, keen observation, and a singular sense of discrimination in character and dialogue."

MRS. STEEL'S NEW NOVEL.

THE HOSTS OF THE LORD.

By FLORA ANNIE STEEL.

The Standard.—"Mrs. Steel has here gathered up all the threads of Indian life, and woven a very remarkable story, far more remarkable than 'On the face of the Waters.' In her knowledge of Indian life she shows herself to be without a rival."

MR. GILBERT PARKER'S NEW BOOK.

THE LANE THAT HAD NO TURNING.

By GILBERT PARKER.

The Times.—"Not even in 'The Seats of the Mighty' does Mr. Parker suggest such an impression of his strength as in this story which gives its title to the book. Strong and yet natural situations follow in rapid succession. In Madelinette Mr. Parker has idealised the noblest of women."

THE EAGLE'S HEART.

By HAMLIN GARLAND.

The Athenæum.—"Mr. Garland's work is always fresh and vigorous, and this story is full of his characteristic energy. He makes one share with delight in the irresistible fascination of wild life in the Far West."

NUDE SOULS.

By BENJAMIN SWIFT.

The World.—"There is that about the book which makes the reader loth to put it down—comprehension of human nature, power of expression. The plot is fresh and original."

THE FLAME OF LIFE.

By GABRIELE D'ANNUNZIO.

The Pall Mall Gazette.—"A work of genius, unique, astounding. There are passages that sweep one headlong, and the whole leaves an indelible impression."

THE STORY OF RONALD KESTREL.

By A. J. DAWSON.

The Athenæum.—"This romance of a young man with literary talent, his struggles and his successes, is the subject of this gracefully told story. The literary composition keeps a good level throughout. Mr. Dawson is a writer of ability who has seen men and things, and should go far."

THE LADY OF DREAMS.

By UNA L. SILBERRAD.

The British Weekly.—"Many will pronounce this the best novel of the year. It is a work of genius, which gives Miss Silberrad a place amongst our foremost writers."

THE QUEEN versus BILLY, AND OTHER STORIES.

By LLOYD OSBOURNE.

THE IMAGE BREAKERS.

By GERTRUDE DIX.

The Outlook.—"We have here a book packed with thought—suggestive, sincere. The story is told supremely well—it is of absorbing interest."

THIRTEEN STORIES.

By R. E. CUNNINGHAME GRAHAM.

The Outlook.—"Some readers will be scandalised and some delighted by their astounding frankness; but all who prize good reading must own themselves enchained."

THE NOVELS OF IVAN TURGENEV.

Uniform Edition. Translated by CONSTANCE GARNETT. Fcap. 8vo, cloth, 3s. net each Volume, or the Set of 15 Volumes, £2 2s. net.

The Athenæum.—"Mrs. Garnett deserves the heartiest thanks of her countrymen and country women for putting before them in an English dress the splendid creations of the great Russian novelist. Her versions are both faithful and spirited: we have tested them many times."

THE NOVELS OF BJÖRNSJERNE BJÖRNSON.

Uniform Edition. Edited by EDMUND GOSSE. 8 vols., fcap. 8vo, cloth, 3s. net each Volume.

MR. HEINEMANN'S NOTES ON FORTHCOMING BOOKS POST FREE.

London: WILLIAM HEINEMANN, 21, Bedford Street, W.C.

THE ACADEMY.

Editorial and Publishing Offices, 43, Chancery-lane.

The ACADEMY will be sent post-free, if prepaid, to every Annual Subscriber in the United Kingdom.

Price for One Issue, Threepence; postage One Halfpenny. Price for 52 issues, Thirteen Shillings; postage free.

Foreign Rates, for Yearly Subscriptions, prepaid (including postage) . . . . . 17/6

„ Quarterly . . . . . 5/0

„ Price for one issue . . . . . 1/5

American Agents for the ACADEMY: Brentano's, 31, Union-square, New York.

Literature in 1900.

Some Memories and Impressions.

It was to be a year of war and war-books, that only was clear. The expectation has been extravagantly fulfilled. And yet, before January had passed, Literature, no less than War, was counting her dead. Never do we wish to publish such an ACADEMY as that of last January 27. Ruskin was dead; Blackmore was dead; James Martineau was dead; Steevens was dead. And of each there was so much to say!

Yet the month had its living interests. In the first week the Society of Authors published its scheme of a pension fund for authors, with the moral and practical support of Mr. Meredith, Mr. Kipling, Mr. Barrie, Mrs. Humphry Ward, and other writers. The fund is frankly an appanage of the Society of Authors, of which its beneficiaries must be members. A somewhat kindred topic of the month was the question of the Duration of Copyright, which had been raised in connexion with Lord Menckhouse's new Copyright Act. Mr. Andrew Lang was in favour of perpetual copyright, a proposal which Bernard Shaw called "a piece of rapacious impudence." No one was angry. It became evident, however, that an extension of the period of copyright to fifty or sixty years was generally desired.

Meanwhile, book-publishing was in its post-Christmas ebb, and most books under review dated from December. The late Mr. Stephen Crane's Active Service did, and so did Mr. Owen Seamen's In Cap and Bells, in which he showed himself a master of parody not merely ingenious and superficial, but of parody in which the subject is conceived as the poet parodied would have conceived it. Mr. Frederic Harrison's Tennyson, Ruskin, Mill, and Other Literary Estimates were also under review; we thought it an extremely able though not strongly original book. Lord Rosebery's little book on Sir Robert Peel, reprinted from the Anglo-Saxon Review, was being widely read. Mrs. Humphry Ward's Eleanor and Mr. Zangwill's The Mantle of Elijah were beginning in Harper's, and Mr. Barrie's Tommy and Grizel, with O. P. Pym in the first instalment, was the attraction of Scribner's. On the 26th of the month Mr. C. K. Shorter's new paper, the Sphere, was born, and was widely approved, though a young man in a Peckham railway carriage was heard to object that its title clashed with the Globe. Things seemed to be in a fairly bustling state when, in the dawn of

FEBRUARY,

Mr. George Moore suddenly took an affecting farewell of London as a centre of art. His tearful declaration was followed by productions of his own play, "The Bending of the Bough," and Mr. Edward Martin's "Maeve," by the Irish Literary Theatre Society, in Dublin. Forsaken London was delighted to offer a tribute of admiration to Dr. Furnivall on February 4th, his seventy-fifth birthday. In acknowledging various gifts, Dr. Furnivall predicted that English is destined to become the universal language of civilisation, which was nice of him.

The conduct and disasters of the Boer war drew verses from Mr. Stephen Phillips, who cried: "O for a living man to lead, That will not babble when we bleed," and from Mr. Austin Dobson, whose lines to the "Undistinguished Dead" in the Sphere struck a right chord. Meanwhile, the tidal wave of war literature could be seen advancing; and February was not out before the war narratives began with Mr. Alfred Kinnear's To Modder River with Methuen.

On the 20th Mr. H. D. Traill's death came as a shock to his friends and the public. A week later we reviewed an enlarged edition of his New Lucian. A clever sketch from his pen, called "The Unflinching Realist," was in the current Anglo-Saxon Review; where, also, appeared Mr. W. H. Mallock's interesting versification of Lucretius, in the stanza of FitzGerald's Rubaiyat.

Many of the books of February made for learning and seriousness. Mr. Charles Godfrey Leland's The Unpublished Legends of Virgil was, however, wholly purged of dulness, though it could not escape a charge of literary untidiness. Principal Caird's posthumous Fundamental Ideas of Christianity, Prof. Sayce's Babylonians and Assyrians, and Mr. W. S. Lilly's First Principles in Politics, appeared in rapid succession. In biography we had Mr. Kinloch Cooke's too voluminous life of Princess Mary of Teck; in poetry, Miss Moira O'Neill's lilting Songs of the Glens of Antrim; in belles lettres, Mr. Le Gallienne's prettily insubstantial The Worshipper of the Image; in humour, Mr. Dooley in the Hearts of His Countrymen. Of fiction there was plenty. In They that Walk in Darkness Mr. Zangwill returned to the Ghetto, on which he had turned his back. Parson Kelly, the joint work of Mr. A. E. W. Mason and Mr. Andrew Lang, was a good lightsome Jacobite novel. Mr. Sutcliffe's Shameless Wayne was a sombre tragedy, too little relieved. Mr. Winston Churchill's Savrola, a "rattling" description of a revolution in the imaginary state of Laurania, was read with interest in the author's absence in South Africa. To South Africa Mr. Kipling, also, had gone when a number of his early stories and articles appeared under the title of From Sea to Sea. These writings were immature in thought and style, but they contained seeds of his later work. While the critics were looking for these, Lord Roberts was giving Mr. Kipling a pass enabling him to go wherever he pleased in South Africa. In the first week of there came the sorrowful story of the death of Ernest Dowson. His was an ineffectual life. His poems in Verses and Decorations revealed qualities best described as pale, tender, and fragile. He was a decadent who paid in full for his decadence; but some loved him well. In the same week we were reminded of the splendidly vital talent and stoic death of George Warrington Steevens, whose unfinished narrative From Capetown to Ladysmith now appeared, with a memorial chapter by Mr. Vernon Blackburn. The Queen accepted a copy of the book, and sent a message of sympathy to Mrs. Steevens through Messrs. Blackwood. Books on South Africa and on the origin of the Boer War had become very numerous; and besides Mr. Kinnear's and Mr. Steevens's volumes, the public could buy Mr. Bennett Burleigh's The Natal Campaign, and Mr. Julian Ralph's narrative, with the rather premature title, Towards Pretoria.

MARCH,

Mr. Arthur Symons published his Symbolist Movement in Literature. We remarked that the movement studied with exquisite insight by Mr. Symons would be more accurately called Evocative than Symbolist. His dynasty of symbolists was entirely French; beginning with Gérard de Nerval, it included Verlaine, Mallarmé, and Maeterlinck. While Mr. Symons was asking, What is Symbolism? Mr. Elmond Holmes was putting the larger question, What is Poetry? His reply was a striking essay, essentially a poet's attempt to define what Aristotle had tried to define. Meanwhile, Poetry, in the person of M. Edmond Rostand, was defining itself as wealth, applause, and dazzling success. L'Aiglon had been produced by Sarah Bernhardt in Paris, and was in delirious vogue. The blaze of that triumph fell on London while Mr. Stephen Phillips's Paolo and Francesca was still reposing in Mr. George Alexander's desk, unacted and unrehearsed.

On the 20th Dr. Ibsen celebrated his seventy-second birthday, and on the same day the English translation of his play, When We Dead Awaken, was published. It proved a bewildering affair. It held a great deal of device and technique, but the reader could not penetrate to the spiritual meanings which these seemed to portend. After being disappointed in Ibsen, it was no consolation to be disappointed in Tolstoy; but such was the fate of readers of Resurrection, which had begun well—indeed, wonderfully—but now ended like a tract.

Among other books of March was the first volume of The Complete Works of John Gower, edited by Mr. G. C. Macaulay for the Clarendon Press—a work of toilsome scholarship and permanent value. There also came to hand the first volume of Mr. Andrew Lang's History of Scotland from the Roman Occupation, an undertaking for which he had qualified himself to write by numerous subsidiary studies. The work contained many original judgments, and the narrative was easy and effective. In their sphere Mr. W. W. Skeat's Malay Magic, Mr. Percy Gardner's Exploratio Evangelica, and Mr. Moncreu Conway's Solomon and Solomonie Literature were important enough to receive close expert criticism. Mr. William Archer's book of impressions, America To-day: Observations and Reflections, was chiefly interesting for a chapter on "The American Language."

Some of the best novels of the month were American; they included Mr. W. D. Howells's Their Silver Wedding Journey, Miss Johnstone's By Order of the Company, and Mr. Booth Tarkington's A Gentleman from Indiana. It was just when Miss Ellen Thorneycroft Fowler's story, The Far-ridingons, took the middle classes by storm. Without much profundity or real literary charm, its energetic wit, its correct moral tone, and the reputation of the author of A Double Thread, secured it tens of thousands of readers. The interests of April were light to the end, fiction predominating. Other novels were Dr. William Barry's Arden Massiter and Mr. Ralph Connor's The Sky Pilot, both religious stories, yet as far asunder in complexion as the Vatican is from a chapel in a remote creek of California. Mr. Crockett's Joan of the Sword Hand and Mr. Marriott Watson's The Rebel were sound stories of action. To these were added Mr. Ernest Bramah's very amusing Chinese tales, called The Wallet of Kai Lung, and Mr. G. S. Street's clever satire on upper middle-class snobbery, The Trials of the Bantocks. There was also Mr. Frederick Wedmore's study of bored penitence, entitled The Collapse of the Penitent.

APRIL

The first serious book of April to be widely reviewed was Mr. John Glyde's Life of Edward Fitzgerald, which was acceptable as a narrative of FitzGerald's external life, but was deficient as a memoir of his scholarship and temperament. It probably met the demands of those admirers of FitzGerald who knew him well enough to call him "Old Fitz," but had not read his Letters. Two books of Eastern travel, widely different in character, were Mr. and Mrs. Theodore Bent's Southern Arabia and Mr. Robert Barr's The Unchanging East; the first was resolutely informing, the second resolutely facetious. Two important reprints were Mr. W. G. Collingwood's enlarged Life of Ruskin and Prof. Knapp's edition of Larenegro. The last book drew from Dr. Augustus Jessop a remarkably outspoken article on Borrow in the Daily Chronicle, embodying a view of Borrow which is not likely, even now, to go unanswered.

When we turn from books to events April does not look at all empty in retrospect. There was the Cowper Celebration at Olney on the 25th, and the cosmopolitan tribute to Mr. Herbert Spencer on his eightieth birthday, which fell on the 27th. A good deal of discussion arose on the Bill promoted by the Trustees of the British Museum to enable them to "dispose of valueless printed matter," and to relieve the Museum shelves of collections of local newspapers. The Bill is probably dead and buried.

Death was still busy in the literary world. In the first days of the month Mr. St. George Mivart passed suddenly away, unreconciled to the Roman Catholic Church from which his matured scientific opinions had caused him to be separated. His was a tragically memorable end, on which the last word will not be said for many a year. Three weeks later Mr. R. A. M. Stevenson died, at the age of fifty-three, mourned as not all men are by their friends. Cousin to Robert Louis Stevenson, he was himself so notable as a man of taste and as a talker that the loss of him was comparable—at any rate, was compared—to that which was suffered in the death of R. L. S. He was a man whose charm was his sufficient achievement; yet, in addition, he was the most original and convincing art critic of his day. He was art critic to the Pall Mall Gazette, in which position he has been succeeded by Mrs. Meynell.

All this time the events of the war, including the relief of Ladysmith, were responsible for an ever-growing supply of war-books, and for a general paralysis of other literary production. Yet in the first week of we noted the completion of the Haworth edition of the Brontë books by the issue of Mrs. Gaskell's Life of Charlotte Brontë, with Mr. C. K. Shorter's admirable notes. Mrs. Humphry Ward's introductions to the novels had formed a series of acute criticisms which no student of the Brontës could afford to neglect. In the first week of May Prof. Herford's metrical translation of Ibsen's Love's Comedy was issued, and proved a merciless study of marriage, brilliantly translated. Written in 1862, the last thing Ibsen did before turning his back on unfriendly Norway, this play had usually been classed as a mere picture of manners, and was apparently regarded in that light by Mr. Gosse. Our own contention was that Love's Comedy is as much a problem play as anything Ibsen ever did. The problem stated and solved is the very simple, very engrossing, problem, Can Love and Marriage be reconciled? Ibsen decides that love is bound to die after marriage, but decides it by a process which leaves out of court the very human nature that should be the basis of his inquiry. In the Comedy love dies by slow syllogism; in life it lives and prospers without taking thought for its stature or conditions.

MAY

On all such arguments the life-wasting war in South Africa broke in; we were shelled with siege books. Mr. Pearse's (Daily News) story of Ladysmith, Four Months' Besieged; Mr. J. B. Atkins's (Manchester Guardian) The Relief of Ladysmith; Mr. Nevinson's (Daily Chronicle) Ladysmith: The Diary of a Siege; Mr. Winston Churchill's (Morning Post) London to Ladysmith, via Pretoria, and Dr. Oliver Ashe's Besieged by the Boers, a narrative of Kimberley, all came at once. The circumstances under which these books were written forbade the critics to take them seriously as literature. In most cases the authors could never have seen their proof-sheets, and several of the narratives were supplemented in London by other hands in the eager rush for the bookstalls. By this time it had become a commonplace that the war-book business was being overdone. An American publisher, visiting this country, was offered in one week the rights of no fewer than twenty-five books about the Boer War. Nothing, however, stayed the rush; least of all the deaths and wounds of the war correspondents themselves. On May 26 the Sphere published a list of ten journalists who had suffered; and of these five had been killed. A complete set of the Kelmescott publications at Sotheby's realised £550 8s., as compared with the original value of £144 14s.

The month saw some notable publishing work done. Mr. W. H. Mallock's Doctrine and Doctrinal Disruption was a curiously plausible invitation to Anglicans to come over to Rome as the one Christian body that had an answer to the devastation of the Bible by science; the answer being—herself. Among some solid works that descended on us was the report of The International Congress of Women, 1899, in seven volumes—a huge and valuable blue-book of the Woman movement; and Prof. W. W. Skeat's The Chaucer Canon, a re-statement of the philological method employed by Chaucerian scholars to distinguish the genuine works of Chaucer from those falsely so called. Miss Fiona Macleod's rather miscellaneous volume, The Divine Adventure; Iona; By Sundown Shores: Studies in Spiritual History, was chiefly interesting for its essay called simply "Celtic," in which she said some sensible things that came refreshingly from a Celt of the Celts. She acknowledged that there is such a thing as English emotion, English love of nature, English visionariness, differing from Celtic only in contour and colour, but not in essence; so that William Blake, the Londoner, was more "Celtic" than any visionary of Ireland, and Keats, the Englishman, than any Gaelic poet. Dean Farrar supplemented his Life of Christ, written twenty-six years before, by another work, expository rather than biographical, entitled The Life of Jesus: Further Studies in the Life of Christ. The florid style of the old work was found in the new; but by both books Dean Farrar has served the cause of intelligent Christianity.

An important literary event was the completion of Prof. Bury's edition of Gibbon's Decline and Fall, which deserves to rank with Prof. Frazer's Pausanias as a work of profound scholarship and discreet editing.

In lighter literature, Mr. Arthur Symons gave his volume of poems, Images of Good and Evil, in which a rather weary and anæmic philosophy was set forth in lines that were often beautiful. In descriptive passages Mr. Symons reached a high level. Mr. Le Gallienne's Rudyard Kipling: a Criticism, was the collision of his temperament with Mr. Kipling's works; from the first one was inclined to discount the impact. Yet with this sentence of his book—"As a writer Mr. Kipling is a delight; as an influence he is a danger"—it was difficult to disagree with a whole heart. In Fiction, Mr. Harland gave us a delicate and charming story, The Cardinal's Snuff-Bor; Mr. Percy White a study of a parvenu family in The West End; and Mr. MacIlwaine's novel of the Australian Bush, called Fate the Fiddler, repeated the promise of his Dinkinbar. The publication of Hilda Wade reminded novel-readers of the special kind of loss they had sustained in the death of Mr. Grant Allen, whose compact and suggestive biography, by Mr. Edward Clodd, reached us in the first days of just after Lord Roberts had entered Johannesburg.

JUNE,

Already we had in our hands another memoir, Mrs. Meynell's monograph on Ruskin, in the "Modern English Writers" series. The form in which Mrs. Meynell's book was cast did not commend itself to all critics, some of whom forgot, perhaps, the extent of the subject and the limitations of a volume belonging to a series. As an exposition of Ruskin's teaching the book was not for beginners or for lazy readers, but as the working of a brilliant and sympathetic mind on Ruskin's whole achievement it was a study of special charm and value.

Gabriele D'Annunzio's play, "The Dead City," translated by Mr. Arthur Symons, was a powerful production, full of the last delicacies of thought and style, but full also of morbid horrors which could not always be indicated in a review. One turned in haste to Mr. Kipling's stories of the Boer War in the Daily Express, or took up the Ladysmith Treasury, a budget of stories written by many authors to help in the relief of distress at Ladysmith. Other books that made some impression in this month were Camille Flammarion's queer, irrational book, The Unknown, a collection of stories of telepathy and hallucination, designed "to discover if the soul of man exists as an entity, independent of his body, and if it will survive the destruction of the same." Other interesting arrivals were the newly-found Lenore, translated by Rossetti from Bürger's poem in his sixteenth year; Mr. Hilaire Belloc's Paris, a very clever study, in which history was not so much written for its own sake as to support the writer's personal interpretations of streets and buildings "noisy with an infinite past"; and The Rhodesians, a book of sharply-defined impressions of South African life. A pleasing and well-informed little biography of Robert Browning, by Mr. Arthur Waugh, inaugurated a series of "Westminster Biographies," designed by Messrs. Kegan Paul.

The novel of the month was Mr. H. G. Wells's Love and Mr. Lewisham. It seemed probable that Miss Mamie Bowles's Charlotte Leyland would have created great interest, but circumstances compelled its withdrawal from circulation.

In June, as in each preceding month, an implacable fate withdrew some fine workers from the literary ranks; and in one number we recorded the deaths of Mr. Stephen Crane and Miss Kingsley.

The Mansion House celebration of the completion of The Dictionary of National Biography was the first literary event to rivet attention in #### JULY.

Mr. George Smith made it clear that the production of this work had cost him something like £150,000. The last impulse of the Spring Season was now exhausted, and we began to talk about Mr. Morley's Cromwell as an event of the autumn—an autumn on which the reported massacre at Pekin threw an uncertain and lurid light. But the month was made notable by the publication of Mrs. Craigie's Robert Orange, the sequel to her earlier book, The School for Saints. Many of the events and publications of the month savoured of the past. It was announced that Mr. Herbert Spencer had completed a revised and final edition of his First Principles, embodying his matured views and dealing with some misapprehensions. Prof. Ker's edition of Dryden's Essays was seen to be of lasting value to scholars. Mr. Ernest Hartley Coleridge's edition of Byron's Poetry received its third volume, containing the poet's Eastern tales; and the fourth volume in Mr. Prothero's edition of Byron's Letters, dealing with his life in Venice, was of exceptional interest.

An attack on the "genuineness" of the Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam, by Mr. A. H. Millar, provided a topic of some interest; and although, in our judgment, that attack was ill-based, it was directed against a cult which was assuming the proportions and complexion of a folly. A considerable revival of interest in the novels of Mr. James Lane Allen followed the publication of The Increasing Purpose, and it was recognised that the moral grandeur of human nature fills Mr. Allen's mind not less than the humour and natural charms of life in Kentucky, his chosen background. The flow of war-books had become less strong; but the story of Mafeking had to be told, and Major F. D. Baillie told it well in his Mafeking: a Diary of the Siege. A number of pleasant summer books, of which Mrs. Pamela Tennant's Village Notes and "E. V. B.'s" Seven Gardens and a Palace, were examples, put an edge on one's appetite for the holidays. August always brings a calm in publishing; this year it brought a dead calm, and the Ruskin Exhibition at Coniston. On the 11th we wrote: "The publishing of books has practically ceased." Everything seemed to have expired—even the copyright in Balzac's novels. Sir Henry Irving's declared intention to produce Byron's "Manfred" at the Lyceum gave rise to some interesting discussion.

AUGUST

The book, outside fiction, that excited most interest was Ouida's Critical Studies, in which her hatred of modern pushfulness and vulgarity of all kinds found characteristic expression. Mr. Marion Crawford had most reason to be pleased with the book; he received a warm appreciation. In Fiction there was nothing so new as Miss Edith Wharton's short novel, A Gift from the Grave—a delicate ethical problem treated with a subtlety and grace that won instant recognition. Mr. Pett Ridge's Son of the State, Lucas Malet's A Gateless Barrier, Mr. Hornung's The Belle of Toorak, and Miss Ellen Glasgow's Voice of the People, were all being read. A capital cricket book was Mr. A. W. Pullen's ("Old Ebor") Talks with Old English Cricketers. Mr. Henley's "sheaflet" of patriotic verse, For England's Sake, had no need to go begging for readers. The literary gossippers were making themselves amusingly authoritative about the authorship of Elizabeth and Her German Garden, and the Allies were making themselves comfortable in maligned Peking, when brought us the first instalment of Marie Bashkirtseff's unpublished journals and letters to Guy de Maupassant, in the Gentlewoman. On the whole, these fell rather flat. They added to the list of Marie Bashkirtseff's whims and petulancies rather than to our knowledge of her temperament. While her memory was being revived, another vexed spirit passed away—Friedrich Nietzsche, in whom the complexity of his age had bred an incredible tooth-and-claw philosophy of life, which he expounded with a wealth of satirical humour and a visionary splendour that made his books interesting to read, though impossible to accept.

SEPTEMBER

By the middle of the month the autumn publishing season had unmistakably begun. The publication of the Letters of Thomas Edward Brown, edited by Mr. Sidney T. Irwin, was of capital interest to the few, as the publication of Miss Corelli's novel, The Master Christian, was to the many. Mr. Whibley's edition of Rabelais, in the "Tudor Translations" series, gave us the perfect text of Urquhart and La Motteaux, to which Mr. Whibley prefixed an admirably luminous Introduction. Mark Twain's book of sketches, entitled The Man that Corrupted Hadleyburg, was variously estimated; but everywhere it served to recall the long and manful struggle against adversity which Mark Twain has waged, and from which he has this year triumphantly emerged—bless him!

The "boom" of The Master Christian fulfilled even expectation, and was assisted by a particularly needless quarrel between Miss Corelli and Mr. Hall Caine. The same month gave us, in unboomed fiction, Mr. Eden Phillpotts's Sons of the Morning; Mrs. Atherton's study of American political-social life in Washington, called Senator North; Mr. Henry Seton Merriman's Isle of Unrest, a brisk tale of Corsican villainies; Cunning Murrell, in which Mr. Arthur Morrison left the London of to-day for the Essex marshes of yesterday; Mr. Murray Gilchrist's well-written Peakland story, The Courtesy Dame; and Mr. Henry James's dozen short stories, called The Soft Side.

September had been a time of waiting for the General Election, which broke over us in the first days of and was more than usually interesting to literary men by reason of the large number of authors and journalists who sought seats. Mr. Anthony Hope had been compelled, by illness, to abandon his candidature for the Falkirk Burghs; but Mr. Henry Norman, Mr. Gilbert Parker, and Mr. Winston Churchill were quickly elected by South Wolverhampton, Gravesend, and Oldham respectively. Dr. Conan Doyle was not so fortunate, and the unseating of Mr. Augustine Birrell was widely regretted.

OCTOBER.

On the 7th Mrs. Severn unveiled the memorial to Ruskin on Friar's Crag—the spot to which he remembered being taken by his nurse in infancy, and from which in after life he often surveyed the Derwentwater prospect and found in it "one of the three most beautiful scenes in Europe."

The books of the month were Mr. John Morley's Cromwell, which had appeared serially in the Century Magazine, Mr. Champneys's long-looked-for biography of Coventry Patmore, and Dr. Conan Doyle's History of the Great Boer War. The collected edition of T. E. Brown's poems probably came next in interest. Miss Clara Linklater Thomson's life and critical study of Samuel Richardson brought a great literary personality before many uninformed readers; but the book had not, unfortunately, finality. Thoroughly characteristic of their author were Mr. Charles Whibley's brilliant, whimsical portraits of dandies, in The Pageantry of Life.

Sir Edward Fry's Studies by the Way recalled us to the gravest walks of life, and to the sagacity of great and settled minds. Meanwhile, war-books had revived, and a long train of Mafeking, Pretoria, and "how-I-was-captured-and-escaped" narratives passed in file through the growing chaos of autumn literature. We should mention, also, The Story of Dr. Pusey's Life, by the author of Charles Lowder, and The Unpublished Letters and Philosophical Regimen of Anthony, Earl of Shaftesbury, edited by Dr. Rand.

The production of novels was enormous, and quality redeemed quantity when we noted in one week the arrival of Mr. J. M. Barrie's Tommy and Grizel, Mr. A. T. Quiller-Couch's Old Fires and Profitable Ghosts, and Mr. Conrad's Lord Jim. Yet the month had already given us Mr. Anthony Hope's Quisante, Mr. Hichens' Tongues of Conscience, Mr. W. W. Jacobs's A Master of Craft, Miss Braddon's The Infidel, Mr. Anstey's The Brass Bottle, and Sir Walter Besant's The Fourth Generation.

The month closed with the return of the City Volunteers and successful production, on the 31st, of Mr. Stephen Phillips's poetical play, "Herod," at Her Majesty's Theatre. We will not treat the doings of as ancient history. The book of the month was the Life and Letters of Thomas Henry Huxley, by his son, Mr. Leonard Huxley. It may be said to be still under review, and to be secure of a long life.

NOVEMBER

Lord Rosebery's study of Napoleon at St. Helena, called Napoleon: the Last Phase, was a brilliant work, and somewhat unexpected.

In lighter literature we had the concluding three volumes of Mr. Augustus J. C. Hare's Story of My Life—a record not the less entertaining because its readers could laugh with the author through a hundred pages, and at him in the hundred-and-first. Mr. Bullen's racy book on The Men of the Merchant Service was acceptable; and Messrs. Macmillan gave us some of Edward Fitz-Gerald's miscellaneous writings in a volume of "The Golden Treasury" series.

We fear that few younger reputations have called for notice this year. All the rising talent seems to exhaust itself in undistinguished fiction. But we are glad, in the present issue, to notice a promising book of poems by Mr. Gilbert Chesterton. Rumour is also busy with the authorship of a remarkable little book, called An Englishwoman's Love-Letters—the history of a blighted passion.

Prof. Dowden's Puritan and Anglican—an appreciation of the books of certain seventeenth-century writers to whom Prof. Dowden feels specially drawn—was a notable arrival.

The novels of the month were Mr. Zangwill's The Mantle of Elijah, and Mr. Maurice Hewlett's Richard Yea-and-Nay.

A year of frustration, yet a year of some fine performance. If inspiration burns low in these days, striving was never more vigorous. The year and the century are dying game.

IDEAL GIFT BOOKS.

THE HOLIDAY EDITION OF MRS. WIGGIN'S
TWO MOST POPULAR WORKS.

Crown 8vo. Cover design in gold, by CHAS. E. BROCK. Gilt edges, 6s. each.

PENELOPE'S ENGLISH EXPERIENCES.

AND

PENELOPE'S EXPERIENCES IN SCOTLAND

With more than 50 Full-page and Text Illustrations in each Volume.

By CHARLES E. BROCK.

Over 150,000 copies of these two works have been sold in England and America, and the unanimous verdict of the world's press is expressed in the word "Delightful."

"* Mr. Brock's Illustrations make these volumes ideal Gift Books.

EDITIONS DE LUXE. ONLY AUTHORISED ENGLISH EDITIONS, REVISED, AND WITH MANY CHARMING NEW POEMS ADDED.

POEMS OF PASSION.

By ELLA WHEELER WILCOX.

Large crown 8vo, tastefully printed on hand-made paper, 6s. net. each.

POEMS OF PLEASURE.

By ELLA WHEELER WILCOX.

"The daintiest books of the season."—Pall Mall Gazette.

THE BIBELOTS.

A SERIES OF REPRINTS FOR THE BOOK-LOVER.

Edited by J. POTTER-BRISCOE.

Size, 5 by 2½ in., with photogravure portraits, prettily designed title, head and tail pieces, and bound in embossed leather, gilt edges.

Price 2s. 6d. each, net.

Or any three volumes in pretty leather case, 10s. 6d. net.

NOW READY.

- |      |                                        |
|------|----------------------------------------|
| Vol. | I.—COLERIDGE'S TABLE-TALK.             |
| "    | II.—HERRICK'S WOMEN, LOVE AND FLOWERS. |
| "    | III.—LEIGH HUNT'S THE WORLD OF BOOKS.  |
| "    | IV.—GAY'S TRIVIA AND OTHER POEMS.      |
| "    | V.—MARCUS AURELIUS' MEDITATIONS.       |
| "    | VI.—KEATS' SHORTER POEMS.              |
| "    | VII.—SYDNEY SMITH'S WIT AND WISDOM.    |
| "    | VIII.—AN ELIZABETHAN GARLAND.          |
| "    | IX.—DR. JOHNSON'S TABLE-TALK.          |
| "    | X.—SHAKESPEARE'S SONNETS.              |

DAILY TELEGRAPH—"One of the prettiest sets of booklets which have recently exhibited the taste and skill of modern publishers."

SPECTATOR—"We have nothing but commendation for the series."

PUNCH—"These daintily-bound volumes, a library in themselves, precious to the lover of books."

DAILY NEWS—"Among the daintiest little volumes on the book market."

BIRMINGHAM POST—"The little book is indeed a treasure."

JUST PUBLISHED. Demy 8vo, pp. 946, cloth gilt, gilt top, 12s. net.

AN AMERICAN ANTHOLOGY.

1787-1900.

Edited by EDMUND OLARENCE STEDMAN,

Author of "Poets of America," &c., &c.

This is the most complete anthology of recent times. It contains an index of first lines; also a very valuable biographical dictionary.

A CHOICE GIFT-BOOK. Fcap. 4to, richly gilt side, 5s. net.

THE ANCIENT MARINER.

By S. T. COLERIDGE.

With six Full-page Illustrations, reproduced in Photogravure

By HERBERT COLE.

EDITION DE LUXE. Limited to 200 copies, on hand-made paper, bound in half vellum, 10s. 6d. net.

Fcap. 4to, attractive side design, 5s.

A BOOK OF ELFIN RHYMES.

By NORMAN.

With 40 page Humorous Illustrations, in three colours,

By CARTON MOORE PARK.

London: GAY & BIRD, 22, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C.
Agency for American Books. Catalogues, post free, on Application.

FROM

MESSRS. HARPER & BROTHERS' LIST.

THE LIFE OF THE EMPEROR FREDERICK.

From the German of Margaretha von Poschinger.

Edited, with an Introduction, by SIDNEY WHITMAN.

Demy 8vo, cloth, 16s.

The contents of the volume include conversations, letters, and personalia of monarchs, soldiers, savants, statesmen, and men of letters during the last half of the nineteenth century. The attempt is made for the first time to describe the part the late Emperor took in the political shaping of affairs and the building of Modern Germany, throwing entirely new light on several important historical events.

A book which should prove of engrossing interest; and invaluable to serious students of modern history.

"A welcome account of one of the noblest monarchs who ever occupied a throne."—St. James's Gazette.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE SOUL OF A PEOPLE."

PALACE TALES.

Tales of Burma and the Burmese Royal Household.

By H. FIELDING.

Author of "The Soul of a People," "Thilaw's Queen," &c.

Crown 8vo, 6s.

"Very quaint and charming, and altogether original.....Mr. Fielding can be witty as well as charming, and his tales of old Burmese Palace life are delightfully fresh and natural in their unforced humour."—Daily News.

A BOOK OF SUBURBAN GARDENING.

'TWIXT TOWN AND COUNTRY.

By ROMA WHITE.

With Photogravure Frontispieces of the Bank of England Garden.

Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

"Of practical use to the citizen as well as to the countryman, and which the skilled horticulturist and the amateur cultivator can alike read with pleasure."—Irish Times.

FICTION.

A NEW ROMANCE BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE PRINCESS XENIA."

CHLORIS OF THE ISLAND.

By H. B. MARRIOTT WATSON.

Author of "The Princess Xenia," "The Rebel," "The Adventurers," &c.

Crown 8vo, 6s.

"The story bristles with incident, the plot is well conceived, and there is not an uninteresting page from first to last."—Glasgow Herald.

AN ANONYMOUS WORK BY A WELL-KNOWN POPULAR AUTHOR.

THE SLAVES OF SOCIETY.

A Satire on Social Life and Usages.

Crown 8vo, 6s.

The Publishers beg to call special attention to this book, which, although published anonymously, is from the pen of a well-known and brilliant writer.

"It is so good, indeed, in form and style, that we are convinced the author is no newcomer into the field of literature."—Glasgow Herald.

"Clever in its delineation of character, and sparkling in its dialogue, painting the fashionable people of the moment in vivid, graceful lines; and no one will read it without a keen and hearty enjoyment."—Scotsman.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE GRASSHOPPERS."

THE INNER SHRINE.

By Mrs. ALFRED SIDGWICK (Mrs. Andrew Dean).

Crown 8vo, 6s.

"Excellent in tone and feeling throughout, and deserves to be widely read."—Daily News.

A BREAKER OF LAWS.

By W. PETT RIDGE.

Author of "Mord Em'ly," Crown 8vo, 6s.

"The tone of the book is excellent throughout; it is the life of the slums caught at the happiest moment and admirably reproduced.....Though true, it is never distasteful."—Daily News.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE RED BADGE OF COURAGE."

WHILOMVILLE STORIES.

By STEPHEN CRANE.

Illustrated. Crown 8vo, 5s.

Mr. Crane's book is another contribution to the humorous study of boy nature, inaugurated by Mark Twain's "Tom Sawyer," Mr. Anstey's "Vico Versa," Mr. Eden Philpotts' "The Human Boy," and Mr. Kipling's "Stalky and Co." Mr. Stephen Crane believed these "Whilomville Stories" to contain his best work.

HARPER & BROTHERS, 45, Albemarle Street, W.

Things Seen.

The Poor.

I WAITED for the train in a small provincial town. Just outside the station was a second-hand bookseller's shop, and, as a drizzle of rain was falling, the sixpenny box had been covered with a tarpaulin. Pulling aside the covering, I peeped and poked among the moist volumes to find—"Religio Medici; Urn Burial; and Christian Morals. By Sir Thomas Browne, Knight, Physician of Norwich. Printed for Andrew Crooke in the Year 1643."

I turned the friendly leaves, and suddenly this line leapt to my eyes from "A Letter to a Friend":

To be dissolved, and be with Christ, was his dying ditty.

Straightway, without effort, the dull town and the bookseller's shop were dissolved, and my mind jumped the years back, back to the memory of the dawn that followed a night I had spent at the St. Bernard Hospice. The loosing of the dogs had roused me, and looking from my window I had seen the human things gamboling and fraternising in the snow. I went downstairs, through the cold corridor, past the door of the chapel where the homeless of two nations, poor birds of passage, were thanking God for the gift of another day. I stepped from the Hospice out into the shining dawn, and came to a small stone building about the size of a workman's cottage. Three feet from the ground it was pierced by a window a couple of feet square, crossed by thick wooden bars. I peered through the bars, and when my eyes pierced the mystery of its gloom I shuddered. It contained a score or so of dead—men, women, and children—of dead against whose bodies decay cannot prevail. Arranged in a semi-circle round the chamber, they stood or sat just in the attitude and in the condition when death had touched them. A mother was giving her breast to her child, an old man was huddling a cloak tighter around his body. The snow, their enemy, blew past me through the crossed bars in little drifts, circling playfully about its harvest of victims. There, frozen into stone that never thaws, they stood or sat, those friendless travellers, caught and preserved at the supreme moment of their lives.

To be dissolved, and be with Christ, was his dying ditty.

Never to be dissolved—though dead! What a destiny! Even a mummy is hidden from the living—but they! It was a fancy, a morbid fancy, but it haunted me. And this also. If there be a place where the spirits of these poor are made perfect, and if they are permitted to look upon the world they have left, they must see their bodies willing to return to the elements, but forbidden. I bought the book. I put the fancy away. Such solemn morbidities are not for me. But the author of Urn Burial! What a chapter!

The Summer Isles.

THE City was proud of its great Library, with its miles of shelves, but the Librarian loved it. He was a bent, spectacled old gentleman, who looked as if he had been cradled in an encyclopædia. He lived for the Library, he lived within its precincts, and his recreation consisted in showing people over it. One day he culled me, and for an hour I walked between hedges of books, climbed ladders that led to more books, gazed wearily into glass cases which contained precious books, lived for a time in a world from which everything had been blotted out but books. A musty smell pervaded that city of books, there was no air, a pale light glimmered feebly through windows obscured by books, and on each floor sat a yellow, spectacled man writing in a book, so entranced in his book that he did not so much as raise his head as we passed on tiptoe on our way to other corridors of books. But once a door of painted books would not open. My guide left me to fetch the key, and I, with that feeling of angry, useless protest against the immediate conditions of life that make a fish flap when it has been ravished from its natural element, snatched a volume from the shelf, and opened it at the title-page. It was called: The General Historie of the Summer Isles with the Names of the Adventurers from their First Beginning to this Present 1626. The walls of the Library fell away and I saw a summer sea, little lazy isles, birds, trees nodding in a temperate breeze, and the adventurers drawing rein beneath them. And I thanked God that He had not made me an author. When my guide returned he caught me humming (how he stared!)—

You have heard the call of the off-shore wind

And the voice of the deep-sea rain;

You have heard the song—how long, how long?

Pull out on the trail again!

The Lord knows what we may find, dear lass,

And the Deuce knows what we may do—

But we're back once more on the old trail, our own trail,
the out trail,

We're down, hull down on the Long Trail—the trail that is always new.

Friends that Fail Not.

THE glowing of my companionable fire upon the backs of my companionable books; and then the familiar difficulty of choice. Compassed about with old friends, whose virtues and vices I know better than my own, I will be loyal to loves that are not of yesterday. New poems, new essays, new stories, new lives, are not my company at Christmastide, but the never-ageing old. "My days among the dead are passed." Veracious Southey, how cruel a lie! My sole days among the dead are the days passed among stillborn or moribund moderns, not the white days and shining nights free for the strong voices of the ancients in fame. A classic has a permanence of pleasurable: that is the meaning of his estate and title. It is the vexing habit of many, whose loving intimacy with the old immortals is undoubted, to assume and say that no one now reads the Religio Medici, or the Pickwick Papers, or Ben Jonson's Masques, or the Waverley Novels, or Pope's Essay on Man, or Dr. Johnson's Rambler and Idler. Themselves excepted, there are no votaries, no willing bond-slaves, of such works. It is not credible. I believe that in numbers we are a goodly company, who joy in the fresh humanities of the old literature, and are not without a portion of Lamb's spirit. The eight volumes of Clarissa Harlowe—does the world contain volumes more passionately pulsing than these, "my midnight darlings," which tell me of white Clarissa in her sorrows, of the brilliant villainies of Lovelace? How can that tragedy, that comedy, grow old; and who in his right mind wishes one word away from its voluminous unfolding? Or the evening choice may fall upon the dazzling cruelties of the Duneiad, and its brutal brilliancy people the room with ghosts in tattered raiment, under their fleshless arms piles of "Proposals" for a new version of Horace, and in the pallor of their grotesque countenances the signs of an habitual starvation: it is reality, a gaunt, historic truth.

Presently comes a voice of majestic vastness from the chambers of the incalculable dead, plangent, triumphant, mystically sweet; the voice of him who in life was "a king among death and the dead." Has our world to-day outworn the wisdom, wearied of the music, processionally flowing from the Knight of Norwich? As little as it has outgrown the poignant thinking of Pascal, the sad, the haughty, the proudly prostrate before God; or the lacerated heart of Swift the lacerating. But at this cordial period of the calendar Swift may prove too grim. Let Fielding, Homer of novelists, lead in Parson Adams with his Æschylus, or escort Slipslop the fair and frail. It were stupid and mendacious to aver that we have spoken of friends too antiquated for ease of converse with them, that the books of yesterday must claim our preference, that we are affected and ineffective else, and aliens in the air we breathe. "Peace, for I loved him, and love him for ever! The dead are not dead, but alive," cries Tennyson. What is true of loved humanity is true also of loved humanities, the high expressions of man's mind. As Augustine said of the Christian faith, here is a beauty both old and new; only a starveling imagination is so hampered by the accidents of any ancient excellence that it cannot discern the essence which is dateless. Quaint, old-fashioned, say some when they read the writings of their forefathers; and it is said with a confused and confounding foolishness. Language, manners, circumstances, these may not be ours; but have we different passions and human relationships, another interest in life and death? Stripped of our "lendings," our ancestors and we are the same, and their writings are contemporary with our own. Smiles can be kindly: but there is something painful in the smiling indulgence with which we are wont to regard the works of old which were once in the very forefront of modernity. We live in time, and the past must always be the most momentous part of it. It will be all past when time, that accident of God, is over. "I will remember the days of old!" "Whatever else we read, Gibbon must always be read too." The spirit of Freeman's verdict applies to all mastership of any Muse. To ignore, to treat with impatience, to be soon weary of an ancient excellence and fame, is like blindness to the natural humanities of the world, to sea and wind and stars, to the forests and mountains. If only we had more of that spirit of tremulous delight, of awe in ecstasy, with which the men of the Renaissance read the recaptured, the resurgent classics of Greece and Rome! Few of us would dare to write at all, had we always before the eyes of our minds remembrance of the mighty: are we of the Apostolic Succession? are our reforms legitimate? do we consult the general consent of the Forefathers? Milton smiles austere at the thought, and Shakespeare smiles compassion: Virgil says gently, "I, dying, wished my Æneids to be burnt." But the torrent of trash runs gaily on, and the struggling critic longs for a breath of the "diviner air": he remembers Bacon's saying, that some books may be read "by deputy," and wishes that he could so read the futilities upon his table. And yet all is repaid by those happy rarities of time, the days on which there comes his unexpected way occasion for "the noble pleasure of praising": when he can say, "This is the right thing, here is the true touch; my shelves welcome their new companion." There is little fear of excellence escaping him: he fears that fear too much. We do not envy the fate and fame of him who said of Wordsworth, "This will never do!" nor of him who bade Keats "back to his galipots." We desire no experience of the feelings with which publisher or editor remembers that he "declined with thanks" what the general judgment of the judicious came afterwards to applaud. But, to employ the impressive imagery of Mr. Chadband, I will not go into the city, and, having seen an eel, return to bid the literary world "rejoice with me, for I have seen an elephant!" In the words of that eloquent divine, "Would that be te-rewth?" But when I encounter living genius, which may grow to noble proportions, it were a churlish folly to belittle it—to bestow an elegant and timid mediocrity of praise. "All Horace then, all Claudian now" is as rash a wail as when Byron uttered it, though the voices of Wordsworth and Coleridge were heard in his land. But the classics have attained; they are at rest. Complete, immutable, they have for us no surprises, save the permanent surprise of genius—that "strangeness" without a strain of which "there is no excellent beauty," and which keeps its virginal first freshness from the "valley of perpetual dream." We are so sure of the classics "strongly stationed in eternity."

There exist moments in the life of man

When he is nearer the great Soul of the World
Than is man's custom,

says Coleridge, translating Schiller. The readers share with the writers of masterpieces the exaltation of such moments, but they come chiefly at sound of "ancestral voices." About contemporary voices there is an element of uncertainty not undelightful, yet forbidding the perfection of faith. We prophesy and wait. And, if the noble ancients are more comforting to us than even the worthiest seeming moderns, how much more tolerable and pardonable are the mediocrities of the past than of the present! They are historically interesting. I would rather laugh over the poems of a Cibber or a Pye, than over the poems of their living likes; it is better to be amused than exasperated, and kindly time lets me laugh at that past incompetence which would annoy me were it present. A monody upon the Death of the Princess Charlotte, totally devoid of merit, does not rouse the wrath aroused by similar performances upon the death of Prince Christian Victor. The insanities of a Zedowich Muggleton or a Joanna Southcott provoke me to more patient an anger than the diatribes of a Dr. Dowie. The blunders of the dead are over and done, harming no one; the blunders of the living are a danger and a nuisance. It is a pity that anyone, however uncritical, should enjoy the Martin Tupper or Robert Montgomerys of the day; it implies an inability to enjoy Milton. No man can serve two masters; you cannot be Fielding's friend, and also accept the colossal ineptitudes of our most popular novelists—artless, humourless, most brazen. Bad novels of the last century have never failed to give me a certain pleasure. I trust that posterity may be able to extract pleasure from the bad novels of last year, for I am not. They fill me with the sourest sadness, which is an unwholesome state of mind.

Perish, cried Newman, the whole tribe of Hookers and Jewells, so Athanasius and the majestic Leo may be mine! We cannot afford to let go the Shining Ones upon the heights. It does not matter that the heights are so high that our intelligences climb up so poor a portion of the way. He would be a liar full of impudence who should dare to say that he felt wholly at ease with the awful Milton or Dante, with the solemn meditations of Browne, with the dread death march over death of dread Lucretius. There are times when the high things of art seem almost incredible; magnificent delusions, golden dreams; their creators' pains must surely have been too vast for bearing. We, with our little lamps of intelligence in our hands, go tremblingly through the sacred dimness, hoping to comprehend at last a little more. Our reverence is a religion; genius, like love and beauty, is a pledge of divinity and the everlasting; a light perfected lyric lures us heavenward; and from of old come the proudest and the clearest voices. The voices of the day must wait for their consecrate authority and confirmed applause, till Time, the just, shall please. Take me with you in spirit, Ancients of Art, the crowned, the sceptred, whose voices this night chaunt a gloria in excelsis, flooding the soul with a passion of joy and awe.

LIONEL JOHNSON.

The Struggle for Existence among the Stars.

If the importance of a scientific theory ought to be judged by its extension, there can be no doubt that Darwinism is the most important discovery of the nineteenth century. Its effect has been felt far beyond the province in which it was initiated, because it has been used to interpret the growth of almost every form of activity known to the human mind. Science, indeed, had already made many valuable discoveries, and Philosophy had made many valuable generalisations, before The Origin of Species was published; but it is hardly too much to say that all these must be readjusted and reinterpreted by the modern thinker if he wishes to bring them into close relation with modern knowledge. The portentous fact of Evolution had, to be sure, flickered and glimmered before great minds. Vague questionings of it are to be found both in Eastern and in Western thought. But its detailed process, its vast and multiform significance, had not yet startled mankind. It is doubtful if even to-day we have measured its full revolutionary power. Except by a few speculative thinkers concerned with the mysterious "last things" in human knowledge that are revealed only to those who push thought back to its dim, vast presuppositions, the work of Du Prel,* for instance, would probably be received with consternation and derision. How great is the gulf fixed not merely between ancient and modern knowledge, but between the knowledge of this generation and of its predecessor, might, perhaps, be seen by a comparison of the sort of spirit which animates Chateaubriand's Génie du Christianisme with the sort of spirit which fills the book that is before us. A sentimentalist like Chateaubriand (1768-1848) would doubtless have thought it blasphemous to believe that the stars are not "singing together," but only struggling together in a war of forces as fierce as ever raged between species. "Quoi!" he says, "dans des figures si variées, dans une si grande diversité de caractères, on ne peut trouver les lettres qui suffisent au nom de Dieu! Le problème de la divinité n'est-il point résolu dans le calcul mystérieux de tant de soleils? Une algèbre aussi brillante ne peut elle servir à dégager la grande Inconnue?" But an astronomy which has only an æsthetic basis will not carry us far, and we turn to the audacious science of Du Prel who applies Darwinism to the stars!

Now the ordinary observer supposes that the face of the sky has not changed since Job watched Orion and the Pleiades, and that although man and his gods and their temples pass away at least the stars remain for ever and ever. The man of science, however, is impressed by a still deeper thought, viz., that Nature is not immobile, but mobile and for ever passing away and for ever in process. If we reasoned by analogy, therefore, we would expect to find that not merely the inorganic world beneath us and around us, but also the inorganic above us, is, like the organic, subject to change. And this is what we do find. Even although all the planets disappeared, many generations of men (supposing the earth held her place) would still behold their light. If Arcturus perished, its light could be visible for twenty-four years, since its rays take that time to travel to the earth. And there is a star which, although it foundered to-night, would be seen for 573 years afterwards, because the light that it sends us left it in the thirteenth century.

But if there is one hypothesis in science which may be said to have grown into a fact it is the Nebular Hypothesis according to which the sidereal system was evolved out of a chaos of elements which gradually organised itself into such order as we see. The importance of Du Prel's work consists in the attempt to impress the imagination with the fact that the process is still going on, and to discover the laws by which the sidereal system attained its equilibrium. Whereas the ordinary observer believes that that system was never imperfect, but constituted a harmony from the beginning, the truth is, that—even yet—it contains unstable elements and mechanical contradictions—Mechanische Widersprüche.

The laws of adaptation and variation, in fact, which Darwin discovered among organic things are applicable throughout the universe, and it is in obedience to them that the planets discovered their orbits. It is certainly an amazing thought that a star requires to fight for its place in the sky with as much persistence as an animal requires in the struggle between species! The single fact that a comet changes its path would be sufficient basis for Du Prel's hypothesis. For what does change of path imply except a disturbance coming from external forces? The conception of a struggle between the stars thus begins to be intelligible. Brorsen's comet, for instance, is known to have suffered changes in its path owing to the disturbing attractive force of Jupiter. As it described its ellipse, its nearest approach to the sun was once 30 million miles and its greatest distance 117 million miles. But at the next observation 30 millions had become 13, and 117 millions had become 113. Comets, meteorites, and asteroids are to be explained on the principle of the elimination of the unfit. There is a perpetual weeding out (Ausjätungsprozess) of those bodies which in the Kampf ums Dasein are overcome by bodies stronger than themselves. How are the observed changes of orbit to be explained except on the hypothesis that the system is not yet thoroughly organised, and that some of its members are being persecuted by the force of gravitation? The fall of meteorites and asteroids (in Smolensk in the year 1807 a meteorite fell which weighed 70 kilograms) proves that those bodies which are unable to withstand by their own repulsive forces the attractive forces of others disappear from the system. Newton's Law of Gravitation runs: "Every planet is attracted towards the sun by a force which varies according to the inverse square of the distance." And this law is supplemented by another which states that the planets are likewise attracted and repelled by each other. Thus a system which, as we look at it, seems an immobile product, a kind of Nunc Stans, is really a sidereal Armageddon of blind forces. The life of a planet consists in an attempt which lasts millions of years to overcome by means of its own tangential velocity (Tangentialgeschwindigkeit) the attractive forces of the sun (p. 200). The fact that the path is elliptical means that there is a temporary compromise between those two forces, but the compromise cannot last. As the velocity slackens, the planet gradually approaches the limits of its existence. "Before every star lies the inexorable alternative either to adapt itself to the sidereal system or to be thrust from it" (p. 21). The law of gravitation is the instrument of selection (besorgende Faktor) by means of which the fittest survive and the unfit disappear. The change of a comet's path means the attempt to escape or postpone destruction, and, according to Schiaparelli, our stellar system is already full of the debris of comets and stars that have fallen in the struggle. The miniature catastrophes of asteroids and meteorites are only prophetic of what must yet take place on a large scale. The sidereal system is moving towards its own dissolution. Owing to the gradual loss of speed, the planets are unavoidably drawn nearer the sun, which, like Kronos of the Greeks, must one day devour his own children (p. 243), Alles ist daueros! These firmaments shall be shaken and their stars blotted out, and the universe as we know it shall become again a heap of magnetic dust. "They shall perish: but Thou remainest: and they all shall wax old as doth a garment: and as a vesture shalt Thou fold them up, and they shall be changed."

Baron du Prel's merit lies not in the discovery of new facts (although, indeed, it is obvious that he has been a first-hand observer), but rather in his use of a new method of interpreting the facts. Moreover, this extraordinary book betrays metaphysical insight. I am told that Metaphysic is dead. Metaphysic is never dead. The particular sciences are of no interest until Metaphysic gathers them together and relates them to human emotion and to human thought.

BENJAMIN SWIFT.

* Der Kampf ums Dasein am Himmel. The title of the third edition, however, is, Entwicklungsgeschichte des Weltalls. 1882. Leipzig.

---

IF YOU REALLY WANT TO SEE the most interesting and best produced of the Illustrated Papers, tell your Newsagent to send you

THE SPHERE

which is everywhere acknowledged to be

The Leading Illustrated
Newspaper.

First in Variety of Interest.

First in Artistic and Literary Merit.

First in Excellence of Production.

---

"The largest, best, and brightest illustrated newspaper sixpence can buy."—OUTLOOK.

"THE SPHERE again holds an easy first place among the week's illustrated papers."

BIRMINGHAM DAILY GAZETTE.

"The more I see of THE SPHERE, the more I like it. Mr. Clement Shorter, the editor, has achieved a feat unparalleled in journalism. With the first number of his beautiful paper he attained for it a popularity which with other journals has been the result of the slow, patient labour of years. Novelty, freshness, the breath of vigorous and wholesome life, the bloom of brain and pen—these are the characteristics which have made THE SPHERE unique and foremost in the illustrated journalism of the world."—REYNOLDS'S NEWSPAPER.

---

CAN BE OBTAINED OF ALL NEWSAGENTS AND AT ALL RAILWAY BOOKSTALLS.

Price SIXPENCE Weekly.

---

Publishing Office: GREAT NEW STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Favourite Books of 1900.

Some Readers.

THIS year, in accordance with our custom, we sent to a number of well-known men and women a request that they would name the two books which during the past year they have read with most interest and pleasure. A large number of replies have already been received, some of which we print below.

Sir F. H. JEUNE.

Morley's Cromwell.
Huxley's Life.

Sir CHARLES W. DILKE.

The book which has interested me most in 1900 has been Jacquon le Croquant, published in January. I cannot use the word "pleased," as the novel is intensely sad, while it does not either correspond with any existing facts or help one in working to remedy existing evils. The world is already too sad for the poor to make one wish to read sad books about them, which relate to a state of things somewhat different from what is, here and now, and which hardly, therefore, can do positive good. Some modern books can help in this way, but are not on the artistic level of Jacquon le Croquant. I should prefer to name no second book this year.

Mr. FREDERIC HARRISON.

The only first-class book of 1900 has been Maurice Hewlett's Richard Yea-and-Nay.

Mr. EDMUND GOSSE.

The Life and Letters of Huxley.
Mr. Arthur Symonds's Symbolist Movement in Literature.

Mr. ALFRED R. WALLACE.

Mr. Richardson's How it can be Done.
Mr. Kenworthy's Anatomy of Misery.
Both new editions, but unknown to me before.

Mr. KARL BLIND.

Ein Gottsched-Denkmal, by Eugen Reichel.
The Life of Abdur Rahman. Edited by Sultau Mahomed Khan.

Mr. SIDNEY LEE.

C. H. Firth's Life of Oliver Cromwell.
Leslie Stephen's English Utilitarians.

Mr. OSCAR BROWNING.

Bury's History of Greece.
Robertson's Introduction to English Politics.

Mr. WALTER CRANE.

J. A. Hobson's South Africa.
The Book of the Art of Cennino Cennini.

Mr. ARTHUR W. PINERO.

Leonard Huxley's Life and Letters of Thomas Henry Huxley.
Beatrice Marshall's Emma Marshall.

Mr. HENRY ARTHUR JONES.

Huxley's Letters.
An Englishwoman's Love-Letters.

Sir ROBERT S. BALL.

Life of Archbishop Benson, by his Son.
Red Pottage.

Mr. C. ARTHUR PEARSON.

Lord Rosebery's Napoleon: The Last Phase.
H. Harland's Cardinal's Snuff-box.

Mr. STEPHEN GWYNN.

Herod and Lord Jim. If I might name a third in a wholly different kind, it would be Dr. Hirn's Origins of Art; but that is partly an accident.

Mr. LIONEL JOHNSON.

Basil Champneys's Life of Coventry Patmore.
Clement Shorter's new edition of Mrs. Gaskell's Life of Charlotte Brontë.
Other books have interested me not less than these, but none more.

Mr. W. P. JAMES.

Miss Moira O'Neill's Songs of the Glens of Antrim.
Letters of T. E. Brown.

Dr. JOSEPH PARKER.

Robert Orange.
The Master Christian.
They should be read one after the other, and in the order given.

Mr. ARNOLD WHITE.

Rosebery's Napoleon.
Winston Churchill's (first) Letters from the War.

Mr. ARTHUR WAUGH.

Walter Raleigh's Milton.
I. Zangwill's The Mantle of Elijah.

Mr. MAURICE HEWLETT.

Tommy and Grizel.
An Englishwoman's Love-Letters.

Mr. GILBERT PARKER.

Stephen Phillips's Herod.
Lord Rosebery's Napoleon.

Mr. PERCY WHITE.

Wells's Love and Mr. Lewisham.
Street's The Trials of the Bantocks.
But I have read few novels.

Mr. ALFRED SUTRO.

The Mantle of Elijah.
Richard Yea-and-Nay.

Mr. I. ZANGWILL.

Quisanté.
Herod.

Mr. RICHARD PRYCE.

G. S. Street's The Trials of the Bantocks.
Annie Wakeman's The Autobiography of a Charwoman.

Mr. BENJAMIN SWIFT.

Gilbert Murray's Andromache: a Play in Three Acts.
Lichtenberger's Die Philosophie Friedrich Nietzsches.

Mr. ARTHUR MORRISON.

I have read very few new books this year. But as regards fiction, I have been pleased and interested by Mr. G. S. Street's Trials of the Bantocks and Mr. Wells's Love and Mr. Lewisham.

Mr. EDWARD FREDERIC BENSON.

Tolstoi's Resurrection.
Lord Rosebery's Napoleon.

Miss ELIZABETH ROBINS.

Of the books lately in my hand those I have cared most for are Rostand's L'Aiglon, and the haunting and exquisite Love-Letters of an Englishwoman.

Mr. H. W. MASSINGHAM.

Tolstoi's Resurrection is the only book published in 1900 which seriously interested me.

Mr. CLEMENT SHORTER.

J. B. Bury's History of Greece.
A Treasury of Irish Poetry. Edited by Stopford Brooke and T. W. Rolleston.

Mr. MAX BEERBOHM.

Henry James's The Soft Side.
An Englishwoman's Love-Letters.

Old Par's Wanderings.

I WAS born in the brain of a totally unprincipled "Literary Gossipper." Late one Friday night the proof of his Saturday article came back to him marked "7 lines short," and he was put to his wits' ends to fill it. Once again he ran through the literary papers, but they yielded nothing fresh. It was either invention or disgrace; so he invented; and I was born. I ran thus:

Who shall say that the lot of a successful literary man is nowadays a hard one? We understand that Mr. Guy Boothby, the author of Dr. Nikola and a host of other popular books, has lately acquired a large estate in Hertfordshire, and is there building a "pleasure dome." Mr. Boothby does nothing by halves, and among the luxuries of his new home is a bath of solid gold. Modern Grub-street is surely a tributary of Park-lane.

Having produced this, the Literary Gossipper went to bed and forgot all about it. My travels had begun.

One of my first journeys took me to the Sphere. "C. K. S." wrote in his "Literary Letter":

My attention has been drawn to a paragraph in the . . . relating to Mr. Guy Boothby and a golden bath, which he is stated to be installing at his new house in Hertfordshire. I know this part of England well, as it is within forty or fifty miles of the home of my friend Mr. George Meredith, and not so very far from the residence in which my friend, Mr. Thomas J. Wise, keeps his collection of Shelleyana and other treasures. Apropos of Shelley, I may mention that Mr. Spencer, the bookseller of Oxford-street, has just sent me a catalogue containing a commonplace letter of Byron to the author of Alastor, a facsimile of which is given on this page.

I was now fairly set going. The next week "S. G.," in the "Literary Notes" in the Pall Mall Gazette, gave me a helping hand:

The dream-palace of Herod, in Mr. Stephen Phillips's stupendous play at Her Majesty's, is, it seems, to have a real counterpart in the new house which Mr. Guy Boothby is building for himself in the country. A golden bath, such as, I am told, this inspired writer is contemplating, is quite in keeping with Herodian ambition. Personally I could never read anything that Mr. Boothby has written; but there are people, I understand, who prefer Dr. Nikola to Marpessa. 'Tis an odd world.

The Globe's "Literary Gossipper" on the following Saturday wrote:

What, we wonder, would Dr. Johnson say could he read the announcement, recently made public, that a popular novelist is adding a golden bath to his household furniture? We would give much to hear the Sage's thunderous criticism. Lamb would have found in the subject an opportunity for some pretty embroidery. But for circumstantial description no one could excel Defoe: how he would show us to the very life the soap-dish and towel-rack, the taps and cork-matting! Future students of London, by the way, may perhaps make ingenious speculations as to the origin of the name Coldbath Fields and come in time to associate it with the Gold bath of Mr. Guy Boothby's mansion.

The "By the Way" column of the Globe also noticed me:

The author of Dr. Nikola, it seems, has a golden bath. We understand that invitations to his house are much sought after; but the host, having his wits about him, stipulates that his guests shall not bring hammer or chisel. He may be Guy Boothby, he says, but he refuses to be Boothby guyed.

Punch was witty too:

A golden bath sounds like Midas; but, as a matter of fact, the real owner of it is Mr. Guy Boothby, the author, who has had one placed in his new home in Hertfordshire. How many carats is not stated; but if Midas' ears as well as his tastes have been acquired by Mr. Boothby, twenty-two would not be too many. Hertfordshire will in future be known as County Guy.

The Christian Herald and Signs of the Times improved the occasion:

Mr. Guy Boothby, the talented author of Dr. Nikola and other stories, has installed a bath of solid gold in his new residence in Hertfordshire. The bath, we are informed, weighs one hundred pounds, and has cost not less than eight thousand pounds sterling. The bath is, of course, fitted with hot and cold water, and one may lie at full length in perfect luxury. Few authors are in so fortunate a position as to be able to emulate Mr. Boothby's extravagance. But we must beware of excesses. (Proverbs xi. 4.)

Truth was indignant:

I cannot remember an instance of more obnoxious snobbishness than that recorded of the egregious author of Dr. Nikola and a number of equally foolish stories. It is stated by one who apparently knows that this gentleman has added a golden bath to his mansion in Hertfordshire. Time was when authors were kept in their place; but the crass ignorance of a gullible public has changed all that and made ridiculous fopperies like this possible. It does not need extraordinary powers of vision to see in such a manifestation of vulgarity another proof of Joe's malign influence. Truly the autocrat of Brummagem has much to answer for.

"L. F. A.," in the Illustrated London News, played with me:

There is a pleasant suggestion of Miss Kilmansegg in the statement that Mr. Guy Boothby has a golden bath. Personally I prefer porcelain, such as you see in that charming shop window at the top of Bond-street; but why not gold? It was only the other day that my landlord was doing a few little things for me, and I might so easily have suggested a gold bath.

What accessories has Mr. Boothby, I wonder? A soap dish set with pearls? A sponge—well, there is not much one can do to ennoble a sponge. A sponge is ever a commoner. And his towels? What can one do to a towel to make it worthy a golden bath? Scent it with attar of roses, perhaps.

Mr. Ashby Sterry, the "Bystander" in the Graphic, was true to his old gods:

To keep pace with new books is too great a task for me. As a lazy minstrel of my acquaintance once sang:

Of Mudie's last tale how one wearies and sickens!
We'll throw it aside and get back to our Dickens.

Among new novels there is one called Dr. Nikola, the author of which has made so much money that he has a gold bath. Ah, me! times change. There was no gold bath at Gad's Hill. Which reminds me that I walked to Gad's Hill the other day and spent some hours peering through the sacred railings. As a rhyming friend of mine (who shall be nameless) has it:

Next to sweet girls in dainty pantalettes,
I treasure most my Early Vic. regrets.

In course of time I crossed the Atlantic. Two American versions follow. This is from the Roycroft Rouser:

We have always thought Richard Harding Davis's valet fairly tall, but an English author puts him out of sight. Guy Boothby, the patent steam Nikolist, who keeps twenty phonographers busy taking down his yarns, has left Dick Davis nowhere. Boothby's pet weakness is for a gold bath. Gold for him, he says. Meredith and Hardy and G. W. Cable and W. D. Howells may wash in silver if they like, or not wash at all; but gold for him.

The second American paragraph appeared in a Californian paper. It was very circumstantial:

The English author Mr. Guy Booth, author of Dr. Nicoll, and other biographies, is the third son of General Booth, the leader of the Salvation Army. Mr. Booth, however, does not share his father's views, particularly with regard to the bestowal of wealth. Part of his own large fortune, made by a long series of very successful books, has recently been spent in acquiring an estate in the country, where he is building a house of unrivalled splendour. Among its luxurious appointments is a solid gold bath, purchased, we understand, from the late Barney Barnato's mansion in Park-lane.

After roaming America for some time I crossed to England again. The Westminster Gazette found me somewhere and put me into "Here, There, and Everywhere," and it was in that column that my inventor found me once more. Being again short of a par, he judged it time for contradiction; and in his next "Book Babbings" I made a reappearance, but this time in a new form. I was changed to:

The statement that Mr. Guy Boothby, the author of Dr. Nikola, has a golden bath in his new country house is, we are authoritatively informed, untrue; and we regret to have been the means of promulgating the rumour. How the report got about we cannot think, but it came to us from a source which we considered trustworthy. However, no harm has been done.

The British Weekly, which hitherto had kept silence, now gave me attention. "A Man of Kent" wrote, under the heading of "Rambling Remarks":

For a long time a ridiculous story about Mr. Guy Boothby and a gold bath has been in circulation. It was, of course, a fabrication, as I knew from the first, and it is now finally contradicted. We are too much in the power of newspaper men who do not make sure of their facts. In the old days, when Mr. Hutton had the Spectator and Mr. Barrie was a journalist at Nottingham, it was very different. Mention of Mr. Barrie reminds me that his Tommy and Grizel is among the best selling books of the month.

And there I leave my peregrinations. But I am still wandering, and a hundred years hence I shall be wandering still. A personal par. never wholly dies.

Correspondence.

Art and Technique.

SIR,—Mr. Arthur Symons has presented an absorbingly interesting problem in his article in last week's ACADEMY. Just where technique ends and Art begins—that is the point on the clear perception of which depends the reputation of every critic of painting, music, and literature. In my opinion it is not sufficiently recognised that technique is something far more than the mere mechanism of agile fingers: it is no less the outcome and visible proof of acute intellect, absolute self-command, and real depth of feeling. The artistic temperament is an infinitely more widely-distributed gift than that combination of talents which means perfection of technique.

It has always seemed to me that Busoni is an artist through and through: that he is of a very different type from Ysaye I do not dispute, and I can very well understand that when they are heard together the latter should seem to display more artistic feeling and emotional power than Busoni; but yet I very much doubt if the violinist's temperament is of so spiritual a nature as that of the pianist. Ysaye is open, frank, brave; he will tell you all he feels; he is not ashamed to weep while you look on in sympathy. But Busoni is intellectual: his emotions are held in check. He is ascetic—his nature is refined and delicate. It has been scourged by the whip of Idealism, and brought into subjection by years of incessant and strenuous thought. The very appearances of the men are indicative of their opposing temperaments. If every man makes his own face (and, in these days, this truism is becoming a platitude) surely a Christ-like head is likely to contain more depth of feeling and intellect than one which, however remarkable it may be in other respects, is not particularly noticeable for its rejection of the coarser appeals to the flesh. When in conversation with Busoni a year or two ago, he resented his intellectuality being mistaken for coldness or insipidity. If Mr. Symons would turn to some of Busoni's compositions he would, I think, discover there convincing proof of his truly artistic and emotional temperament.—
I am, &c.,
C. FRED KENYON.

"An Englishwoman's Love-Letters."

SIR,—I have read An Englishwoman's Love-Letters with great attention, and it appears to me it has been completely misunderstood by your reviewer and by the writer of every other criticism which I have come across. That the tragedy (as the few lines of the preface declare) is wholly the outcome of Fate, and no fault of either of the principal actors, is clearly indicated by many passages in the letters themselves—passages which are introduced with such care, skill, and art, that the theory of the authenticity of the letters becomes untenable.

The reason of the breaking off of the engagement and the abandonment of the girl is not the infidelity of her lover, nor the waning of his passion caused by the intensity of hers. It is brought about by the young man's discovery of an insurmountable barrier between them—a barrier, the nature of which is so terrible that his most merciful action can only be to leave her to die in ignorance of the truth, while he himself bears as a lesser evil the torturing knowledge that she must believe it is his hand that has dealt her the death-blow.

The only hypothesis which fits all the circumstances of the case is, that the girl's father was the father of the young man also, and to the truth of this hypothesis innumerable indications point. The girl was an only child, and her father and mother lived separated from her earliest infancy; and, though there was no scandal, it is clear that the mother was in no way to blame for the separation. The girl herself, as we are carefully told, is six months older than her lover (an otherwise curious detail); but the grounds for separation took place after the marriage of her parents. Though the young people had spent all their lives within six miles of each other, they met at last only by accident. Some powerful agency had hitherto kept them apart: this agency was the young man's mother, and it is during her absence that the intimacy begins. From the first she is opposed to the match, and looks upon the girl, who is rich, charming, beautiful, and in every respect desirable, with a coldness which amounts to repulsion. At the beginning her opposition is discreet, calculated, diplomatic; gradually, as she becomes less hopeful of stifling the attachment while it is still immature, she tries more violent means—appeals, entreaties, threats. These also are in vain, and she finally realises that nothing but a confession of the truth will avail to sever loves so faithfully and so firmly knit. At the last possible moment she makes the confession, with the result that the letters show. The young man, filled with horror, pity, and despair, bids his beloved farewell, in words which must be cruel, for they must leave no shadow of hope behind them. And does she not have an unconscious intuition of the nature of his feeling in the mystic vision, in which he shrinks, shuddering, from her kiss? In the meantime, he can no longer bring himself to continue living with his mother, who dies very shortly after the revelation of her guilt. And, in spite of a momentary gleam of hope, her death brings no return of her lover to the unhappy girl.

Such are the main outlines of this heart-rending romance, so delicately, so purely, so artistically shadowed forth. A hundred details point to the same conclusion: the tragic figure of the stern mother—a heart of gold, the girl believes (Letter 15), with a great charity towards evil-doing—bought, no doubt, by her sin and remorse; the likeness of the lovers (Letter 58); the foreign air they have in common, which was striking also in the girl's father (Letter 89), &c. But I think I have said enough to establish the truth of my supposition.

Needless to say after this that I am absolutely ignorant of the name of the author of the book, and perfectly convinced that it is a work of art and imagination and not the actual relation of facts.

I write chiefly out of sympathy with the Englishwoman, and to save her piteous little ghost from the additional pain of hearing the reviewers speak with harshness and injustice of the man whom she loved so passionately, and, who, I fondly believe, did not long survive her.—I am, &c.,
“THETA.”

The Songs of the Sanctuary.

SIR,—In the article on the above subject, which appears in the current number of your valuable paper, the writer says: “And despite Macaulay's terrible essay, the muse of the egregious James Montgomery survives to this day in the hymn-books, which contain several of his pieces that are popular and constantly sung—such as, ‘For ever with the Lord.’” May I be allowed to point out that your contributor has confused the names and writings of two very different men. “Macaulay's terrible essay” was concerned with the poems of Robert Montgomery (1807-1855), the author of Satan: or, Intellect without God, The Puffball, &c., and afterwards a clergyman of the Establishment.

The author of the hymn “For ever with the Lord” was the well-known James Montgomery (1771-1854), son of a Moravian minister, and author of several popular poems, such as “The Wanderer of Switzerland,” “The Grave,” and “Greenland.” A considerable part of James Montgomery's reputation rests on his hymns, over one hundred of which, according to Julian's Dictionary of Hymnology, are still in use.

I do not find that Robert Montgomery wrote any hymns.—I am, &c.,

T. H. MARTIN.

[Mr. J. B. Hobson, Mr. A. Paterson, Mr. S. G. Green, Mr. G. Clarke, and Mr. W. R. Johnson also wrote pointing out the error. We forwarded the letters to the writer of The Songs of the Sanctuary, who replies as follows: “This unhappy slip is one of those of which it can only be said that they emphasise the insufficiency of mere repentance. The moral is the double one that the memory is the most frequent and flagrant of all bearers of false witness, and that the counsel to ‘verify your references’ is the Golden Rule of journalism.”]

“Ada Negri.”

SIR,—In reply to your correspondent “H. T. T.,” a volume of Ada Negri's poems, called Fatalità, appeared about eight years ago. She was then a girl of twenty, living in great poverty with her mother in a suburb of Milan, where she held the post of schoolmistress. She had, I fancy, no intellectual environment, and her genius was entirely original and uncultivated. These details are to be found in the preface of Fatalità. She afterwards published another volume of poems, called Tempesta. As this was some time ago, others have probably appeared since then. Her works are published in Milan by one of the large publishing houses.

I enclose a rather rough translation of one of her poems which might interest your correspondent.—I am, &c.,

MAY TOMLINSON.

You ask who I am? Child, you shall know this thing:

In prison where men lie condemned
I am a bird soaring on vigorous wing;
Who demands the splendours of heaven's ring,
And here I suffer, chained and hemmed.
Child, hearken whilst I sing.

I dream of the marriage of each rural flower
In the forest's green and shady ways,
Of the wild beasts, strong in their love and power
On the burning tropic sands at midday hour,
The whirlwind and the sun's fierce rays,
The tempest, and the shower.

And sometimes, behold in my audacity,
I cursing weep, and struggle and shake,
But the laughing world passing ignores me!
And in my dark prison, headstrong in fury,
Against the bars my wide wings I break,
And still the world ignores me!

O who will break each twisted iron bar;
Who will give me endless life and light,
Who for me will set the closed gate ajar?
Free and strong, I fain would spread my wings afar,
Sun-raptured, take my charmed flight,
O Liberty, O Death, day star.

Tu vuoi saper chi io sia? Fanciullo senti,
In deserto prigion chiuso e dannato,
Io sono angello dall'ali possenti;
E chiedo il felgorar dei firmamenti,
E qui m'agito e soffro incatenato
Biondo fanciullo, senti.

Io sogno nozze di silvestri fiori
Ne l'ombra secolar della foresta
E delle belve i deliranti amori
Su le sabbie del tropico, e gli ardori
Del sole e il turbinar della tempesta
Raggi, procelle e fiori.

E qualche volta, vedi, audacemente
Io mi dilatto, maledico, piango,
Ma passa il mondo e ride, e non mi sente,
Ed io, testardo prigionier furente
Contro il ferri l'aperte ali m'infrango
E il mondo non mi sente! . . .

O chi mi spezza le ferre ritorte,
Chi mi dona la luce e l'infinito
Chi mi dischiude le tenaci porte?
Io voglio, io voglio errar garrulo e forte,
Nel delirio del sole ebbro e rapito
O libertade, O morte.

Re “Stedman's American Anthology.”

SIR,—We shall esteem it a kindness if you will state that the above work, reviewed in your last issue, is arranged for on this side and stocked by us.—We are, &c.,
GAY & BIRD.

"The Blue Boy."

SIR,—Gainsborough's famous picture, "The Blue Boy," was exhibited at the Royal Academy Exhibition of 1770, and naturally excited great admiration and much curiosity. The picture itself was not a portrait of any celebrity, but was the likeness of an ironmonger's son, who lived near the house where Gainsborough lodged. But the painting itself was so far beyond everything else exhibited that season that the painter leaped into fame at once.

The Prince of Wales, afterwards George IV., in his way a patron of the arts, gave to his friend, Mr. John Nesbit, a picture which Nesbit knew as Gainsborough's "Blue Boy." This circle of friends was notoriously always in want of funds. The picture was bought in for the Prince of Wales, and placed for care and safety in the hands of Hoppner, who was requested to take care of it for Mr. Nesbit. Hoppner died in 1810, and then the picture remained in the Prince of Wales' custody for five years, still belonging all this time to Nesbit. At the end of the five years Nesbit himself had possession of the picture. When Nesbit died, "The Blue Boy" passed through many hands, and at length found a home in New York with Mr. Hearn, the great New York banker, in whose house it now hangs. And there is no doubt that this "Blue Boy" is the one the Prince of Wales (George IV.) gave to Nesbit, for the dates and facts are history.

Now, the agitating point arrives. In 1802, Hoppner having possession of Gainsborough's "Blue Boy"—belonging to Mr. Nesbit—sold to Lord Grosvenor a "Blue Boy" by Gainsborough, five months after receiving Mr. Nesbit's picture. This picture has been in the Grosvenor family ever since that date, and now belongs to the present Duke of Westminster, whose father was created first Duke in 1874. Which of these pictures is the real Gainsborough exhibited in 1770, and which is the replica? A great many people believe that as Hoppner was a friend of the Prince of Wales, and Nesbit, and of that circle, and would not for worlds have betrayed them, he sold Lord Grosvenor the original "Blue Boy" and kept for Mr. Nesbit a copy done by himself. But Hoppner was a fine painter of portraits; he had Gainsborough's picture in his house, Lord Grosvenor probably admired it, and possibly wished for it; Hoppner could not sell it, so he had to listen to the nobleman bewailing his fate for something out of his reach.

In five months Lord Grosvenor had a "Blue Boy." Who painted it? Where did it come from? "The Man in the street" would say: "Why, Hoppner, of course." The two "Blue Boys" were in his house! He was a sufficiently fine painter to copy anything.

What was there to prevent Hoppner from making a copy? Nothing, except perhaps the chance of being found out; and the chances were ten to one against that happening. Or, again, did Gainsborough paint two copies of his "Blue Boy," send one, the original, to the R.A. in 1770, and give Hoppner the other? He did not die till 1788, so he had plenty of time to paint several if he wished, though at this date only two "Blue Boys" are known to exist—the one belonging to Mr. Hearn, of New York, and the other to the Duke of Westminster.—I am, &c., AUDAX.

Our Weekly Competition.

Result of No. 63 (New Series).

LAST week we offered a Prize of One Guinea for the most ingeniously rhymed verses on "Rhyme," not exceeding sixteen lines. We award the prize to Mr. C. E. Hughes, 98, Church-road, Richmond, S.W., for the following:

Me advise about rhyme? Why, such verbal gymnastics

Mean naught; there's already more verse than there's need for, writ;

Rhyme, though, is where your incompetent ass sticks,
And pliant elastic 's

Far harder to draw out than I, if you plead for it.

I'm for sense: strew your work (as the fête-day confettist,
With paper, his friends) with true wit: don't be dull, Gr-r-r—I'm Certain the lines of the modern librettist

As frequently get hissed

For poorness of point, as for Cockney or vulgar rhyme.

Still, if you would revel in metrical bliss, you'd

Shun rhymes of words hacked in pieces; ah! that, alack, 's
Vile as the discord from Babel that issued,

Like horses amiss shoed;

The chisel for artists in words, not the battle-axe!

Other verses received are:—

Run, little verses, like horses in couples, you!

You shall have movement that stretches and supples you.

This is a steeplechase all thought of sleep 'll chase,

Reach out like racehorses; see nothing troubles you!

Yours not to build the severe, lofty rhyme at all,

Verbal hedge-fliers, you've really not time at all!

Don't stop to analyse what in the channel lies;

You've got to jump now, and not be sublime at all!

Many-barred gates are your words polysyllable,

Syntax suspicions, the ditches unfillable;

Numbers cacophonous, if you take off on us,

Quick to recover, you'll find yourselves ill able!

Bravo! you've vaulted the barbed fence of metaphor.

"Metablism" you're not much the better for!

Course strewn with obstacles, quickest of cobs tackles;

Whew! here's the winning post—what did you let her for?

[R. O. S., London.]

The rhyming instinct, first of all, is musical and practical—

But many poets, hitherto, invariably have lacked it all:

To make a word, a little word, strike music with another one,

Were surely not a gift bestowed on every blessed mother's son!

And many critics, scanning modern rhymes, must groan within themselves

To read the stuff—altho', alas! they're often prone to sin themselves.

But that's all one! To rhyme is good! but persons sometimes go too far

By spinning jingling rubbish to the bubbling of a motor-car.

Music with sense is music—but all music and no sense at all

But seldom sets the Thames on fire—tho' sometimes fires a music-hall.

Leave sound to those who cultivate "the Absent-minded Beggar rhyme,"

And let your muse's foot be rooted firmly on our leg a time;

And, chief of all, be sure the metre to your subject's suitable—

The man who writes a jig-like dirge is nothing if not bootable!

[H. A. M., London.]

Ah! what a difficult task to begin is here—

I've a small chance of the coveted guineas, dear!

Whether iambs or whether pentameters,

Mine, I much fear, will be nothing but sham metres!

Rhymes of this kind will decidedly fether us,

E'en with a chance of a guinea to better us,

Then as to rhythm, I trochees discard, sir—

Bronchial ones are best known to this bard, sir.

I'll have iambs, a short and a long, here,

So I may build up a sort of a song here.

Not the odd foot! I could never endure a

Whimsical, awkward, atrocious caesura!

There! That's enough of your rhyming philosophy:

Now I will go for a ride on my 'oss Sophy.

Is it a fact that these wonderful jingles be Quite on a par with the ventures of Ingoldsby?

[F. B. D., Torquay.]

Answers also received from T. C. Buxted; M. A. W., London; H. M. G., London; E. H. H., Streatham; G. M. W., Hull; E. L. A. G., London; Mrs. C., London; W. H. M., London; A. H. C., Lee; J. S., Brighton; Miss L. M. L., Stafford; M. H. N., Sheffield; Mrs. A. M. P., Hampstead; A. E. W., Inverness; M. S., Aberdeen; W. C. T., Tattenhall.

Competition No. 64 (New Series).

We offer a prize of One Guinea for the best verses of welcome to Lord Roberts on his return from South Africa. Not to exceed sixteen lines.

RULES.

Answers, addressed "Literary Competition, THE ACADEMY, 43, Chancery-lane, W.C.," must reach us not later than the first post of Wednesday, December 12. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found on the second page of Wrapper, or it cannot enter into competition. Competitors sending more than one attempt at solution must accompany each attempt with a separate coupon; otherwise the first only will be considered.

MR. GRANT RICHARDS'S LATEST PUBLICATIONS.

THE EDITION DE LUXE OF A DREAM of FAIR WOMEN, and other Poems.

By ALFRED, LORD TENNYSON. With 40 Full-Page Illustrations, and Postscript by EDMUND J. SULLIVAN. Limited to 125 copies, numbered and signed by the artist. Printed on hand-made paper, with 4 of the Plates in duplicate in Photogravure. Demy 8to, half-vellum, £2 2s. net.

Illustrated Prospectus, post free, on application.

JEAN-PAUL MARAT: the People's Friend. By E. BELFORT BAX. With Portrait in Photogravure, and 7 other Illustrations. Crown 8vo, cloth, 10s. 6d.

"The book is written in such a thorough and convincing way that no one can for a moment doubt that Mr. Belfort Bax has done a great service to history."—DAILY CHRONICLE.

RECTORIAL ADDRESSES: Delivered before the University of Edinburgh, 1859-1890. Edited, with Introduction, by A. STODART-WALKER, M.B., Author of "The Struggle for Success." Demy 8vo, cloth, 7s. 6d. net.

"All the addresses in Mr. Stodart-Walker's book are of the greatest interest."—LITERATURE.

ETHICAL DEMOCRACY: Essays in Social Dynamics. Edited, for the Society of Ethical Propagandists, by DR. STANTON COIT. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

"The book deserves an attentive reading from a thoughtful reader."—SCOTSMAN.

(RELIGIOUS LIFE SERIES, No. 1)

THE CONFESSIONS of ST. AUGUSTINE. With

Introduction by ALICE MEYNELL. Fcap. 8vo, vellum, 3s. 6d. net.

"Beautifully produced."—WESTMINSTER.

"The volume is excellently printed."—GLOBE.

MEMOIRS of EDWARD HARE, C.S.I., late Inspector of Hospitals, Bengal. By EDWARD HARE, Major I.M.S. With Portrait and other Illustrations. Fcap. 8vo, buckram, 5s. net.

"Admirably put together."—ACADEMY.

"Daintily got up, the volume has some admirable illustrations."—SCOTSMAN.

WHAT IS CATHOLICISM? By Edmond Scherer.

Translated by the Rev. T. A. SEED. With an Introduction by the Rev. F. R. HORTON. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

"This work will interest many religious controversialists who cannot consult it in its original."—SCOTSMAN.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "HOW TO DEAL WITH YOUR BANKER."

HOW to CHOOSE your BANKER. By Henry WARREN. ("How to" Series, No. IV.) Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

CLOTHES and the MAN: Hints on the Wearing and Caring of Clothes. By "THE MAJOR" of To-Day. Fcap. 8vo, cloth 2s. 6d.

FICTION.

PECCA VI. By E. W. Hornung, Author of "The Belle of Toorak," &c. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

"At once the most serious and the strongest novel that has issued from Mr. Hornung's engaging pen."—SPECTATOR.

"The character of Robert Carlton is finely conceived, and it is worked out with patience, skill, and force. The various phases through which he passes, and the gradual lifting of the whole man's nature, are admirably described."—WORLD.

"'Peccavi' is a good book and a great one, unusually good, unquestionably great."—SUNDAY SUN.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "MR. AND MRS. DAVENTRY."

MONTES the MATADOR, and other Stories. By

FRANK HARRIS. Demy 8vo, cloth, 6s.

"A book of five strong tales."—SCOTSMAN.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "POOR HUMAN NATURE."

THE HARP of LIFE: a Novel. By Elizabeth

GODFREY. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

"Miss Godfrey is essentially the novelist of the 'musical circle.'"

ST. JAMES'S GAZETTE.

"A good story, and a strong one."—PALL MALL GAZETTE.

THE DOCTOR SPEAKS. By W. J. Dawson,

Author of "London Idylls," &c. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

".....carefully written, with a strength and individuality to be expected from the author of 'London Idylls.'"—SCOTSMAN.

NEW VERSE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "AD ASTRA."

SONGS and LYRICS. By Charles Whitworth

WYNNE. Fcap. 8vo, green cloth, gilt top, 3s. 6d. net.

"The volume contains a collection of exquisite gems, which well maintains the reputation of the author."—SOUTH AFRICA.

THE WILD KNIGHT, and other Poems. By

GILBERT CHESTERTON. Fcap. 8vo, half-parchment, 5s. net.

"A true poet."—ACADEMY.

"The book is interesting for its cleverness and modernity, and should not fail to please a cultured reader."—SCOTSMAN.

MR. GRANT ALLEN'S STORY FOR CHILDREN.

TOM UNLIMITED. With Illustration by Miss GERTRUDE M. BRADLEY. New Edition. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 6s.

Mr. Grant Richards will send No. 1 of "The Reader," post free, on application.

London: GRANT RICHARDS, 9, Henrietta Street, W.C.

MACMILLAN & CO.'S BOOKS For Christmas Presents.

SECOND IMPRESSION NOW READY.

OLIVER CROMWELL.

By JOHN MORLEY.

With Portrait, 8vo, 10s. net.

Illustrated Edition, extra crown 8vo, 11s. net.

LIFE AND LETTERS OF THOMAS HENRY HUXLEY.

By his Son,

LEONARD HUXLEY.

With Portraits and Illustrations. In 2 vols., 8vo, 30s. net.

F. MARION CRAWFORD'S NEW WORK.

RULERS OF THE SOUTH:

Sicily, Calabria, and Malta.

Illustrated by 28 Photogravures and 91 Illustrations in the Text by HENRY BROKMAN. In 2 vols., 8vo, 21s. net.

SYLVANA'S LETTERS TO AN UNKNOWN FRIEND.

By E. V. B.

With numerous Full-Page and other Illustrations. Extra crown 8vo, 8s. 6d. net.

SECOND EDITION, REVISED AND ENLARGED.

THE GOLDEN BOUGH.

A Study in Magic and Religion.

By J. G. FRAZER, D.C.L., LL.D., Litt.D.

In 3 vols., 8vo, 36s. net.

THE ROMANCE OF SPAIN.

By CHARLES W. WOOD, F.R.G.S.

Illustrated. 8vo, 10s. net.

Manchester Courier.—"A work brimful of the charm of a lovely land and interesting people."

STAGE COACH AND TAVERN DAYS IN AMERICA.

By ALICE MORSE EARLE.

Illustrated by the Author. Crown 8vo, buckram, gilt top, 10s. 6d.

By LORD ROBERTS.

FORTY-ONE YEARS IN INDIA.

Containing 44 Illustrations and Plans. 30th Edition. Extra crown 8vo, 10s. net.

LIBRARY EDITION. With Portraits on Steel. 2 vols., 8vo, 36s.

VOL. I. OF THE NEW ISSUE OF

THE WORKS OF MARION CRAWFORD.

A new and uniform Edition in Fortnightly Volumes.

Crown 8vo, price 3s. 6d. each volume.

MR. ISAACS. With Portrait of Marion Crawford.

COMPLETE EDITIONS OF THE POETS.

With Portraits. Crown 8vo, 7s. 6d. each.

LATEST VOLUME.

THE COLLECTED POEMS of T. E. BROWN.

Author of "Foe's'le Yarns," "The Manx Witch," &c.

THE COMPLETE WORKS OF ALFRED, LORD TENNYSON.

THE POETICAL WORKS OF MATTHEW ARNOLD.

THE POETICAL WORKS OF JAMES RUSSELL LOWELL.

THE POETICAL WORKS OF PERCY BYSSHE SHELLEY.

THE POETICAL WORKS OF SAMUEL TAYLOR COLERIDGE.

THE POETICAL WORKS OF WILLIAM WORDSWORTH.

Illustrated Catalogue sent Post Free on application.

MACMILLAN & CO., LIMITED, London.

HODDER & STOUGHTON'S NEW LIST.

W. B. YEATS.

THE SHADOWY WATERS. A New Volume of Poems. By W. B. YEATS. Cloth, 3s. 6d. net.

H. A. VACHELL.

LIFE and SPORT on the PACIFIC SLOPE. By HORACE ANNESLEY VACHELL. With 8 Illustrations. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

ELLEN THORNEYCROFT FOWLER.

LOVE'S ARGUMENT, and other Poems. By ELLEN THORNEYCROFT FOWLER. Fcap, 4to, cloth, price 6s.

A NEW EDITION, ILLUSTRATED.

CONCERNING ISABEL CARNABY. By ELLEN THORNEYCROFT FOWLER. Seventeenth Edition, completing 50,000. The New Edition contains Six Beautiful Pictures by Fred Pegram. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

JOHN URI LLOYD.

STRINGTOWN on the PIKE. By JOHN URI LLOYD. With 8 Illustrations. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

W. ROBERTSON NICOLL.

JAMES MACDONELL of "THE TIMES." By W. ROBERTSON NICOLL. New and Cheaper Edition. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

FRANK T. BULLEN.

WITH CHRIST at SEA: a Religious Autobiography. By FRANK T. BULLEN. Author of "The Cruise of the 'Cachalot.'" Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

The First Edition was exhausted before publication. Second Edition is now ready.

SECOND EDITION.

IRENE PETRIE, MISSIONARY to KASHMIR. By Mrs. ASHLEY CARUS-WILSON, B.A. With Illustrations by Geoffrey Millais and others. SECOND EDITION. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

DAVID BARON.

THE ANCIENT SCRIPTURES and the MODERN JEW. By DAVID BARON. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

IAN MACLAREN.

CHURCH FOLKS. By Ian MacLAREN. Author of "Beside the Bonnie Brier Bush," &c. SECOND EDITION. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

S. R. CROCKETT.

THE STICKIT MINISTER'S WOOING, and other Galloway Stories. By S. R. CROCKETT. Author of "Tome Murch," &c. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

JOSEPH HOCKING.

THE MADNESS of DAVID BARING. By JOSEPH HOCKING. Author of "The Purple Robe," &c. With Illustrations by Sydney Cowell. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

AMY LE FEUVRE.

OLIVE TRACY: a Novel. By AMY LE FEUVRE. Author of "Probable Sons," "His Big Opportunity," &c. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

MARIE CONNOR LEIGHTON.

A NAPOLEON of the PRESS By MARIE CONNOR LEIGHTON. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

A. ST. JOHN ADCOCK.

The LUCK of PRIVATE FOSTER a Romance of Love and War. By A. ST. JOHN ADCOCK. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

London: HODDER & STOUGHTON,
27, Paternoster Row, E.C.

"An admirable volume, full of grace and spirit."—Glasgow Herald.

THE PRAYER OF ST. SCHOLASTICA

And Other Poems.

BY

LADY LINDSAY.

Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

"The poem is profoundly touching: the humanity and the super-humanity of it, the gentle reminiscence, the quiet, unfathomable love, the submission, the faith—all these in verse simple, musical, and dignified, give rarely-felt pleasure to the reader." The World.

THE PRAYER OF ST. SCHOLASTICA.

By LADY LINDSAY.

Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

"A true poetic imagination, and a gift of graceful and melodious versification."—St. James's Gazette.

"Full of tender thought, deep feeling, and delicate fancies exquisitely expressed."—Cork Examiner.

"The book does justice to Lady Lindsay's enviable reputation as a poetess."—Dundee Advertiser.

London:

KEGAN PAUL, TRENCH, TRÜBNER & CO., LTD.,
Charing Cross Road, W.C.

F. V. WHITE & CO.'S LIST.

NOW READY.—In cloth gilt, price 5s.

With Illustrations by A. WALLIS MILLS.

A CABINET SECRET.

BY

GUY BOOTHBY.

A NEW JUVENILE BOOK.

In cloth gilt, Illustrated, price 2s. 6d.

A MAGIC GARDEN.

By CECIL MEDLICOTT.

FOUR POPULAR NOVELS.

Price 6s. each.

WAR and ARCADIA.

By BERTRAM MITFORD.

Miss CLEVELAND'S COMPANION

By ADELINE SERGEANT.

BROUGHT TO BAY.

By RICHARD HENRY SAVAGE.

THE JUSTICE of REVENGE.

By GEORGE GRIFFITH.

F. V. WHITE & CO.,
14, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C.

NOW READY.

WHO'S WHO, 1901.

AN

Annual Biographical Dictionary.

"The 'Debrett' of the Intellect."

1,200 pages, price 5s. net.

NOW READY.

THE

ENGLISHWOMAN'S YEAR BOOK, 1901.

"The Woman's Whitaker."

400 pages, price 2s. 6d. net.

NOW READY.

New Pocket Edition.

HORÆ SUBSECVÆ.

BY

Dr. JOHN BROWN.

IN THREE VOLUMES.

Each 2s. net.

Also to be had in full limp leather, gilt top
2s. 6d. net per vol.

Full stiff leather, gilt edges, 3s. net per vol.

NOW READY.

VOLS. I. and II.

Uniform with the above in size, binding, and price.

Black's New Pocket Edition.

WAVERLEY NOVELS.

To be completed in Twenty-five Volumes, on thin paper, and published at the rate of Two Volumes a Month, each Volume containing a Photogravure Frontispiece.

A. & C. BLACK, Soho Square, London.

The Academy

A Weekly Review of Literature and Life.

No. 1493. Established 1869.

15 December, 1900.

Price Threepence.

[Registered as a Newspaper.]

The Literary Week.

PROF. COURTHOPE, who has just vacated the Chair of Poetry at Oxford, was elected in 1893. Among his predecessors were T. L. Cloughton, John Campbell Shairp, Matthew Arnold, and F. T. Palgrave. Several names have been mentioned as possible candidates, the more likely being Mr. A. C. Bradley, Professor of Modern Literature at University College, Liverpool.

IN our issue of last week we published a letter, signed "Theta," on the subject of the inner meaning of An Englishwoman's Love-Letters. "The only hypothesis," said our correspondent, "which fits all the circumstances of the case is that the girl's father was the father of the young man also, and to the truth of this hypothesis innumerable indications point." In reference to this letter we have received the following communication: "To 'Theta.' Thanks and compliments from the Editor of An Englishwoman's Love-Letters."

ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON's posthumous volume, In the South Seas, which has just been issued by Messrs. Chatto & Windus to the general public, makes a handsome volume of nearly three hundred and fifty pages. It is a record of the years 1888 and 1889, "being an account of experiences and observations in the Marquesas, Paumotu, and Gilbert Islands, in the course of two cruises on the yacht Casco and the schooner Equator." Says Stevenson:

For nearly ten years my health had been declining; and for some while before I set forth upon my voyage, I believed I was come to the afterpiece of life, and had only the nurse and undertaker to expect. It was suggested that I should try the South Seas; and I was not unwilling to visit like a ghost, and be carried like a bale, among scenes that had attracted me in youth and health.

The world knows how those health-giving islands restored his health and gave him a new lease of work and happiness. There he found life most pleasant and man most interesting; "the axes of my black boys," he wrote, "are already clearing the foundations of my future home; and I must learn to address readers from the uttermost parts of the sea." Well, triumphantly well, he did it, and he has also inspired in many a longing to visit those bewitching islands:

Few men who come to the islands leave them; they grow grey where they alighted; the palm shades and the trade-wind fans them till they die, perhaps cherishing to the last the fancy of a visit home, which is rarely made, more rarely enjoyed, and yet more rarely repeated. No part of the world exerts the same attractive power upon the visitor, and the task before me is to communicate to fireside travellers some sense of its seduction, and to describe the life, at sea and ashore, of many hundred thousand persons, some of our own blood and language, all our contemporaries, and yet as remote in thought and habit as Rob Roy or Barbarossa, the Apostles or the Cæsars.

"A HUNDRED Years of Irish Fiction" is the subject of a lecture to be delivered by Mr. Ernest Rhys at the meeting of the Irish Literary Society, to be held at the Society of Arts on Saturday. Mr. Anthony Hope will take the chair.

MR. PAGET TOYNBEE states in the preface to his little Life of Dante that it has been written for the general reader rather than for the more serious Dante student. There may be, however, not a few "serious Dante students" who will read the interesting résumé of the discovery of Dante's remains with pleasure. For a fuller account Mr. Wicksteed's translation of Dr. Karl Witte's essay should be consulted. Corrado Ricci's "L'ultimo Rifugio di Dante Alighieri" is the most elaborate, and contains numerous plans. The other new feature unusual in Dante primers is the discussion on the Portraits of Dante.

THE English public is learning—gradually—that ears as well as eyes ought to be used at the theatre. By degrees it is dawning upon the ordinary mind that a succession of incidents do not constitute drama, that familiar remarks do not make life-like, or even tolerable, dialogue. By degrees, also, the English actor and actress are showing real willingness to talk in their natural voices. They take an interest, too, in words, and perceive that character is shown as much in what is said as in what is done. It would be sheer sentimental dreaming to pretend that a great, or even a proper, advance has been made in these directions. But an advance, after a fashion, there is. Let us be thankful. Mr. Max Beerbohm, who some little time ago composed a touching allegory, has cast it into a most effective one-act proverb. Had he been a little more independent and forgotten all he has written about the plays of other authors, the piece would have been planned, we are sure, with a truer sense of proportion. Some scenes would have been longer; others, shorter. "Things" would not have "had to happen." We should have had fewer "groups." But, nevertheless, "The Happy Hypocrite" is an admirable one-act play, truly conceived, keenly felt, gracefully written. In spite of the fantastic element (which we delight in), it has more humanity of the highest kind than most of the "serious" dramas we have seen on the English stage for the last ten years. Mr. Frank Mills will act with deeper conviction when he realises that Lord George Hell had never, in his life, to think of the gallery. The part is a difficult one, but it offers many fine opportunities. Mr. Mills seized one—when his saint's mask was torn off—and he had the reward of thrilling the audience. Mr. Arliss as the Mask-maker was distinguished. His facial expression, vocal inflexions, and by-play could not have been better. Miss Winifred Fraser gave a sweet rendering of the unsophisticated heroine. The acting, taken as a whole, was not so striking as the piece, nor, indeed, adequate to its intention; but it was good, and Mr. Beerbohm's first dramatic venture is an uncommon success.

WE are indebted to a poet in the Westminster Gazette for a new word—Brunch, that unhappy combination of breakfast and lunch which is the resource alike of the toiler by night and the indolent by day.

"IN Defence of Borrow" is the title of a foreword to the Minerva Library edition of Romany Rye, written by Mr. Watts-Dunton. It is intended as a reply to the remarkable article which appeared in the Daily Chronicle on April 30 of this year, from the pen of Dr. Jessopp. It will be remembered that Dr. Jessopp hinted that Borrow was lacking in virility, and used these words: "Of anything like animal passion there is not a trace in all his many volumes. Not a hint that he ever kissed a woman or ever took a child upon his knee. He was beardless: his voice was not the voice of a man." Considering the force of these statements, we are surprised by the mildness of Mr. Watts-Dunton's "Defence," the chief part of which he shifts to the shoulders of Mr. Thomas St. E. Hake, "a well-known writer in Chambers's Journal." Mr. Hake wrote Mr. Watts-Dunton a letter drawing his attention to Dr. Jessopp's article, and making observations thereon. Mr. Watts-Dunton prints this letter, but it is not a very strong document; and Mr. Watts-Dunton goes off into reminiscences which are very readable but hardly destructive of Dr. Jessopp. Possibly we may return to this subject; meanwhile we will quote Mr. Watts-Dunton's general statement of Borrow's hard case:

His has indeed been a fantastic fate! When the shortcomings of any illustrious man save Borrow are under discussion, "les défauts de ses qualités" is the criticism—wise as charitable—which they evoke. Yes, each one is allowed to have his angularities save Borrow. Each one is allowed to show his own pet unpleasant facets of character now and then—allowed to show them as inevitable foils to the pleasant ones—save Borrow. His weaknesses no one ever condones. During his lifetime his faults were for ever chafing and irritating his acquaintances, and now that he and they are all dead these faults of his seem to be chafing and irritating people of another generation. A fantastic fate, I say, for him who was so interesting to some of us!

WE observe that Mr. Wentworth Wynne's volume of poems, Ad Astra, is in its sixth edition. Not in vain, therefore, have sandwich men paraded its title along the streets of the West End. And yet this seems an occasion to revise the query—What is an edition? The lexicographer says that it is the "whole number of copies of a book printed at one time," but it is the publisher who gives the printing order and knows whether it be for a hundred, five hundred, a thousand, or five thousand copies. And in many cases he seems inclined to keep this knowledge to himself.

Country Life in its every-week dress is a capital paper, responding as it does in every page to that love of the soil that is in us all. But Country Life in its Christmas number is all this, and more. Yet no foolish foreign matter has been introduced. We are glad to learn that the beautiful series of photographs of country seats which has appeared in Country Life is now to be had in the form of a two-guinea volume—described, not unjustifiably, as "the gift-book of the year." Country Life is now a fine property.

THE Hampstead Annual for 1900, edited by Greville E. Matheson and Sydney Mayle, will be issued shortly. It will contain contributions from Canon Ainger, Dr. Garnett, Prof. Hales, Mr. Arnold White, Mr. I. Zangwill, Maud Egerton King, John Fulleylove, Mr. H. W. Nevins, Mr. Ernest Rhys, Mr. H. A. Bryden, and others, and will be illustrated with numerous views of Old Hampstead, reproduced by special permission from the collections of Mr. George Potter, of Highgate, and Mr. T. J. Barratt, of Hampstead.

THE New York Outlook has been publishing lists of the ten most influential books of the nineteenth century, drawn up by ten men of eminence in literature and education in England, America, Germany, and France. The word "influential" has evidently been given a practical significance; so that books of arresting beauty have had to yield place to books of commanding force. Judged by their visible effects, Prof. Bryce thinks that the following have been the ten most influential books of the century:

Darwin's Origin of Species,
Goethe's Faust.
Hegel's History of Philosophy.
Wordsworth's Excursion.
Mazzini's Duties of Man.
Karl Marx's Das Kapital.
De Maistre's Le Pape.
De Tocqueville's Democracy in America.
Malthus's Population.
Victor Hugo's Les Misérables.

Of these, De Maistre's Le Pape and De Tocqueville's Democracy are almost forgotten; but Prof. Bryce includes the first because it propagated ideas which have greatly affected Italy and France, and contributed, he thinks, to the Romeward movement in England. De Tocqueville's Democracy laid down principles which are now too familiar to be expounded on Sunday afternoon in Hyde Park; but his book was, for that very reason, an epoch-making work.

CONCERNING the fiction of the century, Prof. Bryce says:

Prose fiction has been more widely and powerfully employed as a means of enforcing theories regarding man's nature and social relations in this century than it ever was before. Among the great writers of fiction the first place probably belongs to Victor Hugo or to Count Lyof Tolstoi; and if any book is to be selected as especially conspicuous for the influence it has had on men's thoughts and emotions, Hugo's Les Misérables would seem to have the strongest claim; though as respects fertility of invention, or exuberance of humour, or fineness of treatment, other writers, including Dickens and Thackeray, may have reached as high a level.

DR. FAIRBAIRN, Principal of Mansfield College, also contributes a list. In it Wordsworth's Lyrical Ballads are substituted for his Excursion, and a place is found for Scott's Waverley on the ground that it not only powerfully influenced the romantic movement in literature, but "determined the mental attitude to the Middle Ages and to the Mediaeval Church of the Oxford men. The movement, which stands associated with the names of Pusey and Newman, owes historically its origin to Scott." Dr. Fairbairn considers that Strauss's Life of Jesus has influenced the century more than any other book. "The attempt to apply historical methods and criticism to the facts, the beliefs, and the persons of the early Christian faith which has so marked our century really began its active critical and fruitful life with the work of Strauss." All the lists give Darwin's Origin of Species. The only poets selected are Tennyson and Wordsworth; the only novelists Scott, Hugo, Tolstoi, and Mrs. Stowe. Among philosophers we find Emerson, Hegel, Carlyle, Ruskin, and Mr. Herbert Spencer. Collectively, the lists show that the following works have left the deepest impress on the nineteenth century:

Darwin's Origin of Species.
Goethe's Faust.
Emerson's Essays.
Wordsworth's Poems.
Carlyle's Sartor Resartus.
Mrs. Stowe's Uncle Tom's Cabin.
Hegel's Logic.
Tennyson's In Memoriam.
Scott's Waverley.
Victor Hugo's Les Misérables.
Ruskin's Modern Painters.
Comte's Social Philosophy.
Herbert Spencer's Synthetic Philosophy.
Strauss's Life of Jesus.

DR. FAIRBAIRN'S inclusion of Waverley among the influential books ought to please Mr. Andrew Lang, who, in an article in the New York Critic, called "The Decline of Intellect," has some startling observations about Scott. After pointing out that the human intellect has long been going to the dogs, that books, if solid, are denounced as "heavy," and that "literary gossip" is concerned mainly with "the wealth attained by a few manufacturers of fiction," Mr. Lang proceeds to inquire:

What is the history of this alarming process of intellectual decay? How did the England to which Burton of the Anatomy of Melancholy, and Jeremy Taylor, and Dr. Johnson appealed—how did it become the England of "the popular style," of the imbecile anecdote, of the "faked" interview, of the paragraph and the snippet? Whence arose the extreme mental laziness of the epoch? The history of the decadence is still to be written, and for lack of readers, nobody will write it. I offer a mere sketch, not a volume, for I have some experience of the rewards of the historian.

Our intellectual degeneracy, I trace—to Sir Walter Scott! Before 1814, the birth year of Waverley, novels were mere objects of contempt among the world of educated readers. By 1832, the year of Scott's death, Bulwer Lytton could seriously state that no literature but novel-writing had any pecuniary reward. There have been a few relapses into, or rather revivals of, intellectual interest, but the progress has been rapid from reading novels only, to reading only "short tales and snatchy articles."

We are afraid that Mr. Lang's picture of latter-day shallowness is not overdrawn. "It is a solemn fact," he says, "that the court of the Restoration was infinitely more concerned with things of the mind than any European court of to-day. Among our statesmen we have not for history a Clarendon, for style a Shaftesbury or a Temple, a Buckingham for wit, a Dorset for poetry, a Wharton for accomplishment. Such matters are wholly out of fashion, and are naturally objects of contempt."

A FORTNIGHT ago a correspondent hastened to inform us that the author of a new novel called Julie, described on the title-page as "A Man," is Mr. Robert Blatchford, of the Clarion. Mr. Blatchford is a man of many friends, of whom another hastens this week to assure us that Mr. Blatchford is no sentimentalist. We print his remarks in full, as they raise a larger question than the merits of Mr. Blatchford's novel, which we shall review shortly:

In reference to that wonderfully interesting, wonderfully clever little novel, Julie, of which you speak in the ACADEMY of November 17, I notice you describe the author as a "sentimentalist." Of course, it is often unfair to read vocal tone into written matter, but assuming that one is right in detecting scorn in the word, I venture to think you are wrong in being so censorious. What is there wrong in being possessed of sentiment? All the men whose opinions I value most highly regard sentiment as a splendid virtue. The book Julie is full of heart—and all the loveliness that that means—but it is also full of soul and engrossing interest, of finished writing, of clever character sketches, and of fine bits of descriptive work and rare thought. Perhaps the term "sentimentalist" was applied because of the book being dedicated "To Winnie." This eighteen-year old lady is the author's eldest daughter, it may be as well to mention, and Mr. Robert Blatchford, I judge, has drawn largely from her life in giving us the splendid chief character he has. But for the matter of that, the whole of the cast is drawn from life, and almost all else in the fascinating and real little story. I think the book will add further lustre to Mr. Blatchford's already high reputation.

THE Dundee Advertiser will celebrate its Centenary on January 16, 1901; and we have received an advance copy of a special Centenary number, in which the histories of Dundee and its century-old newspaper are set forth with an abundance of drawings. Congratulations!

COUNT TOLSTOI is reported to be in greatly improved health, and full of talk and humour. These cheerful tidings are brought by Mr. Edward A. Steiner, who has recently been a guest at Yasná Polyana. In a few weeks' time Tolstoi's drama, "The Corpse," will be published, and he has completed a controversial work on Socialism—the German Social Democratic brand—under the suggestive title, The New Slavery. Mr. Steiner's account of his interview, contributed to an American paper, is very racy. Among other things the Count said: "It is a pity that Moses gave ten commandments. It would have been much better if he had given only these three: 'Thou shalt not kill,' 'Thou shalt not steal,' and then the seventh commandment—what is that seventh commandment?" and, beating himself upon the forehead, he said: "Oh, that memory! that memory! Yes, I have it: 'Thou shalt not commit adultery.' Out of the ten commandments you keep one or two; pick out the easiest, and make believe that you obey God." Tolstoi still takes long walks with his dog, Bailok—whom he calls his "only sin."

THE first chapter of Mark Rutherford's Pages from a Journal, just issued by Mr. T. Fisher Unwin, is an account of a visit to Carlyle in 1868, at Cheyne-row, Chelsea, when Carlyle was re-reading his Frederick the Great to correct it for the stereotyped edition. Carlyle talked as racily as ever, and said of his book: "On the whole I think it is very well done. No man, perhaps, in England could have done it better. If you write a book though now, you must just pitch it out of window and say, 'Ho! all you jack-asses, come and trample on it and trample it into mud, or go on until you are tired.'" Then he laughed heartily, and, says Mark Rutherford, "his laughter struck me—humour controlling his wrath, and in a sense above it, as if the final word were by no means hatred and contempt even for the jack-ass."

CARLYLE went on to talk about military matters, and his remarks have a most curious bearing on the present controversy about the abilities of British officers. He said:

No piece of news of late years has gladdened me like the victory of the Prussians over the Austrians. It was the triumph of Prussian over French and Napoleonic influence. The Prussians were a valiant, pious people, and it was a question which should have the most power in Germany, they or Napoleon. The French are sunk in all kinds of filth. Compare what the Prussians did with what we did in the Crimea. The English people are an incredible people. They seem to think that it is not necessary that a general should have the least knowledge of the art of war. It is as if you had the stone, and should cry out to any travelling tinker or blacksmith, and say, "Here, come here and cut me for the stone," and he would cut you! Sir Charles Napier would have been a great general if he had had the opportunity. He was much delighted with Frederick. "Frederick was a most extraordinary general," said Sir Charles, and on examination I found out that all that Sir Charles had read of Frederick was a manual for Prussian officers, published by him about 1760, telling them what to do on particular occasions. I was very pleased at this admiration of Frederick by Sir Charles.

WE have received the following additional replies in response to our circular asking for the names of "Favourite Books of 1900":

MR. WILLIAM SHARP.

Louis Berilard's Fin de Classicisme et le Retour à l'Antiquité.

Dmitry de Mérejkowsky's The Death of the Gods.

The two English novels that interested me most were Ernest Rhys's The Whistling Maid, and R. Murray Gilchrist's The Courtesy Dame.

MR. G. S. STREET.

I remember several books which have pleased and interested me very much, but I would rather not commit myself to any invidious order of merit. I should like, however, to mention one I have just read, which seemed to me unique, and, within its limits, absolutely successful and delightful—The Visits of Elizabeth, by Mrs. Clayton Glyn.

MR. J. A. SPENDER.

John Morley's Cromwell.
Huxley's Life and Letters.

MRS. SARAH GRAND.

Morley's Life of Oliver Cromwell.
Lucas Malet's The Gateless Barrier.

MR. J. K. JEROME.

Zangwill's The Mantle of Elijah.
Rosebery's Napoleon.

MISS BRADDON.

Huxley's Life and Letters.
Sir Herbert Maxwell's Life of Wellington.

MR. TIGHE HOPKINS.

A translation, issued from Paris, of the Cent Nouvelles Nouvelles (The Hundred Merry Tales). An unbowdlerised version of a top-shelf work, valuable in the extreme for its side-lights on mediæval society.

My other new books have been for review, and chiefly on Paris. I venture to bracket three—Mr. H. B. Belloc's Paris, Katharine de Forest's Paris of To-Day, and Richard Whiteing's The Life of Paris.

Bibliographical.

MR. PERCY FITZGERALD has suddenly blossomed into fame as the author of "a hundred books." I have not taken the trouble to count the titles of the publications to which his name is attached; but even if it be the case that he has produced a hundred books, I do not see that the fact is either to his credit or to his discredit. Only the ignorant are impressed, one way or another, by mere numbers. A hundred books! Well, what of that? Obviously, everything depends upon their bulk and character. And, to take only the one question of bulk: if it be not strictly true that a "book's a book although there's nothing in 't," it is certainly true that very frequently a book has next to nothing in it in the way of letterpress. Of recent years, especially, the number of booklets in which only a narrow rivulet of text meanders through a broad meadow of margin has increased very markedly. Our poets, in particular, have become exceedingly economical. Rarely are their works "voluminous."

But let us assume that a man has, in the course of (say) forty years of active literary life, produced a hundred fairly substantial books. Assuming also that this has been practically his sole literary output; what is there of wonderful in it? It amounts to rather more than two books in a year. Now, in order to produce two books in twelve months it is not necessary that a man should be a mere "compiler," or in any respect a hasty or a careless writer. A very tolerable novel, I should say, could be penned in six months, if the writer had the necessary brains; and if a novel, why not a volume dealing with the facts of life and history? I knew an author who in the course of his forty years of professional labour brought out considerably more than a hundred separate volumes, some of them very elaborate performances. And how did he do it? In the first place, because he had the brains; in the second, because he wrote on the basis of reading which had been wide and deep; and in the third, because he wrote with regularity and ease.

Since writing the above, I have looked at the account of Mr. Fitzgerald in Mr. J. Foster Kirk's Supplement to Allibone, and find that Mr. Fitzgerald is there credited with only fifty-eight books up to 1888. Mr. Kirk is by no means an infallible guide; but if his estimate is accurate as far as it goes, clearly Mr. Fitzgerald must have produced since 1888 the forty-two books necessary to make up the hundred.

There is a certain type of novel-title which must by this time be beginning to pall even upon the most persistent fiction readers. I find no fewer than three examples of it in the current list of one of our publishing firms. These are—The Madness of David Baring, The Luck of Private Foster, and The Conscience of Gilbert Pollard. To the same order belong The Sway of Philippa, The Dishonour of Frank Scott, and so forth; and it would be difficult to say when this method of nomenclature was originated. It goes back, one may say, to such stories as Mrs. Lynn Linton's Atonement of Leam Dundas; nay, for that matter, to The Mystery of Edwin Drood, and even farther. There is no objection to the thing per se, but it grows decidedly irritating when it is so lavishly iterated within a small space of time.

Talking of titles, I read that one of our successful fictionists is at work on a new novel of romance which he thought of calling The Chaplain's Daughter, but which he has since preferred to re-christen The Eternal Quest. Is not it a little hard that the reading world should be bothered with these fluctuations of an author's mind? I do not suppose that the author in question had any desire to take the public so far into his confidence; we probably owe the unimportant detail to the activity of the literary paragraphist.

Yet once more about titles. We are told that Mr. W. T. Le Queux will bring out next year a work of fiction called The Court of Honour. There is no reason, I suppose, why he should not do this. Nevertheless, "The Court of Honour" is the name of a play produced in London not so very long ago, and it is just possible that its authors might some day like to turn their drama into a narrative—as has been done with their own works by other dramatists of late. Still, there can be no permanent confusion between a novel and a play, even if they are similarly entitled.

I have just been cutting open the pages of Mr. Le Gallienne's Sleeping Beauty, &c., and I feel I have some ground of complaint against the publisher thereof. For not only have I had to cut now at the top and now at the side; I have had to cut, on occasion, at the foot of the page also. Now that I regard as a little too much to expect from even the most enthusiastic reader. I am not at all an advocate of the "fully cut" volume; I am quite willing to use the paper-knife on the side edges, if the top be but gilded. But one ought not to be asked to cut at all three sides of a book.

Another grievance. I take up Mr. Frank Harris's Montes the Matador, and find no head-lines to the pages. The book contains several short stories. Open it at random, and you cannot know on which of the tales you have alighted. You can turn, of course, to the table of contents; but that is a nuisance. Surely, to omit all head-lines is to go to the extreme of eccentricity. Mr. Harris's pages are numbered at the bottom (in the centre) instead of at the top. That is no great matter. The other aberration is more irritating.

Referring to my quotation, last week, of Mr. Watson's couplet about "the basest weed" "towering to a lily," and so forth, a correspondent says he has been trying to find the author of "two somewhat similar lines—

Touched by his hand the wayside weed
Became a flower."

He asks me to help him, but I cannot. Can any of my readers?

THE BOOKWORM.

Reviews.

Spooks and Seers.

The Alleged Haunting of B— House. Edited by A. Goodrich-Freer and the late John, Marquess of Bute. (Pearson, Ltd.)

NEAR Ballinluig, in Perthshire, stands the estate of Ballechin, which has been in the possession of the Steuart family since the reign of James I. Major Robert Steuart, a former owner of the property, lived at Ballechin House for sixteen years, up to his death in 1876. He was a bachelor, and kept fourteen dogs, who were all shot after his death. His housekeeper, a young woman of twenty-seven, pre-deceased him by three years, and the "unmarked graves" of the Major, his housekeeper and his Indian servant lie together in the village churchyard. The house, like most houses in the Highlands, had the reputation of being haunted even before the Major's time, and a former governess of the family, in 1893 told a priest, who told Lord Bute, that within four years of the Major's death so many people complained of queer noises in the house that she "got alarmed and left." This had the more effect on the priest that the year before he had himself slept at Ballechin House for nine nights and had been disturbed almost nightly by "loud and inexplicable noises," the only ones that he specifies being the ordinary "spirit raps," an explosive sound, and a noise like that of a "calf or big dog" falling against the outside of his room door. This experience he also confided to Lord Bute, who, after consulting with Sir William Huggins, wrote to the then owner, suggesting that a phonograph should be placed in the rooms in question to decide whether the noises were real or fancied. In 1896, another owner succeeded to Ballechin, and the house and shooting were let to Mr. H—, a gentleman who is described as "of Spanish origin." During the three months that his occupation lasted, his family, guests, and servants were so annoyed by noises that are described as: bangings at the doors of their rooms, more rarely shrieks and groans, and sometimes the rustling of a silk dress, that Mr. H— quitted the place before the expiration of his tenancy, although he still attributes the noises to "the hot-water pipes and the peculiar way in which the house is built." This gave Lord Bute, whose interest in the house had first been awakened by the story told him by the priest in 1892, the chance for which he had been waiting, and he suggested to certain members of the Psychical Research Society that they should take the house for the winter at his expense. In the result the house was taken in the name of Colonel Taylor, an office-bearer of the society, and one of the founders of the London Spiritualist Alliance; but as he was himself prevented by family affairs from paying much attention to it, it was arranged that Miss Goodrich-Freer should "undertake to conduct the investigation," and act as hostess to the different persons engaged in it.

These are the facts admitted by those most concerned, as we gather from a collation of this book with the article and letters that appeared in the Times during the month of June, 1897. We have purposely omitted such statements as have been directly contradicted, and also much imaginative stuff about bedclothes being pulled off, doors burst open, and the sound of a lame man limping round the bed in the room where the housekeeper is said to have died. Most of this was not collected until long after Mr. H—'s tenancy had ceased; and Miss Freer herself is of the opinion that the sounds heard by the priest were, as she says in her learned way, of a "subjective or hallucinatory character." For Miss Freer has dabbled in the supernatural from her childhood, her first occult experience having taken place, as she tells us in her Essays in Psychical Research, when she was three years old. She has herself seen a full-blown ghost in Hampton Court Palace, and has chronicled many theories on the subject of haunted houses, all of which are to be found set out in the same interesting work. Hence she was clearly the right person in the right place; and Mr. Myers, late secretary to the S.P.R., now travelling on a spook chase in America, was no doubt well inspired when he wrote to her urging her to go down to Ballechin, and adding: "If you don't get phenomena probably no one will." His confidence turned out to be justified.

On February 4, 1897, we see, then, Miss Freer installed as mistress of Ballechin House, with her own maid and a butler, his wife the cook, and two housemaids, all caught, so to speak, for the occasion and of mature age. A kitchenmaid was engaged from the neighbourhood, and an old caretaker, said to be too deaf to hear anything, appears to have slept on the premises as during the tenancy of Mr. H—. With this staff, Miss Freer no doubt felt herself prepared to receive all visitors ghostly or otherwise, and to conduct the investigation with which she was charged. Yet her method of discharging the latter duty seems at first sight curious. The reader who is unused to what are humorously called the methods of psychical research is no doubt prepared to hear that the phonograph recommended by Sir William Huggins was installed in every room, that a competent sanitary engineer—rara avis in terris!—was engaged to investigate the hot-water pipes, and that flour was scattered nightly in the passages to ensure that no material footsteps came undetected to reinforce the ghostly ones. None of these precautions were adopted. The absence of the phonographs are passed over by Miss Freer without remark, though she makes it a grievance against the late owner of Ballechin that he refused to make use of one on Lord Bute's suggestion in 1893. The hot-water pipes are dismissed with Miss Freer's statement that at first they would not work, and that afterwards the water in them was never hot enough to make any noise at all. As for the flour trick, which is at least as old as the Apocrypha, it seems to have occurred to none of the psychical researchers, although it was made use of during the H— tenancy, though with what result is, oddly enough, not recorded. But Miss Freer did not by any means go down to Ballechin unequipped. She took with her a crystal for gazing, an "Ouija," as the "talking board" or instrument for so-called automatic writing is called which seems to have succeeded the once familiar "planchette," and a conviction that the noises heard by the family of Mr. H— were due to practical joking. She also either then or later excogitated a theory of apparitions and the like, which she gives in these words:

The thoughts and affections appear to dwell for a time where they have been already fixed during life, but changes here, including the gradual reunion on the other side, of all those who are loved with those who love them, the advancing dissociation of the mind with things here, and, no doubt, the evolution of a different life under different conditions, seem gradually to efface the ties of earthly memory, connecting the feelings with particular spots on earth: Such thoughts not infrequently include repentance, a desire for the remedy of acts of injustice, and an eagerness for the compassion and sympathetic prayers of those whom we call the living.

As for organising research, she tells us frankly, in an article in the Nineteenth Century here quoted, that she "didn't propose to do anything of the sort. It seemed to me that among several things to be avoided was self-consciousness of any kind, that the natural thing to do was to settle down to a country-house life, make it as pleasant as possible, and await events." The guests, we learn on the same authority, were invited on no special principle, and some of them were not told until after their arrival that the house was supposed to be haunted.

Neither guests nor "events" were, however, long wanting to Miss Freer. Miss Constance Moore was with her from the first, and the Hon. Everard Fielding and Mr. Lane-Fox, the electrical engineer, arrived in a few days. Then came Colonel Cadell, V.C., and a Mr. Wood, "an utter sceptic." They were followed by Colonel Taylor and others—in all eleven ladies, twenty-one gentlemen, and a person who afterwards wrote to the Times about it. Of the men other than the unmentionable Times correspondent, three, Miss Freer tells us, were soldiers, three lawyers, two were men of letters, one an artist, two were in business, four were clergy, one a physician, and five men of leisure. Only five, we are assured, of the guests were connected with the S.P.R. Of these visitors, seventeen, besides Miss Freer and Miss Moore, testify to having heard noises generally at either about two or about five in the morning. Some of these noises are described as resembling a loud bang on the door of the observer's room, others as the pattering of invisible feet in the room above, others as of a distant explosion, and yet others as of persons reading. As to visions, Miss Freer saw, in a certain copse, to which she was directed by "Ouija" to go at dusk, the figure of a nun nearly every evening. After a time, Miss Langton—a visitor who seems to have acted as a sort of amanuensis to Miss Freer—began to see it too; and sometimes they contrived to see it in the house. It was connected by means of the crystal with a sister of Major Steuart, who died a Canoness of the Holy Sepulchre; but as the costume of this order afterwards turned out to be quite different from that of the vision, and as Miss Freer is herself now of opinion that her visions were purely "subjective"—or, in other words, fanciful—we, perhaps, need waste no further time over this, or over a housemaid who, not to be outdone by her betters, one morning saw half a woman sitting at the foot of her bed. "Mr. Q.," a clergyman, who wrote to Lord Bute a moving account of a wooden crucifix and other things that appeared to him, when they were not, at Ballechin, may be likewise dismissed by the remark that, on his own confession, he is in the habit of seeing abnormal crucifixes at home. So ends the tale of the Ballechin happenings; but, to bring the story of Colonel Taylor's tenancy to a conclusion, it may be said that Mr. Myers occupied the house for a few days in Miss Freer's absence, and was of the opinion that nothing "supernormal" occurred. Then came Lord Bute, who, gentle-hearted and generous though he was, was himself, as Lord Beaconsfield hinted in Lothair, of the stuff of which seers of visions are made. He read the Office for the Dead in some of the rooms, and experienced a slight difficulty of utterance and "a feeling of hostility, but neither saw nor heard anything out of the way." Finally, a Roman Catholic bishop was sent for, who blessed every room in the house, after which both hostess and guests were left in peace.

On the whole, the balance of evidence seems to be on the side that mysterious noises really did occur at Ballechin, and we therefore hasten to the rational explanation—furnished, it is only fair to state, by the editors themselves—that these were connected with tremors of the earth. Prof. Milne, on being applied to, testified that Ballechin is situated as nearly as possible in the centre of the area of greatest disturbance, and it is exceedingly probable that the straining of beams and iron girders, produced by the slight quaking of the earth, would produce all the louder noises described. As to the others, a letter in the Times informs us that the basins—in some of the bedrooms, at all events—are fixtures drained by pipes which communicate with the outer air with the outer ends left open as approved by the latest fad in plumbing. Hence the wind whistling up these would probably account for such of the other noises as did not exist solely in the imagination of their hearers, and this is borne out by the fact that the days on which the spook-hunters drew blank are often noted by them as being unusually still. Otherwise we might account for some of them by pointing to passages in Miss Freer's diary here given, from which it appears that "a disreputable man" was frequently seen about the place who was not one of the farm servants, and that a sheep was killed in the garden by persons unknown on the night of April 1, the slaughterer taking away the skin and the meat. But if any reasoning person should prefer the revenant theory of Miss Freer detailed above to these simple explanations, to what miserably impotent conclusions does it not lead him? The old-fashioned ghost story, in which the murdered man returns to this world to call down vengeance on his murderer, or the ancestor to point out hidden treasure to his descendants, had at least some idea of human dignity about it; but how contemptible must be the existence of the modern spook, who comes back in immaterial shape to his earthly home only to make unmeaning thumps on the doors!

As to the manner in which the story of Ballechin House has been given to the public, we have but two things to say. Miss Freer is reported on all hands to have been a charming hostess, and we have no doubt that, in this case, this is not merely the language of conventional compliment; but there is an asperity—or, to speak more particularly, a tetchiness—in the way she speaks of most of the other actors in her little drama which shows that the worldly wisdom which warns the worldling against having much to do with dabblers in the occult is, as ever, justified of her children. Hardly anyone who does not do what she wishes here escapes hostile comment, and while Mr. Myers, who seems to have objected to the publication of this book, has his earlier contrasted with his later utterances on the subject in a way which is hardly polite, the Steuart family, the H——'s, and everyone else who declined to supply Miss Freer with the information she required, is shown in sarcastic terms the wickedness of their conduct. This last trait is the more noteworthy that Miss Freer's own conduct in the matter is by no means free from the (no doubt unconscious) slipperiness generally to be found among those who deal frequently with the spiritual world. Thus, a member of the Ballechin family who called frequently on Miss Freer during her stay complained bitterly in the Times that she was never informed of the new tenants being spook hunters, and that in speaking to them "as one lady to another," she had no idea that her conversations were afterwards to be used for the purposes of this book. Another instance of this tendency is to be found in the fact that, although Dr. Menzies, an old friend of Major Steuart, wrote to the Times repudiating the suggestion (here echoed by Miss Freer) that there was any undue intimacy between his late friend and his housekeeper, Miss Freer (in this edition) takes no notice of the denial. Finally, in Miss Freer's former book, already referred to, most of the minor phenomena here described, such as the pulling of bed-clothes, the sound of limping footsteps, and the incomplete apparitions of animals, are given in connexion with other houses than that of Ballechin. The coincidence seems to us to destroy what is called, in its own phrase, the evidential value of this book.

Leopardi.

The Poems ("Canti") of Leopardi. Done into English by J. M. Morrison. (Gay & Bird.)

MR. MORRISON'S translation of the poems of Leopardi is, at its best, so good as to be almost poetry; throughout it is scrupulously faithful to the form and meaning of the original. At times sound and sense are echoed as closely as in the rendering of

Bella non solo ancor, ma bella tanto

by

Not only lovely still, but lovely so.

And the "Canto notturno di un pastore errante dell'Asia," perhaps the most poetical of all Leopardi's poems, seems to have found for itself a singularly felicitous shape in English, as these opening lines may indicate :

O silent moon, what dost thou in the skies ?
O moon, say what thou dost ?
At eve thou dost arise,
And scan the wastes, then to thy rest thou sinkst.
Art thou not sated yet
With thine eternal wandering that same way ?
Is thy desire not weary with disgust
Of seeing these same vales ?
So does the shepherd's life
Thy life resemble, moon.
He wakes at dawn of day,
His flock across the plain he leads, and sees
But flocks, and wells, and grass ;
Then, tired, he lays him down when night is nigh,
Nor other hope he has.
O moon, tell me what boon
The shepherd's life brings him,
Or your life unto you ? What purpose, pray,
Has my brief course, or thy
Immortal, heavenly way ?

Now that, as a translation, is quite good ; it is, on the whole, good English verse. If one looks into it more closely, it will be seen that, simple as it seems to be, it is, after all, not so simple as Leopardi. How much more straightforward, with a really poetical effect of precision, is

Di riandare i sempiterni calli than

With thine eternal wandering that same way ;

and how the addition of a single word spoils the antithesis of Questo vagar mio breve,

Il tuo corso immortale ;

when we read it in English :

My brief course, or thy
Immortal, heavenly way.

Elsewhere, though not indeed in this particular poem, Mr. Morrison is too fond of leaving out "a" or "the," putting "'s" for "his," and inverting English sentences, in which inversion is always bad, even more than Leopardi sometimes inverted his sentences in Italian, where, if only for its likeness to Latin, inversion seems more tolerable. He is not always quite careful to scan his lines properly, and will write

Of thy nature, thine arts, and thy desires as an iambic line. He has translated the very beautiful little blank verse poem "L'Infinito" into the form of a sonnet, adding an apology, which is no excuse. It happens that Dr. Garnett, in his History of Italian Literature, has translated this particular poem ; and, though here and there Dr. Garnett's blank verse is less literal than Mr. Morrison's rhyme, the result, in Dr. Garnett's hands, is a poem in English which certainly suggests the manner of Leopardi, while Mr. Morrison's rendering certainly does not.

Yet, on the whole, Mr. Morrison has done well a piece of work which was well worth doing. Thanks to him, English readers can for the first time realise much at least of the quality of Leopardi as a poet, and all that is most characteristic in his attitude as a philosopher. His philosophy (in part Solomon's) may be summed up in two of his own lines :

Nasce l' uomo à fatica,
Ed è rischio di morte il nascimento.

His utmost hope, a faint one, is that there may be something, outside the world, not indeed pitying us for our sorrows, but at least a spectator of them. He exhorts himself to a kind of naked Spartan courage in the face of things as they are, making every renunciation with almost the cheerfulness of despair. His finest irony comes out at those moments when he is really most keenly sensitive to his own unhappiness ; he denies love, hope, faith, human righteousness, the righteousness of fate, the more defiantly when some memory comes back to him to remind him that there have been moods in which it has almost seemed possible to him that man may be happy. The last word is always despair, but a calm, immovable despair which turns this poetry of revolt into classic poetry. Leopardi has measured his grief, he has thought out the limits of his resignation, he is a dignified captive at the chariot wheels of whatever conqueror. For him, all is lost except pride ; and it is this supremely quiet pride under defeat which gives him, as a poet, his loftiness, almost the equivalent of that great poetic quality in which he is lacking, rapture. Poetry affirms, is too arrogant a messenger from the unknown to carry uncertain tidings. We have seen in Clough and in Matthew Arnold the never quite resolved battle between poetry and scepticism ; we have seen how the sceptical mind has chained the imagination, and put out the heat of the soul. Leopardi never doubts, is no sceptic, and so he can put his negations to a more equable music. Supreme intellectual good-breeding holds him back from any too hoarse or too piercing outcry ; and he is much too polite to argue a point, even with destiny. He is quite convinced of the truth of his conclusions, and seems only somewhat haughtily tolerant of their being overheard. And so his poetry is, after all, the poetry of conviction, resolute, clear-eyed, owing nothing to the illusions out of which most men make their happiness. And his treatment of verse has the same dignified severity, always precise, and always equally attentive to the march of thought and to the music with which the thought keeps step. A little formal, a little cold, it is a faultless music, almost as simple as the music of prose, to which it is still further related by the frequent and increasing absence of rhyme. Mr. Morrison tells us in his preface that, "as more frequent rhyme seemed essential to our less plastic and less musical northern tongue, he has ventured to increase the number of rhyming lines where the poet used such irregularly and sparingly." Now English verse is certainly not "less plastic" than Italian verse, and unrhymed lines are certainly much more natural in English than they are in Italian. Leopardi was a scrupulous artist, and did not leave a line unrhymed because he could not find a rhyme for it. He had his own purpose, his own theory. It is to be regretted that a translator, who has, on the whole, been so faithful to the task he had chosen, should have thought it necessary to improve his author on so significant a point of technique.

Born of the Spirit.

George Whitefield, M.A., Field Preacher. By James Paterson Gledstone. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

DIFFUSIVENESS is so notoriously the besetting sin of the biographer that we hasten to offer to Mr. Gledstone the right hand of congratulation upon this practical demonstration of the advantages of compression. This story of the firebrand of Welsh Methodism is packed very tight ; so as by fire have been purged away all hay, straw, and stubble, and the residue is a crystal of many facets.

The Rev. George Whitefield, M.A., was the son of a Gloucester publican, and was bred a tapster. He was a naughty boy : brawled in conventicles, loved the play, and stole pence—some of which he gave to the poor. But he read books of devotion with a relish, and on his knees, by his bedside, could curse his enemies in the choicest terms of scriptural malediction. His mood swung at times to pietism, and his friends had reason to doubt his stability. Interest was made to procure for him the office of a servitor at Pembroke College, Oxford. There he had for his contemporary Mr. Samuel Johnson. More important by a good deal it was that he fell under the influence of the Wesleys; soon he was a member of the Holy Club. As an outward sign of his having "commenced Methodist," he wore his hair unpowdered. But he presently abjured the Covenant of Works and ceased to "go nasty," passing out of the Arminian atmosphere of the Wesleys into a convinced Calvinism, wherein, assured of his own predestination unto life, he went thenceforth always rejoicing. Nay, he did not hesitate in later years to withstand to the face his quondam master. Their letters are more than touched with acrimony both on one side and the other; and from them it would appear that Whitefield was of the impossible class that must insist always on points of difference rather than on points of agreement. It went so far even that, preaching in the Wesleys' own meeting-house, he indulged in violent attacks on their Arminianism. But it was not in the meeting-house that he showed his mettle best. "Every one," said he, "hath his proper gift. Field preaching is my plan; in this I am carried on eagles' wings; God makes way for me everywhere." The practice was not common in those days. It was counted not a little ignominious.

"I doubt not," he says, "but many self-righteous bigots, when they see me spreading out my hands to offer Jesus Christ freely to all, are ready to cry out, 'How glorious did the Rev. Mr. Whitefield look to-day as he stood venting his enthusiastic ravings in a gown and cassock upon a common and collected mites [for his orphanage] from poor people!' But if this be vile, Lord grant that I may be more vile. I know this foolishness of preaching is made instrumental to the conversion and edification of numbers. Ye scoffers, mock on; I rejoice, yea, and will rejoice."

But from the moment the fire was kindled—the day of his espousals, big with glory, when the weight of sin went off and an abiding sense of the pardon and love of God broke in upon his soul—he must speak, pulpit or no pulpit, with his lips. In the face of his congregation he would lift up his voice and cry aloud and spare not, and weep the tears of a soul tormented with its own bliss. No scepticism, no hardness of heart, could withstand the appeal. White streaks showed in the grimy faces of colliers—men, women, and children melting together into tears. Beside his enthusiasm there was little in the sermons, so far, at any rate, as they have been preserved, that might account for the extraordinary effect produced by their delivery. It was the man himself all the time. In later days, in Lady Huntingdon's drawing-room and elsewhere, he preached before the polite. The Great Atossa heard him gladly. But the Duchess of Buckingham found the Methodist doctrines "most repulsive, and strongly tinctured with impertinence and disrespect towards their superiors." Lord Chesterfield heard him preach; and, "Sir," said he, "I will not tell you what I shall tell others, how I approve of you." Hume gives the following as an extraordinary example of his use of apostrophe:

Once after a solemn pause he thus addressed his audience: "The attendant angel is just about to leave the threshold of this sanctuary, and ascend to heaven. And shall he ascend and not bear with him the news of one sinner among all this multitude reclaimed from the error of his way?" To give greater effect to this exclamation, Whitefield stamped with his foot, lifted up his hands and eyes to heaven, and cried aloud: "Stop, Gabriel, stop, ere you enter the sacred portals, and carry with you the news of one sinner converted to God." This address was accompanied with such animated, yet natural, action, that it surpassed anything I ever saw or heard in any other preacher.

He died in 1770, at the age of fifty-six. In all that is most catholic and ardent in the soul of British evangelicism his spirit lives on, the spirit that at no time is wholly silent among the nations of the earth—the spirit of authentic prophecy.

For the Times.

War and Policy. Essays by Spenser Wilkinson. (Constable.)

MR. SPENSER WILKINSON is the founder of a school. He began to think on the subject of Imperial Defence and the philosophy of sea power when the majority of people were lapped in the luxury of belief that British prosperity, like gravitation or the correlation of forces, was of the nature of things. Mr. Spenser Wilkinson has written many books which have helped to make laymen think. In this one he gives us an interesting insight into the origin of his life work and reveals the secret of his singular faculty for making our flesh creep. When he was a boy, his father, he tells us, partly by precept but much more by example, taught him three things—to tell the truth, not to be afraid of saying what he thought, and to live for the public good. Similar ideals were taught to the youth of Persia in the old times before us, but the decay of the Persian Empire was not arrested by the dissemination of sound doctrine on the subject of telling the truth and drawing the bow. Still, there is reason to believe that Mr. Spenser Wilkinson's jeremiads do not fall on deaf ears. His seed is sown on fruitful ground. No country is rotten where ninety-seven per cent. of the Reservists rejoin the colours on the outbreak of war. No country is effete where so high a standard, not of efficiency, but of character prevails. And no nation need despair of the future when in the past we have overcome difficulties as great as those which the Ameer of Afghanistan and Mr. Spenser Wilkinson have recently described for us.

Nevertheless, it is scarcely possible to represent too strongly the importance of Mr. Spenser Wilkinson's teachings. We may differ from his conclusions, we may question the relevancy of some of the illustrations, and we may deny the accuracy of some of his deductions from history, but what is undeniable is the fact that there are dangers ahead for which the nation is unprepared. Mr. Spenser Wilkinson perceives the storm that is brewing on the horizon. He is a student and a man of sense. He is like the tick bird on the rhinoceros that warns the unwieldy beast of the approach of danger.

The various essays that compose this book are collected from numerous magazines. They represent a portion of ten years' work in the search for principles which might serve as guides in the conduct of the British Empire. Too often right can only be maintained by force, and our author holds that the great test of character for nations, as for men, arises when they are faced by a dilemma which requires them either to risk their existence for what they believe to be right, or to commit suicide by acquiescence in what they know to be wrong. The historical papers in this volume are of special value, more particularly those which relate to the American Civil War. The other heads are: The Problems of Policy, National Defence, and The South African War. There is a continuity of thought running through all these essays which renders them agreeable to read. It seems hypercritical to point out repetitions, but we are told that the essays have all been revised. In the essay on the Command of the Sea (page 336-337) the same information is given as on page 318-319 concerning the Nation and the Navy. The words are not absolutely identical, but the statements contained in the earlier essay are reiterated with scarcely a change of form.

From Pulpit to Pew.

Church Folks. By Ian Maclaren. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

"ONE of the cruellest acts of injustice on the part of the pew," says Ian Maclaren, "is to suspect the preacher of personality and to read unthought-of meanings into his words." That phrase, on the part of the pew, gives, we think, the clue to this diverting and sensible little book. You may sit in the pew, regarding the pulpit as something foreign, remote, and strange; but, unless you have imagination, you are apt to forget that there is a human being up in that pulpit who regards you in the pew as something foreign, remote, and strange—something erratic, unascertained, inscrutable—a target at which to preach as one might take aim at an object in the dark. These little essays are the message of the pulpit to the pew. Doffing its white choker, and lighting its Havana cigar, the pulpit becomes urbanely candid, unprofessional, and says to the pew: "See here, after all you are one man and I'm another; let us talk as such, and I'll tell you several things that are on my mind." And the pew gets a startling glimpse into the mere machinery of preaching, together with a few home-truths for his own betterment.

Apparently Church Folks is partly the result of the author's visit to America. Certainly, some of it is addressed first to an American audience. We remember to have seen sundry of the papers in that wonderful periodical The Ladies' Home Journal of Philadelphia. The readers of The Ladies' Home Journal must have been edified, if not flattered, by Ian Maclaren's remarks on what he calls "The Candy-Pull System in the Church." The author prints the appeal of a Young Men's Christian Association:

DO NOT FORGET

The next Social.
The next Candy-pull.
The next Entertainment.
The next Song Service.
The next Gospel Meeting.
The next meeting of the Debating Club.
The next Chicken-pie Dinner.
The next date when you ought to make the secretary happy with your cash.

With this as a text, he preaches a trenchant, informal sermon against the abuse of that element of so-called religious life which in England is typified by the P.S.A. and the P.S.E. The attack is quiet, even restrained, but it is bitter, and justly so:

The service of the past was musically imperfect and was generally too long. To-day the tenor in the choir is dismissed if his voice shows signs of wear, and the people sit in judgment on how the anthem has been "attacked" or "rendered"—perhaps it was "Holy, Holy, Holy, Lord God Almighty"—and there is a notice in the vestry (or minister's parlour) that the Scripture lesson must not exceed fifteen verses—ten is preferred—and the prayers must not encroach on the music, and the sermon, whatever be its subject, even though it be Judgment Day, must be "interesting." In the former time a congregation used to speak of a sermon as "edifying" or "searching" or "comforting." Now it declares that the preacher was in "great form," or it complains that he was "off colour."

Ian Maclaren's fanciful sketch of the minister who shall be equal to the social demands of the "new" congregation—"a sharp man, with the gifts of an impresario, a commercial traveller, and an auctioneer combined, with the slightest flavour of a peripatetic evangelist"—is a witty and damaging onslaught which constitutes at the same time a defence of the old style of minister.

Throughout, the book is as much an attack as a defence, as much a manual for the use of congregations as an apology for preachers. Given the point of view, and the restricted horizon, the chapters on "How to Make the Most of a Sermon," "Is the Minister an Idler?" "The Mutineer in Church," and "The Pew and the Man in It," are really broad-minded, sagacious, and valuable work. We have not often read anything of this kind which was at once so frank and so unprejudiced, so free from the odious clichés of the "cloth," and so genuinely dignified. Moreover, the book is vastly readable. Even if you are imbedded in the Established Church, and have only heard faint rumours of the existence of bizarre persons called Nonconformists, even if you are of the Higher Critics, you will be singularly unfortunate if you do not derive useful information and wholesome amusement from this expert on his profession.

A Confidante of Kings.

Madame, a Life of Henrietta, Daughter of Charles I. and Duchess of Orleans. By Julia Cartwright (Mrs. Henry Ady). Second Edition. (Seeley. 7s. 6d.)

ON the appearance of the first edition of this monograph in 1893, it was acknowledged that Mrs. Ady had succeeded in investing the most charming and lamented princess of the seventeenth century with an historical importance hitherto unattached to her. Our critic, however, pointed out some inaccuracies. Of these the chief have been corrected, but we note that Mrs. Ady persists in the statement, which does not originate with herself, that "Le Misanthrope" was not a success when first produced. We repeat our critic's remark that it was "played in its nouveauté for the then considerable number of twenty-one nights." We recall, however, a "report" that the Pit were annoyed at the first representation to find that they had given themselves away by applauding the song by Oronte which Alceste shows they were intended to despise.

We diverge from this slight matter to call attention to the fact that there are passages of authentic khaki complexion in the delightful letters which the vendor of Dunkirk wrote to the sister whom he loved better than he loved his wife, or even his mistresses. When Louis sounded him through Madame on the question of dispensing with "the customary salute yielded by ships of all nations to the British men-of-war," he wrote: "All I shall say to you is that my ships must do their duties, lett what will come of it!"

Here is the woman-politician, coquettishly ignorant as we love her to be, in a letter to Charles written November 4, 1664:

I have shown your last letter to the King, who has ordered me to tell you in answer to what you write touching the Dutch, that if you will agree to treat his subjects in England as the English, he consents that the English in France should be treated as French, excepting the fifty sous [tonnage]. I am not clever enough to know what this means, but these are the King's own words which I repeat to you.

Three months later Charles wrote thus to his sister respecting a Dutchman accused of vituperating him in Bordeaux, whom the French King was willing to punish:

I do not care a T. for anything a Duch man sayes of me, and so I thinke you have enough upon this dirty subject, which nothing but a stinking Duch man could have been the cause of.

Here is a brotherly touch (the date is May 7, 1668):

I will not go about to decide the dispute betweene Mam's masses or Mr. de Mayerne's pills, but I am sure the suddenesse of your recovery is as neere a miracle as anything can be, and though you finde your selfe very well now, for God's sake have a care of your diett, and beleve the planer your diett is the better health you will have. Above all, have a care of strong brothes and gravy in the morning.

The charm of Madame was enhanced by the inevitable contrast between herself and the nominal queen of the court, Marie Thérèse, a woman so stiff that "she referred to Court Chamberlains for leave to embrace her father, and held out her skirt to be kissed by her own children."

A word in conclusion. Her husband was despicable, but it were easy to suspect a wife who rambled with a king at two in the morning. Her position as the "go-between" of the "grand" monarch and the "merry" monarch compelled her to a habit of secretiveness irritating to a man from whom, for the rest, the regard of Clio gladly wanders.

Mr. Coutts's New Volume.

The Mystery of Godliness. By J. B. Money Coutts. (John Lane.)

MR. MONEY COUTTS has won deserved favour by some of his previous poems, particularly his first volume; but we fear he shows a decided tendency to utilise his talent with less regard to its poetic than its ethical quality. Diffuseness, disregard of the advanced thought of the day, a disposition to soliloquise at a rate which might have given Hamlet pause, are notable features of his later work. Really, poetry is no medium for the exposition of a system. Your true poet dreads a system as the gates of Hades. A system is only for the philosopher, for a system implies analysis, and the poetic method is essentially synthesis. To reason a thing out is fatal to verse. Now Mr. Money Coutts shows a most tenacious disposition to reason things out. We do not say that a system should not underlie poetry, if it be philosophical; but the system should be suggested, not elaborated. It should be caught at the nodal points, the points of intersection, and indicated by pregnant, inclusive suggestion of those points. Mr. Coutts, on the contrary, takes a thesis and conscientiously labours it out in argumentative detail. No poet should argue, for argument, again, is analysis. Mr. Coutts has chosen the worse part, and we would he might let it go from him. His present poem or treatise (for it is really that) is an exposition of his ideas on religion, a word in the ear, a warning, to the orthodox world. In a literary appreciation we shall not be expected to discuss the argument of such a performance. At times it agrees with the ethics of Coventry Patmore.

Unjoyous is the joy of sense,
If unconditioned by the mind;
A faint reflection, pale pretence,
An imitation base and blind.

This is one with the "Angel in the House":

And orderly deriving thence,
Its pleasure perfect and allowed,
Bright with the spirit shines the sense,
As with the sun a fleecy cloud.

At other times it is directly antagonistic, as when Mr. Money Coutts assails

The quacks of sanctity
With futile eulogies of pain.

Whereas Coventry Patmore devoted a whole ode to the "eulogy of pain"—futile or not. But our business, we repeat, is less with the author's thesis than his utterance of the thesis: and here we regretfully find fault. Mr. Money Coutts can utter himself poetically when the fit is on him; but the fit is too often not on him; and worse, he does not seem to care whether or not it be. Obviously the thing said is to him paramount, the saying of it an after-matter. Now in didactic poetry the ideal is weighty matter with perfect utterance, but, at any rate, perfect utterance. In poetry of any kind the first essential is poetry, and that lies in the saying, not the thing said. The bird-note of a Herrick is better than the unimpeachable didacticism of a Quarles. Mr. Coutts too plainly puts his teaching first and his expression—his poetry—second; he preaches far too much, in fact. Even when it is good preaching—terse, trenchant, direct, well-put—it is not poetry, for it is not poetically put; it lacks the lilt, the fervour; above all, it is not inevitable. It would be possible to conceive the thing said otherwise, and said as well. Whereas in poetry not a word can be plucked or exchanged without ruin to the verse. He is content with good, where he should have been content with nothing short of best; he can light on best as this verse shows:

The sower that goes forth to sow
Should first beware the field has need
Of harvesthood, and fain would know
The sweet perturbation of the seed.

That last line is big with poetry. So also here:

The world is ignorant of joy;
In mind alone she has her seat;
For there the Eternal Girl and Boy
Have playgrounds in a sure retreat.

Or when the daisies fold their smocks,
Edged with fine pink, but all else white,
To guard their yellow-powdered locks
From mothly kisses of the night.

Oft will that diligent Spirit nurse
The two fair children on her knees,
And sing them many an ancient verse
Of immemorial melodies.

More the pity that, being capable of this, he forces his muse to thump the dusty cushion of the pulpit. She was made for better things.

An Historical Essay.

England under Protector Somerset: an Essay. By A. F. Pollard. (Kegan Paul.)

THIS is a study in the best Oxford manner. Mr. Pollard is admirably documented. His analysis of the original sources for his period is thorough, and his reference to them constant. Painstaking research and cautious judgment have combined to produce a really valuable monograph. One is, perhaps, inclined to regret that Mr. Pollard has confined his sweep to the somewhat narrow field provided by the five short years between the death of Henry VIII., in 1547, and the coup d'état of Warwick, in 1551; but, after all, they were an important five years, and they form a definite epoch, to which the far-from-insignificant personality of Somerset gives a unity of interest. The book is a biography of Somerset almost more than a picture of England under his rule, and its outcome is certainly something of an historical revaluation of the man. The process of "whitewashing" lends itself to satire: yet it is a necessary stage in the slow evolution of a final judgment upon vexed protagonists. The contemporary judgment is too often written by the successful rival, and becomes inevitably depreciation; posterity connects it irregularly with alternating praise or blame, as this cause or that is in turn in the ascendant or descendant. Of recent years the English Reformers have enjoyed more than their share of blame. They have been the object of the sneers of Anglicanism since Newman taught Anglicanism to sneer; and Somerset in particular has had the disadvantage of being lumped in a common condemnation with Warwick, whose defects and abilities he did not really share. The Somerset whom Mr. Pollard presents to us is an honest, if not a brilliant, man, and a statesman possessed of sympathies for the poor and downtrodden which do not find many echoes in the policies of the Tudors. He was an early democrat in high places.

Failure, indeed, is written scornfully across the history of Somerset's career. Men who grant the nobility of his intentions condemn him as a weak enthusiast whose aims and intentions led but to the block. Many another shining light has gone out that way; but failure is not the verdict on their life and work. Unless might is to be identified with right, and the physical to be confused with the moral order of the world, aims, rather than achievements, must be the final test applied to man. With all his faults of method and defects of character, Somerset had instincts of genuine statesmanship, which raised him above the personal ambitions and unprincipled time-serving of his colleagues. His means were inadequate, his time was short, and the men with whom he worked had no eye for the loftiness of his aims, and no sympathy with the motives that impelled him. Yet his achievements were of no mean order. He was born before his time—a seer of visions and a dreamer of dreams; but his visions were visions of the future, and his dreams were dreams that came true.

In the paragraphs which he devotes to the question of education, Mr. Pollard endeavours to correct a recent extravagance of statement. The traditional view which ascribes the foundation of half the grammar schools of England to Edward VI. is now discredited. Mr. Leach, in his valuable book on English Schools at the Reformation, gave it the coup de grâce by showing in detail how the setting up of grammar schools was only a sequel to the disestablishment of educational chantries. Mr. Pollard, however, demurs to Mr. Leach's assertion that Edward VI. did not found a single school, and suggests that the records of any foundations subsequent to the proceedings of the Chantry Commissioners would not be included in the evidence on which his book was based. The specific instances, however, of schools founded within the reign which Mr. Pollard can quote are examples of private rather than of royal munificence; and although Somerset introduced a Bill into Parliament for "making of schools and giving lands thereto" in 1549, it does not seem ever to have become law. Nevertheless, it is clear that, whatever the Protector could or could not accomplish in this direction, his intention was far more favourable to education than that of his predecessor. Henry VIII. appropriated the chantry funds; Somerset, at least, designed to spend them on schools. It is true, that when the considerable vested interests involved had been compensated, and the pressing necessities of a bankrupt exchequer had been relieved, the balance of funds available for this laudable purpose was not great.

Other New Books.

THE ODYSSEY.

TRANSLATED BY SAMUEL BUTLER.

Mr. Butler's new rendering of the Odyssey into English prose, "for the use of those who cannot read the original," appears to be traceable to two motives. He desires to support his somewhat fantastic theory that the Odyssey was the work of a woman, a girl whose home was at Trapani, on the west coast of Sicily, who was familiar with the Iliad, and who introduced herself into her own poem in the romantic guise of Nausicaa; and also being, like many other scholars, irritated by the affectations of Messrs. Butcher and Lang's translation, he desires to substitute something in the way of a more "readable" English version. We do not propose to be so unchivalrous as to take up the gauntlet which Mr. Butler has thrown down on behalf of the damsel of Sicily. That this is an attitude commonly adopted by critics we gather from Mr. Butler's own statement that "nothing to which I should reply has reached me from any quarter"; and although he modestly declines to infer from this "that scholars generally acquiesce in my conclusions," surely this betrays a weak-kneed want of confidence in his own arguments. What, indeed, could be more convincing than this? Ulysses, leaving Phœacia, politely observes to his hosts, "May you whom I leave behind me give satisfaction to your wives and children." On which Mr. Butler subtly comments: "A male writer would have made Ulysses say, not 'may you give satisfaction to your wives,' but 'may your wives give satisfaction to you.'" As to the manner of translating, let Nausicaa herself be arbiter. Thus, according to Messrs. Butcher and Lang, she addresses her royal sire:

"Father, dear, couldst thou not lend me a high waggon with strong wheels that I may take the goodly raiment to the river to wash, so much as I have lying soiled? Yea and it is seemly that thou thyself, when thou art with the princes in council, shouldst have fresh raiment to wear. Also, there are five dear sons of thine in the halls, two married, but three are lusty bachelors, and these are always eager for new-washen garments wherein to go to the dances: for all these things have I taken thought."

And now for Mr. Butler:

"Papa, dear, could you manage to let me have a good big waggon? I want to take all our dirty clothes to the river and wash them. You are the chief man here, so it is only right that you should have a clean shirt when you attend meetings of the council. Moreover, you have five sons at home, two of them married, while the other three are good-looking bachelors. You know they always like to have clean linen when they go to a dance, and I have been thinking about all this."

Well, we do not hold any brief for Messrs. Butcher and Lang, who are often archaistic when Homer is merely simple; but it must in justice be said for them that they do not turn the whole thing into irreverent burlesque. (Longmans.)

LIFE OF THE EMPEROR FREDERICK.

EDITED BY S. WHITMAN.

Simultaneously with the publication of the last instalment of the German original of this work we have an English edition (Life of the Emperor Frederick, edited from the German of Margaretha von Poschinger, with an Introduction by Sidney Whitman) of such selected portions of the whole as are considered most likely to interest English readers. Much has been eliminated, so that the general effect of the book is rather scrappy; but as the author's narrative is pedestrian and undistinguished, Mr. Whitman has done wisely in reducing it to narrow limits and giving us the story mainly from correspondence and official documents.

The second German Emperor needs no apologist. In private life he was a man simple, truthful, eminently loving and lovable, with a fine sense of honour and no detractors. Born into a world and kingdom already beginning to feel the stir of modern restless impulses, he never lost much of that elder spirit which expresses itself in gentle courtesies and noble appreciations. As Mr. Whitman somewhat grandiloquently says, "His career moves under the blood-red sunset of a dying chivalry." The most interesting chapters in this volume deal with the opposition of the Crown Prince to the policy of the King and Bismarck: a policy eventually leading to the great campaigns in which he won well-deserved military glory. All through his life he was forced into positions antagonistic to instincts essentially liberal, and it was a strange irony of fate which made this lover of peace a great soldier. "He became the victim," as Heinrich von Freitschke wrote, "of the wonderful greatness of his father, and therein lay his tragic destiny." We may add also, of the wonderful greatness of Bismarck.

The shortness of the Emperor Frederick's reign and the pathetic circumstances of his death have served to cast something of a halo round a figure which certainly lacked no endearing qualities and was amply endowed with great ones. As Bismarck said of him: "He genuine Hohenzoller of the best kind and most brilliant capacity. His courage was indeed something heroic." Lenbach's excellent portrait, a reproduction of which is prefixed to the volume, gives us the man. (Harper. 16s.)

The literary device of making the Founder of Christianity a character in a story can rarely, if ever, be justified; yet it is becoming quite common. Last year a melodramatic novelist, bent on sensation, offended many readers by employing it under no proper sanction; and we are little inclined to approve its employment by the writer of Christ in London, by the Rev. R. C. Fillingham, vicar of Hexton (Watts, 1s.), who uses it as an aid to his controversial treatment of Anglican problems. It is repelling to read: "'Where are we to go to-night, Master?' 'We will go again to the House of Rimmon,' said the Lord. 'My salaried misrepresentative explained Me away this morning, and crucified Me afresh, and put Me to open shame. We will see what he will do with Me to-night.'"

We have often thought that the conventional dull travel-book would, in most cases, be well exchanged for its photographs, and short notes thereon bound up in an album. We should never have said this in connexion with Mrs. J. F. Bishop's books on China, which are not conventional or dull; and yet it is Mrs. Bishop who is the first to adopt the plan. Chinese Pictures, issued by Messrs. Cassell, is an admirable little book of photographs and notes which you can assimilate in a rocking-chair, and, what is more, remember. On opposite pages throughout the book, which is comely and light in the hand, you have a photograph and its explanation. The result is what we expected—admirable.

Messrs. Putnams have devised a series of illustrated biographical collections, of which Twelve Great Actors and Twelve Great Actresses, both edited by Mr. Edward Robins, are the pioneer volumes. Mr. Robins falls to work con amore, pleased that the first books in the series should be concerned with "that dramatic art which Charlotte Cushman placed above the other arts." Charlotte is rewarded with a place in the Actresses' volume. These books are more than ordinarily interesting and well equipped. We open the first on a facsimile of the play-bill which announces Garrick's first appearance in London at Goodman's Fields, on October 19, 1741, as "a gentleman who never appeared on any stage"—a managerial lie. Pains have been taken with the selection and production of the portraits of the actors and actresses, and the books make an ideal Christmas present for a play-going friend.

When Mr. Rider Haggard was riding his hardest into the hearts of novel readers it was suddenly hinted that he was indebted for the incidents of She to Tom Moore's all but forgotten story The Epicurean. It was an idle charge, and Mr. Haggard denied having read Moore's story, which Messrs. Greening now issue with remarks by Mr. Justin Hannaford, whose introduction, indeed, is a sound appreciation of Moore.

Daybreak in Livingstonia (Oliphant, 5s.) is the story of the work of David Livingstone, and of the mission that resulted from his labours. It has been compiled at home by Mr. James W. Jack from original papers, and in the hope "to imbue the reader with the same profound admiration for the work that he has himself."

Mr. H. A. Nesbitt, the translator of Dr. C. Keller's description of Madagascar, Mauritius, and the Other East African Islands (Sonnenschein), considers that "there is no book in existence which presents so complete and trustworthy an account of Madagascar, the Mascarenes, and the smaller islands of the Ocean to the East and South-East of Africa, as this work of Prof. Keller." The aspects of these islands dealt with by Dr. Keller are very varied, and those which lend themselves to photography are illustrated with fair success, but the pictures are not the strong point of this learned and often picturesque memoir.

Dining is a nineteenth century custom that will certainly survive into the next century, and The Twentieth Century Cookery Book, by Hannah Machugan (Everett) is accordingly at your service. Special attention is directed to menus for six to ten persons, and to the "twenty-one economical dinners for every day in the week." This suggests, on the face of it, that we are to dine three times a day, commencing on January 1. By the way, why does not someone write a paper on the vocabulary of the culinary art. It is often delightful. "Shred the pistachio nuts, and cut the fruit into dice-shaped pieces. Whip up the whites of the eggs . . . working it occasionally with the spatula . . . add a gill of maraschino. Work these in, turning the freezer round . . . and lastly the whipped cream." This for Tutti Fruitti. Blest art!

We have received the eighth annual edition of Messrs. A. S. & G. G. Brown's Guide to South Africa, a work which is likely to be in unusual demand next year. There seems to be no class of information about the South African States which is not supplied, and of course the war about to be concluded is taken into account.

Fiction.

Jezebel. By Richard Pryce.
(Hutchinson. 6s.)

THIS is a diverting book, and though in substance it is not original, one can be, and must be, somewhat enthusiastic about it. The opening scene, even if overburdened with detail, is highly dramatic. There is a christening, and there are present at it Lord and Lady Dormoral, the baby, Mr. Riversley, and the village. "Name this child," said the parson; and Lord Dormoral said "Jezebel." It was his first intimation that he knew of the liaison between Lady Dormoral and young Mr. Riversley. Lord Dormoral deemed Jezebel to be the child of this shame, but he was mistaken in that particular. Exit Lady Dormoral from Hinton Dormoral, and incipit the friendship of the fearless and incorrigible infant with the dark and brooding lord. That friendship has been done in fiction many times, and the situation itself lacks freshness, but Mr. Pryce's handling is clever. He has wit, and he often shows it. Most of the passages between father and daughter and Aunt Dexter, that pugnacious woman, are amusing, and something else besides. Thus, when Jezebel is asking the inevitable questions about her mother:

"Shall I understand when I'm seven?"

"Or eight," said Lord Dormoral.

She remembered to come to him the day she was seven.

"Not yet," said her father.

"Not yet?" echoed Jezebel.

"We must wait a bit still," said her father.

"But I'm very pe—croocious," urged Jezebel, pausing to get the word right.

"Very pe—what?" said her father.

"Pecroocious," said Jezebel. "Aunt Dexter says so."

Lord Dormoral was delighted. He said to himself, but aloud:

"It's worth everything."

"What is?" asked Jezebel quickly.

"To have you for a child."

He swung her by the shoulders and kissed her.

Miss Dexter was by.

"And what's everything?" she asked.

"All I've gone through," said her brother.

The story develops when the two schoolboys enter into Jezebel's existence—Lord Malmsey and Anthony Mundham. These schoolboys are excellent. Mundham comes on a visit to Warbeck, the stately mansion of the Malmseys. We must quote again:

"Jump in," he said.
His friend took his place.
"Got everything?"
"Everything."

The boys drove off together, the porters and station loafers touching respectful caps.

"Well, young Malmsey!" said Mundham at last, and drew a long breath.

"Have some toffee," said Philip. "I'm awfully glad you were able to come. It's been beastly dull, but we shall have some fun now."

"Here's another old woman sea-bathing to you," said Mundham.

Philip acknowledged the salute with a wave of his whip, and Mundham proceeded. What a dook Malmsey was. His guest felt a sort of glory reflected. Here was another.

"Great Scott! and to think you've been my fag! I must punch your head for you, young Malmsey, just to show there's no ill-feeling!"

Which was done, and Jezebel happened to see it, and all the silver chocolate cubes scattered about the trap and the road. It was to be expected that Philip Malmsey should fall in love with Jezebel, and that the obstacle to young happiness should be the prejudices of Lady Malmsey. How Lady Malmsey, whom Jezebel had been taught to hate, was compelled, after years of snubbing on her part, to swallow a multitude of prejudices and actually request Jezebel to take her son, is shown in the sequel.

We do not know that there is much fault to be found with Jezebel. The writing is occasionally careless and undignified, as in this sentence, which might be set as a conundrum: "Even within, and the somewhat chastened mien, that was held meet for all exercises of religion, assumed, their faces did not wholly lose an alertness indicative of presenting people come out for to see." But otherwise the book is consistently satisfactory and sometimes brilliant. Mr. Pryce has a firm grasp of all sorts of character; he can render a footman as neatly as a schoolboy or a dowager. His manipulation of dialogue is pretty to see; and if he has done a better book than Jezebel we should like to be informed of it.

---

Whilomville Stories. By Stephen Crane.
(Harper. 6s.)

No man—as we have before now pointed out—manifested so little progress as Mr. Crane: almost he may be said, in a literary sense, to have been born an adult. Thus these attempts upon Tom Sawyer subjects may be either early essays of the time when Crane was looking about the globe for the matter proper to his genius, or they may have been the fruit of recreatory moments during his short, brilliant career as a war correspondent or psychological artist of the battlefield. Extremely slight they are; in some the framework is almost too frail to bear the canvas on which he paints; but everywhere in the treatment of these children, no less than in the minute touches by which his ultra-sensitised mind reflected the humours, the gaieties, the bizarreries of the struggle against an armed landscape that is modern war, you find the marks of the wonderful beyondness that was his convincing effect. The absurdities of the playground, the jealousies of rival heroes, the boastfulness of the coward, the complacencies of the lickspittle—it is pleasant to see these things exposed. The Child in these days has been so boastfully set in the midst! Comes along a grown-up with a grain or two of observation and diligence, and, lo! our paragon is seen to be hardly wiser, simpler, juster, or truer than his parents and his grown-up neighbours. The fact is, we were conscious of a progressive fortification of our self-respect as we turned these satirical leaves. Mr. Newell's pictures are no more indulgent than the pages they illustrate; but then, frankly, young children are rather grotesque: the most artistic nation of the world altogether rejected them.

---

A Year of Life. By W. S. Lilly.
(Lane. 6s.)

LET it be said at once that this is a novel of high-life, and rather schoking. We share with its author the privilege of "peeping" at the domestic arrangements of a ducal household, of which the head is a bachelor and, in the opinion of all the characters whose judgment is worth anything, a preux chevalier. The Duke marries our second-best heroine, a sprightly young person dowered with half-a-million, who offers "ripe, pouting lips." For our number-one-chop heroine—who is "cultured and refined," but "not a bit voluptuous"—a mere baronet may suffice; but he is a soul-subduing baronet, whose liaison with a "baneful enchantress" gives him a certain cachet. For this diablesse is, in fact, the cousin of the "habitually courteous and considerate" Duke.

It will be gathered from the foregoing sketch, wherein in our poor way we have striven to indicate our author's style, that Mr. Lilly, who in matters of philosophy and theology has made creditable essays, in this new field has come near to failure. It is true that a great many silly people have written bad novels; but from that it is not safe to conclude a clever person is sure to write a good one. The best element of the book is that which is perfectly irrelevant, made up of smoking-room yarns—some good, some indifferent, some familiar, none (we suppose) original—which suggest that as a listener Mr. Lilly is no less diligent than as a "peeper"; and little fragments of essays on political or economical subjects in which the persons of the drama utter, with suspicious fluency, views that the author has elsewhere expounded at length. We have no desire to be unkind to Mr. Lilly, for to every man who writes at all it is permitted to prove by experiment that he cannot write a novel, but we dare not encourage him to try again.

---

A Suffolk Courtship. By M. Betham-Edwards.
(Hurst & Blackett. 6s.)

BACK to the land, by all means. Let us renew our memory of the life that is lived in the open, in the sunlight, in the silence. We opened Miss Betham-Edwards's book with a good heart, ready to rejoice. The atmosphere of Essex is no less precious than that of Wessex: only it has lacked its poet. It lacks him still. It is very well for Miss Betham-Edwards to sigh, in the intervals of her story, "Ah, merry was that farmhouse life of fifty years ago!"—we are not enchanted. We are told something of the farming operations of the circling year, but are left with a lingering suspicion that, after all, the substitution of machinery for hand labour can hardly be carried out on too large a scale: there is no music in these milkpails. Even the morsels of social philosophy are depressing. "Want of delicate-mindedness and real ill-nature, so often confused, have very different roots"—well, that is true. We are not so sure that the same may be said of: "The most exquisite hour of summer precedes storm, and overjoy is instinctively regarded as a portent rather than happy promise, retributive rather than anticipatory." Another surprises rather by its form than its substance: "It is not the partings so much as the manner of them that make their bitterness"—did such a sentence ever before have the chance of blushing at itself in print? And the story is wound up with this merciless paradox:

"Love, alike in the homeliest as well as the most exalted natures, what is it but another name for Hope?" We should be inclined, for our own part, to carry a step or two further this process of identification: And Hope what is it but Faith? And Faith what else than Love?—and so the circle is complete, and henceforth in the moral order Everything is Anything.

Have we been a little too hard on A Suffolk Courtship? Almost we think we have. After all, the most unscholarly writer may have in him the root of the matter; and there is sound work that does not bear comparison with Far from the Madding Crowd. There are sweet simpletons who will read this story and live peacefully in it for hours. Bless them!

Sons of the Covenant. By Samuel Gordon.
(Sands. 6s.)

THE most charitable of critics—and, on the whole, one hopes, of course, that oneself deserves the epithet—would scruple to call this a good book; on the other hand, it is eminently a comfortable one. A placid sense of well-being invades the reader once launched upon the ocean of its voluminous commonplace. Fragrant breezes of Self-Help waft him over oily billows, which heave and toss indeed, but never break. The excellent widowed mother has two excellent sons. One is adopted by a rich lady; the other starts life, at the first moment allowed by a paternal legislature, with a tray of toys. Now of the twain one, you would say, must go wrong, and for choice the younger, introduced by irregular means to an alien atmosphere. Not a bit of it; for while Leuw wins the confidence of an old soldier who keeps a shop, becomes his partner, and finally in South Africa develops into a man of fortune, Phil carries all before him at Eton and Trinity and enters Parliament. There are just two marriageable girls in the book, and with hardly a hitch each finds her way into the appropriate arms. You couldn't imagine a more comfortable book. And there is a vulgar Mrs. Diamond who at moments is quite amusing. It should be mentioned that the people are Jews—that is, Mr. Gordon says they are; and if the hypothesis is sound which would identify his countrymen with the lost ten tribes (he plays with the idea as if he rather liked it), he ought to know.

God's Lad. By Paul Cushing.
(Pearson. 6s.)

THIS is a book of adventure. It is largely concerned with "gold, gold, GOLD." And Mr. Cushing has known how to give an occasional impression of first-hand knowledge. Over against this must be set a rather poignant ignorance of many things which must be observed by him who would write a novel that shall be essentially distinct from the kind of literature that contends with sweetstuff and cheap toys in dingy windows of streets off the Edgware-road. There arrived a crisis in the story which our endurance could not surmount. It was the thrilling instant when God's Lad, with a wild, piercing scream, pulled off with a quick movement his well-trimmed beard and dainty moustache, his sombrero and with it a close-fitting wig, revealing a head of golden hair, and broke out in a voice that thrilled the crowd with a stanza of the "Song of the Cradle." Need we add that as the wondrous voice rang out with a sweetness, a compass, a passion never before touched, Black Muzzle, by a dexterous movement, threw the noose from Vassault's neck, and that at her signal a score of men sprang forward and in a flash severed the bonds of Vassault and Grey Daddy? This occurs in the last chapter but one, and we surmounted a lot of spirited writing before we collapsed upon it. Mr. Cushing might learn to write a book, we believe; but he sorely needs chastening.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the week's Fiction are not necessarily final. Reviews of a selection will follow.]

THE QUEEN VERSUS BILLY. BY LLOYD OSBOURNE.

As R. L. Stevenson's stepson, as his collaborator in The Wrong Box, The Wrecker, and The Ebb Tide, Mr. Lloyd Osbourne can count on a welcome and an attentive hearing. The nine stories contained in this volume all deal with strange men and matters, things seen and heard, far away from civilisation, as befits an author whose address (given in the new edition of Who's Who) is still Vailima, Apia, Samoa. (Heinemann. 6s.)

MISS CLEVELAND'S COMPANION. BY ADELINE SERGEANT.

There are certain novelists who produce the particular kind of books for which they are known regularly and steadily, unswayed by movements, uninfluenced by fashion. To this class Miss Sergeant belongs. Miss Cleveland's Companion is a readable story inclining to melodrama. The first chapter introduces us to an errant son, with the police on his trail, "gluing his face to the window of his mother's little drawing room." (White. 6s.)

A CUIRASSIER OF ARRANS. BY CLAUDE BRAY.

"Now, sir, who are you?" he asked sharply. "Gervase Scrope, a lieutenant of Arran's Cuirassiers," was my reply." Scrope was on special service; the above dialogue took place at Whitehall in the presence of King James and Father Petre. The narrator is Scrope, and the author, through him, has written an attractive, bustling, historical novel. "A round shot," at the end of his adventures, tore Scrope's left arm from him as he charged "for King William at Rooselaar." (Sands. 6s.)

COMMITTED TO HIS CHARGE. BY R. AND K. M. LIZARS.

The end is: "There is a new rectory pew, but in the old one sits a sad-looking little widow, a serene contentment in her eyes as she looks from the blooming, girlish faces on one side to a handsome boy on the other—Eustace, only and beloved son." The sub-title is "A Canadian Chronicle," although there is little in this record of parish interests and small talk to indicate that the story passes in Canada. The parish is called Slowford-on-the-Sluggard, and the humour of the tea-table talk is like that. (Greening. 6s.)

SARAH, P.G. BY MRS. S. M. LANYON.

"P.G." stands for "paying guest," and the story deals with the adventures of a very young orphan girl, who, being left alone in the world, advertises for a lady "chaperone." She is inundated with replies from Society women, and her various experiences as a "paying guest" are given. The fire at the "Bazar des Charités" in Paris forms one of the incidents, upon which the authoress sentimentalises thus: "I often wonder when I go to Paris and look at the monument erected to the memory of those who died by the fire, if their love was wrong, if their fate was a punishment, or was it heavenly sympathy, emitting their spirits through death?" (Unwin. 6s.)

We have also received The Hidden Sear, by J. R. Adamson (Simpkin, 6s.); Kitty Fagan, by Ramsay Guthrie (Christian Commonwealth Co., 3s. 6d.); The Romance of a Vocation, by Aleydis Inglesant (Burns & Oates, 3s. 6d.); and His Only Son, by Cyril Darrah (Hood, Douglas & Co., 1s.).

THE ACADEMY.

Editorial and Publishing Offices, 43, Chancery-lane.

The ACADEMY will be sent post-free, if prepaid, to every Annual Subscriber in the United Kingdom.

Price for One Issue, Threepence; postage One Halfpenny. Price for 52 issues, Thirteen Shillings; postage free.

Foreign Rates, for Yearly Subscriptions, prepaid (including postage)..... 17 6
 " Quarterly ..... 5 0
 " Price for one issue ..... 5

American Agents for the ACADEMY: Brentano's, 31, Union-square, New York.

"Variations upon Whitebait."

"On such a night" our talk fell upon whitebait.

As the Sphinx's silver fork rustled among the withered silver upon her plate, she turned to me and said:

"Have you ever thought what beautiful little things these whitebait are?"

"Oh, yes," I replied; "they are the daisies of the deep sea, the threepenny pieces of the ocean."

"You dear!" said the Sphinx, who is alone in the world in thinking me awfully clever. "Go on, say something else, something pretty about whitebait—there's a subject for you!"

Then . . . I sententiously remarked: "Of course, if one has anything to say, one cannot do better than say it about whitebait. . . . Well, whitebait. . . ."

But here, providentially, the band . . . struck up the overture from "Tannhäuser."

WHEN Mr. Richard Le Gallienne wrote these sentences in an essay, called "Variations on Whitebait," in his second series of Prose Fancies in 1896 it is not likely that he intended to assist us to a descriptive phrase for his essays as a whole in 1900. The temptation to forge such a phrase is, however, presented by the publication, from the Bodley Head, of a third series of Prose Fancies, unaccompanied by any guarantee that a fourth and fifth series will not be forthcoming. If they come, they will be welcome; we merely wish to show that the moment has arrived when critics who are interested in Mr. Le Gallienne may properly set themselves to discover what his powers are, and whither they tend. This need not be a cold-hearted business; indeed, the critic who could dissect Mr. Le Gallienne's mind in such a temper must be constituted differently from ourselves. He must also be untouched, as we are not, by Mr. Le Gallienne's persistence. By his persistence we mean his very evident determination to be himself. We have ourselves admonished him to grow up, to stiffen his view of life, to give pretty fancies and boudoir sentiment and the stars of heaven their proportionate place in the scheme of things, and generally to yoke his undoubted talent to some purpose—or, at least, to some train of purposeful thought by which he may be known in the market-place. But now we are done with such prosing. After reading his new essays, entitled Sleeping Beauty, and Other Prose Fancies, we formally abandon the last wish we might have had to guide Mr. Le Gallienne's feet. Perhaps it was never our office to do this, although, when one thinks of it, criticism of a young writer is of little use unless it wears the quality of advice. The important thing is that the pedagogic attitude should cease at the point where it ceases to be effectual or dignified. Effectual it has never been in Mr. Le Gallienne's case, and like a baffled schoolmaster we no sooner recognise this than we half admire him for it.

The third Prose Fancies are as the first. Some might think them echoes of the first. But one thing is clear: it is that Mr. Le Gallienne chooses to think and write thus. Incurably slight and irredeemably pretty, he will keep his path; and, perceiving this, we perceive that he will have his reward. The fact is, that Mr. Le Gallienne is beginning to reap the benefit of personality. The world dearly loves personality, and will come round to a dogged fellow, even if he be an elf who refuses to be elbowed back to fairy-land, or a butterfly who declines to be broken on any wheel. Mr. Le Gallienne is himself in love with personality, and not a few of his earlier essays suggest that he devised his own years ago, and has "wrought upon the plan that pleased his boyish thought." You may not admire the plan very much, and it is highly probable that it would not have suited your own temperament and health of mind, even if you had devised it in a summer night, pregnant with resolution and irresistible sanction, in the golden years. But that only proves the reality of Mr. Le Gallienne's thushness; it belongs to him, and he has cherished it. In one of his new essays he describes a quaint individual, the voluntary manager of a thriving cab-rank, a thick-set, buttoned-up man, with hands deep in his pockets, and a fiery face, who—clothed in his own authority—whistles up cabs and disciplines their drivers on a certain London cab-rank. How he got there, and why he is obeyed, are mysteries; but the "Cap'n" is always there, and is always obeyed. As Mr. Le Gallienne says, he has the gift of personality, and "to be a personality is to have succeeded in life." It would be hard, very hard, to combat this definition of success, or, having allowed it, to refuse its application to Mr. Le Gallienne himself. He has personality, whatever he has not. He is the Ariel of the literary cab-rank, always there, and—never obeyed. Who would not miss him?

We would not imply that Mr. Le Gallienne gives orders like the "Cap'n," or blows a shrill whistle to call us peremptorily from our work or play. He is sweetly indifferent whether we dance to his piping or not; and that is another reason why we should spare him our advice. He will not heed it. He will reply, as he does in his essay on "The Lesson of Romeike": "You write of love, but your reviewer has never loved; of sorrow, but your reviewer has never known it." But suppose you have both loved and sorrowed, and yet are dissatisfied. What then? "Well, again, nothing. You can soon tell for yourself if the man possesses imagination and humour and fancy, and if you decide not—well, his opinion is no affair of yours, and he has only done his duty in warning the people without imagination, humour, and fancy for whom he writes that your book is no affair of theirs. Never fear but your book will find its own, at last some day find its way with a little sigh into the hands that were meant to hold it." An answer to that is hardly worth seeking. If there emerged from Mr. Le Gallienne's essays a philosophy of life which might influence men and women, there would be an answer. But you cannot make a disturbance about variations on whitebait. You may fairly be asked to take or leave the threepenny-pieces of the ocean.

Has Mr. Le Gallienne, then, nothing to offer but wit and fancy, prettiness and poetic "notions"? On the whole, we think not. But are these things so common or dull that we should look cruelly on his prodigal supplies of pearl and coral and silk and scent and love-knots and laughter? To be sure, great literature was never made in a bazaar. The single thread of Lamb's love of Alice W—, glancing like a gold thread through his essays, long hidden, and then appearing only to be lost again in the woof of sterner thought, leaves on the mind a more actual and heart-felt impression of what love is to life than scores of pages of Mr. Le Gallienne's frothy pleading in the court of Cupid. But to ask Mr. Le Gallienne to be a Lamb, if it was ever just, is exactly what we have resolved to eschew. This is not an age of great and leisured literature, and nowhere—in poetry and belles-lettres, at all events—does one find much ripeness and balance. Rather we find the ingredients of great writing imprisoned in separate minds, forbidden by the spirit of the age to reside in one. In Mr. Le Gallienne's mind we find veritable siege-supplies of sentiment and (purely literary) variations on whitebait. Other essayists do on occasion what Mr. Le Gallienne does all the time. His mission is to embroider. He may embroider on little things or great, on whitebait or whales, on lilies or life, on daisies or death, but embroider prettily he can and will. To prettiness or a pretty sadness, to wittiness or a witty madness, he will beat the most unpromising metal. To say that he belittles great themes would be harsh; he merely treats them in a beguiling after-dinner way. No wonder it is sometimes a relief, even to himself, when the band strikes up "Taunhäuser" and the music crashes through the banquet-hall. Were we to seek to churn Mr. Le Gallienne's milk of prettiness and kindness into a more solid dairy product, we should, perhaps, select, for a trial sample, his essay called "A Note on Values." It may certainly be said in general terms that Mr. Le Gallienne wishes to revalue the good things of life. He would like to see poetry, even minor poetry, esteemed to the point of subsidising it; and he plays, only half ironically, with the idea that a poet's profits should be shared by the women who inspire his verse. Consider how we value lovers! "As they go by through the streets, hand in hand, a dream-fed, flower-crowned company,

Speaking evermore among themselves
Their heart-remembered names, do we bow the knee and doff our hats as we pass; do we strew their path with roses; do we clear the way for their beautiful faces; do we say to ourselves: 'Hush! there go the holy ones, the lovers, the great dreamers, the young priests and priestesses of futurity'?" Mr. Le Gallienne is always saying these things, and, of course, they cloy. Were love to preoccupy us in life as it preoccupies Mr. Le Gallienne in literature, it would lose its significant charm as surely as it does in his own essays—if you are so indiscreet as to eat these before beef instead of nibbling them after. You can enjoy Mr. Le Gallienne when you have understood this, and when you know that he holds it to be "the duty of every great man to bequeath his love-letters to the British Museum"; and that he regards England as "the Siberia of the emotions." Not that he will never come to your rescue himself with a passage in which Cupid has had no hand. He has a happy knack of mingling everyday matters with his discourse—stamping them with his daisy escutcheon. In this vein, what could be better than the following from "A Definition of Poetry"?

I have just fallen a victim to the prevailing fashion and gone in for a Times reprint of the Encyclopædia Britannica, following the friendly recommendation of the publishers and choosing the half-morocco bound form, which, in comparison with a friend's cloth-bound copy, I find unquestionably superior and relatively cheaper. I have also gone in for a bookcase, and the whole investment is impregnating my bedroom with an essence of learning from which I am hopefully anticipating the most encouraging results. The other day I read in the papers the curious story of some sailors who had crossed the sea with a cargo of arsenic. For many weeks they had slept near to the arsenic, and the air they breathed was so full of it that these—possibly American—sailors grew fatter and fatter, till at length on their arrival in port, their friends hardly knew them—they were so changed.

Now I am wondering if a similar intellectual fattening might not result from sleeping night after night in a room impregnated with Encyclopædia Britannica, and that is why I have had my copy placed in my bedroom. Then, apart from this unconscious method of assimilation, the little bookcase has a small reading desk at its side, which is just about the right height for reading in bed; and the Encyclopædia may thus be used as an admirable "dormitive" for those who go to bed—but not to sleep. If, however, you desire a soporific you must not choose the article which has just stimulated me to a most enjoyable sleepless night.

The sleepless night was occasioned by Mr. Watts-Dunton's article on poetry, from which our essayist quotes a finely illuminating passage. Mr. Le Gallienne always quotes well. Again and again you have the selection of a nice palate in small print. Nor, if you are in the nibbling mood, will you fail to enjoy those sentences in which he crystallises portions of his—philosophy?—well, the word must pass. It is true that a saying like this: "After all its talk, science has done little more than correct the misprints of religion"—can be coarsely blown out of window; but it is wittily, and not unwisely, said for all that. Nor is one otherwise than drawn to a writer who good-humouredly remarks: "It needs more courage nowadays for a man to wear his hair long than to machine-gun a whole African nation." That Mr. Le Gallienne wears his hair long everyone who tries to keep up with modern literature is profoundly aware; but not everyone knows that he very seriously purposed, last autumn, to go to South Africa as a war-correspondent. There is a notion that our essayist lacks manliness; and he is himself frank enough to recognise this notion, and reply to it. We have no such impression ourselves. Mr. Le Gallienne is too sensitive to be afraid, too fond of Life not to wish to interview its master, Death. We verily believe that his unwritten war-correspondence would have been a variation on Pom-poms, but we are sure that it would have been interesting. It would have been prettily penetrative, for he would have retained his personality on the veldt.

Well, that is the case for Mr. Le Gallienne, essayist. We have thought it well to deal with his familiar reputation as the beau of the Bodley Head, and a smiling promenader in the byways of literature. We leave him to sport with Amaryllis in the shade, and with the tangles of Neera's hair; and now, to horse! There is real reading to be done.

Things Seen.

The Merchant.

HE was a tall, dignified, elderly man, orderly in his dress, regular in his habits, well groomed, and on courteous terms with life. He lived in the northern residential quarter that corresponds to Chislehurst; a victoria carried him to the station every morning; he caught the same train; he occupied the same carriage; he gave his morning paper, carefully folded, at the same moment every day to the engine driver; and he acknowledged the salute of the ticket collector with the proper inclination of his stately head. In the late afternoon the same regularity marked his movements. The day's toil had no effect on his appearance—his hat remained glossy, his boots spotless, his cuffs immaculate. He was the pink of propriety, the pattern of respectability, the highest type of citizen, master of himself and of a well-ordered, well-disciplined household. But one morning when we occupied the same compartment a little incident occurred which "made me think," as Dean Farrar said, after reading The Christian. I do not blame myself, for my action was entirely involuntary. He had been reading a letter, and, as I rose to leave the carriage, it fell from his hand. I picked it up and returned it to him. As I did so my eye rested for the fraction of a second on the front page. It began: "You dear old silly!"

The Pavement Artist.

HE was lazy even for a pavement artist. He did not draw "The Return of the Hero," or "Where is your Wandering Boy To-night?" each morning in coloured chalks upon the pavement, but brought the pictures with him framed, placing them, side by side, along the flags. That was his day's work. During the other hours till sunset he sat at the end of his line of dreadful daubs, huddled up against the area railings, a piteous object, with his milk-can half full of halfpennies before him, and his pale, cunning face screwed into an expression of patient despair. He was a woe-begone sight, and yet once, long ago, this weed on the ocean of life had had one flash of humour. For hanging on the area railings, just above the line of preposterous pictures, was a placard, and on it this was written in ornamental lettering: "All good drawing is the gift of God."

The Tramp.

HE was one of those strange, unkempt tramps you meet on country roads who have quietly shuffled out of civilisation. His matted locks fell about his neck and brushed against his straggling beard. Indeed, the only luxuriant thing about him was the wilderness of hair that sprawled over his head and face. I had seen his kind often on country roads, but the other morning I met him prowling in a London gutter, peering to right and left, digging his heel in heaps of refuse, hunting, like his ancestors, for food. Presently his eyes fell upon the windows of a corner warehouse in which were displayed bottles of the latest Hair Restorer, with life-sized "before and after" pictures. He examined everything with scrupulous care, reading the directions for curing baldness and the prices of the various bottles. Then he removed his battered hat and gazed at the reflection in the plate glass of his own long hair. He whistled, seemed to wonder, and slouched on.

Paris Letter.

(From our French Correspondent.)

M. RENÉ DOUMIC is a competent critic of a sure but narrow range; but it would be difficult to name a more antipathetic one. He has neither gaiety nor humour, nor individual style, nor charm, nor wit. He is the impersonal critic after the heart of M. Brunetière, who is content to write good French and utter judgments in keeping with those of his editor. Of temperament not a suspicion, of enthusiasm not a hint, no generous appreciation of generosity. He is the narrow, catholic, cold, impersonal, dogmatic critic who fitly occupied a professor's chair at Stanislas College before seating himself at the critic's desk for the Revue des Deux Mondes.

His several volumes of Etudes sur la Littérature Française, of which I have just received the last, cannot compare on any ground with M. Jules Lemaitre's studies of contemporary literature. All that M. Lemaitre has M. Doumic lacks—wit, style, now and then a touch of bright sentimentality, comprehensiveness, a supple nature, a wide taste, a distinct charm and grace in spite of a certain canaille which makes us think of an academic street arab with his tongue in his cheek, or a cat with sheathed claws waiting to catch you unawares with a dainty scratch, when we think of M. Jules Lemaitre. But M. Doumic is quietly, coldly, antipathetic, without vices or virtues to endear him to the reader. As a Catholic he holds all individual effort, all generous reform, in contempt and detestation. Hence his summary justice in the case of M. Marcel Prévost's feminist novels, the sort of justice dealt by M. Brunetière to M. Paul Hervieu's Loi de l'homme. To maintain that women have any reason for complaint or dissatisfaction, to pretend that anything in our social organisations might be improved, is to invite his censure. Nothing could be more exasperating than his article on Tolstoi's noble book, Resurrection. Out of sympathy with the generous and ardent Christianity of Tolstoi, which for him is nothing better than Socialism, such a chill and ungenial nature can seize nothing of the beauty of Tolstoi's work. His criticism of Marcel Prévost's remarkable books, Frédérique and Lea, is inexcusable. A critic who does not like an author may be pardoned for demolishing him without even an attempt to understand him, provided he does so in a brilliant, paradoxical way, with wit and charm. It is immoral, but it is human to strike our enemies hard. But to strike with a dull and heavy pen, as M. Doumic does, is a double crime. His inability to conceive moral delicacy and pride in a woman is shown in his unworthy sneer at the girl who disdainfully rejects the offer of a man who before had wanted to make her his mistress. Here M. Prévost shows himself the better man of the two, a fact M. Doumic is so far from doubting that he continues in the best of conceit to preach his heavy and utterly unjust sermon. The annoying feature in these criticisms of M. Doumic is the superb air of moral and intellectual superiority this second-rate pedant, without a grain of imagination or a halfpennyworth of art, gives himself towards those who are immeasurably his superiors. He patronises Balzac, nods at Tolstoi, kicks Voltaire, disapproves of Michelet, with the air of a master. As a critic, this was the ground Sainte-Beuve so admirably held. His tact was exquisite. He neither patronised nor jeered at the authors he criticised. He analysed and understood them. He went to the heart of a book and culled its flower. He was all things that a critic who is not a pedant should be: graceful, sentimental, witty, delicate, tender, impertinent, human, personal. But, then, Sainte-Beuve was not second-rate; he was never dull, never pedantic, like M. Doumic.

Mme. Bentzon is another contributor to M. Brunetière's Review who makes us regret the good old days of the Père Buloz. Oddly enough Buloz, the founder of this eminent Review, was a man quite destitute of letters, and never was a Review before or since so brilliantly edited. It is true that there has rarely been such a blaze of genius in any land as that which found George Sand, Mérimée, Musset, Gautier, Balzac, Flaubert and Hugo contemporaries. But it needed the peculiar qualities of Buloz to group an army of the best writers around him, and found a Review which to-day subsists upon his memory. Now the Revue des Deux Mondes is edited by a man of letters, an Academician, and never was it so badly edited. All its brilliance has gone, and it has become merely the dull, somnific organ of the heaviest bore French letters have produced. Verve, brilliance, originality, all the qualities that Buloz sought and prized, are religiously tabooed. Brilliant and persuasive writers may be found in France, but rarely within the covers of M. Brunetière's Review. While Buloz would have cherished M. Anatole France, M. Brunetière gives us Th. Bentzon, a writer of trivial novels, milk-and-water romances, lacking distinction of style, characterisation, interest, wit, humour, observation. Her last story, Tchélorek, is an inept and feeble novel, commonly written, with nothing on earth to recommend it. The heroine and hero, cousins and lovers in early youth, sillily allow themselves to be separated. He goes to Africa, she stays at home and writes a great novel. The eminent critic of the hour analyses it; they fall in love and marry, and have a wretched time. They divorce, and the African officer returns to his early love. Again, for inadequate reason, they separate, and the heroine remains a writer of novels.

The book contains but two lines worth reading, and these two lines contain a truth worth noting: "The Anglo-Saxons are haughty of soul, while we Latins are, what we have ever been, the real democrats, if that name should be applied to those who believe most in human fraternity." But Mme. Bentzon, the writer of this mediocre "lady's" novel, is one of the pillars of the Revue des Deux Mondes. Shades of George Sand! Think of the Père Buloz reading Tchélorek in the alleys of the Elysian Fields. Truly will he sigh tout passe, since the glory of his Review has passed.

Better reading far is Mathilde Serao's collection of stories Ou Giovannino ou la Mort. It is brightly written, with a pleasant stroke of satire, a keen and sensible observation, and a vigorous touch. Hardly literature in the real sense of the word, but agreeable prose agreeably relating an interesting little tale of an Italian maid, her unworthy lover, and rapacious stepmother, with a sharp series of tiny suggested domestic scenes around them. Such stories may be read in an idle moment, and forgotten as easily without rancour towards the futile author, while pretentious drivel like Tchéloek excites anger at the impertinent claim upon our attention.

La Valse, by Henri Lavedan, is, properly speaking, the Academician's first work. Why M. Lavedan was ever elected I have yet to understand. La Valse leaves me more than ever in the dark. It lacks the mordant satire, the extraordinary cruel suggestiveness of Les Jeunes; it lacks the wickedness, the sparkle, and the wit of Nouveau Jeu; it lacks the conventional virtues of Catherine; and it possesses nothing of itself as compensation.

H. L.

Children's Reading Books.

THAT the novel has deteriorated is a proposition to which many people have of late cheerily assented without troubling to specify the excellencies which they miss in contemporary fiction and find in its typical forerunners. Another dubious proposition which meets with even readier acceptance is the improvement in recent years of children's reading books. In a little book, dated 1825, that was given the writer by a domestic who had authority over him, Sydney asks, "Are the common poultry natives of England?" and Lady Mandeville replies "Aristophanes calls the cock the Persian bird; and it seems that it was known in Persia before Darius and Megabyzus." It would be interesting to know when encyclopædic aunts went out of fashion; but even while they were in fashion there were other and fairer trees of knowledge. An earlier decade opposed the exemplary actuality of "Early Lessons" alike to such stupefying erudition and the suffocating evangelicism of Mrs. Sherwood.

What the tiniest children should read from is really a question of the highest scientific importance. It is a question which involves a theory of articulation (what sounds are easiest to utter?) and a theory of assimilation (what thoughts are easiest to understand?). It is very possibly easier to write a novel that will pass muster as regenerate than to make a book which babyhood will inhale without a declaration of war.

Yet the feat was accomplished thirty years ago by Mrs. Leathley, whose obituary notice we printed last December. M. Darton, father of the well-known publisher, Mr. Joseph W. Darton (Wells Gardner, Darton & Co.), issued eighty-nine works by her. The British Museum takes next to no account of these; but one of them, Chickseed without Chickseed, whereof half a million was sold, has the flavour of a classic. We offer one, and only one, specimen of this book:

Why do you cry?
The Dog has bit my leg.
Why did he do so?
I had my bat, and I hit him as he lay on the mat, so he ran at me and bit my leg.
Ah! you may not use the bat if you hit the Dog. It is a hot day, and the Dog may go mad. One day a Dog bit a boy in the arm, and the boy had his arm cut off, for the Dog was mad.
And did the boy die?
Yes, he did die in a day or two. It is not fit to hit a Dog if he lie on the mat and is not a bad Dog. Do not hit a dog or a cat or a boy.

The reader will note that the whole of this moving dialogue is written in words of three letters. Yet is there nothing archaic or retrouvé in its texture. The author runs playfully into rhyme—e.g., "It is not fit to hit a dog," as though to show the perfect freedom of her movements within her self-prescribed limits. The climax is finely studied. The child is led by an irresistible chain of reasoning to forswear cruelty to dogs. First, by adroit questioning he is led to admit that the dog bit because he was hit. Secondly, he is warned that a bite from a dog may mean a bite from a mad dog, and consequently a painful end for the bitten one. Thirdly, an appeal is made to his moral sense—"It is not fit to hit a Dog if he lie on the mat and is not a bad Dog." The last two lines, at first sight the weakest, reveal a complete insight into infant nature. Dog, cats, and boys are the only three living creatures with whom babies are likely to conflict. In naming them separately clear mental pictures are produced worth any amount of generalisation. It is better that by misapprehending his licence baby should be unkind to snakes or buffaloes than that he should forget that there is anything he may not ill-treat.

Mrs. Leathley understood then the whole art of didactic writing for children: it consists in painting and in talking. It is not for nothing that the dialogue has come down to us since Socrates as the ideal vehicle for imparting knowledge to slow and easily wearied intelligences. Sandford and Merton, The Fairchild Family, Evenings at Home, and The Child's Guide to Knowledge all show in greater or less measure their author's perception of the uses of dialogue. And the life of Mrs. Leathley's whimsical little book is but another witness to the fact that A. without Q. in a child's reading book is as little to be thought of as Q. without A.

C.

The Poetry of John Donne.

BROADLY speaking, Jacobean lyric, and still more Caroline lyric, is less of temperament than of convention. Felicities of expression, of music, of courtesy, it has in good measure; it charms and delights. But it lacks the intimate interest of personality. It is built upon common forms, and is everything rather than immediate and human. From this condemnation, if you think it a condemnation, you will exempt John Donne. It would be almost true to say that John Donne's temperament became the Jacobean convention. Nothing can be more misleading than to remember that his poems were first printed in 1633. For half a century they had been potent in MS. There is Walton's word for it, and Ben Jonson's, that they were written, so far as secular, by his twentieth or twenty-fifth year. This must not be pressed too literally, but it is clear that his style was already formed in the great 'nineties, the spacious days between the coming of the Armada and the coming of the Stuarts. And then it was unique. Among the contemporaries of his early manhood, Donne's sole affinities are with Marlowe. Metaphysical, rugged, and obscure, dowered with a macabre imagination and a white-heat of passion, he was an entirely new note in a literature dominated, outside the drama, by the distant influence of Spenser. The pretty fancies of sonnetteers, song-writers, and pastoralists he passed on one side, and witched les jeunes with a new and poignant lyric, imperfect in technique and full of extravagant conceits, lending itself as all strongly marked styles lend themselves, to formal imitation, but in his hands, at least, the fascinating reflex of an undeniable personality. He did not print, for his ambitions were in the world of state, not that of letters; but his precious verses filled innumerable common-place books, and that they set the poetic model for the first half of the seventeenth century there can be no manner of doubt. True, it was of Ben Jonson that Carew and his fellows proclaimed themselves the sons; for while Donne read theology in the country and strove to get his footing on the slippery steps of diplomacy, Jonson lorded it amongst the wits of London in "The Dog, the Triple Tun." But Jonson himself, outside his own special realms of dainty masque and learned tragedy, owes an unmistakable debt, which he is not slow to acknowledge, to the master of lyric and occasional verse.

Since then Donne's poems are of temperament; they bear study as human documents; they are a record of that fiery, enigmatic "soul's progress" which was the life of Donne. Chronologically they fall into three groups. The first includes the poems of early manhood, the satires, the "idylls" modelled on Ovid's Amores, and the lyrics of love. And here, in the lyrics in particular, you may trace two somewhat contradictory moods. Sometimes Donne writes as the man of pleasure, of bonnes fortunes, with a cynical laxity of ethics which goes to explain the almost morbid remorsefulness of the sermons of his later years, and with a strong sense of the vanity of things which makes pleasure and bonnes fortunes but as Dead Sea ashes in the mouth. Man delights him not, nor, save for the intoxication of an hour, women either. And both the intoxication and its reaction are realised and expressed with an almost modern subtlety of psychological insight. On Donne in this mood we do not love to linger. Here is, we suspect, the poetry of a young man, the typical travelled Italianate Englishman, whose precocious experience has been throughout of the senses rather than of the heart. And we turn gladly to other poems in which Donne writes more worthily of love, with no less psychology, and with an imaginative rapture which subordinates all time and all existence to the emotional fact. Here he gives you, by fits and starts—for, alas! his inspiration rarely extends throughout a whole poem—some of the finest love poetry in the world. These verses should be beads on every lover's chaplet:

All kings, and all their favourites,
All glory of honours, beauties, wits,
The sun itself, which makes time, as they pass,
Is elder by a year now than it was
When thou and I first one another saw.
All other things to their destruction draw,
Only our love hath no decay;
This no to-morrow hath, nor yesterday;
Running, it never runs from us away,
But truly keeps his first, last, everlasting day.

And again:

I scarce believe my love to be so pure
As I had thought it was,
Because it doth endure
Vicissitude, and season, as the grass;
Methinks I lied all winter, when I swore
My love was infinite, if spring make it more.

And yet no greater, but more eminent,
Love by the spring is grown;
As in the firmament
Stars by the sun are not enlarged, but shown,
Gentle love deeds, as blossoms on a bough,
From love's awaken'd root do bud out now.

A poem of singular beauty concerns an armlet of his mistress' hair worn by the poet, and to be buried with him. Throughout life the thought of death was very present to Donne:

Whoever comes to shroud me, do not harm,
Nor question much,
That subtle wreath of hair, which crowns my arm;
The mystery, the sign you must not touch;
For 'tis my outward soul,
Viceroy to that, which unto heaven being gone,
Will leave this to control
And keep these limbs, her provinces, from dissolution.

I do not know that it is particularly sentimental to connect the higher spiritual mood of Donne's love poetry with the romance of his marriage. Like Robert Browning, he eloped. The lady was Anne More, daughter of Sir George More, of Losely, near Guildford, and niece of the Lord Keeper, Lord Egerton, to whom Donne was secretary at the time. For some time they loved in secret, and in the end, hopeless of Sir George More's consent, made a clandestine match of it. To the strange circumstances of the courtship there are pretty clear allusions in some of the poems.

The second group of Donne's poems, those of mature life, between his marriage in 1601 and his taking orders in 1615, are mostly verse letters to his friends, and to certain great ladies, such as Lucy Lady Bedford, who held a court of poets at Twickenham Park, through whom Donne probably hoped to obtain State employment. They include also some remarkable funeral elegies, of which the best are those on a somewhat enigmatic Mrs. Cecilia Boulstred, a friend of Lady Bedford's, and on Elizabeth Drury, the child daughter of Sir Robert Drury of Drury Lane. As a flatterer, Donne is magnificent. You may not like the use of his pen, but certainly neither dead nor living were ever celebrated with more splendid hyperbole of praise. This is Lady Bedford:

. . . I would behold
You as you're Virtue's temple, not as she;
What walls of tender crystal her enfold,
What eyes, hands, bosom, her pure altars be;
And after this survey, oppose to all
Babblers of chapels, you, th' Escorial.

Yet not as consecrate, but merely as fair;
On these I cast a lay and country eye.
Of past and future stories, which are rare,
I find you all record and prophecy.
Purge but the book of Fate, that it admit
No sad nor guilty legends—you are it.

If good and lovely were not one, of both
You were the transcript and original,
The elements, the parent, and the growth;
And every piece of you is both their all;
So entire are all your deeds, and you, that you
Must do the same things still; you cannot two.

Leaving then busy praise and all appeal
To higher courts, sense's decree is true.
The mine, the magazine, the common-weal,
The story of beauty, in Twickenham is, and you.
Who hath seen one, would both; as, who had been
In Paradise, would seek the cherubin.

Finally, as Donne came more and more to occupy himself with theology, and especially in his latter years as a divine and Dean of St. Paul's, he also came to regret some, at least, of his earlier verse. But, as Walton puts it, "he was not so fallen out with heavenly poetry as to forsake that; no, not in his declining age; witnessed then by many divine sonnets, and other high, holy and harmonious composures." Donne's divine poems have the same intensity of imagination, the same fine exordia which are characteristic of his secular verse. Space does not, unfortunately, permit of more than one brief example:

Death, be not proud, though some have called thee
Mighty and dreadful, for thou art not so;
For those, whom thou think'st thou dost overthrow,
Die not, poor Death, nor yet canst thou kill me.
From rest and sleep, which but thy picture be,
Much pleasure, then from thee much more must flow,
And soonest our best men with thee do go,
Rest of their bones, and soul's delivery.
Thou'rt slave to Fate, chance, kings, and desperate men,
And dost with poison, war, and sickness dwell,
And poppy, or charms can make us sleep as well,
And better than thy stroke; why swell'st thou then?
One short sleep past, we wake eternally,
And Death shall be no more; Death, thou shalt die.

Correspondence.

"An Englishwoman's Love-Letters."

SIR,—As another careful reader of An Englishwoman's Love-Letters, I should like to express my agreement with "Theta's" view of the nature of the catastrophe which these letters indicate, and at the same time my absolute disagreement from what appears to be the general verdict upon the book—"Theta's" verdict included.

There is not, to my mind, the slightest doubt that the lovers were brother and sister; the supposition, which seems to have contented other critics, of infidelity or fickleness in the man, is contradicted by every word that can afford a clue to his character; his action in breaking off the engagement is due solely to the statement made to him by his mother; she had appointed a definite time for making that statement, but before the expiration of the "truce" she found silence no longer possible, and she spoke. Till she spoke the cause of her opposition was a mystery to both lovers equally.

What conceivable disclosure could have induced that man to abandon that girl, whom he had certainly not ceased to love, to express at once the deepest respect for her and the most positive repudiation of all relations between them, and to leave her, without a word of explanation, to sob out her life in the torture chamber to which he must have known he condemned her without possibility of escape or respite?

No hypothesis but "Theta's" meets the case. Lunacy existing in one or other family might be suggested; but apart from the fact that in one of the letters that solution is expressly guarded against, it will not explain the brutality of the dénouement, which is the one thing that needs explanation. "Theta's" hypothesis makes that dénouement possible; but it destroys the claim of the book to be considered a work of art, and reduces it to the level of a revolting practical joke, or at best of a cheap melodrama, in which every probability is sacrificed to the demand for sensation.

That incest, actual or contemplated, may legitimately furnish a motive in art I do not wish to deny. Sophocles used it, Ford used it, Shelley used it; even Scott used it—though so carefully avoiding any appeal to the imagination of his readers that nine out of ten people read Redgauntlet without a qualm. The province of the artist includes the whole realm of human nature, regular and irregular; but his choice is limited. All things are possible for him, but not all things are expedient. He has no right to impose a monstrosity upon us as a type. It is quite possible that a man should cook his children for breakfast, but a story written on the supposition that a good man might do so would be worthless; and as a story An Englishwoman's Love-Letters are worthless for this very reason, that the particular men and women invented by the author would not have acted as they are made to act. The latter part of the book is a piece of mere wanton cruelty, wholly inconsistent with what we are shown of the characters of the personages who are made responsible for it. Indeed, any man who had come to know the writer of those letters must have known better than to keep the secret from her, whatever it was; in surrounding her victim with a conspiracy of silence the author is taking an unpardonable liberty with the human race; she is flouting the unity of human character.

Of the general scheme of the book there is little to say. Setting aside the "Explanation," in which the author's tongue is so plainly in her cheek that it hardly becomes anyone to draw attention to it, the rest is a very skilful appeal to the present appetite for "interiors," which the publication of Mrs. Browning's letters seems to have whetted amazingly. The heroine is dragged into view, stripped bare for inspection, and then (lest we should doubt her flesh and blood) flayed alive before our eyes;

we touch at once the zenith of sensationalism and the nadir of decency; and the pity of it is that "even the very elect are deceived" into approval.—I am, &c.,

PHI.

"The Story of Ronald Kestrel."

SIR,—I hold to the notion that the average author does not cherish grateful feelings toward the average reviewer of books. Broadly speaking, I fancy the author justified in this apparent churlishness—at all events, in the case of reviewers who write for newspapers as distinguished from other periodicals.

The foregoing is not intended as an essay in pointlessness. Quite the reverse. I want to say that I read all the ACADEMY'S reviews of books, enjoy most of them, and, with never an exception, have felt really grateful in the matter of ACADEMY reviews of my own work. That of The Story of Ronald Kestrel in your last issue is a case in point. "But it is not as good as Mr. Dawson's best." I want to thank you for perceiving that. Having also stated it, would you mind further stating the reason of my pleasure in your recognition of the fact? That reason is this: the book in question was written two years before "Mr. Dawson's best" (i.e., Daniel Whyte); and the said Dawson has to confess to a kind of literary deformity which makes revision impossible to him. I have never been able to revise anything, save my own and my chief's moral editorials in Australian back-blocks newspapers. Never real work. That, in my case, has to face the blasts of the autumnal season in its buff, so to say—as it is born. And now you see why I am glad. The "best" was the mellowed, later growth. Whereat I rejoice, hopefully. And as for "Mr. Dawson having always drawn too much upon his own adventures," you know (I won't shuffle by dilating upon the merits of first-hand studies, because I well know what you mean. Only give Mr. Dawson a little time. He has lived a lot in a little while. It lay there, outspread at his hand) you cannot credit me with having personally, and in the flesh, struggled through all the adventuring of In the Bight of Benin and African Nights' Entertainment, I am sure.

One other word, please. Is my little "advertisement" of Ronald Kestrel truly in verse? I give you my word and honour that I wrote it for prose in a note to my publisher; note, advertisement, stamping and addressing occupying no more than five minutes.—I am, &c.,

A. J. DAWSON.

"Ada Negri."

SIR,—I observe that one of your writers describes Ada Negri as an "apostate," and since her marriage to a wealthy capitalist neglects to plead the cause of the poor and the oppressed, as aforetime.

On the contrary, I hear from an Italian lady, "Tuttora scrivo, e fa conferenze." Her mother was a weaver when Ada was born at Lodi, in Lombardy. To gain an honest livelihood she took a post as schoolmistress at Motta Visconti, until she met, and married, Signor Garlanda, her lately chosen husband.

My friend, without knowing anything of this correspondence, quotes to me from memory some brani of Signora Garlanda's verses, which, to save space, I will translate into English prose:

My heart weeps blood at sight of great souls in darkness; they are the starving and oppressed.

What truce or relief did they ever get from cruel and unrelenting nature?

Still they bore no hatred!

Have they not seen the corn grow? Still they stole not!

Have they not drunk gall and tears—been brutally smitten on the cheek by blind and tyrannical injustice? Still they never killed!

Have they not wandered through ice and storms in poverty and contumely, without home, bread, or clothing? Still they believed in a God!

Had they not a bundle of straw to sleep upon, wretched and filth-bespattered, and an hospital where to die? Still they perished always loving!

I know not if these lines are from either of Ada Negri's volumes of poems, Fatalità or Tempeste, but they are words that burn with sacred fire.—I am, &c.,

WILLIAM MERCER.

Our Weekly Competition.

Result of No. 64 (New Series).

LAST week we offered a prize of One Guinea for the best poem of welcome to Lord Roberts, not exceeding sixteen lines. We award the prize to Mr. Alfred Edward Wright, Inverinate Villa, Attadale-road, Inverness, for the following:

One voice, one mind, one heart be ours,
One great acclaim from sea to sea,
To him, who led to victory
The startled Empire's gather'd powers.

He gave men hope and steadied nerve,
So gentle-strong to think and do,
So modest he, so good and true,
Our faith in him could never swerve;

Who, at the call of duty, gave
His unbowed weight of stealing years;
Suppress'd his heart, kept back his tears,
And laid his sorrow in the grave.

No Roman triumph his shall be;
Our stintless praise is greater far—
The triumph of the single star,
The single star which all men see.

[A. E. W., Inverness]

Other poems follow:

India knows him: each Hindoo
Marvels at this strangest man,
Who had power, and yet was true,
Who the thing he said must do,
Even in Afghanistan.

Europe knows him: France may sneer
At a general who is just:
Germans, who obey in fear,
Slaves who serve when knout is near,
Wonder at his soldiers' trust.

England knows him—knows the why
He inspires the trust that moves
Every heart to loyal faith,
Knows her meaning as she saith,
"England trusts the man she loves."

[G. S., Brentwood.]

Hero we hail thee, not for fortitude

Alone, or wit, or high strategic skill;
Nor that thou mad'st thine own the heavenly will—
A soldier-saint; but rather for that mood
Most gracious, rarest, which would fain make good
The world's ungentleness, and gave to least
And last of men—nay, to the tortured beast—
A home in thoughts where love and pity brood.

There are whom Peace makes kind: not so with thee,
Nursling of War! whom yet her scorching breath
Could sear not, nor the guerdons she would give Seduce from fealties that shall outlive
Her lurid cult, and in her place of death
Rear altars to a new humanity.

[M. A. W., London.]

You heard your country's mandate and obeyed;
She called you in your sorrow, you arose
Her son and servant; and with instant aid
Went forth to meet the menace of her foes.

Foremost alike in military fame,
And kindly forethought, and all courtesy,
Your past and present kindled to a flame
The conquering ardour of your soldiery.

We hail you now, for your accomplished toil—
Fair fall the sequel to the clearing cloud!
Again, upon our own inviolate soil,
We hail you with our welcome warm and proud!

For with her loyalty of kindred blood
You kept our Empire's honour fair and free,
And Britain honours that wide brotherhood
In you, the pattern of her chivalry.

[I. S., Brighton.]

With the cannon's boom, and the bunting flying
From roof and casement and stately mast,
We give our hero, of fame undying,
A glorious welcome home at last.

Pierced with the cruel thorns of sorrow,
With bleeding heart was thy task begun;
But now is dawning a fair to-morrow—
The foe is scattered, thy work is done.

Thou hast covered thy name with glory,
Brilliant, generous to the end;
Thou wilt live in our island's story,
The soldier's "darling"—the Army's friend.

A prouder title could none desire!
Nobly, "Bobs," hast thou played thy part!
With tears of joy and with words of fire,
England now clasps thee to her heart!

[F. B. D., Torquay.]

When in the gloomy time of her despoil
Thy country called on thee, though scarce yet cold
Thy gallant son's life-blood, yet as of old,
When the fierce Afghan warred against our right,

No laggard thou; before thee, swift to smite,
In headlong rout the stricken foe was rolled
From arid plain and torrid mountain bold,
By many a toilsome march and stubborn fight.

Victorious now we hail thee; yet the rest
Which is the victor's due thou seekest not,
Embracing that new task the fates allot,

That, welded by thy counsel strong and sane,
Puissant our arms may be by all confessed;
Thus still in peace new triumphs shalt thou gain.

[E. W. H., Manchester.]

Sixteen other poems sent in.

Competition No. 65 (New Series).

We offer a prize of One Guinea for a list of the ten books written in English in the nineteenth century which no English home should be without. We exclude works, encyclopedias, and works of reference generally. The best list will be identified by plebiscite.

RULES.

Answers, addressed "Literary Competition, THE ACADEMY, 43, Chancery-lane, W.C.," must reach us not later than the first post of Wednesday, December 19. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found on the second page of Wrapper, or it cannot enter into competition. Competitors sending more than one attempt at solution must accompany each attempt with a separate coupon; otherwise the first only will be considered.

Special cloth cases for binding the half-yearly volume of the ACADEMY can be supplied for 1s. each. The price of the bound half-yearly volume is 8s. 9d. Communications should be addressed to the Publisher, 43, Chancery-lane.

CATALOGUES.

SOTHERAN'S PRICE CURRENT OF LITERATURE.

MONTHLY LIST OF NEWLY-PURCHASED SECOND-HAND BOOKS.

No. 603, just published for DECEMBER, post free on application.

Also Catalogue of Newly-bound Books for the Library or Presentation.

H. SOTHERAN &amp; CO., Booksellers, 140, Strand, W.C.; and 37, Piccadilly, W.

WILFRID M. VOYNICH.

CATALOGUE No. 3 IN PREPARATION.

CATALOGUE No. 1, 1s., and CATALOGUE No. 2, 2s. 6d.,

May be had on application at 1, SOHO SQUARE, W.

A Large Collection of Fifteenth and Sixteenth Century Books on view.

DENNY'S CHRISTMAS LIST OF BOOKS

for PRESENTS and PRIZES. Just Ready. A large selection in stock at Full Discount Prices for Cash.—Note New Address, A. &amp; F. DENNY, 147, Strand, West End Branch: 2, Charing Cross, S.W.

WILLIAMS &amp; NORGATE,

IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN BOOKS.

14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, 23, South Frederick St. Edinburgh, and 17, Broad Street, Oxford.

CATALOGUES post free on application.

BAEDEKER'S &amp; BADDELEY'S

TOURISTS' GUIDE BOOKS.

New fully detailed CATALOGUE sent post free on application.

DULAU &amp; CO., 37, SOHO SQUARE, LONDON, W.

BOOKS, RARE and OUT-OF-PRINT, SUPPLIED.—State wants.

CATALOGUES free. Libraries and Small Parcels Purchased for Cash. WANTED, Gardiner's HISTORY, 2 vols., 1863.—HOLLAND CO., Book Merchants, Birmingham.

BOOKS WANTED.—25s. each given for any

Presentation Volumes with Inscriptions written inside by Dickens, Thackeray, Browning, Lamb, Keats, Shelley, Tennyson, Scott, Lang, and any notable Authors. Special List (3,000 Books Wanted) free.—BAKER'S, John Bright St., Birmingham.

LITERARY RESEARCH.—A Gentleman,

experienced in Literary Work, and who has access to the British Museum Reading Room, is open to arrange with Author or any person requiring assistance in Literary Research, or in seeing work through the Press. Translations undertaken from French, Italian, or Spanish.—Apply, by letter, to D. C. DALLAS, 151, Strand, London, W.C.

GRAHAM'S TYPE-WRITING OFFICE,

23, COCKSPUR STREET, PAUL MALL.—All kinds of difficult MSS. receive careful attention from experienced workers. Specimen page and references sent if desired. Over five years' experience.

TYPE-WRITING promptly and accurately done. 10d. per 1,000 words. Samples and references. Multi-Copies.—Address, Miss Messer, 15, Mortimer Crescent, N.W.

TYPE-WRITER.—AUTHORS' MSS.

COPIED with accuracy and despatch. Carbon Duplicates. Circulars. Examination Papers, &amp;c.—Miss E. THOMAS, 23, Maitland Park Villas, Haverstock Hill, N.W.—Established 1884.

The Book of the "Foudroyant,"

NELSON'S FLAGSHIP.

Write to GOODALL, LAMB and HEIGHWAY, Ltd., Manchester, for the above, containing beautiful Reproductions of rare Portraits, reproduced from Old Prints in the British Museum of Nelson and his Captains, not elsewhere procurable, which will be sent post free on approval.

UNA.

A SONG OF ENGLAND IN THE YEAR NINETEEN HUNDRED.

By WILLIAM GERARD.

3s. 6d. net.

KEGAN PAUL, TRENCH, TRÜBNER &amp; CO., LTD.

THE DOWNS SCHOOL,

SEAFORD, SUSSEX.

Head Mistress—Miss LUCY ROBINSON, M.A. (Late Second Mistress St. Felix School, Southwold).
References: The Principal of Bedford College, London, The Master of Peterhouse, &c.

YOUNG WRITERS OF PROSE or VERSE

should send stamped envelope for full Prospectus of "Literary Tuition per Post," as conducted by E. L. Haas-Bickford, F.R.S. (London). Ex-President of, and Critic to, the International Literary Association; Critic to the Junior Literary Association, &c. &c. MSS. criticised, corrected, and commented on weekly, accompanied by "Fraternal Papers." Prizes and Payment have been won by Mr. Bickford's Pupils.—Address Thornley House, Redruth. (Please mention THE ACADEMY.)

THE REV. WILLIAM C. STEWART.

LL.B., LECTURES on HISTORY and LITERATURE, and gives LESSONS in RHETORIC and POETRY, Orally or by Correspondence.—7, Spencer Road, Wandsworth Common, S.W.

ROYAL INSTITUTION OF GREAT

BRITAIN, Albemarle Street, Piccadilly, W.

LECTURE ARRANGEMENTS BEFORE EASTER, 1901.

LECTURE HOUR, 3 O'CLOCK P.M.

CHRISTMAS LECTURES.

Sir ROBERT BALL, M.A., LL.D., D.Sc., F.R.S., Lowndean Professor of Astronomy, University of Cambridge.—SIX LECTURES (Adapted to a Juvenile Audience) on "GREAT CREATIONS from the Beginning to the Present." On Tuesdays, Jan. 1, 3, 5, 8, 1901. One Guinea the Course; Children under 16, Half-a-Guinea.

Professor J. A. EWING, M.A., F.R.S., M.Inst.C.E., Professor of Mechanism and Applied Mechanics, University of Cambridge.—SIX LECTURES on "MECHANICAL MECHANICS (Experimentally Treated): First Principles and Modern Illustrations." On Tuesdays, Jan. 15, 22, 29, Feb. 5, 12, 19. One Guinea the Course.

ALLAN MACFADYEN, M.D., B.Sc., Jenner Institute of Preventive Medicine, Full-time Professor of Physiology, R.I.—FIVE LECTURES on "THE CELL as the UNIT of LIFE." On Tuesdays, Feb. 26, March 5, 12, 19, 26. One Guinea.

ARTHUR WILLEY, M.A., D.Sc., Lecturer on Biology in Guy's Hospital.—THREE LECTURES on "THE ORIGIN of VERTEBRATE ANIMALS." On Thursdays, Jan. 17, 24, 31. Half-a-Guinea.

The Rev. HENRY GREY GRAHAM, Author of "The Social Life of Scotland in the Eighteenth Century."—THREE LECTURES on "SOCIETY in FRANCE before the REVOLUTION." On Thursdays, Feb. 7, 14, 21. Half-a-Guinea.

Professor PERCY GARDNER, Litt.D., F.S.A., Professor of Archaeology and Art, University of Oxford.—THREE LECTURES on "GREEK and ROMAN PORTRAIT SCULPTURE (Illustrated by Lantern Slides)." On Thursdays, Feb. 28, March 7, 14. Half-a-Guinea.

Sir WYKE BAXLISS, F.S.A., President of the Royal Society of British Artists.—TWO LECTURES on "SHAKESPEARE in his RELATION to his CONTEMPORARIES in ART." On Thursdays, March 21, 28. Half-a-Guinea.

Professor R. K. DOUGLAS, Keeper of Oriental Books and Manuscripts, British Museum.—Professor of Chinese, King's College, London.—TWO LECTURES on "THE GOVERNMENT and PEOPLE of CHINA." On Saturdays, Jan. 19, 26. Half-a-Guinea.

F. CORPHER, Esq., F.R.A.M.—THREE LECTURES on "VOCAL MUSIC: Its Growth and Decay (with Musical Illustrations)." On Saturdays, Feb. 2, 9, 16. Half-a-Guinea.

The Right Hon. LORD RAYLEIGH, M.A., D.C.L., LL.D., Sc.D., F.R.S., M.R.I., Professor of Natural Philosophy, R.I.—SIX LECTURES on "SOUND and VIBRATIONS." On Saturdays, Feb. 2, 9, 16, 23, 30. One Guinea.

Subscription to Non-Members to all Courses of Lectures (extending from Christmas to Midsummer), Two Guineas. Tickets issued daily at the Institution, or sent by post on receipt of Cheque or Post-office Order. Members may purchase not less than THREE SINGLE LECTURE Tickets, available for any Afternoon Lecture, for Half-a-Guinea.

The FRIDAY EVENING MEETINGS will begin on January 18th, at 9 p.m., when Professor DENAR will give a DISCOURSE on "CASES at the BEGINNING and END of the CENTURY." Succeeding DISCOURSES will probably be given by Dr. ADOLPHUS W. WARD (Master of Peterhouse), Right Rev. Monsignor GERALD MOLLOY, Professor G. H. BRYAN, Professor J. J. THOMSON, Sir W. ROBERTS-AUSTIN, H. HARDING CUNYHAM, Esq., W. C. SIENSTONE, Esq., Dr. HORACE T. BROWN, The Right Hon. LORD RAYLEIGH, and other gentlemen. To these Meetings Members and their Friends only are admitted.

Persons desirous of becoming Members are requested to apply to the Secretary. When proposed they are immediately admitted to all the Lectures, to the Friday Evening Meetings and to the Library and Reading Rooms; and their Families are admitted to the Lectures at a reduced charge. Payment: First Year, Ten Guineas; afterwards, Five Guineas a year; or a composition of Sixty Guineas.

ROYAL HISTORICAL SOCIETY

(Incorporated by Royal Charter).

Patron—HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN.

President—A. W. WARD, Esq., Litt.D.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 20th, 5 p.m., at ST. MARTIN'S TOWN HALL, Charing Cross, the following Paper will be read:

"THE EARLY RELATIONS between the SLAVS and the TEUTONS," by RONALD W. HEATON, M.A.

HUBERT HALL, Director and Hon. Secretary.
115, St. Martin's Lane, W.C.

LONDON LIBRARY.

ST. JAMES'S SQUARE, S.W.

Patrons—H.R.H. THE PRINCE OF WALES, K.O.

President—LESLIE STEPHEN.

Vice-Presidents—The Right Hon. A. J. BALFOUR, M.P., the Right Rev. the LORD BISHOP of LONDON, HERBERT SPENCER, Esq.; the Right Hon. W. E. H. LECKY, M.P., D.C.L.

Treasurer—Right Hon. Sir M. GRANT DUFF, Right Hon. LORD AVEBURY, F.R.S., Right Hon. EARL of ROSSEBURY.

The Library contains about 200,000 Volumes of Ancient and Modern Literature, in Various Languages. Subscription, £3 a year; Life-Membership, according to age. Fifteen Volumes are allowed to Country and Ten to Town Members. Reading Room Open from 10 till half-past 6. CATALOGUE, Fifth Edition, 1888, 2 vols., royal 8vo, price 21s.; to Members, 16s. C. T. HAGBERG WRIGHT, LL.D., Secretary and Librarian.

Elliot Stock's New Publications.

In demy 8vo, bound in buckram, 7s. 6d. net.

RAILWAY RUNS in THREE

CONTINENTS. A Short Record of Actual Performances on some European, Canadian, Australian, and American Railways. By J. T. BURTON ALEXANDER.

This volume contains the personal observations of the author either whilst riding on the engine or in the train. The booked and actual times of each run are given, also the load drawn, and the class of loco by which the train was hauled. The speed is noted, and there are explanatory notes opposite most of the runs, showing, roughly, how the work done struck the observer, together with the chief physical features of the line. The work will be handy as a book of reference, showing in a compact form the relative performances of many celebrated trains all over the world.

A SEASONABLE CHRISTMAS GIFT.

Crown 8vo, cloth, 5s.

THE FORGOTTEN MELODY.

By ONE WHO REMEMBERS IT. A Christmas Recital.

In this tale the critical and sceptical spirit of the age comes in prominently, and the keeping of Christmas is treated of in both the lively gossiping style and the seriously thoughtful, making it a suitable book to place on a pile of suggested Christmas presents for the coming season.

NEW NOVEL.—In crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

ALIENS AFLOAT. A Story

of the Sea. By H. E. ACRAMAN COATE, Author of "Realities of Sea Life."

"Some found in a previous book by Mr. Coate the truest story of the sailor's life since Dana's 'Two Years before the Mast.' The present novel is neither better nor less good than 'Realities of Sea Life.' It has a 'purpose' with which many of those who have what Bentham called 'no sinister interest' will sympathise."—Athenaeum.

In small crown 8vo, cloth, price 2s. 6d.

ALL CHANGE. Jottings at the Junction of the Nineteenth and Twentieth Centuries. By WILFRED WOOLLAN, M.A., LL.M., Camb.

NEW VOLUME OF FAIRY TALES.

In crown 8vo, cloth, price 6s.

FRIENDS OLD and NEW.

Twenty German Nursery and Fairy Tales. Translated into English and Retold by SOPHIE HIRCH.

"Children will find in the volume endless amusement combined with instruction."—The Baptist Times and Freeman.
"The book is so thoroughly interesting and gently refined that its mission in the nursery or schoolroom should be a very helpful one."—Dundee Advertiser.

ELLIOT STOCK, 62, PATERNOSTER ROW, LONDON, E.C.

MUDIE'S LIBRARY

(LIMITED).

SUBSCRIPTIONS for 3 Months, 6 Months, and 12 Months

CAN BE ENTERED AT ANY DATE.

THE BEST and MOST POPULAR BOOKS

of the SEASON ARE NOW in

CIRCULATION.

Prospectuses of Terms free on application.

BOOK SALE DEPARTMENT.

Many Thousand Surplus Copies of Books always ON SALE

(Second Hand). Also a large Selection of

BOOKS IN LEATHER BINDINGS

SUITABLE FOR

CHRISTMAS, NEW YEAR, BIRTHDAY, AND WEDDING PRESENTS.

30 to 34, NEW OXFORD STREET;

241, Brompton Road, S.W.; 43, Queen Victoria Street, E.C., LONDON;

And at 10-12, Barton Arcade, MANCHESTER.

The Academy

A Weekly Review of Literature and Life.

No. 1494. Established 1869.

22 December, 1900.

Price Threepence.

[Registered as a Newspaper.]

The Literary Week.

A SENSE of the petering out of the autumn season, the year, the century, sits heavily on literary chroniclers. The books on our table are very miscellaneous, and include only three new novels. There are a few war-books that look belated, even if they are not so. Three minor poets are represented in the heap, their lowly chirpings suggesting the closing-in of a twilight misty and gradual. Will the new century bring, of itself, a new inspiration in literature? It is, of course, absurd to suppose that men develop by the calendar; and yet we are so accustomed to allot to each century its literary production and qualities, that it is difficult not to think of twentieth-century literature as something that will be affected by the mere date. Our younger writers may not unprofitably feel that, in a renewed sense, the world is all before them.

PRONOUNCEMENTS on the state of society and the world at the end of the nineteenth century will be as common as blackberries during the next fortnight. Of these the gloomiest may perhaps be already found in Mr. Frederic Harrison's paper in the North American Review, entitled "Christianity at the Grave of the Nineteenth Century." The fact that Mr. Harrison compares Imperialism to a upas-tree, and raises no uncertain voice against the Boer War, will prejudice many readers against his views. But read in a broad spirit, his article is a striking statement of the case against the last quarter of the nineteenth century and the position to which that period has brought us. Mr. Harrison contends that our immediate generation "has been sinking of late to meaner ideals, to coarser ways of life, to more vulgar types of literature and art, to more open craving after wealth, and a more insolent assertion of pride and force." His article is an expansion of these clauses. After inveighing against the rampancy of wealth, vulgar luxury, and the "open sale of rank and person by those who claim to lead society and to dictate taste," Mr. Harrison says:

In such a world it is inevitable that the intellectual and æsthetic aims should become gross and materialised. The . . . least vicious symptom of this decadence is the prevalent fondness of men and women of fashion for the slang of the gutter and the slum. Popular novels, songs, and plays are composed in the jargon current among costermongers and thieves. Romance tends to vignettes of sensationalism, to the more cancerous forms of debauchery, and to prurient maunderings over sex problems. It may be true that there have been ages more vicious and brutal than our own; and, no doubt, the last years of the Victorian Epoch are no worse than the Georgian epoch of Hogarth and Fielding. That is not my argument. My contention is, that there is to-day, as compared with the middle of the present reign, a sensible debasement of tone.

It is, however, the way of the world to move strongly in one direction at a time, and the impression of gloom which Mr. Harrison's article may leave on the minds of some readers will depend on the amount of faith they put in a speedy turning of the tide.

MR. SIDNEY LEE's pamphlet, written specially for Messrs. Waller and Hollinson's revival of "Henry V.," will be an attractively prepared narrative of the play. On the first night—Saturday, the 22nd—a copy will be presented to everyone entering the Lyceum.

OMARIANS, we are told by the New York Dial, "will find their account this season in the artistic production entitled The Book of Omar and Rubāiyāt, a pictorial and literary miscellany." This miscellany contains, "among other unique features, reprints of selected addresses made at the dinners of the Omar Khayyām Club of London, facsimiles of menu and guest cards, &c." Facsimiles of menu and guest cards! How can a spark of true appreciation of Omar or of any other poet be fanned, and not extinguished, by a passion for the menu and guest cards used by his admirers in a far-off city? American enthusiasts will next import the sawdust on which the members of the Johnson Club have rested their feet on the floor of the Cheshire Cheese.

Tit-Bits commemorates the attainment of its 1,000th issue by a number consisting of forty-eight pages, the first of which is written by Sir George Newnes. Sir George credits the paper's success largely to the prize system which he adopted, and he takes occasion to state that the long-current report as to Mr. Alfred Harmsworth's official connexion with the paper is incorrect. Mr. Harmsworth was no more than a frequent contributor.

To this 1,000th number Dr. Conan Doyle contributes some entertaining particulars concerning "Sherlock Holmes." Although Dr. Doyle has himself no great opinion of detective stories, he writes: "That does not say, however, that because he (Sherlock Holmes) is dead I should not write about him again if I wanted to." Here Dr. Doyle drops a hint about posthumous papers. For ourselves, we trust that Holmes will be allowed to rest in peace.

THE work of carving the cross which is to be placed over Ruskin's grave at Coniston has begun. The cross is a free adaptation of the Ruthwell Cross, a fine Early English model, and it is of hard greenstone from the Tilberthwaite quarries. The cross is nine feet tall, and the only words inscribed on it will be Ruskin's name and the dates 1819-1900. The qualities and achievements of Ruskin will be indicated entirely by pictures, and we fear that this method is being overdone. It would take nearly half a column of our space to enumerate the carvings and their meanings. One side alone is to bear the burden of all this: "The west side, looking towards the mountains, represents his ethical and social teaching. At the bottom is the parable of the workmen receiving each his penny from the Master—'Unto this Last.' Then a design of 'Sesame and Lilies,' and, in the middle, 'Fors Clavigera,' the Angel of Fate holding the club, key, and nail, which every reader of his works will easily recognise. Over that is the 'Crown of Wild Olive,' and at the top 'St. George and the Dragon.'" All that to recognise easily!

WE have received a communication from the editor of the Lawyer complaining of our paragraph concerning the letter by Charles Lamb printed in that paper in its issue of November 30. It will be remembered that we questioned the genuineness of that letter. Our contemporary considers that we did this in "a most improper manner," and calls upon us to apologise. It is evident that our words have been taken in a sense they were not intended to bear, and therefore we willingly express our regret for any unintended offence or injury we may have given. Our contemporary does not challenge our remark that in printing this Lamb letter it did not mention its source, ownership, or history. The letter itself was one to give pause to any lover of Elia, and it was only after reading it with great care that we questioned its genuineness. In doing so our only thought was that the Lawyer had been misled. But its editor now informs us that the letter in question comes from Mr. Edward Hartley, of Spinney Oak, Addlestone, Surrey, whose wife is the daughter of Mr. Ashbery, to whom Charles Lamb wrote that communication. We need scarcely say that had we known these facts we should have written differently.

MR. ROBERT E. DELL resigned the editorship of the Review of the Week last Saturday, December 15, and wishes it to be known that he is in no way responsible for the conduct of the Review since that date.

THE proposal to commemorate in a suitable manner the great services to learning and letters of Prof. Max Müller was initiated, on November 30, by the publication in the Times of a letter signed by the Vice-Chancellor and thirteen heads of colleges and professors in the University of Oxford. In this letter it was suggested that the contemplated memorial ought to be specially associated with the University of Oxford, in the service of which the late scholar had spent half a century; and that his memory would be most appropriately perpetuated by a fund employed in promoting the study of ancient India, to which the chief efforts of his long life had been devoted. The necessary steps are being taken to raise a fund, which, after providing for some personal memorial such as a bust, relief, or portrait, should be handed over to the University of Oxford, and held in trust for the promotion of learning and research in all matters relating to the history and archaeology, the languages, literatures, and religions of ancient India. Subscriptions for the "Max Müller Memorial Fund" may be sent to the Old Bank, Oxford, or to Messrs. Barclay & Co., 1, Pall Mall East, London, S.W. Other communications on the subject of the fund should be addressed to the Hon. Secretary, Prof. A. A. Macdonell, All Souls College, Oxford.

THE Council of the Anthropological Institute proposes to establish, under the title Man, a monthly record of progress in the various branches of the study of Man. Its contents will include contributions to physical anthropology, ethnography, and psychology; the study of language, and the earlier stages of civilisation, industry, and art; and the history of social institutions and of moral and religious ideas. These various branches of study will be treated more fully, in proportion as they are less adequately provided for in existing periodicals. Classical philology and antiquities, for example, and the history of European civilisation, which have recognised organs of their own already, will be treated only from the strictly anthropological standpoint; and, conversely, prominence will be given to those other studies, such as prehistoric archaeology, and the history of non-European cultures, which (in this country, at all events) have not hitherto had a periodical record of their own. Special note will be taken, throughout, of those investigations which deal with the origins and the earlier stages of those forms of civilisation which have eventually become dominant.

How many books are sold in this country during a year? "A Man of Kent" says this week that "it is all but impossible to get at the exact facts," but that he has valuable data which enable him to put the figure at between ten and twelve millions—"nearer twelve than ten." In this estimate sixpenny reprints and second-hand books are excluded. "A Man of Kent" believes that his is the first attempt to estimate the annual sale of books, and he would be glad of the views of others. As he does not commit himself within a couple of millions, there is plenty of room for further conjecture. We should like to see an estimate of the number of unsold books in a year of publishing—correct, say, within a couple of millions.

A PARAGRAPH which we printed last year, giving what purported to be a Chinese editor's form of words for the rejection of MSS., has been beating about the world ever since. It will be remembered that this letter of rejection was full of flowers of speech, and that the rejected contributor was addressed as "Brother of the sun and moon," and told that his MS. was only rejected because it would set a standard of merit which the Emperor would require him to keep up. A Chinese correspondent, resident at Hanyang, near Hankow, has seen our paragraph. He writes as follows:

I venture to say that whoever sent you this paragraph has drawn as largely on his imagination as Dean Swift, or Oliver Goldsmith in his Citizen of the World. I have just endeavoured to translate it for the delectation of my able Chinese co-editor, but, as it contains no one Chinese phrase, and is full of idioms that are quite as outlandish to Chinese as to English ears, the only result has been his wondering query: "What nation under heaven talks rubbish like that? 'Brother of the sun and moon'! 'Rolling at thy feet'! 'Kisses the earth'! 'Both speak and live'!—how could a dead man speak? He must be alive. 'To live after speaking'—is that it? An editor anywhere in the world writing like that! Why, you must be joking, Signior!"

"How would an ordinary Chinese editor write a letter to accompany a rejected MS.?" I asked, for I have no such document in my possession.

"Oh, he would be careful not to find fault with the scholarship, as that would be an insult. He would say 'Lack of space,' or 'Not in accord with the general character of the paper,' and so on.

"Just as we should in England," I added.

There would be a little polite flourish at the first—a couple of phrases such as are stock material for all letters, amounting to "Honourable Sir." Instead of the big "I" there would be a small character, "servant"; and at the end, "ignorant junior bows." But, eliminating these formalities, the epistle would be very like one which you, Mr. Editor, yourself might send, if you are in the habit of acknowledging rejected communications.

THE poetic dedication is rarely a success. Mr. E. V. Lucas's dedication to his little book of household impressions, called Domesticities, hardly aspires to be poetic, but as a rhymed dedication it is very winning. Here it is:

In gratitude; yet with apology
For offering a book which seems to me
So very far from what it ought to be.

Because all books, I think, should manifest
Their author's self, complete, north, south, east, west;
And here so much of me seems unexpressed:

Not great (Heaven knows!) nor curiously fine,
Nor aught, may be, to help a single line,
Yet certain things more intimately mine.

Still, lacking these, I beg to give it you,—
One of the kindest friends man ever knew.
Perchance, in reading, you'll deduce a few.

ANOTHER dedication in verse, making no poetic claim, but felicitous in idea and happy in expression, is prefixed by the author of Pages from a Private Diary to his Conferences on Books and Men:

In that old spring when I was young,
At Oxford, many a song was sung,
And undergraduate friends were willing
To buy them printed for a shilling.

Our songs were all of Oxford's bliss,
Her spires, her streams, her mysteries;
Of Love, and Death, and Change, and Fate,—
As known to th' Undergraduate.

Since then full twenty years are sped,
And most are married, some are dead;
Some sit as ministers of state,
And some as priests beg at their gate.

In all, the pulses fainter beat
And will not move in metric feet;
Despatches, sermons—whatso goes
Into their brain comes out as prose.

Yet still their ink will flush to flame
If chance permits it Oxford's name;
Still have they won the meed of wit,
If Oxford reads what they have writ.

But should the Undergraduate read
O heart, then fame is fame indeed;
Th' o'ertasked, ingenious brow to smoothe
Once more, is to renew one's youth.

Then pardon, sirs, if I am bold
To offer, when the blood is cold,
Tame spirts of a parergic pen
To you, who taste both books and men.

THE North American Review, from which we have already quoted, has a destructive article by Mr. W. D. Howells on "The New Historical Romances." We do not need to tell our readers that to this novelist of character and modernity the historical novel as it is now being written and boomed is anathema. Looking round the world, Mr. Howells deploras the deaths, or silence, of the masters of the natural school, while in his own country "nothing of late has been heard but the din of arms, the horrid tumult of the swashbuckler swashing on his buckler." Mr. Howell thinks that the new historical novels are false to their periods, and, indeed, to human nature, by representing the men of old as being always willing to take human life, and to take it hideously; and by repeating such incidents until they seem the only incidents. As for the characters:

Are they characters, any of those figments which pass for such in the new historical romances? They are hardly so by any test of comparison with people we know in life or in the great fictions. They are very simple souls, whose main business is to impersonate a single propensity, and immediately or remotely to do the hero and the heroine good or harm; to show them off; to die by his hand, or to cherish a baffled ambition for hers. When they are historical figures their deportment is such as would be imaginable of the historical figures of the Eden Musée if these were called upon to leave their statuesque repose and move and speak.

Hip and thigh Mr. Howells smites the new historicals until, to relieve the reader, he exclaims:

Do I, then, wholly dislike historical fiction as impossible and deplorable? On the contrary, I like it very much in the instances which I can allege for the reasons I can give. I like Goldsmith's Vicar of Wakefield, Richardson's Pamela and Clarissa, Frances Burney's Evelina, Maria Edgeworth's Belinda, Jane Austen's Pride and Prejudice, Northanger Abbey and Emma, all of Anthony Trollope's novels and most of George Eliot's; my catholic affection for historical fiction embraces even Fielding's Tom Jones and De Foe's Roxana. These and the novels like them are what Mr. Kipling has somewhere declared the only historical novels, because, being true to the manners of their own times, they alone present a picture of the past, worthy to be called historical.

On the whole Mr. Howells seems to over-state his case. But that only vitiates it to the extent that it is over-stated. We shall rejoice when the present passion for gaudy and gory historical fiction passes away, and when the manners and characters of to-day find many novelists to record them—novelists of genius if possible, but certainly novelists as talented and vigilant and wisely slow as, say, Mr. Gissing.

THE Christmas number of the Sphere is first-rate. Its special feature is a Children's Christmas Supplement. It consists of coloured pictures for the nursery walls, the best being a reproduction of Sir Joshua Reynolds's child portrait, "The Age of Innocence." The literary contents of the number are of exceptional interest, and include a pleasing sketch by Mr. Pett Ridge called "Preserved Illusions." In the "Newsletter" we find a reproduction of a new portrait of Thackeray, identified as such by Mr. Lionel Cust and other competent judges. This portrait, painted in oils life-size, seems to have been done during Thackeray's stay in Paris fifty-five years ago. It is signed by Leonard T. Poyet, a well-known painter in his day. The probable history of the picture is sketched as follows:

The portrait is believed to have been brought to England by a French owner and to have been stored among furniture for a long time till it was eventually sold in an apparently ruined condition among some old lumber, and it thus got into the hands of a second-hand bookseller, amid whose stock it was found, hardly recognisable through the accumulations of time. A careful cleaning, however, performed as a labour of love by an artist who had moulded a bust of Thackeray a quarter of a century ago and who instantly identified it, soon brought out its beauties, and showed the background only had suffered some unimportant damage. This is the more fortunate as—while Dickens was often painted—no worthy portrait of his great rival at his best was known to exist before this very singular discovery.

THE proprietors of the Home Counties Magazine, an excellent publication, are determined to begin the new century well. A new type has been adopted, and a new cover; and among the articles promised for 1901 are the following: "London Windmills," by Mr. J. E. Waller; "Nelson and Lady Hamilton at Merton," by Mr. Percy Mundy; "Mr. Rhodes's Farm at Islington," by Mr. Richard B. Prosser, &c., &c.

DR. ROBERTSON NICOLL is such a connoisseur on all that pertains to journalism that the following remarks which he includes in some "Meditations at Pau," printed in the British Weekly, are interesting:

One great difference between our country and the Continent is that our people read newspapers and the Continental nations do not. I know that some foreign papers have enormous circulations. I know that nearly everybody reads a few scraps of news each day. But journalism on the Continent is in its initial stage. The papers, all things being allowed for, are no further than the London papers of Dr. Johnson's day. Some of them employ brilliant writers; some of them show enterprise in getting news; but not the best of them could live in London. We are at the stage when we read newspapers, but do not read books. I have observed carefully at this hotel and noticed how English and American ladies spend hours over the newspapers. I have not seen a foreign lady even glance at one. On the other hand, I have not seen a book in anyone's hands—not even a Tatchnitz.

We presume that Dr. Nicoll thinks that England has retrograded from, rather than failed to reach, the "stage when we read newspapers, but do not read books." In Johnson's day, and for that matter fifty years ago, books were in the ascendant over newspapers in this country, and the reading done then was far more muscular and availing than the reading of to-day.

THAT death-mask of a young girl who was drowned in the Seine, and taken to the Morgue, which inspired Mr. Richard Le Gallienne to write his Worshipper of the Image, has inspired Mr. Stephen Gwynn to write a striking little poem in the Pall Mall Magazine, where the death-mask is reproduced. We are tempted to quote some of Mr. Gwynn's stanzas:

That cast there, fixed against the wall—
That face, seen now the lamps are lit—
What cunning sculptor moulded it?
My friend—the cunningest of all.

Look at her hair, drawn back in bands,
Across the ears that hardly show;
One loved it when she wore it so,
Just so unruffled, till his hands—
Ah, but not dank, nor dull! It shone,
It lived; and here it falls like lead,
Yet keeps the contour of the head
His fingers loved to dwell upon.

Ay, what of him? Read in her face.
Is it betrayal that you trace?
That unresentful brow, exempt
From soil of anger or contempt,
Seems dimly touched with some divine
Compassion for a faith less fine.

Who shall divine? But if her leap
To other lands than lands of sleep
Launch her, and he may follow, where
He can confess till his life lies
Pierced through and thrilling with her eyes,
He yet may be forgiven there.

THE January number of the Antiquary will contain articles on the following subjects: "The Potters' Craft in Olden Times," with illustrations; "Notes on Roman Britain," by H. F. Haverfield; "Three Cromwell Books"; "Annals of a Country Fair," by F. J. Snell; "Gogarth Abbey," by W. H. Burnett.

Bibliographical.

My remarks last week upon the monotonous nature of the titles of so many contemporary novels have drawn from a correspondent the following observations. Speaking of one of the stories I mentioned, he says: "It may interest you to know that this book was named and re-named several times. At last '—' was chosen. Copies were actually ready and bound for subscription; then one of the wholesale people declined it on the ground that the title had been recently used. Of course, it might be said that the publisher should have found this out before, but the actual difficulty is not easily disposed of. It involves in any case the choice, on the part of an author, of a title which in many a case he dislikes, and the changing and re-changing of a title is a troublesome business."

Undoubtedly it is; but ought it to be necessary? My correspondent seems to suggest that it is the publisher's duty to see that a title has not been anticipated; but is that not quite as much the author's duty? When a publisher accepts a novel he generally accepts the title with it—unless he is exceptionally shrewd, and rejects the title either because it is familiar, or because (in any case) it would be bad. I have known instances in which publishers have again and again disapproved of suggested titles, and persevered until the author invented something better. I have known cases in which the accepted title has been excogitated by the "reader" to the firm. Male authors generally know what they mean and want in the matter of titles; the ladies are too often agreeably vague. They will send you, obligingly, half a dozen or so "to choose from."

I have at least once, if not more often, in this column, mentioned an obvious resource for novelists perturbed about titles—namely, the latest edition of Mudie's Catalogue, to which I may add the latest edition of W. H. Smith's. These supply, at any rate, the titles of the fictions which are presently in demand. And that is the great point. There is no actual intrinsic value in the title of a story which is out of print and out of vogue. The public's memory is short; the memory of librarians is not much longer. Publishers (I have always found, but I do not ask my Editor to agree with me) are, in this respect, blissfully ignorant of the A B C of their profession. You would think that it was their business, as well as that of their authors, to keep the titles of novels in their mind; but, as a matter of fact, dear Editor, they don't.

Says a contemporary: "Whence sprang that peculiar product, Gilbertian wit, if not wholly in the brain of Mr. Gilbert?" It is suggested that that writer may have owed something to Meilhac and Halévy. Mr. Gilbert admitted that he was indebted for his "Palace of Truth" to a French original, but his peculiar familiarity with topsy-turvydom is surely a personal gift. Otherwise we might trace some of it back to that old comedy, "The Antipodes," in which all the usual social conditions are represented as reversed. Does not the foreign king in Fielding's extravaganza "enter walking on his hands"? And is there not in one of Planché's comic pieces a character which seems to have suggested directly Mr. Gilbert's Pooh-Bah? "Gilbertism" is not a new thing, but none have had it in such profusion and perfection as Mr. Gilbert himself.

The announcement of Mme. Ristori's article on "The Art of Acting" in the January number of Macmillan's Magazine reminds me that we already possess in an English translation an autobiographical work by Mme. Ristori called Studies and Memoirs, published by W. H. Allen in 1876. In that book the actress does not discuss at all elaborately the principles of her art, but she devotes a chapter to the analysis of each of her most notable impersonations—Mary Stuart (Schiller), Myrrha (Alfieri), Medea (Legouvé), Phaedra (Racine), Lady Macbeth and Queen Elizabeth (Giacometti). These chapters are much on the plan of Helen Faucit's studies of Shakespeare heroines—a mélange of exposition and reminiscence.

The proposed facsimile of the First Folio of Shakespeare plays will be extremely welcome, but can it be produced at a reasonable price? Shakespeare students with limited resources have been content for a good many years back to utilise the reduced facsimile of the Folio published by Chatto & Windus in 1876, with an introduction by Mr. Halliwell-Phillips. Of course, the type in this is small, and, for all but youthful eyes, requires the aid of the magnifying glass; still it has been found eminently useful. I do not know whether it is still on Messrs. Chatto & Windus's list.

I am glad to be in a position to inform my correspondent of last week as to the authorship of the two lines he submitted—

Touched by his hand the wayside weed
Became a flower.

Longfellow, I am reminded from several quarters, wrote this concerning Burns; and by so doing he no doubt led to Mr. Watson's pronouncement on "the basest weed." The inspiration of contemporary bards can generally be traced to an original not very remote.

One of my correctors is kind enough to remark: "Your ignorance of Longfellow's tribute to Burns is pardonable. There is more in common, by the way, between the American and the Scottish bard than is apparent to those who affect nowadays to depreciate the former." Let me say that I am not among the depreciators of Longfellow, but I confess to being unable to recall to memory, at will, every line he wrote.

THE BOOKWORM.

Reviews.

Some Excluded Poets.

The Oxford Anthology. Chosen and Edited by A. Quiller-Couch. (Clarendon Press. 7s. 6d.)

THE anthology edited by Mr. Quiller-Couch, if not perfect (what anthology is?), is a very interesting compilation. Let this be said at the outset, because it is our intention to dwell especially on that portion of it which is least adequate and most open to comment. This not out of any desire to disparage the collection, but because the portion in question happens to be the most interesting to the general reader. Mr. Quiller-Couch's task has been one of great difficulty. He has set himself to cover the whole range of English poetry, from the early beginnings to the present day, including living authors, and not excluding the better-known American poets. He might have adopted the strictly representative plan. He might have elected to be frankly individual and capricious—to say: "These are my likings; take or leave, as you please." He has done neither, or rather he has done both. He has tried to be representative, classical, and at the same time to make room for his personal preferences. Now (and for the most part) you feel the pieces are there because the anthologist judges them classically the right thing—the pick of the basket. Now you feel they are there because they are the personal protégés of Mr. Quiller-Couch. The resulting gruel is not quite "thick and slab." Still, there is little fault to find in the bulk of the anthology. What it loses in absolute impeccability it gains in side-interest and freshness. We have read it with real interest, blasé though we be with anthologies. And we believe that others will do the same. Mr. Quiller-Couch, for example, has sandwiched into the seventeenth century a selection of old ballads. It is a question whether it should have been there at all, or anywhere. It is scarcely representative. But it contains, with some disputable things, specimens not usually quoted in selections from the old ballads, and so altogether delightful that for their sake much worse matters might be forgiven Mr. Quiller-Couch. And so, whenever we are disposed to curse, we remain to bless, and the anthologist is safe until—Alas! there is an "until"—until he comes to the living poets of unestablished rank. These might very well not have been included at all, and most anthologists would have shrunk from their inclusion. The courage which led Mr. Quiller-Couch to include them is so commendable, that it seems hard to criticise him for the difficulties into which he has been betrayed by that inclusion. Yet it does appear necessary to say that it was an error of judgment to include them unless his space allowed him to make a representative selection. And it is very evident that his space did not so allow him. Here, and with this, we might stop. But this is precisely the section which to the general reader will possess most interest. Therefore, we purpose to criticise Mr. Quiller-Couch's selection in some detail, and to suggest what additions are necessary to make it at all representative.

Mr. Austin Dobson, we note, is represented by two poems—scarcely adequate, to our thinking. Mr. Bridges has no less than seven pages—surely an excessive proportion, excellent though Mr. Bridges be; and the "Elegy on a Lady," perhaps his finest poem, is omitted. Mr. Wilfrid Blunt has also seven pages, to which the same remark applies; but we cannot question the selection in his case. It includes not only some of the best of his sonnets, but the one lyric in which Mr. Blunt seems to us to have succeeded.

It is scarcely a matter of taste that Mr. Henley has but three pages and three poems. Two of them ("Invictus" and "Margaritæ Sorori") are excellent; but "England, My England" is far from Mr. Henley's highest mark. Yet Lord Lytton, a poet of lesser power, is represented by a long poem. Mr. John Davidson has but two short poems, neither of which is his high-water mark. Mr. Watson has three poems: the "Ode to May" quite representative, the "Song" scarce his best, the sonnet far from showing his mastery over this form. Yet there was the fine "Autumnal Ode" to quote, not to speak of lesser lyrics.

Mr. Kipling has space enough, but the bulk of it is devoted to a long poem which might be bettered; while of the remaining two quotations one is the notorious and weak "Recessional." "Tomlinson," "Mandalay," "The English Flag"—half-a-dozen one thinks of which would show him better. Mr. Lawrence Binyon has two brief poems, which give no idea of his power. And novelists like Mr. Howells and Mr. Gilbert Parker, why are they here? Why Mr. Rolleston, Mr. Sturge Moore, Dr. Todhunter, while poets of greater parts are omitted, as we shall presently show?

Those who should surely have figured, rather than, say, Mr. Howells and Mr. Gilbert Parker, are more numerous than we can well discuss. One such, surely, is that fine poet, Mr. Stephen Phillips. For, apart from his longer poems, he has done exquisite things in the brief lyric, as this poignant example shows:

THE APPARITION.

She is not happy! It was noon;
The sun fell on my head:
And it was not an hour in which
We think upon the dead.

She is not happy! I should know
Her voice, much more her cry;
And close beside me a great rose
Had just begun to die.

She is not happy! As I walked,
Of her I was aware:
She cried out like a creature hurt,
Close by me in the air.

Mr. Arthur Symons, again, might surely have found a place. Granted the monotony of his note, it has at times extreme grace. And he can sometimes touch a more human tone, as in "Emmy":

Emmy's exquisite youth and her virginal air,
Eyes and teeth in the flash of a musical smile,
Come to me out of the past, and I see her there,
As I saw her once for a while.

Emmy's laughter rings in my ears, as bright,
Fresh and sweet as the voice of a mountain brook,
And still I hear her telling us tales that night
Out of Boccaccio's book.

There in the midst of the villainous dancing-hall,
Leaning across the table, over the beer,
While the music maddened the whirling skirts of the ball
As the midnight hour drew near;

There with the women, haggard, painted, and old,
One fresh bud in a garland withered and stale,
She, with her innocent voice and her clear eyes, told
Tale after shameless tale.

And ever the witching smile, to her face beguiled,
Paused and broadened, and broke in a ripple of fun,
And the soul of a child looked out of the eyes of a child,
Or ever the tale was done.

O my child, who wronged you first, and began
First the dance of death that you dance so well?
Soul for soul; and I think the soul of a man
Shall answer for yours in hell.

In an anthology of living poets Mme. Darmesteter would claim a place. She has tried many themes with success; but, rather than her graver style, we are tempted to quote from "The Springs of Fontana." Even an abbreviation cannot obscure its musical spontaneity :

The springs of Fontana well high on the mountain,
Out of the rock of the granite they pour,
Twenty or more ;
Ripple and runnel and freshet and fountain,
Well, happy tears, from the heart of the mountain,
Up at Fontana.

Twenty or more, and no one of the twenty
Gushes the same : here the waters abundant
Babble redundant,
Filling the vale with the bruit of their plenty ;
Here a mere ripple, a trickle, a scanty
Dew on Fontana.

Over the rocks !
Over the tree-root that tangles and blocks—
Robbing from all that resists you a sunny
Scent of the cistus and rock-hidden honey,
Yarrow, campanula, thyme, agrimony,—
Flow from Fontana !
Flow, happy waters, and gather and rally,
Rush to the plain.
Flow to the heavenly fields of Limain,
Blue as a dream in the folds of the valley,
Feed them and fatten with blossom and grain,
Springs of Fontana !

Born (who knows how ?) a mysterious fountain
Out of the stone and the dust of the mountain,
Bound to a country we know little of,
How shall I bless ye and praise ye enough,
Image of Love,
Springs of Fontana !

Mr. Frederick Myers is another writer yet living among us who does not deserve neglect in such a collection. The best of his work is in his longer poems, the "St. Paul" or the "Passing of Faith," with their imposing and flamboyant passages. Another who might well have a place (though not among actually living poets), but who finds no place in this anthology, is the late Lord de Tabley, whose best work, fine though it be, is too little known. Let us quote some portion of "Retrospect" :

With ardent cheek and earnest breath
We plighted unenduring vows ;
And bound, instead of amaranth wreath,
Deciduous roses round our brows.

Then farewell, Love, for other skies,
We laud thee now we need thee least ;
We will not be as guests who rise,
And risen, chide against the feast.

We least will ape this dotard's part,
Who sneers at Love in aspen tone ;
Who jests on his once wholesome heart,
And cheapens all who still have one.
He hardens in his selfish crust.
His bleared eyes only understand
Three things as comely—wise and lust,
And greed which guides the palsied hand.

Leave in his shrine, veiled round and sad,
The Amor of thy tender days ;
Thank Heaven that once thou couldst be glad,
Be silent if thou canst not praise.

Ah, crush not in with tainted feet ;
Is thy thought cankered, keep away ;
Tho' idols snap, and fair things fleet,
Leave one spot pure wherein to pray.

Some day, indeed, before thy last,
When all life's boughs are bare of fruit,
When mock and sneer are overpast,
And every shallow laugh is mute,

Come to this haven, and unveil
The imaged face thy youth held best ;
Kneel down before it, have thy wail,
And crawl the better to thy rest.

The terse, pregnant, and finished diction of this lifts it far beyond the level of average verse. Nor should the two Housmans be passed over. A. E. Housman, author of "A Shropshire Lad," is the more popular in his direct and simple style. Who that has read it can forget the epigrammatic close of this poem ?

"Is my team ploughing
That I was used to drive,
And hear the harness jingle,
When I was man alive ?"
"Aye, the horses trample,
The harness jingles now ;
No change though you lie under
The land you used to plough."

"Is my girl happy
That I thought hard to leave,
And has she tired of weeping
As she lies down at eve ?"

"Ay, she lies down lightly,
She lies not down to weep :
Your girl is well contented.
Be still, my lad, and sleep."

"Is my friend hearty,
Now I am thin and pine,
And has he found to sleep in
A better bed than mine ?"

"Yes, lad, I lie easy,
I lie as lads would choose ;
I cheer a dead man's sweetheart ;
Never ask me whose."

Two stanzas we have been forced to omit. The same considerations of space forbid us to quote Mr. Laurence Housman's lovely "Cupid and Christ," a strong contrast in its mystical grace and felicity. And the best of Mr. Norman Gale, or Mr. Cosmo Monkhouse—might not these, too, plead admittance ?

But our list is already too long, yet it may be not long enough. Enough has been said, we hope, to show that this section of Mr. Quiller-Couch's anthology is so gravely defective that it should never have been attempted. There are sins of inclusion, which need not have been ; while sins of omission, under the conditions of the anthology, there could scarce help but be.

De Profundis.

Pictures and Problems from London Police Courts. By Thomas Holmes. (Arnold. 10s. 6d.)

"I HAVE learned to be pitiful." That is Mr. Holmes's answer to the statement of a notable lady that women are better adapted for "rescue work" than men, because "women can see through people better than men," thereby giving the measure of her unfitness. "I can see through no one," says Mr. Holmes. "I do not want to. I am not worse than the average male, but I would not like anyone to see through me ; and quite certain am I that I would not like to rake anyone fore and aft with mental rays. Many a time I have shut my eyes that I might not see, for I have learned to be pitiful." That is the lesson which Mr. Holmes has learned in his service of many years as a police-court missionary, and that is the keynote of the book before us. It is a book which one can criticise only as one criticises Bradshaw or the Law Reports. The style is a secondary consideration. In this case it is sometimes surprisingly good for an unpractised writer, and sometimes it is bad. Its strength and its weakness will be apparent to the expert from the above quotation. But the facts overshadow the form, and Mr. Holmes has the real thing. He has been at grip with life at its lowest expression. Many men have glanced and nodded at mean streets and hooligans and drunkards and burglars. But their interest has been more or less an æsthetic one. They have not, as Mr. Holmes has done, taken the outcast to their homes, sat at meat with him, given him the best bedroom and years of steady friendship. Mr. Holmes has gone down to the depths. He has fought, like Paul at Ephesus, with wild beasts, the wild beasts of lust and drink and crime and insanity. He has known the worst of which human nature in the biggest and wickedest city in the world is capable, and this book contains only hints of the lowest inferno. And the outcome of it all is—"I have learned to be pitiful."

Pitiful; and the law is pitiless. The law, we are told, is not made to fit individual cases; but each case of crime is an individual case, and as all human beings do not possess, morally, the stock figure—to use the dressmaker's phrase—ready-made law is too often a misfit. It was a terrible misfit for poor Jane Cakebread, the demented woman whom the law treated as an habitual drunkard for thirty years or so, and over whom the papers made mercy, little suspecting the tragedy behind the comic relief. She did not drink as much in six months as an average alderman will drink at a city banquet; but a pennyworth of four ale sent her after the nearest policeman clamouring for arrest. "I have seen policemen running away," says Mr. Holmes, "and old Jane after them to be taken into custody." And after stepping out of the dock she would say: "Mr. Holmes, did you see me make the magistrate laugh?" and ask him to keep her a paper that she might read her press notice. On Clapton Common she would be found pounding up pieces of brick to a powder for her teeth, of which she was rightfully proud. A gentleman left a shilling a week at a coffee-stall so that Jane should have two cups a day. This she construed into a pound a week and a declaration of love, and the hope kept her straight for weeks. She came to the same conclusion when Mr. Holmes paid for her lodging, much to his embarrassment. The end came in Claybury Asylum. "I touched her and said: 'Jane, don't you know me?—I am Mr. Holmes.' She half-opened her eyes for a moment, and said: 'You are a liar. Mr. Holmes wouldn't leave me here.'" But for years the law could think of no better expedient than to send Jane back to gaol unto seventy times seven. It was the same with Kate Henessay, Susan Hurley, Annie Drayton, and the rest of the wild, homeless women whom the police-court missionary brought home and at least partially tamed. The legal rule of thumb, the rule of the stick, is absurdly inadequate.

What are we to do with the man, expert workman and good husband, who once in every few years of honest and lucrative labour drops into a burglary on a sudden impulse? What are we to do with the man who, with a watch in his pocket, suddenly hears a voice from the past when he was sentenced for stealing watches, and steals another so clumsily that he is caught at once? What are we to say to the man who never steals anything but boots, and has paid years of hard labour for his passion? He does not want for boots; Mr. Holmes has seen to that. But he wants them. Is there not a twist in these men's minds that cannot be straightened out by the plank bed and treated by the warder or the average prison doctor? Take the man with the passion for burglary, one of the most inexplicable of many extraordinary cases. The man was a skilled bookbinder, a little man, straight as an arrow and full of nervous energy. He appealed to Mr. Holmes for help after a "stretch" of fifteen years—and men are not given fifteen years for a first offence. "Bring drink, gambling, horse-racing, and roll them into one, and they do not equal the fascination of burglary." So he said in explanation of his conduct. He obtained help, tools, work, a house, furniture. Then the instant's temptation and more years of gaol. Once again he tried, and succeeded. "With some pounds of his own honest earnings in his pocket, with a watch and chain and plenty of good, tailor-made clothes, with a thriving business that promised him independence, with a smile on his face and a 'Good afternoon, Mr. Holmes,' he left my house and went to the suburbs and broke into a mean little house where it was impossible for him to secure portable goods to anything like the value of the money then in his own pocket." He is now dying in prison. "I am no hypocrite, but why cannot I be as your sons?" he writes. "Why there should be a power within me impelling me to do these things I don't know; but I do know that at times I am utterly unable to resist it." Gaol is no remedy for such a man, for the prospect of penal servitude is powerless against the passion that masters him. Religion is equally futile; for the man knows that theft is wrong and strives with might and main to do right. It is the business of the doctor to cure him, and so far the doctor has failed.

But this book of pity is not compact of sorrow—indeed, we may gather from it that human nature at its worst is flecked by fine impulse, and that the impenitent sinner has the making of a saint. One does not look for fine feeling among the "drunk and disorderlies" in the women's waiting-room at the police-court. Well, visiting a cell one morning, Mr. Holmes found a girl of refined appearance with the hand of death upon her. On the wall above her was freshly scrawled "Deus Misereatur." Strictly speaking, it was not God, or the Law, or even Mr. Holmes who had mercy, but a couple of coarse prostitutes, who assured Mr. Holmes: "We can look after her ourselves." Fresh from the dock these two girls went out to pawn their jackets and came back to meet the law's demands. "I watched them in the street, that cold wintry morning as the snow fell about them, two jacketless girls, one on each side of a dying one supporting her. I saw them pass into a haunt of vice, and I knew they would be faithful unto death. In less than a month's time there was a funeral from that house. . . . How had they paid for the funeral, kept their friend, and paid the doctor? By selling themselves, by hunting drunken men, and possibly by robbing them, by the help of other unfortunates, and by getting into debt. And I had no word of condemnation"—"Neither do I condemn thee." One cannot forget that Divine apology for the failure of humanity.

The question of the Hooligan has lately stirred the public mind and has engaged many pens. Sir Walter Besant has treated it in the Century, and M. Maurice Kuhn has made it the subject of an essay on "La Rue à Londres" in the Nouvelle Revue. "Comment capturer ces bataillons en armes?" asks M. Kuhn. "Comment connaître leur lieu de rassemblement? Comment les empêcher de se disperser au moindre signal et de glisser entre les mains de l'autorité?" Mr. Holmes must know much of the Hooligan who is attracting the attention of America and France, to say nothing of those immediately concerned with his loaded belt. But he says disappointingly little. What he does say, however, is quite in accord with the view of the present writer, that the boy who makes the London streets a terror is simply a boy with abounding energy and no legitimate outlet for that energy. There comes a time in the healthy boy's life when he must play hard, work hard, or hit something. For play the London slum boy has no facilities. Then comes the difficulty which the slum parent shirks. It is the neglect of parents to provide situations for their boys before they leave school which leads to mischief. "Scores of lads become criminals from this one cause. The day arrives when these lads can legally leave school, and they do it. There is nothing at home to entertain them, so they seek entertainment in the street. A few weeks' idleness, coupled with the undisciplined liberty of the street, is sufficient for the ruin of many lads." The Etou or Harrow boy, as M. Kuhn acutely observes, has his athletics; and the Hooligan looks to his leader as to the captain of football or cricket. And though Mr. Holmes suggests no definite remedy for Hooliganism—his book was completed before the public went into its periodical hysterics—it is obvious that he is not in favour of the stick.

We have picked but a few passages from a book which is very notable, since it is written on a vital subject by a man who knows. And as we have said, it is a cheering book. Coming from contact with the dregs of humanity, Mr. Helmes hopefully bids us be pitiful.

The Primrose Path of Criticism.

Conferences on Books and Men. By the Author of Pages from a Private Diary. (Smith, Elder. 6s.)

THE nameless author (nameless if not unknown) of this book of literary essays has as pretty a wit, as lucid a style, and as sound a judgment as need be asked of any contributor to a magazine. He touches his subjects with grace and discretion, leaves us pleased and smiling, and passes on. From a light essayist nothing more can be demanded.

But Mr. Be——, but the author of these Conferences, does more than that. His book is not merely entertainment; it is informing too. By some charmingly alluring excursions into literary criticism it opens the eyes of its readers, and leaves them also to seek for excellences. We do not remember, for example, a more agreeable and sound appreciation of Cowley than we have here. Mr. Swinburne has written finely of the poet; but the later critic seems to us to come nigher to the heart of him. And of Chaucer he writes with gentle enthusiasm and keen delight. For the sake of getting two birds with one stone—two critics with one quotation—we give a passage from the Conference on Chaucer, wherein some new comments of Leigh Hunt also find a place:

I have among my books a copy of Dryden's Fables with manuscript notes by Leigh Hunt. It is plain that he began to read the book with the orthodox conviction of the day, that Dryden had done an invaluable service to letters by polishing Chaucer's rough diamonds; for he explains at the beginning that an asterisk is to mark the good passages. But again and again the asterisk is supplemented by the note, "Word for word from the original," and there are many notes which at first hesitatingly and presently with emphasis record the critic's growing conviction that Chaucer has been badly served by his friend. "Dryden has omitted here a very lively and characteristic part of the picture." "These lines are a noble specimen of increasing energy—of 'building the lofty rhyme'; but Dryden has omitted a fine finishing touch of his rude original." "The original is much more natural and pathetic." "Chaucer has a fine racy line in this place." "Chaucer is more native and striking in this passage." "This pleasant satire is better and prettier in Chaucer." At last we come to the note: "A pretty, natural touch of Dryden's, quite worthy of his original!" There is a famous story of a young enthusiast telling Mr. Ruskin of a visit he had paid to Florence, and how he had seen at once all that the Master had written of the merits of Botticelli. To whom the Master replied: "At once? It took me twenty years' hard study to discover them." We now can see at a glance the merit of Chaucer's verse; let us not forget the patient labour of the critics who gave us our eyes. It may be interesting to compare a passage of Dryden with his original; for that purpose we will take a very beautiful and characteristic description of morning in the "Knight's Tale":

"The bisy lark, messenger of day,
Saluted in her song the morning gray;
And fiery Phebus riseth up so bright
That all the orient laugheth of the light.
And with his stream's drieth in the graves
The silver drops hanging on the leaves."

In Dryden's "transfusion" this became:

"The morning lark, the messenger of day,
Saluted in her song the morning gray;
And soon the sun arose with beams so bright,
That all th' horizon laugh'd to see the joyous light;
He, with his tepid rays, the rose renews,
And licks the drooping leaves and dries the dews."

The reader will not fail to note that all the spring is taken out of the lines by Dryden's change of an iambic for a trochaic movement, Chaucer having thirteen trochaic disyllables in the six lines to Dryden's six; that all the freshness is taken out of them by the substitution of "the sun" for "fiery Phebus" and "the horizon" for "the orient"; and that all the poetry is gone when for the lovely picture summoned up by Chaucer's last line we have nothing but a coarse metaphor and a dull, matter-of-fact statement.

That is good criticism, and it is a fair specimen of the methods of this appraiser, for it shows him exercising his laudable habit of not only saying a thing is good, but saying why it is so. Too many critics omit the reason for the faith that they profess.

But Mr. Be——, late Urbanus Sylvan, has more than one advantage over the majority of the critics of to-day. As well as a willingness to give his reasons, and much soundness of judgment, he has humour. His gift of irony is ample, and in the paper on the "New Criticism," where Prof. Dowden (for his Hibernicising of Hamlet), Mr. Samuel Butler (for some fantastic theories concerning the sennets of Shakespeare), and Mr. Gosse (for laying down the principle that Donne's poems have an autobiographical basis) the gift has very agreeable play. Mr. Gosse's treatment of Donne being transferred to Browning, we get such acceptable fooling as this:

The first thing to strike a new critic in the search for biographical material is Mr. Browning's curious penchant for duchesses, which is every bit as remarkable as Donne's for countesses, only Browning's were not, of course, English duchesses, who are rare birds, but the more widely spread Italian species. One of them, a Ferrarese lady, is described as his last duchess, implying, therefore, at least two predecessors, one of whom was probably the duchess that ran away from the effeminate duke with a gipsy woman, who is thus seen to have been in league with Browning, if not, as I suspect, Browning himself in disguise. From a poem called "Love among the Ruins" it would appear that they had found a very safe and picturesque trysting-place. It is, however, neither of these, but the first duchess who attracts me most. Her story is contained in a poem called "In a Gondola." She was a Venetian lady, whose brothers for some reason had a spite against Mr. Browning, and hired bravos to stab him—happily, as we know, without permanent effect.

In the same paper, by the way, there is this passage of outspokenness on a matter upon which not many persons are honest enough to tell the strict truth:

Few people, notwithstanding a literary affectation to the contrary, are really so coxcombical as to prefer old books when new are to be had. There is a gusto, an enthusiasm, with which the mind throws itself upon the new work that the old, however reverently esteemed, cannot inspire. Even shadows of the good things to come, the advertisements which form the best reading in the gazettes the few weeks before Christmas, are apt to take the taste out of the second-hand catalogues. They lie before me, Mr. Starkey's list of announcements for the year of grace 1671, in which I read:

Paradise Regain'd, a Poem in four books, to which is added Samson Agonistes. The author, John Milton, price, bound, 2s. 6d.

Will anyone contend that if at this moment, in exchange for my half-crown, the large and well-printed octavo lay crisp and clean before me, my feelings would be no livelier, if less devout, than when I take it now from its sacred tabernacle?

The Conferences are not wholly literary. Men play their part as well as books, and the account of a holiday in a Swiss health resort is by no means the least worthy of the essays. Among the other Conferences is a précis of the story of Maccenglinne, of which we fancy Mr. Yeats makes use in his Celtic Twilight, an account of the quainter entries in the black books of Lincoln's Inn, a disquisition on patriotic songs, a disquisition on Oxford wits, and the appreciation of two comparatively unknown living poets—Mr. Oliver Herford and Mr. Bowyer Nichols. Of Mr. Herford we should think more if his technique were better, but the critic does not seem to us to have said a word too much for the delicate and distinguished art of Mr. Nichols. We quote one of the epigrams chosen as illustrative by Sylvanus Urban, made upon Marie Antoinette's toilet-table in the South Kensington Museum:

This was her table, these her trim outspread
Brushes and trays and porcelain cups for red;
Here sate she while her women tired and curled
The most unhappy head in all the world.

The Conferences should find many readers; and if every one who reads Pages from a Private Diary buys a copy, they will be popular indeed.

The Anatomy of Paris.

The Life of Paris. By Richard Whiteing. (Murray. 6s.)

MR. WHITEING's book on Paris is as interesting from the merely cold and accurate point of view as it is brilliant from the purely literary point of view. Its intellectual value gives it a place apart among books of the kind. It is not the author's concern to make us feel the undying charm of Paris, for charm plays no part in his vigorous and virile style; his design is to get at the very core of Parisian life. How admirably he has achieved this will be felt by all who know Paris as well as he does. There can be no hesitation in admitting that no modern Englishman has written more wisely or more comprehensively of Paris. Here is, for instance, a novel aspect of French character, profoundly true: "The French are really the most serious and purposeful folk in the world—a great sad race too, with a pessimistic bitter for the sub-flavour of their national gaiety as it is the sub-flavour of their national absinthe." It is something of a paradox, in continuing the assertion, to depict them as "a gloomy and brooding swarm," while truth again lies in the statement that they are "ever haunted with the fear of being left behind in the race of life, their clear, keen intellect marred and thwarted by wretched nerves." And, again: "In point of temperament the men here are the women, and the women the men. The quiet, laborious, cool-headed housewife runs France."

To know a city surprisingly well is not enough to make an intimate record; but in addition to full knowledge and the faculty of trained observation, Mr. Whiteing brings to the study of Paris an intellect cool and clear, precise and logical. He takes to pieces in the first chapter the entire governmental machine and shows us carefully how each part works separately yet in perfect conjunction with the whole. He makes a very plausible apology for Napoleon's famous gift to France, its present centralised rule, the tyranny of bureaucracy and the discouragement of individualism, because, like most dispassionate observers, he sees that it works on the whole fairly well and makes for national prosperity. He is too much preoccupied with the question of racial nerves and the sky-flying of incensed blunderers and dreamers to give the consideration it deserves to the desirable project of decentralisation and the diminution of the functionary's glory. At first blush no foreigner can be brought to accept the average Frenchman's honest conviction that France is the worst governed country of the world. He looks around him and sees on all sides signs of unwonted prosperity; order, grace, a handsome spread of comfort over the lowest ranks of society. The courts of justice are free to all, and the Minister of the Interior attends with such almost superhuman interest to the minutest affairs of the provinces as well as of the capital, that one asks in amazement what the French have to complain of. This is apparently Mr. Whiteing's feeling. The institution, he tells us, is satisfactory, but he does not take into consideration the fact that this institution engenders and nourishes the very faults he complains of in the race. All the horrors of the political battle, all the atrocities of the French press spring from it. The decentralisation which young Liberal France sighs for would prove a safety valve in national wild moments. With all eyes strained towards Paris, and the tiniest administrative existence on the very verge of the frontiers dependent upon the Minister of the Interior, how is the whole country to avoid going mad whenever Paris, most wilful and excitable of witches, takes it into her perverse and charming head to run frantic for a while?

But this is merely a point of difference with Mr. Whiteing. His sentiment is natural in a foreigner content with what he sees and intellectually capable of taking the measure of French administration with all its defects and its benefits. His view is large and tolerant and wise, as appreciative and sympathetic as a strong, self-satisfied Saxon can be of a race so essentially different as the French. What could be neater and more accurate than his definition of the reason of every Frenchman's desire to have the Cross of the Legion of Honour. "To have it not is more of a reproach than to have it is a distinction." The chapter on Parisian pastimes is, perhaps, the most attractive in a work of solid value. "The French," Mr. Whiteing remarks, "have had a century's familiarity with the conception that the first duty of a community in the distribution of the blessings of life is to itself as a whole." The square gardens of London, reserved under lock and key for residents, would be impossible in Paris, for the people have too keen a consciousness of their rights to tolerate such privilege. None work harder than the French, or more cheerfully; but they must have their reward in a full and free share of all the joys art and nature offer in their land. This characteristic Mr. Whiteing notes with wit and fanciful humour: "The Paris man in the street is the heir of the ages of the most stimulating suggestions of glory and power. So fashioned, like the Athenian of old, he has naturally come to regard himself as a sort of centre of things." Here is a page which sums up his out-of-doors view which could hardly be bettered: "So the Parisian common man has his share of the Champs Elysées and of the boulevards in his freedom of access to their fountains and promenades and their bordering alleys of tender green. He comes downstairs to them, so to speak, as soon as the scavengers have done their timely work. He descends to his thoroughfare as the millionaire expects to descend to his breakfast-room or his study, with all its appointments fresh from the broom and shining in their brightness of metal and glass. So whatever the gloom of the domestic prospect, his street helps him to feel good. The beauty of the statuary, of the public buildings, is a means to the same end. For nothing the poorest of poor devils may see the glorious bronzes of the terrace garden of the Tuileries, the outdoor figures of the Luxembourg, the great horses of the Place de la Concorde, the magnificent composition of the Arch. The very lamp-post that will light his way at nightfall serves the purpose of a thing of beauty all through the day. Compare it with the English bar of cast iron, hideous to the eye in form and colour, foul with the mudstains of years of traffic. The Frenchman must have it suave and shapely in its lines, a model of good Renaissance ornament in its decorations, bronze in its material, and washed and polished every week or so to keep it smart."

The book is full of good things, not a page of it is dull or marred with cheap or hasty generalisation. One last quotation:

Montmartre is not so much as the Grub-street of Paris, for Grub-street was actually productive, and it was at least sincere. Most of these poets and painters are simply the failures of the schools, masquerading as coming men. They are put out of doors as soon as they cease to draw.

Their very wickedness is scenic, and it bears a strong family likeness to the potations from the skull in the revels of Newstead Abbey. The contemplative ratepayer looks in, drinks his glass of beer, and goes his way, thanking heaven he was not born clever. The tourist lays out a few francs in a copy of a song or a copy of a volume, and writes well-meant but misguiding letters to his native papers to say that he has been at supper with the gods.

Mr. Whiteing takes the good along with the bad in Parisian life, and is wise enough to see, for all the dissipated voices of renown, that it is the good which prevails, that industry, grace, and order here hold all the strong places.

Nurseries of the Navy.

The Cinque Ports. By Ford Madox Hueffer. Illustrated by William Hyde. (Blackwood. 63s. net.)

THE history of the Cinque Ports is of overflowing interest touching the larger issues of the national life. The men of the Ports were the first organised guardians of the English coast, fathers of the navy in a strictly accurate sense. Their subsidisation by the Crown was a stroke of admirably wise policy, and the return for the services rendered generous and appreciative. The general charter to the confederation of Edward I., which appears to have gathered together and confirmed the previous separate charters of the Ports, enacts that they "shall do to us and our heirs, kings of England, yearly their full service of fifty-seven ships, at their cost, for fifty days, at the summons of us and our heirs." In recognition of this service they were freed from all toll and custom throughout England, and, among other privileges, were granted the right of governing their internal affairs. The confederacy became a rich and jealous commonwealth, able to sustain the harryings and burnings continually inflicted by France, and to repay in kind and in ample measure. But the day of their decline came; their harbours, one by one, silted up, and from nurseries of the navy they declined into the useful obscurity of watering-places.

Mr. Hueffer has brought to his loving labour faculties not often found in combination in writers of topographical and historical books of this description. He is accurate—which was essential—particularly clear in arrangement, and a little master of atmosphere and phrase. In those who know the marsh-country covered in these pages, a sense of reminiscent delight will continually be stirred. To an intimate local knowledge is added a power of poetical appreciation which seldom fails to get at the essence of beauty either in form or suggestion. Take this, of Pett Level; the flavour is admirably caught:

It is a lotus-eating land—a land where one loses one's grip of life, to remain intensely individual. Nowhere is one so absolutely alone; but nowhere do inanimate things—the water plants and the lichens on the stiles—afford one so much company. It must not be hurried through, or it is a dull, flat stretch. But linger and saunter through it and you are caught by the heels in a moment. You will catch a malady of tranquility—a kind of idle fever that will fall on you in distant places for years after.

Mr. Hueffer has a habit which seriously detracts from the melody and grace of his prose—the use of the indefinite nominative "one." At best it is a construction to be used sparingly; here it is thick on almost every page. This is a serious and annoying defect. We can forgive Mr. Hueffer for an attitude towards our own times which seems faddishly depreciative and sometimes blind—a sensitivism too remote from actual life; we can more than forgive him for quoting from his own excellent verse, but we cannot pardon that perpetual "one." It becomes a positive offence.

Both Mr. Hueffer and the Ports are fortunate in their illustrator. Mr. Hyde's drawings, fourteen of which are reproduced in photogravure, are fine examples of the work of an artist whose poetical vision is wonderfully comprehensive and refined, whose execution is delicate and masterly. A careful examination of these plates revives our faith in black and white as a medium for landscape not yet dead; but such work as this can only be attained by the few. The drawing of Dover from the sea has a dignity and imagination, a wave-movement, wholly remarkable; those of Winchelsea, Rye, and Sandwich Flats have caught the true spirit of the places at most characteristic moments. It is, perhaps, this insight into the spirit, into the subtle meaning, of nature, which renders Mr. Hyde's work so fascinating. He interprets rather than represents. But, while according this high praise, we would suggest to Mr. Hyde that he gives us too much of storm and twilight, too little of the witchery of the sun.

Towards the close of his history Mr. Hueffer says: "If the words would come and would dance themselves into metre, one might finish it with a Ballad of Fair Ships and Goodly Havens." We hope that the ballad will not remain long unwritten, that we may "sail with La Blithe de Winchelsea and La Littel Douce de Saundwic over glassier seas into a more golden twilight." And may Mr. Hyde be moved to realise for us those stately ghosts.

Other New Books.

DANTE ALIGHIERI.

By PAGET TOYNBEE.

This excellent little volume on Dante, by one of the most competent and instructed of mediæval scholars, is primarily "addressed rather to the so-called general reader than to the serious Dante student." But the latter, too, will find it a clear, compact, and convenient summary of the whole subject. The five sections into which it is divided consist of, firstly, a study of thirteenth century Florentine politics, under the title of "Guelfs and Ghibellines"; secondly, a sketch of Dante's career at Florence; thirdly, a sketch of his wanderings in exile and posthumous rehabilitation at home; fourthly, a personal account of him, based on Villani and Boccaccio, on his portraits and on the Dante legend; finally, a brief analysis of his works. For the use made of unauthentic and doubtfully authentic stories Mr. Toynbee half apologises, holding that "the legends and traditions which hang around the name of a great personality are a not unimportant element in his biography, and may sometimes serve to place him as well as, if not better than, the more sober estimates of the serious historian." Doubtless this is as true in Dante's case as it certainly is in that of his great countryman, St. Francis. It gives colour to Mr. Toynbee's book that so far as possible he modestly interweaves into his narrative long passages from Villani, Boccaccio and even modern writers, preferring translation of what has been already well said to mere paraphrase. There are some good illustrations, but we look in vain for anything in the way of a bibliography. (Methuen. 3s. 6d.)

HOW THE GARDEN GREW.

By MAUD MARYON.

Had Miss Jekyll never cultivated the Munstead primrose; had Mrs. Earle's Surrey pleasaunce remained untilled; had Elizabeth sate not in her German garden and babbled of the Man of Wrath, this book—and many others—would have remained unwritten, and the task of wounding its author's feelings would happily never have confronted us. But here it is, in all its self-satisfied mediocrity, in all its futile imitativeness, and we must do our duty. All the ingredients are present: the garden, the packets of seeds, the trite reflections on nature and its mystery, the coynesses and archnesses of the fair writer-gardener, and the amusing Men Things who give advice and assistance. Chief of these is the Young Man. When a woman writes a book and spells Young Man with capital letters, one is prepared for the worst. The Young Man is a curate, a nicely bred, rather wistful curate, with the usual gift of conversational facetiousness (yet never wholly unmindful of his high calling). In the end he proposes to the author, and is exquisitely accepted—as curates should be. On the way to this consummation are such passages as the following, discreetly combining the practical and the reflective: “After the ground is ready, make little straight trenches about one inch deep, and thinly, because they are certain anyway to be too close, scatter in your seeds. [Now mark the transition from earth to the rarer atmosphere, the appeal from one class of reader to the other.] There for the present your work ends, and Mother Nature commences her never-ending miracle of death and resurrection. ‘Thou sowest not that body which shall be, but bare grain, it may chance of wheat or some other grain,’ and ‘that which thou sowest is not quickened except it die,’ when ‘God giveth it a body, to every seed its own body.’” So it goes on, with never a word of real gardening knowledge. And incidentally we find such words as “plantlets.” It is high time that this kind of book had a close season. (Longman. 5s. net.)

HOLBEIN'S “AMBASSADORS.” BY MARY F. S. HERVEY.

Has so elaborate, learned, and finely illustrated a monograph ever before been devoted to the elucidation of a single picture? When Holbein's “Ambassadors” first came to the National Gallery from Longford Castle, in 1890, it excited unusual popular interest, partly on account of the curious device of a death's head painted from a reflection in a curved mirror which occupies the foreground, partly because of the difficulty felt by historical scholars in identifying the two important diplomatic personages whose portraits it contains. The problem is now solved, and the whole history of the picture is fully set forth, as a result of unwearied patience and research, by Miss Hervey. The “ambassadors” are Jean de Dinteville, Seigneur of Polisy and Bailly of Troyes, and George de Selve, Bishop of Lavaur. Dinteville was French ambassador at the court of Henry VIII., and in 1533, the year in which the picture was painted, Selve was on a visit to his friend in this country. Miss Hervey's task falls into three sections. In the first she traces the history of the picture itself and of the inquiries which led to its identification. The second deals exhaustively with the careers, personal and diplomatic, of its subjects, two very interesting and typical Frenchmen of the sixteenth century. The third is an explanation of the curious wealth of detail and surrounding, much of it symbolic in character, with which Holbein has accompanied the portraits. Naturally it falls within Miss Hervey's scheme to expound the mystery of the “death's head.” There are other symbols of death in the picture, a smaller death's head in Dinteville's cap, a crucifix half concealed by a curtain in the background. Miss Hervey points out that Dinteville was, in his own words, “the most melancholy ambassador that ever was seen,” and suggests that he had taken the death's head as his characteristic emblem or “devise.” The mystification of the optical delusion thus becomes easily explicable; for according to sixteenth century fancy a “devise” should not be too obviously employed. It must not be “so plain as to be understood by all, nor so obscure as to require a sphinx to interpret.” Miss Hervey is to be congratulated upon the very valuable study of sixteenth century society which she has woven around her text. (Bell. 10s. 6d. net.)

GUINGAMOR, SIR LANVAL, TYOLET,
THE WEREWOLF.

TRANS. BY
JESSIE L. WESTON.

This is a number of Miss Weston's useful little series of “Arthurian Romances unrepresented in Malory.” The four lais—three by Marie de France, one by an unknown author—probably represent an early stage of Arthurian romance. They are short narratives, such as may have served Crétien de Troyes and others, as material to be worked up into longer verse romances. They were in all likelihood translated from the Breton, and through those elements of Celtic faery and folk-lore gradually filtered into French literature. Miss Weston has given a translation which faithfully possesses much of the spirit of the originals, has added some useful notes, and has provided a short introduction on the literary history of the lais and their relation to the Arthurian cycle. (Nutt. 2s. net.)

Fiction.

Montes the Matador, and Other Stories. By Frank Harris.
(Grant Richards. 6s.)

THE author of Elder Conklin employs in all his fiction the device of what we would call “simple narration,” a device used by Balzac and Turgenev, but not, we think, by any other great European novelist of the nineteenth century: not even, strangely enough, by de Maupassant. The user of this device may be deemed to adopt the following attitude toward his reader: “See here, I have some very curious and interesting facts to tell you, and I will relate them straightforwardly, without embroidery, and with only such explanations and descriptions as are absolutely necessary. I merely want you to get hold of the facts; indeed, you must listen to them, because they have interested me tremendously and I am sure they will interest you. Whatever you do, don't mistake me for a romancer, a concocter of stories. Now just listen, and I won't waste your time . . . There! Now, wasn't that worth hearing! True? Of course it is true: that is why I wished you to hear it.” Such an attitude and such a method, employed with skill and discretion, are enormously effective in the way of vraisemblance; and vraisemblance is esteemed by novelists the highest quality of narrative art. (It isn't—no one ever imagined that Paradise Lost was true—but that is another and a larger question.)

There are five stories in Mr. Harris's volume—two rather slight and unequal to the three larger ones—and each leaves you with the impression that the events told did actually occur. The best tale is the first one, the love-story of an old espada, told (like most of the others) in the first person. It is a sinister and powerful recital, and the bull-fighting lore comes out of the mouth of old Montes in a very natural and convincing manner. “Profit and Loss” is a tale of Kansas City—Mr. Harris's cosmopolitanism amounts almost to an affectation—and the theme is an arson committed by an employee at the instigation of his employer, the reward being the latter's daughter. The analysis of the criminal's feelings after the crime is one of the best things in the book.

. . . He realised that all efforts were in vain, that nothing could check the fire, that his work was done—completely. And then remorse came upon him; at first, with a vague sense of loss, such as one feels in missing the familiar and accustomed; later, with the full understanding of waste and destruction, as acutely keen regret. . . .

The last story, “Sonia,” is Russian, and very obviously it has been composed at the feet of Ivan Turgenev. Mr. Harris could not have gone to a better master; but nevertheless “Sonia” is only a clever imitation. The episode of the assassination of Alexander II. is here used with singular dramatic effect.

The book as a whole is capable; but Mr. Harris's careless way of writing English will prevent him from taking so high a place as he might otherwise have occupied.

Marshfield the Observer; and the Death Dance. By Egerton Castle. (Macmillan. 6s.)

ABOUT these "Studies of Life and Character" there is an old-world flavour of the early 'nineties, the Latch Key moment, the moment also of the idiotic notion that the shape of a sentence was everything, its thought—so long as it was of the latch-key order—nothing. We say this because the author of Marshfield is, in this antiquated sense, so manifestly a student of style. If not a stylist, in fact, he is in peril of being almost nothing at all. Yet surely a stylist is just what he can by no means compass it to be. Every paragraph bears witness to his limitations. Take, now, the story of "Endymion in Barracks." Dalrymple "was essentially a college-bred [!] man, and, moreover, a creature specially equipped, both by nature and self training, for the higher transcendent flights of purely intellectual life . . ." This exquisite person joined the army and learned to talk like an officer and a gentleman. Alas! Mr. Marshfield paid him a visit; and he broke out:

At last he began—no longer with the studied disjointedness, the slang of camp and mess, but with the cultured precision of wording and phrasing which had been one of the leading marks in the "Deuced Superior Set."

"Marshfield," he said, "I have that on my mind which must find voice . . . had I to tell it to the clouds, to the winds, to the rushes!" . . .

"It is a wondrous coincidence [he goes on] that you should be near me to-day; for, certes, there is no one I know at present to whom I would tell what has happened to me."

He had found, in fact, that he was growing too Superior; and that way, precedent assured him, madness lay. Therefore:

I burnt my poems, sold my books, locked my piano—nor has any one these eight years even suspected I could play aught but the vamping to a music-hall song.

Then we have a series of apparitions of the Great Joy of Man's Desire ("for when we must symbolise the Beautiful the most abstract, we must of necessity materialise it under lines of beauty the most perfect in themselves, the most harmonious in their changes"); till presently "melancholy marked Dalrymple for her own." In the end:

They found his body on the lip of the enemy's trenches; and it was said that the beauty of his dead face was such, the smile upon it so exquisite, that the very soldiers of the burying party, all hardened to their materialising task, begged to look and look again before wrapping him away in that insatiable earth that had already drunk in so much gallant blood.

All the stories are conceived and told in this exalted manner.

The Visits of Elizabeth. By Elinor Glyn. (Duckworth. 6s.)

"ADORABLE enfant terrible" is Lord Valmond's description of Elizabeth, and whoever looks at the miniature reproduced in this book and reads her droll letters will agree with him. It is a young aristocrat prattling away to its mamma that we encounter in these pages. Mamma had old-fashioned notions about an epistolary style, which were triumphantly opposed in one exquisitely ungrammatical sentence in her daughter's second letter.

Elizabeth visited Lady Cecilia at Nazeby Hall, Great-aunt Maria at Heaviland Manor, Mme. de Croixmare at her French château—but why extend the list? Enough to say that she ended by becoming engaged in November to a person who in August of the same year was "an odious young man and very rude."

It will be perceived that The Visits of Elizabeth is a novel interesting as a piece of pure presentation of what the French journalist called "big-lif." When Elizabeth writes: "I wouldn't keep a coachman with a beard, would you?" one has a flash of the patrician egoism which is the cause of Socialistic surges. For the most part she is just the human girl—an ingénue, perhaps, rather than an enfant terrible, though such ingenuousness as hers is astounding. Even Credulity, however, might be induced to slap Innocence which parades itself thus:

While we were going to the house to get our wraps, I overheard two ladies talking of Godmamma. They said she gave herself great airs, and considering that everyone knew that years ago she had been the amie of that good-looking Englishman at the Embassy, these high stilts of virtue were ridiculous. I suppose to be an amie is something wicked in French, but it doesn't sound very bad, does it, Mamma? And, whatever it is, I wonder if poor papa knew, as he was at the Embassy, and it might have been one of his friends, mightn't it? I expect she had not a moustache then.

The shadow of things not seen is a little too pronounced in the above and some other passages, but Elizabeth's letters from France are amusing in spite and because of their sub-conscious impropriety. She conquered a marquis and a vicomte there, but she would not "dream," she observes in a fit of insularity, "of marrying into a nation that eats badly, and doesn't have a bath except to be smart."

She is a minx when it comes to describing her embodied dislikes. Thus Victorine, in order to prepossess her fiancé in her favour, is credited with having "scrubbed her face with soap—I suppose to get that greasy look off—until it shines like an apple, her nose is crimson, and her eyes look like two beads."

Elizabeth has the frank insolence of seventeen; to her twenty-two spells Old Maid. Her obiter dicta enjoy the emphasis of youth. Thus she conjugates the verb "to hate": "I hate gold-plate myself; one's knife does make such slate-pencilish noises on it." "I should hate to be a priest; should not you, Mamma? You mayn't even look at anyone nice." "I should hate to be a marquis, always having to take the hostess in to dinner, no matter how old and ugly she is, just because a duke isn't present."

One would fain close on so philosophical a note. But, alas! the last sentence of the book expresses Elizabeth's gratification that as an English marchioness she will be able to "walk in front of Victorine anywhere."

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the week's Fiction are not necessarily final Reviews of a selection will follow.]

SECOND LOVE.

BY T. W. SPEIGHT.

Mr. Speight does the mystery novel rather well; he has been doing it for so long that he must by now think in terms of mystery. Here we meet a woman whose second love, after she had married him, was believed by her to be the murderer of her first husband. Of course, he wasn't. Mr. Speight makes it his business to explain matters satisfactorily. The suspected man was our old friend Rivers. (Digby, Long. 6s.)

DIAMANELEN.

BY SADI GRANT.

Diamanelen was named "after a fair, frail ancestress of the time of Charles the Second, who loved not wisely, but too well." We are introduced to a gentleman in the North of China whose name was Li Ki Foo. The book is pervaded by China and melodrama. (Digby, Long. 6s.)

WHO GOES THERE?

BY B. K. BENSON.

This is a story of a spy in the American Civil War. It is packed with adventure, vigorously narrated, and gives a vivid personal view of that great upheaval. The style is somewhat jerky and flamboyant, but the author has grip. (Macmillan. 6s.)

THE ACADEMY.

Editorial and Publishing Offices, 43, Chancery-lane.

The ACADEMY will be sent post-free, if prepaid, to every Annual Subscriber in the United Kingdom.

Price for One Issue, Threepence; postage One Halfpenny. Price for 52 issues, Thirteen Shillings; postage free.

|                                                                                |      |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------|
| Foreign Rates, for Yearly Subscriptions, prepaid (including postage) . . . . . | 17/6 |
| „ Quarterly . . . . .                                                          | 5/0  |
| „ Price for one issue . . . . .                                                | /5   |

American Agents for the ACADEMY: Brentano's, 31, Union-square, New York.

Gabriele d'Annunzio.

An Enquiry.

GABRIELE D'ANNUNZIO is thirty-six years old; he was born in a ship on the Adriatic. His childhood was sensitive, capricious, and violent. As a boy he followed the culte du Moi, and to come between him and the least of his desires was to arouse a storm of furious anger. He was always precocious, and at the age of sixteen he published some verses, Primo Vere, of which the precocity is excessive. He made a name at once. That witty critic, Marc Monnier, said of him in the Revue Suisse: "If I was one of his masters, I should give him a medal and the stick." At the University of Rome his personality excited enthusiasm; he published both prose and verse of unmistakable genius. Soon he burst upon society, and, in the double rôle of artist and rake, he dazzled and scandalised even Rome for a number of years. Then he began seriously to work. All these things are semi-officially recorded of him in print.

To-day, despite his translators, he enjoys a European fame. Few modern writers have suffered more by translation than d'Annunzio. In France, the faithful and hero-worshipping M. Hérèlle has certainly spared no effort on behalf of his idol; but one is bound to say that M. Hérèlle's conception of the translator's charter of freedom is entirely too broad. In England the austerity of taste is such that an adequate translation is impossible; the thing simply could not be done. Miss Georgina Harding has partially rendered several of the novels with brilliance; her version of Le Virgini delle Rocce is one of the very best translations of recent years; but the five translated novels are all mutilated, necessarily, and the effect is like that of a hacked statue. To translate too much, as in France, or too little, as in England, is to impair its appeal, and to translate feebly or clumsily is to nullify it. The final beauty of d'Annunzio's fiction is a beauty of form. In the research after style he began where Flaubert ceased; he performs by instinct feats which cost Flaubert such cruel labour, and Flaubert would have been the first to acknowledge the youth's pre-eminence of virtuosity.

Not often, in these latter days, do the philosopher and the stylist come together in the novelist: the "message" is usually delivered in terms careless of, or derogatory to, art, and the philosopher, while declaring that art must serve morals, is quaintly blind to the fact that art can only serve when it is respected; use it disdainfully, and it disserves. In d'Annunzio, however, the philosopher and the artist are, strange to say, well met; and this man with his keen instinct for form and beauty has also the reforming ardour of the moralist, and the sanity to keep an even balance between the two sides of himself.

The English reader of d'Annunzio, even d'Annunzio expurgated, may perhaps smile at the spectacle of the author of Il Piacere posing as a moralist. Yet indubitably he is a moralist, with a very noble moral to propound. The pity is that he happens to be, by race and by temperament, one of the least proper persons in the world to propound it. You will get the first hint of what the moral is from the fact that all his long novels are more or less about himself. Under one guise or another, he is always the hero, and, directly or indirectly, each book is an impassioned revelation of its hero. We have referred to the culte du Moi—a phrase already sufficiently victimised by the wit of England and France, especially since Maurice Barrès has contrived to make himself both ridiculous and dull, but a phrase, nevertheless, which adumbrates a superb idea. The culte du Moi is d'Annunzio's, and the whole of his production is an apologia—not, for heaven's sake! an apology—pro vita sua. Or one may say, more accurately, that the whole of his production is a statement of himself.

I know I am august,

I do not trouble my spirit to vindicate itself—be understood,

I see that the elementary laws never apologise,

(I reckon I behave no prouder than the level I plant my house by, after all).

I exist as I am, that is enough.

Whitman sang himself in fifty pages, d'Annunzio in nine volumes. To the Italian there is neither pure nor impure: there is only d'Annunzio. And so it happens that several books are devoted to aspects of the man which, to be exact, are obscene. But to d'Annunzio nothing of himself is obscene. "Here am I," he says, in effect, "the result of the operation of natural law during countless centuries. Why should I hide anything? Why should I be ashamed of anything? It is my lot to write, and I will tell you all. I will never pretend to be what I am not. My aim is to be myself." The idea is not a new one, but it has never been worked out with such ruthless and fearless logic, and such bewildering beauty, as characterise d'Annunzio's development of it. Of course the old question at once arises whether one can be more one's-self by self-indulgence or by self-command. D'Annunzio might answer, "Equally by both." But the deep Northern instinct will always answer, "By self-command." It is so that d'Annunzio answers, in The Virgins of the Rocks, that lofty aspiration to transmit his faculties to a descendant in a more efficient condition than that in which they were transmitted to him. The Virgins of the Rocks, steeped in an atmosphere of decay, is yet a profoundly moral and astringent book. It expresses the ideal of d'Annunzio the man, just as The Flame of Life (Il Fuoco), recently issued in English,* expresses the ideal of d'Annunzio the artist. The ideal of d'Annunzio the man is to give play to every natural impulse, to perfect every faculty, to develop the individuality, to mate wisely in order worthily to continue one's "stock," and to blush for nothing except affectation. Put more briefly, the moral of The Virgins of the Rocks is that man's supreme duty is to leave a son superior to himself. Love, for the sake of love, occupies a minor place in such a scheme; and it is indeed highly curious to watch the "child of pleasure" thus reverting, in his finest moments, to an exalted form of altruism.

The ideal of d'Annunzio the artist is, rightly, more egoistic. Il Fuoco is more than a revelation, it is an apotheosis of its hero, Stelio Effrena; and Stelio is more surely and completely a portrait of d'Annunzio than any other of his creations. Il Fuoco is, in fact, a gallery of portraits, for the heroine, La Foscarina, cannot but have been drawn from a renowned tragic actress; and the third great character is Richard Wagner, with no disguise whatever. Stelio Effrena is a poet of the first order, and his artistic emotions are described as only a poet of the first order could describe them. His creative vitality, his ever-burning "flame of life" is always foremost. He is continually called "The Life Giver." "To create with joy!"

* The Flame of Life. Translated by Kassandra Vivaria. (Heinemann. 6s.)

It is the attribute of Divinity! It is not possible to imagine at the summit of our spirit a more triumphal act." Here is a finished picture of the great artist's soul:

The pride; the intoxication of his hard, dogged labour; his boundless, incurbed ambition that has been forced into a field too narrow for it; his bitter intolerance of mediocrity in life; his claim to princely privileges; the dissembled craving for action by which he was propelled towards the multitude as to the prey he should prefer; the vision of great and imperious art that should be at the same time a signal of light in his hands and a weapon of subjection; his strangely imperial dreams; his insatiable need of predominance, of glory, of pleasure—rebelled tumultuously, dazzling and suffocating him in their confusion.

Observe: great and imperious art. D'Annunzio the artist demands empire. "Once more he would prove to them how, in order to obtain victory over man and circumstance, there is no other way but that of constantly feeding one's own exaltation and magnifying one's own dream of beauty or of power." It is a source of sadness to him that he cannot be Napoleon, Bismarck, and Carlyle, as well as d'Annunzio. He has the creative energy to be everything: the field is always "too narrow."

Expression, that is the necessity. The greatest vision has no value unless it be manifested and condensed in living forms. And I have everything to create. I am not pouring my substance into hereditary forms. My whole work is an invention; I cannot and will not obey other than my own instinct and the genius of my race.

It is in that phrase, "the genius of my race," that lies the secret of d'Annunzio's ultimate failure. For he must fail; with all the magnificence of his artistic endowment, the sincerity of his humanity, and the force of his moral and artistic creeds—he must fail. He believes in two things which are certain to play him false—the Latin race and his moral self. He talks of "the growing virtue of the ideals handed down by their fathers, their sovereign dignity of spirit, the indestructible power of Beauty, all the great values held as nothing by modern barbarity." Yes, yes! But modern barbarity will in the end make its own great values, and meanwhile it will crush out the Latin race. That a man of d'Annunzio's vision should have faith in "the growing virtue" of Latin ideals is pathetic. The Latin race is effete, exhausted, dying. No make-believes of a United Italy, no gorgeous activity of Universal Exhibitions, can save it from the fate of assimilation by the stronger. A race cannot have both a detached past and a future. The Latin must be content with its past. And yet here is this imperious and wondrous Unit of a decadent race talking to Europe about the future, explaining how he will "hand down" this and that, and exercise domination and enjoy glory. He will never hand down, he will never dominate, and his only glory will be that he illuminates splendidly a dissolution. He is a lovely orchid flowering over decay. He is not a moral force, and therefore he is not an artistic force (for the one must be behind the other), because there is no moral force left in the race. And so an artistic equipment almost unparalleled in the present era is doomed to spend its strength and sweetness in disguising the odours of corruption. "Be yourself!" It is a proud incitement, but its authentic value depends on what yourself is.

Things Seen.

A Half-God.

SIXTEEN years ago at school, how that name shone! Week after week, when the Illustrated London News came, we used—I and another—to tear it open at the second page and devour those garrulous notes. What wisdom, what humour, what erudition, what a memory, what an acquaintance-roll, what familiarity with Courts, what anecdote! We saturated ourselves in those "Echoes of the Week": to be able to write like that was the crown of the literary life. "Some day [I remember saying, in the Disraeli tone of 'Some day you shall hear me!'], some day I will be Sala's successor on this paper!" I meant it too. And now—. In the holidays I read everything he wrote—even The Seven Sons of Mammon (which Thackeray called "The Seven Tons of Gammon"). I read Breakfast in Bed and Dutch Pictures, and After Breakfast and Twice Round the Clock. "Almost the true Dickens" I thought it then, as Browning said of Gigadibs (perhaps Gigadibs was Sala)—nay, Heaven help me, I believe I thought it better than the true Dickens, for a very madness for this man was working; and I recollect a weary and mortifying pilgrimage to an old and not too popular uncle, undertaken entirely because the rumour circulated that he and G. A. S. had once corresponded. The thrill of seeing him (it was on the promenade at Brighton) I can still recall, though (such creatures we are!) I blush a little in doing so. He wore a white waistcoat, one eye was screwed up exactly as in the pictures, his face celebrated good dinners in both hemispheres. It was he! That was the hand—now holding a large cigar—the hand that wrote the Echoes, and the leaders in the Telegraph, and the books. I beheld George Augustus Sala, and my heart was almost too big for my waistcoat.

And now, sixteen years later, I stand in front of the window of Glaisher's in Holborn—that object-lesson in the mistaken judgment of publishers—and see a huge volume lettered The Life and Adventures of George Augustus Sala labelled at two shillings. My once hero, my once exemplar, a remaiuder! And as I walk away I know that of all the busy hands that have driven a pen since literature began none has possessed a style which I would repudiate for my own so energetically and absolutely as that of G. A. S.

There is something passionate, Lowell wrote, in the recoil of the young man from the idol of the boy. Yes, and there is something very sad in the position of the idol when the devotee neglects him—a side of the question that rebellious devotees too seldom meditate upon.

Gipsies.

THE river was deserted, save by a few pensive fishermen in moored punts. Yet the December Thames had a charm hardly less magical than August's—a charm which instilled into the heart a spirit of quietness, of austere restfulness. The afternoon was warm, the sky clear, the ripples dancing with gold; only I and the swans moved upon the water.

As I pulled upstream between Hampton and Sunbury I saw, on the right bank, the glimmer of a fire against the black mouth of a gipsy tent; above it the smoke curled blue. Round about the fire figures moved, and a red bodice made a vivid splash of colour. A sudden impulse made me run the boat inshore. I landed, to find friends whom I had last seen encamped on a wild Surrey common.

Tea was in preparation, and I was invited to share it. The master was polite, but silent, the wife voluble and embarrassingly hospitable. She of the red bodice, the eldest girl, stood at the tent entrance in an attitude of statuesque repose; her unbound hair, swept back from the wide brows, fell to her waist. In her the true eastern blood was manifest; it spoke in her colour, her poise of body, her untamed eyes, in her power of self abstraction, in her absolute unconcern. She watched the flow of the darkening river as though only it and she existed. So far as I observed, she only glanced at me once during the hour I remained; in all that time she did not speak a word. The other children laughed and scrambled at her feet, but she retained her absolute and impenetrable repose.

As I dropped down the river in the twilight I felt that I was turning my back upon a mystery. In that single figure I recognised all the glamour of the East, and there moved before me a sorrowful but most majestic vision of the world's wanderers.

A Paradox on Art.

Is it not part of the pedantry of letters to limit the word art, a little narrowly, to certain manifestations only of the artistic spirit, or, at all events, to set up a comparative estimate of the values of the several arts, a little unnecessarily? Literature, painting, sculpture, music, these we admit as art, and the persons who work in them as artists; but dancing, for instance, in which the performer is at once creator and interpreter, and those methods of interpretation, such as the playing of musical instruments, or the conducting of an orchestra, or acting, have we scrupulously considered the degree to which these also are art, and their executants, in a strict sense, artists?

If we may be allowed to look upon art as something essentially independent of its material, however dependent upon its own material each art may be, in a secondary sense, it will scarcely be logical to contend that the motionless and permanent creation of the sculptor in marble is, as art, more perfect than the same sculptor's modelling in snow, which, motionless one moment, melts the next, or than the dancer's harmonious succession of movements which we have not even time to realise individually before one is succeeded by another, and the whole has vanished from before our eyes. Art is the creation of beauty in form, visible or audible, and the artist is the creator of beauty in visible or audible form. But beauty is infinitely various, and as truly beauty in the voice of Sarah Bernhardt or the silence of Duse as in a face painted by Leonardo or a poem written by Blake. A dance, performed faultlessly and by a dancer of temperment, is as beautiful, in its own way, as a performance on the violin by Ysaye or the effect of an orchestra conducted by Mottl. In each case the beauty is different, but, once we have really attained beauty, there can be no question of superiority. Beauty is always equally beautiful; the degrees exist only when we have not yet attained beauty.

And thus the old prejudice against the artist to whom interpretation is his own special form of creation is really based upon a misunderstanding. Take the art of music. Bach writes a composition for the violin: that composition exists, in the abstract, the moment it is written down upon paper, but, even to those trained musicians who are able to read at sight, it exists in a state at best but half alive; to all the rest of the world it is silent. Ysaye plays it on his violin, and the thing begins to breathe, has found a voice perhaps more exquisite than the sound which Bach heard in his brain when he wrote down the notes. Take the violin out of Ysaye's hands, and put it into the hands of the first violin in the orchestra behind him; every note will be the same, every interval may be the same, the same general scheme of expression may be followed, but the thing that we shall hear will be another thing, just as much Bach, perhaps, but, because Ysaye is wanting, not the work of art, the creation, to which we have just listened.

That such art should be fragile, evanescent, leaving only a memory which can never be realised again, is as pathetic and as natural as that a beautiful woman should die young. To the actor, the dancer, the same fate is reserved. They work for the instant, and for the memory of the living, with a supremely prodigal magnanimity. Old people tell us that they have seen Desclée, Taglion; soon, no one will be old enough to remember those great artists. Then, if their renown becomes a matter of charity, of credulity, if you will, it will be but equal with the renown of all those poets and painters who are only names to us, or whose masterpieces have perished.

Beauty is infinitely various, always equally beautiful, and can never be repeated. Gautier, in a famous poem, has wisely praised the artist who works in durable material:

Oui, l'œuvre sort plus belle D'une forme au travail
Rebelle,
Vers, marbre, onyx, émail.

No, not more beautiful; only more lasting.

Tout passe. L'art robuste
Seul a l'éternité.
Le buste
Survit à la cité.

Well, after all, is there not, to one who regards it curiously, a certain selfishness, even, in this desire to perpetuate oneself or the work of one's hands; as the most austere saints have found selfishness at the root of the soul's too conscious, or too exclusive, longing after eternal life? To have created beauty for an instant is to have achieved an equal result in art with one who has created beauty which will last many thousands of years. Art is concerned only with accomplishment, not with duration. The rest is a question partly of vanity, partly of business. An artist to whom posterity means anything very definite, and the admiration of those who will live after him can seem to promise much warmth in the grave, may indeed refuse to waste his time, as it seems to him, over temporary successes. Or he may shrink from the continuing ardour of one to whom art has to be made over again with the same energy, the same sureness, every time that he acts on the stage or draws music out of his instrument. One may indeed be listless enough to prefer to have finished one's work, and to be able to point to it, as it stands on its pedestal, or comes to meet all the world, with the democratic freedom of the book. All that is a natural feeling in the artist, but it has nothing to do with art. Art has to do only with the creation of beauty, whether it be in words, or sounds, or colour, or outline, or rhythmical movement; and the man who writes music is no more truly an artist than the man who plays that music, the poet who composes rhythms in words no more truly an artist than the dancer who composes rhythms with the body, than the painter is to be preferred to the sculptor, or the musician to the poet, in those forms of art which we have agreed to recognise as of equal value.

ARTHUR SYMONS.

Correspondence.

"An Englishwoman's Love-Letters."

SIR,—Referring to the recent correspondence on this book in your columns, the "problem" presented by "An Englishwoman's Love-Letters" is briefly this: Can the situation revealed by the letters have arisen, and both lovers still be blameless? As an affirmative answer to this question I concluded "Theta's" suggestion wide of the mark, and hence am the more surprised to find it apparently approved by the "Editor" of the letters. One cannot understand why the relationship for which "Theta" contends should be thought so "terrible" in its nature that it unconditionally imposes silence on the man's lips. Why should he keep silent so persistently? Surely not because of false delicacy or through fear of conventionality where so full and complete a woman as the writer of these letters was concerned? Nor could it be respect for his mother, for she died before his lover. Then why? Far better for him to confess the truth than for his lover to die through a slow torture of perplexity! "Theta's" suggestion hardly reduces the blame attaching to the man's conduct one whit, and leaves his motive undetermined.

The letters imply that both parties were blameless. I hold that no conceivable motive can justify the man's refusal to give his reasons for breaking off the engagement, and allowing his lover to die in the tortures of perplexity; and think that in declaring both parties to be blameless the author's ethics are at fault. Further, with the characters revealed in the letters such a situation was psychically impossible (here I am in agreement with "Phi"); and, even if it had been possible, some inkling of the man's motive must have been suggested to his lover, and, deepening into certainty, dispelled her perplexity.

In these respects the author's ethics and psychology are questionable; but, in spite of that, the "problem" presented by the letters is amazingly interesting, and they form one of the most delightful human documents I have read for long. So ("Phi's" sensational screech notwithstanding) the author has my blessing—"thanks" is not the word.—I am, &c., H. H.

"The Blue Boy."

SIR,—Will you allow me space for a reply to the letter signed "Audax" in your issue of last week, with reference to Gainsborough's celebrated picture—or pictures? I believe that I am in possession of all the known facts. What we want is for someone to discover new facts. Having had access to the Nesbitt family papers, and having seen the "Blue Boy" now in Mr. George Hearn's possession in New York, as well as that at Grosvenor House, I claim to know something about the matter.

It seems not quite certain whether Gainsborough's model was or was not "Master Buttall," the son of an ironmonger in Soho. There is good reason for doubting the assertion, which apparently rests on Young's catalogue of the 1820 sale, published half a century after the picture was exhibited in the Royal Academy.

The present owner is not a banker, but a successful merchant in New York, who has filled his house with art treasures of all descriptions.

It is quite possible that the picture in Grosvenor House is a copy by Hoppner, as suggested by "Audax," or that it is a replica by Gainsborough. It may even be the original. In the latter case, the Prince of Wales's "Blue Boy" was Gainsborough's replica. It is certainly an original picture, and not a copy by another painter, and Gainsborough's own nephew, Lane, pronounced it to be the finer of the two in every way.

It is possible, therefore, that there were two "Blue Boys" painted before 1788, the date of Gainsborough's death.

Now, the points of interest still remaining to be cleared up are these:

1. When did the Prince of Wales give his "Blue Boy" to John Nesbitt?
2. When did the Prince first become possessed of it?
3. In whose possession was the other "Blue Boy" between 1770 and October, 1802; or between the date of the Royal Academy exhibition and the date when Hoppner sold to Lord Grosvenor the picture now in the possession of the Duke of Westminster?

If your readers care to continue the subject, I can give you a summary of all the known facts, which will, I think, leave no doubt in the mind of any unbiassed critic that, whether the Duke's picture is an original or a copy, Mr. Hearn's is certainly the very picture which the Prince of Wales gave to Nesbitt in some year prior to 1802.—I am, &c.,

BUSCADOR.

Our Weekly Competition.

Result of No. 65 (New Series).

The terms of our Competition last week ran as follows: "We offer a prize of One Guinea for a list of the ten books written in English in the nineteenth century which no English home should be without. We exclude encyclopedias, and works of reference generally. The best list will be identified by plebiscite."

An examination of the 60 lists sent in shows that in the united judgment of our competitors the following are the ten English books published in the nineteenth century that no English home should be without:—

| TITLE.                                  | VOTES. |
|-----------------------------------------|--------|
| Thackeray's Vanity Fair .....    | 36     |
| Dickens's Pickwick Papers .....  | 34     |
| Darwin's Origin of Species ..... | 34     |
| Tennyson's In Memoriam .....     | 31     |
| Carlyle's Sartor Resartus .....  | 31     |
| Scott's Waverley .....           | 23     |
| Ruskin's Modern Painters .....   | 22     |
| Lamb's Essays of Elia .....      | 20     |
| George Eliot's Adam Bede .....   | 19     |
| Macaulay's Essays .....          | 19     |

This list strikes us as equally surprising and unsurprising. That Vanity Fair should head the list seems almost a reproach; but this does not prove that any one of our competitors would have placed it there. As a matter of fact, three competitors do place Thackeray's masterpiece at the head of their lists.

Two competitors have sent lists agreeing with the plebiscite list in the proportion of eight to ten. They are: Miss C. C. Bell, Epworth, Doncaster, and Miss E. M. Smith, 7, Gordon Street, W.C. Cheques for half-a-guinea have accordingly been sent to these competitors.

Miss Bell's list is as follows:

The Pickwick Papers.
Vanity Fair.
In Memoriam.
Sartor Resartus.
Waverley.
Modern Painters.
The Essays of Elia.
Emerson's Essays.
The Origin of Species.
Uncle Tom's Cabin.

Miss Smith's list is as follows:

Essays of Elia.
Waverley.
Wordsworth's Poems.
Sartor Resartus.
Vanity Fair.
Pickwick.
Modern Painters.
In Memoriam.
Adam Bede.
Treasure Island.

On the whole, the plebiscite list surprises us the more we look into it. Why should Modern Painters be in every English home? We approve of Elia's Essays, and Macaulay's; the one is a library of sentiment and the other of fact, and both are consummate in their way. It is suggestive that the nearest approach to a book founded on religious faith is In Memoriam. Why Adam Bede? Why not Browning's Poems, Alice in Wonderland, and The Ordeal of Richard Feverel? Why not—? But space forbids. Among books which failed of inclusion in the plebiscite list are these:

| TITLE.                                                    | VOTES. |
|-----------------------------------------------------------|--------|
| Greene's Short History of the English People ..... | 18     |
| Ivanhoe .....                                      | 17     |
| Tennyson's Poems .....                             | 17     |
| David Copperfield .....                                   | 16     |
| Emerson's Essays .....                             | 14     |
| Wordsworth's Poems ..                              | 12     |
| Carlyle's French Revolution .....                  | 11     |
| Sesame and Lilies .....                                   | 9      |
| Wordsworth's Excursion ..                          | 8      |
| Alice in Wonderland .....                          | 6      |
| Lyrical Ballads .....                              | 5      |
| Macaulay's History of England .....                | 5      |
| Idylls of the King .....                           | 5      |

We regret that pressure on our space makes it impossible to acknowledge the unsuccessful competitions.

Competition No. 66 (New Series).

WE offer a prize of One Guinea for the best Sonnet on the passing of the Nineteenth Century and the advent of the Twentieth Century.

RULES.

Answers, addressed "Literary Competition, THE ACADEMY, 43, Chancery-lane, W.C.," must reach us not later than the first post of Thursday, December 27. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found on the second page of Wrapper, or it cannot enter into competition. Competitors sending more than one attempt at solution must accompany each attempt with a separate coupon; otherwise the first only will be considered.

THE SPHERE

Christmas-Week Number.

If you have not seen the last week's issue of THE SPHERE be sure and order it of your Bookseller. It will prove an unqualified delight to you and to your family. The Coloured Plates are Nine in Number:

1. THE SNOWBALL, by F. Newton-Shepard.
2. CHRISTMAS EVE, by Cecil Aldin.
3. CHRISTMAS MORNING, by Cecil Aldin.
4. THE ARRIVAL OF FATHER CHRISTMAS, by Cecil Aldin.
5. THE CHRISTMAS TREE, by F. Newton-Shepard.
6. LITTLE RED RIDING HOOD, by Tom Browne.

AND

7. Sir Joshua Reynolds's great Picture,
"THE AGE OF INNOCENCE," beautifully printed in many colours.

In addition to these there are other pictures for the Children :

LITTLE SNOW-WHITE, by AMELIA BAUERLE.

THE BABES IN THE WOOD, by JOHN HASSALL.

THE GOOSE THAT LAID THE GOLDEN EGGS, by DUDLEY HARDY.

THE INFANT IMPERIALISTS, by CHARLES ROBINSON.

THE LAST CHRISTMAS OF THE CENTURY, by PERCY HOME.

LITERARY CONTRIBUTIONS:

THE LOST PYX, by Thomas Hardy.

TOM SLEIGHT'S WIFE, by Jerome K. Jerome.

PRESERVED ILLUSIONS, by W. Pett Ridge.

SANTA CLAUS, by Adrian Ross.

THE SUMS THAT CAME RIGHT: a Children's Story, by E. Nesbit.

THE MOST BEAUTIFUL AND SEASONABLE CHRISTMAS NUMBER EVER ISSUED.

THE DAILY MAIL says:—"The Christmas Number of THE SPHERE is entitled to be ranked among the best of the Season's productions."

THE DAILY CHRONICLE says:—"THE SPHERE this week is a very attractive Double Number, with charming Coloured Christmas Supplements."

THE DAILY EXPRESS says:—"The Christmas Supplement to THE SPHERE marks a departure in illustrated weekly journalism."

THE WESTMINSTER GAZETTE says:—"Will be amongst the most popular that have appeared this year."

THE DAILY NEWS says:—"The Christmas Number of THE SPHERE will be highly acceptable to everybody, especially to the children, who have a charming supplement all to themselves."

THE MORNING POST says:—"The number is one to buy, for it is the best Christmas number of the year."

.. NEW BOOKS ..

At 5s.

THE MAGIC MIST,

And other Dartmoor Legends.

By EVA C. ROGERS.
Profusely Illustrated by C. Eldred and P. B. Hickling.
Imp. 16mo, cloth boards, gilt edges.

FOURTH EDITION. 20th Thousand (in the Press).

FIELD - MARSHAL

LORD ROBERTS V.C., K.P., G.C.B.

A Biographical Sketch.

By HORACE G. GROSER,
Author of "The Kingdom of Manhood," &c.
Price 1s. net."An accurate and interesting account of a crowded career."
Indica Review.
"It has reached a third edition, a good fortune which it well deserves."—Literature."Yet another edition of this excellent little biography."
Bookman."Written with great care and considerable literary effect."
Outlook.

JOHN RUSKIN

A Biographical Sketch.

By R. ED. PENGELLY.

With a Reproduction from a Water-Colour Portrait by the subject of the Sketch, and with Original and hitherto Unpublished Letters. Price 1s. net.

"Leaves upon the mind of the reader the impression of a faithful portrait."—Spectator."This workmanlike sketch... a bit of honest work, neatly done."—Christian Leader."A good popular sketch, and written with good taste."
Literature.

At 3s. 6d.

FROM THE SCOURGE
OF THE TONGUE.By BESSIE MARCHANT (Mrs. J. A. COMFORT).
Imp. 16mo, cloth, bevelled boards, gilt top.
"This is a very good book. It is not without its sensation and mystery and romance; but it has a great moral purpose."
Methodist Recorder.

WESTWARD HO!

By CHARLES KINGSLEY.

Illustrated by Aytton Symington.

Imp. 16mo, cloth, bevelled boards, gilt top.

At 2s. 6d.

BARFIELD'S BLAZER,
And other School Stories.By W. E. CULE. Illustrated.
"A capital collection of humorous school stories. There is not one of them that will not provoke a hearty laugh... even on the part of adults who take up the volume."—Standard.

.. BOOKS FOR THE HEART ..

Edited, and with an Introduction, by

ALEXANDER SMELLIE, M.A.

Fcap. 8vo, printed on antique wove paper, cloth boards, gilt top. Price 2s. 6d. each volume.

NEW VOLUME.

THE HEIDELBERG
CATECHISM.

A NEW TRANSLATION.

Uniform with "Books for the Heart."

QUIET HOURS.

SECOND SERIES.

By JOHN PULSFORD, D.D. Price 2s. 6d.
"More luminous, more spiritual, more suggestive pages than these it would not be easy to find."—Examiner.
"A peculiarly attractive edition of a peculiarly fascinating book."—*Expository Times.*THE SUPREMACY OF MAN.

By JOHN PULSFORD, D.D.

Author of "Quiet Hours," &amp;c. Price 2s. 6d.

"This is an able book, and will repay study."—Spectator.
"We have found Dr. Pulsford's terse, inspiring and illuminative, and they will be really so to others a doubt. Some books help us more by their spirit than by anything which can be quoted or referred to: this is one of them."—Church Times.
"Thoughtful readers will treat this book as one of devotion, and will return to it again and again for inspiration and help."
Huddersfield Examiner.

At 2s.

SECOND EDITION.

THE SCHOOL'S HONOUR

And other Stories.

By HAROLD AVERY.

New and Enlarged Edition. Illustrated.

SPORTS FOR BOYS.

AN OUTDOOR SERIES.

By HOWARD SPICER, and others.

Illustrated. Price 1s. net.

SPORTS FOR GIRLS

AN OUTDOOR SERIES.

Arranged and Edited by HOWARD SPICER, Editor of "Sunday's Magazine of Physical Culture," "Sports Library," &amp;c. Illustrated. 1s. net.

16, PILGRIM STREET, LONDON, E.C.

DIGBY, LONG & CO.'S
NEW SIX-SHILLING NOVELS.

RICHARD MARSH'S NEW BOOK.

AN ARISTOCRATIC DETECTIVE.

By the Author of "The Beetle," "Frivolities," "The Chase of the Ruby," &amp;c. With Frontispiece by Harold Piffard. Pictorial cloth, 8s. Second Edition.

MAY CROMMELIN'S NEW BOOK.

THE VEREKER FAMILY. By the Author of "Civil-May-Care," &amp;c. With Frontispiece.

"Scotsman."—"The author's style is always sprightly and her tales interesting. Her short stories are quite as good as her full-length novels."

SHYLOCK of the RIVER. By

FERGUS HUME, Author of "The Mystery of a Hansom Cab," &amp;c. Pictorial cloth. [Just out.]

KATE CAMERON of BRUX. By

J. E. MUDDOCK, Author of "In the King's Favour," &amp;c. With Frontispiece by Harold Piffard.

SECOND LOVE. By T. W. Speight,

Author of "The Chains of Circumstance." [Just out.]

LE VOLEURS NEW NOVEL.

THE CHAMINGTON MYSTERY. By

the Author of "For Love of a Redoubt Maid," "By Order of the Brotherhood," "In the Czar's Dominions," &amp;c. With Frontispiece.

G. BERESFORD FITZGERALD'S NEW NOVEL.

THE MINOR CANON. By the Author of "The Stigma," &amp;c. [Just out.]

MANY DAYS AFTER. By C. Howell.

Literary World—"The story is well written."Standard—"The book is well written."

A BRIDGE of GLASS.

By F. W. ROBINSON, Author of "Anne Judge, Spinster."

Daily Telegraph—"An excellent novel... Written in a clever attractive style, which holds the reader enchained to the end."

NEW POLISH NOVEL BY MICHAEL CZAJKOWSKI.

THE BLACK PILGRIM. Translated by S. C. DESOISSONS. With Portrait of Author.

Liverpool Mercury—"A tale of love and jealousy, exciting in the last degree, and as full of highly-coloured romance as a novel can well be."

London: Digby, Long &amp; Co., 18, Boulevard St., E.C.

BLACKWOOD'S MAGAZINE.

No. 1021. — JANUARY, 1901. — 2s. 6d.

MAROONED. By "LINESMAN." — THROUGH DRY PLACES SEEKING REST. — THE FOIBLE OF COMPARATIVE LITERATURE. — FIFTEEN HUNDRED MILES ON FRESH WATER. By C. HANBURY WILLIAMS. — THE ENGLISH IN CHINA. — DOOM CASTLE: A ROMANCE. By NEIL MUNRO. CHAINS. XIII. XV. — THE HOUSE OF COMMONS, PAST AND PRESENT — MUSINGS WITHOUT METHOD: A BIOGRAPHY. — THE VALUE OF PRIDE. — THE BOISM OF PEYS AND MONTAIGNE. — ARDUR RABMAN — HIS ADVENTUROUS LIFE. — GIBSON, THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF THOUGHT. — THE ART OF CRITICISM — MORE PROBLEMS OF RAILWAY MANAGEMENT. — MY WISH. — THE LAST SESSION OF THE CENTURY.

WILLIAM BLACKWOOD &amp; SONS, EDINBURGH AND LONDON.

THE NORTHERN COUNTIES
MAGAZINE.

Edited by HOWARD PEASE.

JANUARY NUMBER NOW READY.

PRINCIPAL CONTENTS.

FAMOUS NORTHERN REGIMENTS. — I. The King's (Liverpool Regiment). By WALTER WOOD. MEDIEVAL FRENCH ART at the PARIS EXHIBITION. By R. L. FRO.

A LOST THREAD. By Mrs. HUGH BELL.

SOME CHEVIOT BURNS. By F. ANDERSON GRAHAM.

GEORDIE: a North Country Sketch. By RICHARD BAGOT.

TALES and LEGENDS of the NORTH. By WILFRID WILSON, Gibson.

LONDON LITERARY LETTER. By E. V. LUCAS.

NORTH COUNTRY CHRONICLE.

Illustrated. Price 6d.

London: ELLIOT STOCK, 62, Paternoster Row, E.C.
Newcastle-on-Tyne: ANDREW REID & CO., LTD.THE RELIGIOUS TRACT SOCIETY INCORPORATED.

THE PILGRIM FATHERS.

HOMES and HAUNTS of. Letterpress by ALEXANDER MACKENNAL, D.D., &amp;c. Profusely Illustrated from Original Drawings by Charles Whymper, and Photographs. A handsome book printed on art paper. With Coloured Frontispiece, and bound in a handsome cloth binding, 30s. net.

PIONEERING on the CONGO. By the Rev. W. HOLMAN BENTLEY. With a Map and 206 Illustrations from Sketches, Photographs, &amp;c. 2 vols., demy 8vo, cloth gilt and gilt top, 10s. net.

WALKS in PALESTINE. By the late HENRY A. HARPER. Illustrated by 16 Photographs from Photographs taken by Cecil V. Shadbolt. Crown 4to, gilt edges, 10s. 6d.

THE HANDWRITING of the KINGS and QUEENS of ENGLAND. By W. J. HARDY, F.R.S.A. With Reproductions of the Autographs, and many Letters of all the Sovereigns from Edward the Black Prince to the Present Time. Imperial 8vo, 10s. 6d., cloth boards, gilt edges.

HENRY MARTYN, SAINT and

SCHOLAR. First Modern Missionary to the Mohammedans, 1781-1812. By GEORGE SMITH, C.I.E., LL.D., Author of "Life of William Carey," "Life of Alexander Duff," &amp;c. With Portrait and Illustrations. 10s. 6d., cloth.

SOUTHERN CHINA, PICTURES

of. By Rev. J. MACGOWAN, of the London Mission, Amoy. With 77 Illustrations. 8vo, 10s. 6d., cloth, gilt top.

RAMBLES in JAPAN: the Land

of the Rising Sun. By Rev. Canon TRISTRAM, D.D., LL.D., Author of "The Land of Moab," "The Natural History of the Bible," &amp;c. With many Illustrations by Edward Whymper, from Photographs and Sketches. 8vo, 10s. 6d., cloth, gilt top.

THE ROYAL OBSERVATORY,

GREENWICH: a Glance at its History and Work. By E. WALTER MAUNDER, F.R.A.S., Assistant at the Observatory. With many Illustrations from Original Photographs. Large crown 8vo, cloth gilt, gilt edges, 5s.

THE MIDNIGHT SKY: Familiar

Notes on the Stars and Planets. By EDWIN DUNKIN, F.R.S., F.R.A.S., Past-President of the Royal Astronomical Society, late Chief Assistant at the Royal Observatory, Greenwich. With 32 Star-Maps, and numerous other Illustrations. New and thoroughly Revised Edition, with an additional Chapter and many New Engravings. Imperial 8vo, 8s., cloth boards, gilt top.

From ALDERSHOT to PRETORIA

a Story of Christian Work among our Troops in South Africa. By Rev. W. E. SELLERS. Illustrated. Large crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 2s. 6d.

WITH OUR SOLDIERS at the FRONT, or, Conflict and Victory in South Africa. By HENRY JOHNSON. With 15 Illustrations. Large crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 2s. 6d.

THE LEISURE HOUR ANNUAL

for 1900. 1,100 pages, with many Illustrations. A handsome Book for Presentation. Containing long Stories by Sir WALTER BESANT and LOUIS BECKE. 7s. 6d., in cloth boards.

The SUNDAY at HOME ANNUAL

for 1900. Interesting Sabbath Reading for every Member of the Family. Profusely Illustrated by Coloured and Wood Engravings, including 6 of Tissot's New Testament Pictures. 7s. 6d., in cloth boards.

THE BOY'S OWN ANNUAL for

1900. 832 pages. With many Illustrations, including 11 Coloured or Tinted. Stories by W. CLARK RUSSELL, JULIUS VERNE, G. A. HENTY, G. MUNVILLE FENN, DAVID KER, Dr. A. N. MALLAN, and many other Writers for Boys. 8s., in cloth.

THE GIRL'S OWN ANNUAL for

1900. 832 pages. Profusely Illustrated. Stories by ROSA NOUCHETTE CARY, Mrs. G. DE HORNE VAISSEY, LESLIE KEITH, SARAH DOUDNEY, and many other Writers. 8s., in cloth.

THE RELIGIOUS TRACT SOCIETY,
INCORPORATED.

36, PATERNOSTER ROW, LONDON.

The Academy

A Weekly Review of Literature and Life.

No. 1495. Established 1869.

29 December, 1900.

Price Threepence.

[Registered as a Newspaper.]

The Literary Week.

WE are glad to be able to print in this issue of the ACADEMY a striking poem by Mr. Francis Thompson, entitled "The Nineteenth Century." Mr. Thompson's long silence has been much regretted by those who love his poetry, and who place it very high among the gifts of the Nineteenth to the Twentieth Century. Our hope, nevertheless, is that Mr. Thompson has been his own herald, and that the pageant of his verse, so finely begun, will move to greater conquests.

In a recent number we commented on the New York Outlook's lists of the most influential books of the Nineteenth Century. Such lists will, no doubt, be diligently compiled, and from points of view as varied as they are numerous. Mr. Shorter, in the Sphere, answers the question: "What are the greatest names that imaginative literature has given to the world during the period?" as follows:

Byron.
Goethe.
Scott.
Balzac.
Turgeneff.

As the six most influential books he names:

Byron's Childe Harold.
Scott's Waverley.
Heine's Buch der Leiden.
Balzac's Père Goriot.
Carlyle's Sartor Resartus.
Turgeneff's Virgin Soil.

Of these it is difficult to understand why Père Goriot was particularly selected from the marvellous Balzac Comédie Humaine, but we are glad that Mr. Shorter has the courage to include Byron so plumply. There is really no doubt about Byron's claim; but not everyone will see or admit it nowadays.

On Thursday the Daily Chronicle published the first four of its promised articles on "The Mind of the Century." Poetry is treated by Mr. Lionel Johnson. Drama by Mr. William Archer. Fiction by Mr. Arthur Waugh. The Essay and Criticism by Mr. H. W. Nevinson. The writers of the summaries are, on the whole, satisfied with the tendencies and work of the almost dead century, but Mr. Waugh ends on a dismal note:

... English fiction seems again to be lost in a very wilderness of indecision. Tacking from topic to topic, viewing nothing steadily or long, tortured by problems of misunderstanding and ignorance, its progress seems for the moment to evade the eye of criticism altogether. Out of all this chaos we can but hope that some unity may come, when feverish emotions have cooled down into enthusiasm.

We hope so, too.

To the January number of the Century Mr. Gosse contributes an article dealing with the career and work of

Mr. Stephen Phillips. Most of the biographical details recorded are already well known, but Mr. Gosse supplies us with one interesting fact which we do not remember to have seen before. He says, speaking of Mr. Phillips's experiences as an actor in Mr. Benson's company:

There was one part in which he really excelled, and, oddly enough, it is one which Shakespeare is known to have played, and which was said to be "the top of his performance." This was the ghost in "Hamlet," which Mr. Phillips acted with a dignity so awful that he was positively called before the curtain—a distinction believed to be in this role unparalleled.

There is reason in the apparent reluctance of an audience to call Hamlet's ghost. Mr. Gosse refers to Herod as being in commission only. We suppose that the exigencies of magazine printing occasionally make such inaccuracies inevitable, but it is almost pathetic to read at the end of December that a play is in the making which has been successfully running for some weeks.

THE first instalment of Mr. Rudyard Kipling's "Kim" appears in the January number of Cassell's Magazine. Some of the illustrations are by Mr. Lockwood Kipling, and are to be reproduced from relief models in clay; one of these appears in this issue. We have had time only to glance at the story, but here is a passage which makes a good beginning:

... Kim was white—a poor white of the very poorest. The half-caste woman who looked after him (she smoked opium, and pretended to keep a second-hand furniture shop by the square where the cheap cabs wait) told the missionaries that she was Kim's mother's sister; but his mother had been nursemaid in a colonel's family and had married Kimball O'Hara, a young colour-sergeant of the Mavericks, an Irish Regiment. He afterwards took a post on the Sind, Punjab, and Delhi railway, and his regiment went home without him. The wife died of cholera in Ferozepore, and O'Hara fell to drink and loafing up and down the line with the keen-eyed three-year-old baby. Societies and chaplains, anxious for the child, tried to catch him, but O'Hara drifted away, till he came across the woman who took opium and learned the taste from her, and died as poor whites die in India. His estate at death consisted of three papers—one he called his "ne varietur," because those words were written below his signature thereon, and another his "clearance-certificate." The third was Kim's birth-certificate. Those things, he was used to say, in his glorious opium hours, would yet make little Kimball a man. On no account was Kim to part with them, for they belonged to a great piece of magic—such magic as men practised over yonder behind the Museum, in the big blue and white Jadoo-Gher—the Magic House, as we name the Masonic Lodge. It would, he said, all come right some day, and Kim's horn would be exalted between pillars—monstrous pillars—of beauty and strength.

THE authorship and literary quality of An English-woman's Love-Letters continue to excite discussion. The meaning of the book seems to be regarded as settled. Meanwhile, attempts to thicken the mystery are not wanting. We have received the following curious announcement from the Unicorn Press: "A sequence of letters, which will be found to fit rather curiously into the letters composing a recently published and much talked of volume, will be issued in a few days under the title of An Englishman's Love-Letters. As in the case of its forerunner, the author's name is not disclosed." One thing grows probable. It is that the concealed authorship device will be practised more and more, and that it will become flat, stale, and unprofitable.

MR. NEWBOLT has given us a very good number of the New Review for January. Mr. Leslie Stephen explains why he refused to sign a protest against the war in South Africa, and proceeds to show that once the war had been entered into, a set of considerations came into existence larger than those which belonged to its alleged root in Mr. Chamberlain's treatment of the Boers. In the course of his argument Mr. Stephen uses the following illustration:

Ahab may have behaved abominably to Naboth; but if Naboth raised a rebellion and called in the Philistines to right himself, it might still be the duty of a loyal Jew to put him down. Right and wrong are so mixed up in this world that an error or injustice in one part of the proceedings which has led to a conflict cannot decide the rights of the whole controversy.

Another good item in the Review is Mr. Julian S. Corbett's presentation of a number of unpublished conversations with Napoleon on St. Helena from the personal notes of his interviewer, Colonel Mark Wilks, who was Governor of the island under the East India Company when Napoleon landed. It is astonishing that conversations of such interest should have remained hidden so long. They now serve as a fine plum to Mr. Newbolt's magazine, and as an answer, more or less effective, to Lord Rosebery's charges of undue severity against Sir Hudson Lowe. The principal conversation shows that Napoleon endeavoured to use Colonel Wilks as a secret messenger to the Prince Regent—a scheme which was at once brought to the knowledge of Sir Hudson. Other conversations between Napoleon and Colonel Wilks turn on flogging in the English army, British administration in India, and—such is the range of subjects—"the mention of indigo brought us back to the subject of chemistry."

In the same magazine Mr. Quiller-Couch writes in varying shades of reverence about Coventry Patmore. He finds it hard to reconcile the homage paid to woman in the "Angel" and "Victories of Love" with Patmore's scoffing rejection of the view that woman is man's equal. And Mr. Quiller-Couch rubs in a little satire:

I confess a disappointment to discover that the exquisite homage paid to Honoria by her poet-husband was, after all, polite humbug. "Everybody knew what he meant in thus making a divinity of her," &c. Did everybody? I—alas!—for years understood him to be saying what he believed. Nor am I assured that Patmore knew everything about love when I read Amelia (which, with his rifle club, he reckoned his greatest achievement), and note the chill endensation beneath the exquisite phrasing of that idyll—so perfect in expression, so fundamentally selfish and patronising in its point of view. Nor, again, am I sure that in chivalry he had hold of the right end of the stick, when I read The Storm, and learn how he earned the thanks of his Beloved by running home in the rain, and sending her "woman" with an umbrella.

In certain of his Odes—"Saint Valentine's Day," "Wind and Wave," "The Toys," "If I Were Dead," and others—Mr. Quiller-Couch holds that Patmore's utterances "pierce and shake as no others in our whole range of song since Wordsworth declined from his best."

THERE is a good paper in the January Macmillan comparing the characters and literary tastes of T. E. Brown and Edward FitzGerald. The comparison is deftly elaborated, from their love of Sophocles to their love of Crabbe. "FitzGerald sobbed over Sophocles. Brown declared that the tremendous parabasis, 'ἄγε δὴ φέρον ἄνδρες ἀμαρτόβιοι, from 'The Birds' of Aristophanes made him tremble." Both men had a passion for music, both loved the sea, and both were wedded to their native soil, with its growth of words and character. "Both had the poet's eye and ear for all the fairest sights and sounds of life, and the tender heart for human suffering. And therefore both suffered much themselves."

THE Cornhill Magazine is about to enter on the forty-first year of its existence, and its January number is appropriately freighted with an article of reminiscences by Mr. George Smith, who tells the story of the magazine from the first bright idea to its full and successful establishment under Thackeray. A very amusing item in the same number is Mr. Andrew Lang's article, "Examinations in Fiction," founded on a "Student's Guide to the School of Literæ Fictitiæ," printed at Oxford in 1855, and anticipating to some extent Calverley's famous Cambridge examination on Pickwick. Some of the questions are fooling, others serious and excellent, as, for instance:

Does the history of prose fiction up to the present time afford any grounds for conceiving its course to be subject to a law of recurrence in a cycle?

Compare, with a view to ascertain the relative excellence of their authors as pathetic writers, the death scenes of Clarissa Harlowe, Ruth, Paul Dombey, Guy Merville, Eva St. Clair, Le Fevre.

Mark the progress of society towards philanthropy by comparing (1) the tone of Fielding's novels, (2) of the earlier and later works of Dickens.

But the cream of the article is the set of questions in Literæ Fictitiæ which Mr. Lang himself propounds for novel critics of these days, when fiction claims to be doing the work of prophecy, science, religion, government, and biblical criticism. From Mr. Lang's fourteen questions we select eight:

1. State and discuss Miss Corelli's theory of a molecule, distinguishing, if possible, a molecule from a microbe.

2. Criticise Mr. Hall Caine's biblical knowledge with reference to his theory of the destruction of Sodom. How far is it in accordance (a) with the Hebrew traditions, (b) with the evidence of the monuments, (c) with the higher criticism?

3. Criticise the use of hypnotism by modern authors. How far is its treatment by Mr. George MacDonald and Mr. A. E. W. Mason in accordance with the teaching (a) of the Salpêtrière, (b) of the Nancy schools?

6. Give a recipe (a) for an historical, (b) for a prehistoric, (c) for a scientific novel, (d) for a novel of the future.

7. Briefly sketch a romance intended to demonstrate the genuine and archaic character of the Book of Deuteronomy, showing how you would work in "the love interest."

8. State the etymology of the word "boom." Show how a boom may best be organised. Mention the earliest known date at which the pulpit was used as an engine for booming a novel.

12. Discuss American historical novels, mentioning, if you can, any examples in which Washington is not introduced.

14. Discuss the theory that Esmond is a work by many various hands, giving reasons for your opinion, and drawing inferences as to the unity of the Iliad.

We may mention, for students of parody, that Mr. Lang's paper contains a rendering into the style of Dr. Johnson of Tony Weller's celebrated remarks on the unnaturalness of poetry.

FROM the secretary of the Public Library in far-off Hawera, New Zealand, we have received a "Visitor's Privilege Ticket," entitling us to borrow books from the Hawera Library for one month. The fact that our month has expired during the ticket's voyage to England does not lessen our gratitude, especially as the ticket is accompanied by particulars interesting to bookmen and gratifying to ourselves. The secretary writes:

In this bright little New Zealand town of 2,500 people we maintain an excellent institution, which, socially, financially, and as an educative influence is quite a success. Each ticket is practically a family one, as it enables the subscriber to take three books. No irksome restrictions are placed upon readers.

We have a free room in which twenty-two daily and six weekly papers are filed.

The secret of success is the selection of the newest books every week. These are notified in the daily paper. The ACADEMY is the guide from which we purchase.

THE Vale Press reprint of Benvenuto Cellini's Memoir (J. A. Symonds's translation) is the handsomest work that has been issued under the direction of Mr. Ricketts since the production of the Vale type in 1896. It is of folio shape, considerably larger than any of the other works of the series, and is issued in two volumes, of which only the first has yet appeared. Like most of the recent Vale Press editions, it was out of print before publication. So far as is known at present, this is the last work which will be published in the Vale type. The Shakespeare, of which nine volumes have appeared out of thirty-six, is printed in a special type that was designed for it, and will continue to appear for many months to come.

ANOTHER very interesting printing venture, which is just about to publish its first announcement, is the press which Mr. Emery Walker and Mr. Cobden Sanderson have started at Hammersmith to revive the fine old type of Jensen. A specimen leaflet has already been privately issued, and shows that the difficulty of reproducing an ancient type has been most successfully overcome. The first work set up by Messrs. Walker & Sanderson is the little Agricola of Tacitus, with text arranged by Mr. Mackail. This is almost ready for issue. Other works which are in course of preparation are Ruskin's Unto this Last and an edition of the Bible, to be published by arrangement with the Cambridge Press. The completion of this great work will, however, depend partly on the support it receives.

In America a somewhat similar undertaking is being carried out by Mr. D. B. Updike, at the Merrymount Press, Boston; and, curiously enough, Mr. Updike's trial volume is also to be the Agricola. The choice is a mere coincidence, both printers being aware that Latin looks handsomer than English in type, and the Agricola being probably selected as the shortest treatise of any recognised merit. Mr. Updike, on hearing what was being done at the Hammersmith Press, has sent over one or two specimen pages of his work, which will be a handsome foolscap folio, probably of no great bulk. His type resembles rather the Jensen revival than the Kelmscott or Vale Press models, and was designed by Mr. Goodhue, the author of the imitation Morris type which is so popular among printers just now. While on this subject we may mention that Mr. C. R. Ashbee, of the Guild of Handicrafts, has also designed a new type, and that the first book printed in it is announced for publication. Hitherto the works issued from Essex House have been printed in "Caslon" type.

A WRITER in Chambers's Journal discourses on the books he has picked from the "Twopenny Stall." For twopence, as he justly points out, one can pick up a great deal of good old literature well worth putting on one's shelf at the price. For twopence the writer of the article, Mr.

Arthur L. Salmon, has, we note, purchased the following books, mostly old editions in good states:

Thomson's Seasons.

Thomas Warton's Poems.

Gray's Complete Works. (Mason's edition.)

Dr. James Beattie's Works.

The Poetical Works of Smollett and Thomas Tickell in one volume.

Ambrose Phillips's Poems.

Akenside's Poems. (Cooke's edition.)

Pope's Homer.

Dryden's Virgil.

Cowper's Iliad.

Fairfax's Tasso.

Glover's Leonidas.

Gay's Poems bound up with Cotton's Visions in Verse, and Moore's Fables for the Female Sex.

Shenstone's Schoolmistress.

Falconer's Shipwreck, and Somerville's Chace in one volume.

Bloomfield's Farmer's Boy.

We have picked these titles out of the pleasant rivulet of comment in which they are set by Mr. Salmon.

STUDENTS of Charles Lamb should not miss the interesting "Lamb Jottings" contributed by Mr. J. A. Rutter to Notes and Queries of last week. Mr. Rutter points out some errors in Canon Ainger's édition de luxe which the Quarterly had pronounced "final." On one point Mr. Rutter incidentally sheds a new light. It has not been clearly known what were Lamb's duties and emoluments during his brief employment at the South Sea House. Mr. Rutter says: "In a small exhibit of documents illustrative of the great Bubble, preserved in the Albert Museum at Exeter, I found the following:

Rec<sup>d</sup> 8th febr<sup>y</sup> 1792 of the Honble South Sea Company by the hands of their Secretary Twelve pounds 1s. 6d. for 23 weeks attendance in the Examiners Office.
£12 : 1 : 6. CHARLES LAMB."

Only the signature is in Lamb's hand. Brief as it is this document furnishes some definite information. That "indolence almost cloistral" which Elia attributed to the South Sea House seems to be reflected in this long delayed payment to a young extra clerk of his small wages.

AMONG those magazines which are putting on a wedding garment for the Twentieth Century is the Art Journal, which appears in a newly designed cover with a bold effect of black and orange. The January number contains the first of a series of articles on the Wallace Collection, by Mr. Claude Phillips.

THE Student, the magazine of Edinburgh University, has arranged a novel and interesting method of celebrating the commencement of the Twentieth Century. About the middle of next month a special New Century number will appear, consisting of contributions from well known men of letters, both in England and Scotland. The list of contributors is by no means complete, but it already contains such names as Mr. William Archer, Mr. John Davidson, Mr. Jerome K. Jerome, Mr. Lionel Johnson, Mr. Evelyn Abbott, Mr. Gilbert Parker, Mr. Neil Munro, Sir George Douglas, Mr. Cyril Maude, Mr. Cutcliffe Hyne, Mr. Laurence Binyon, Mr. John Buchan, Mr. I. Zangwill, Mr. George Gissing, Mr. Morley Roberts, Mr. Louis N. Parker, and many others. This venture of the Edinburgh undergraduates is likely to be of great literary interest.

THE January Pall Mall Magazine is notable for an excellent illustrated article on M. Rodin, the greatest living sculptor, by Marie van Vorst. The article has the more timely interest because of the movement now on foot in this country to buy one of Rodin's bronzes for presentation to South Kensington Museum, a movement which has the support of Prof. Legros, Mr. Sydney Colvin, Mr. Sargent, R.A., and other artists and connoisseurs of note.

Rodin is now sixty years of age, and he is represented to us as full of vitality. "Standing before the head of L'Homme au Nez Cassé (curiously enough the milestone of his first defeat, refused by the Salon in 1864), his masterpieces all around him, in the mellow light of the autumn sun falling on exquisite marble or dark bronze, Rodin said: 'It is good to be alive. I find existence marvellous, glorious. These effigies of human pain' (and he indicated a bronze representing an emaciated poet dying on the knees of the Muse) 'no longer make me suffer as they used. I am happy. To me nature is so beautiful, the truths of humanity are so thrilling, that I have grown to adore life and the world. Je trouve que la vie est tellement belle!'" Rodin's masterpiece, the Porte de l'Enfer ("Door of Hades") has yet to be seen by the world. This great group has occupied him for fifteen years, and has been ordered by the Museum of Decorative Art in Paris.

MR. JOHN A. STEUART has resigned the editorship of the Publishers' Circular, the issue of this week being the last for which he is responsible. Mr. Steuart's new novel, The Eternal Quest, will be published by Messrs. Hutchinson in February next.

Bibliographical.

MESSRS. MACMILLAN promise us the Life and Letters of Phillips Brooks, written and edited by Prof. A. V. G. Allen; and, no doubt, the work will be interesting and, perhaps, valuable. Meanwhile, at least two monographs on the distinguished American bishop have been published in England—one by a Mr. Dunbar in 1893, and another by a Mr. De Wolfe Howe so recently as 1899. Quite a large number of works by the bishop have found their way across the Atlantic. To name only some, we have had The Influence of Jesus (lectures, 1879), The Candle of the Lord (sermons, 1881), Sermons Preached in English Churches (1883), Lectures on Preaching (1881 and 1885), Twenty Sermons (1886), Tolerance (lectures, 1887), The Light of the World and Spiritual Man (sermons, 1891), Letters of Travel (1893), The Mystery of Iniquity (sermons, 1893), Essays and Addresses (1894), and The More Abundant Life (1897). In addition to these we have had two volumes of extracts from the bishop's writings—Brilliantes (1893) and Words of Strength and Cheer (1898). Altogether, this excellent divine must be fairly well represented on the bookshelves of our clergy and more thoughtful laymen.

We are to have, it seems, a new, revised, and augmented edition of Miss Ella Wheeler Wilcox's Poems of Passion and Poems of Pleasure. These volumes appear to have been introduced to the British public in 1894 and 1896 respectively. The works of Miss Wilcox have, however, been before the English reader for at least some ten years past. Her books called A Double Life and How Salvator Won were circulated over here in 1891. In 1892 came An Erring Woman's Love and The Beautiful Land of Nod; to 1893 belongs the book called Men, Women, and Emotions; and in 1896 we had Caster, and Other Poems. Apparently, the latest thing that Miss Wilcox has given us is a volume entitled Maurine, and Other Poems. This is not the place in which to discourse on the merits or demerits of Miss Wilcox's verse; but that it has had, and still has, a certain amount of vogue in this country the above memoranda make tolerably clear.

In his Reason of Church Government Milton wrote—"By labour and intent study . . . joined with the strong propensity of nature, I might perhaps leave something so written to after times, as they should not willingly let it die." It so happens that the last phrase of the last clause of the sentence has come into almost universal use. But, behold, a greater than Milton is here. A writer in the latest issue of the Sunday Times, signing himself "C. J.," describes the phrase as "common, and perhaps somewhat foolish." "Taken literally," we are told, it "is ridiculous, because any willing consideration of literature is obviously just the thing which keeps it alive." Why does not "C. J." set to work and re-write poor old Milton?

It is interesting to note that the Ought We to Visit Her? of Mrs. Annie Edwardes is to come out in a sixpenny edition. This argues for the story a vitality which one would hardly have thought that it possessed, clever as it is, and clever as the author's writings always were. The tale, I may add, has the unique distinction of being the only English work, of any kind, which Mr. W. S. Gilbert has adapted to the stage. His dramatic version of it was brought out at the Royalty Theatre in January, 1874.

The recurrence of Dr. Samuel Smiles's birthday—the eighty-eighth anniversary—will recall to all middle-aged readers the big popular success made, just thirty years ago, by Dr. Smiles's Self-Help. He had already produced his Life of George Stephenson, but it was Self-Help that made him as a writer. After that everything he did went well—the Lives of the Engineers, the Lives of Boulton and Watt, the Huguenots, the Life of George Moore, the Life of Robert Dick, and so forth. The best indication of what is most likely, of all his work, to please the coming generation may be found, perhaps, in the list of those books of his of which a uniform new edition appeared three years ago. These were: Character, Duty, Industrial Biography, Jasmin, Life and Labour, Men of Invention and Discovery, Self-Help, Thomas Edward, and Thrift. Of these, Character, Duty, Self-Help, and Thrift may last the longest. It is difficult, meanwhile, to believe that it is very nearly ten years since Dr. Smiles brought out his biography of John Murray—A Publisher and His Friends.

I see we are to have a monthly publication, to be called the Thrush, which is to consist of "original" verse by living writers. It has my best wishes, though I cannot say I think there is any "felt want" which it will "supply." Is there no room for this sort of thing in the magazines and the country newspapers? Anyway, I trust that this Thrush at least will not sing each song twice over; we shall be satisfied, probably, with the first fine careless raptures. Apropos: did not the late W. C. Bennett issue a serial called the Lark, also consisting of poetry, though (if I remember rightly) of selected poetry only? Is it too late to change the title of the new monthly in favour of Bennett's older and better choice? Think of the charming motto from Coleridge that would be available—

The Lark is so brimful of gladness and love,
The green fields below him, the blue sky above,
That he sings, and he sings, and for ever sings he—which, I suppose, is what the contributors to the Thrush are proposing to do.

Among the books to be expected shortly is one on William Shakespeare: Poet, Dramatist, and Man, from the pen of the American littérateur, Mr. Hamilton W. Mabie. Many writers have tried to build up a plausible figure of "the man Shakespeare"; it will be interesting to note what our Transatlantic contemporary has to contribute on the subject. Of Shakespeare the dramatist very much less has been written, even by the Germans, than of Shakespeare the poet; and, indeed, the topic could only be dealt with adequately by one who had witnessed many of the public representations of the plays. It is in studying them as performed that the dramatic weakness of certain of them is forced upon the critic.

It is said we are to have the autobiography of John Stuart Blackie in the form of a volume to be called The Day-Book of that worthy. Did Blackie really keep a diary, or is the promised work to be simply a sort of calendar made up of autobiographic fragments? Meanwhile, the proposed title recalls that of The Day-Book of Bethia Hardacre, and is none the worse for doing so.

THE BOOKWORM.

Reviews.

An Atlas of Criticism.

A HISTORY OF CRITICISM AND LITERARY TASTE IN EUROPE. By George Saintsbury. Vol. I.: Classical and Mediæval Criticism. (Blackwood. 16s. net.)

It is Prof. Saintsbury's design to furnish young critics with an "atlas" of "the theory and practice of criticism," such as he himself felt the need of when, some thirty years ago, he was first "asked to undertake the duties of a critic." Great as the value of his book may certainly be, when wisely used, we should hesitate to commend it to a young critic without a very strong warning, both against the literary models which Prof. Saintsbury's own writing affords, and against the views as to the limitations and functions of criticism which he holds. There is, indeed, no writer worth reading at all whom we read with less pleasure. Faults of style and taste stand out on every page. The English is without dignity or decorum. Broken-backed sentences stagger under the weight of parenthetic and appended clauses, and are starred with ugly catchwords and unnecessary neologisms. Prof. Saintsbury is as cocksure as Mr. Chamberlain; nor does he ever spare to offend us with arrogant assertions of the extent of his own reading in several languages, or with sneers at branches of research, phonetics, textual criticism, the "higher criticism" of the Bible and Homer, or whatever it may be, which lie outside the somewhat narrow limits of his own literary interests. All these are matters of subjective liking, apart from what seems to us the general incorrectness of his attitude towards literature and criticism. Nor does our prejudice go so far as to deny him more than one sterling merit. He has read widely, with a lucid brain, a rapid judgment, and a strong memory. He does not shun his share of literary drudgery, and behind whatever he writes there is a solid basis of erudition. His criticism, even where we think it unsound, is the outcome of a thoroughly honest attempt to see and judge for himself. It is not mere book-making at second-hand. And, best of all, he has, within his limitations, a genuine and infectious enthusiasm for some at least of the delightful things of letters.

For good or for evil, all Prof. Saintsbury's qualities find characteristic expression in the History of Criticism and Literary Taste before us. The work is planned on a generous scale. Ultimately it will consist of three thick volumes, of which the present instalment deals with Greece, Rome, and the Middle Ages; a second and third will continue the tale through the Renaissance to modern times. Before attempting anything in the way of a summary it will be best to follow Prof. Saintsbury himself in setting down precisely what it is that, for the purposes of his treatment, he considers as included in the term criticism.

The criticism which will be dealt with here is that function of the judgment which busies itself with the goodness or badness, the success or ill-success, of literature from the purely literary point of view. Other offices of the critic, real or so-called, will occupy us slightly or not at all.

A page later this is expanded:

The Criticism, or modified Rhetoric, of which this book attempts to give a history, is pretty much the same thing as the reasoned exercise of Literary Taste—the attempt, by examination of literature, to find out what it is that makes literature pleasant, and therefore good—the discovery, classification, and, as far as possible, tracing to their sources, of the qualities of poetry and prose, of style and metre, the classification of literary kinds, the examination and "proving," as arms are proved, of literary means and weapons, not neglecting the observation of literary fashions and the like.

The obvious remark to make upon this definition is that it takes a good deal for granted. Prof. Saintsbury has ruled out of his inquiry the whole of what he calls "the more transcendental æsthetic." He does not discuss the philosophy of the beautiful, or the place of art in life or in the human ideal, or the psychology of artistic or literary production, or the historical origins of art and song. Yet on such discussions and their result the rightness or wrongness of his definition depends. We demur, as many would demur, to the hedonistic way in which it is stated. Doubtless good literature is pleasant, but is literature pleasant because it is good? And whose pleasure is the test? Certainly not the writer's, as a psychological fact. And if the reader's, as we understand Prof. Saintsbury to mean, then what reader's? Mr. T. E. Brown found pleasure in the works of Mr. Hall Caine, and so do many others. These things cannot be thrashed out here. But our point is that Prof. Saintsbury has not thrashed them out either, and that therefore it must be borne in mind throughout his book that the whole argument of it is coloured by an unverified and highly disputable definition.

Prof. Saintsbury's opinion on another even more important question of critical principle, is not so explicitly stated in the definition; but he does not long leave us in doubt as to what it is. The "purely literary point of view," from which criticism is to judge literature, is explained to be the point of view which commands the form of literature without its content. This is the moribund heresy of "art for art's sake." What you say does not matter, so long as you say it in such a way as to produce the oikeia hedone of the particular mode of expression you have chosen. Those who differ from Prof. Saintsbury have "a mania for insisting that literary criticism shall perpetually mix itself up with ethics and psychology." Dante is claimed as agreeing with him, that "the ultimate and real test of literary excellence" lies "in the expression, not in the meaning." To think that literature can be "judged adequately as an expression of national life," is to harbour a fallacy whence will come "a brood of monsters." Und so weiter. Here, again, Prof. Saintsbury is making an assumption from which many critics will absolutely dissent, and we point it out with the intention, not of arguing it here, but of warning the reader, and especially the young critic, that the consciousness of this assumption must accompany him throughout the book.

He will not, however, find it difficult to disentangle, as he goes along, what is dubious in Prof. Saintsbury's comment and bias from what is clearly valuable in the facts he brings out. The chapters follow a chronological order, and the method is largely that of a copious analysis of all the more important critical writings during the Greek, Roman, and Mediæval periods, together with a brief summary of slighter works, and of incidental illustrations of literary taste gathered from books not professedly critical. It must have been an arid task enough to plough through so many second-rate rhetoricians, and thorough praise is due to the completeness and lucidity of Prof. Saintsbury's exposition. At intervals he stops and sums up the total results of a period in a convenient "interchapter." It must not be denied that the total critical outcome of the ages traversed is not great. Neither insolent Greece nor haughty Rome were critically disposed; their self-consciousness did not take precisely that form. The Middle Ages were too busy in transforming the ideals of literature to reflect much upon its processes. The utterances of most of the writers with whom Prof. Saintsbury deals may be wisely taken from him at second-hand; they are hopelessly jejune, engrossed with the minute classification of tropes and figures, and far less with literature in any reasonable sense than with rhetoric as the base art of persuasion. Aristotle, of course, is fundamental; and so, too, is Plato, though Prof. Saintsbury's assumptions blur his appreciation of the fact. Horace has already a place beyond his deserts. Quintilian cannot safely be neglected. But it is Longinus, or whoever wrote the anonymous treatise "On the Sublime," and Dante, if, as is almost certain, Dante wrote the "De Vulgari Eloquentia," for whom Prof. Saintsbury would claim an attention which they have not always in adequate measure received. "Literary elevation" rather than "the Sublime," the qualities that transport and give ecstasy—these are what Longinus demanded, and, demanding them, he went to the heart of the critic's business.

Amid the desert and chaos of wasted industry there stands the great rock of the Περὶ Τέχνης, with its shade and refreshment in the weary land of its own contemporaries, and with its brow catching the dawn which was not to shine fully for more than fifteen hundred years, and is hardly noon-day yet. . . . The intelligent enjoyment of literature; the intimacy with it, at once voluptuous and intellectual; the untiring, though it may be never fully satisfied, quest after the secret of its charms, never neglecting the opportunity of basking and revelling in them—these things, till we come to Longinus, are rare indeed. And when we do meet them, the rencontre is of a sort of accidental and shame-faced character. When we come to Longinus there is no more false modesty. "Beautiful words are the light of thought." These words themselves are the lantern of criticism.

We do not wish to belittle Longinus, for his point, even if only a half-truth, was a big one to make; and the aspiration to the "Sublime" does not exclude a "Sublime" that is more than merely verbal. He "hitched his waggon to a star," indeed! But, of course, it is the specific requirement of beautiful words that pleases Prof. Saintsbury; just as it is on account of Dante's "bent towards formal criticism—towards considerations of prosody, of harmony, of vocabulary, of structure"—that this historian claims for the "De Vulgari Eloquentia" "not merely the position of the most important critical document between Longinus and the seventeenth century at least, but one of intrinsic importance on a line with that of the very greatest critical documents of all history." The magic of words is a thing that no advocate of soul in literature will deny; let us, as an antidote to Prof. Saintsbury, conclude with a quotation from a great conjuror with words:

Literature [says Mr. Pater], by finding its specific excellence in the absolute correspondence of the term to its import, will be but fulfilling the condition of all artistic quality in things everywhere, of all good art. Good art, but not necessarily great art: the distinction between great art and good art depending immediately, as regards literature at all events, not on its form, but on its matter. Thackeray's Esmond, surely, is greater art than Thackeray's Vanity Fair, by the greater dignity of its interests. It is on the quality of the matter it informs or controls, its compass, its variety, its alliance to great ends, or the depth of the note of revolt, or the largeness of hope in it, that the greatness of literary art depends, as The Divine Comedy, Paradise Lost, Les Misérables, The English Bible, are great art.

In Book Form.

Herod: a Tragedy. By Stephen Phillips. (Lane. 1s. 6d. net.)

To read Herod, and to see it acted, are two different things. But, while it certainly loses force in representation, there can be no doubt that the loss is due to no fault of the playwright. The austere rendering of the grand emotions, even the audible and intelligent articulation of blank verse, are scarcely possible under the conditions of the modern stage in England. One may be, happily, sure, however, that the composition of a few more plays like Herod will soon work a change; for the stage always moves, backwards or forwards, with the playwright: no other influence permanently affects it. In Herod Mr. Phillips is a playwright first and a poet afterwards. Matthew Arnold, in the invaluable Preface to the 1853 edition of his Poems, remarks that "at the present day we can hardly understand what Menander meant when he told a man who inquired as to the progress of his comedy that he had finished it, not having yet written a single line, because he had constructed the action of it in his mind." Mr. Phillips has clearly returned to the classical method; everywhere the poetry is subordinated to the action, and the author's aim is at that "total impression" upon which Matthew Arnold so strenuously and rightly insisted. Here, in Herod, is drama which happens to be poetry, not poetry which happens to be drama. The "action" is the best part of it. Judged on the comparatively low plane of mere theatric invention, Herod is very deft. The introduction of the swooning women during the absence of Herod and Mariamne in the first act is a good example of Mr. Phillips's invention. Cypros' plot against Mariamne in the second act is well devised—yet how simply!—to meet the situation; and, indeed, the whole play is full of the felicities of a born stage-craftsman. The dramatic (as distinguished from the theatric) merits of the piece are admirable. The clash of Herod's two motives—his passion for Mariamne and his murderous hatred of her beloved brother—resounds fatefully in the very beginning, and almost at once we are faced with the great situation of Herod making tempestuous love to Mariamne in the full knowledge that Aristobulus is at the very moment being murdered. This is to conceive in the grand manner of old tragedy. From the first, Herod, with all his tigerish personal force, is helpless in the clutch of circumstance, helpless even in his love. Says Mariamne:

You rushed on me like fire, and a wind drove you,
Thou who didst never fear, Herod, my Herod,
Now clasp me close as thou didst clasp me then,
When like a hundred lightnings brands upsprung
In the night sudden. Then did you laugh out
And whirled me like a god through the dark away.

He raised Aristobulus to high and sacred office in order to please her. He struck the youth down in order to save his throne; and note that his crime was not the killing of Aristobulus (murder was a trifle in Judaea) but the desolating of Mariamne. But he had no alternative; there was no escape from fate. Mariamne's own death follows like a logical consequence the death of Aristobulus: Herod's love was the cause of the one, through arousing the jealousy of Cypros and Salome, just as much as of the other. Blame him for nothing but a too passionate love. It was in the first meeting of their lips that all the ruin was wrought. And Herod, ejaculating at the close,

I have outspanned life, and the worm of God,
Imagining I am already dead,
Begins to prey on me,

was aware of this.

Turning to the "expression" of the play, although it is often beautiful, we do not think it is quite as fine as the "action." For austere discarding the "purple patch" Mr. Phillips must be warmly praised. Not once does he attempt, in the wrong sense, to "write." His one desire is to tell the story, never to discover excuses for splendour of imagery and gorgeous words. There are fine lines and passages in Herod, but scarcely once do they attain the highest standard. And at their best they seem to be imitated from the Elizabethan model:

Summon the queen,
Or I will not call earthly vengeance down.
I have exhausted earth, I'll fetch the lightning
And call on thunder like an Emperor!

And again :

I dreamed last night of a dome of beaten gold
To be a counter-glory to the Sun.
There shall the eagle blindly dash himself,
There the first beam shall strike, and there the moon
Shall aim all night her argent archery ;
And it shall be the tryst of sundered stars,
The haunt of dead and dreaming Solomon ;

And I will think in gold and dream in silver,
Imagine in marble and in bronze conceive.

This may be fine, but is it fine enough ? Has it an individual ring, a fresh inspiration ? In our view there is nothing in Herod so fine as the best parts of Marpessa, except, perhaps, Herod's imperious cry when he dreams of re-creating Mariamne :

Can I

Not imitate in furious ecstasy
What God hath coldly made ?

Mr. Phillips is a rather impressive Elizabethan, but in almost any Elizabethan play of the second-class one can find passages of an absolute virile beauty to which he cannot reach.

Oh, but thou dost not know

What 'tis to die.

Yes, I do know, my lord :

'Tis less than to be born ; a lasting sleep ;
A quiet resting from all jealousy,
A thing we all pursue ; I know, besides,
It is but giving over of a game
That must be lost.

Or this :

Not the calmed sea,
When Æolus locks up his windy brood,
Is less disturbed than I.

These are not Shakespeare ; merely Beaumont and Fletcher, chosen at random.

When Mr. Phillips abandons his great exemplars and essays the poetry of the nineteenth century he is apt to fall into prettiness and flimsiness.

Nor long and leafy Lebanonian sigh is not good. And

The low long " Ah " of foliage is feeble. He uses the word " burn " (in the " Tiger, Tiger " sense) too frequently, and that Mesopotamian word " Lebanonian " has an undue fascination for him. The couplet-like effect of

Some fancy, all incredible to me,
But which alone diverts insanity, is unfortunate, and so is the unintended Americanism in

Am I that Herod

That fired the robbers out of Galilee ?

We have made a few animadversions upon the poetical quality of Herod. On the other hand, its dramatic quality is remarkable.

Mrs. Earle's Museum.

Stage-Coach and Tavern Days. By Alice Morse Earle.
(Macmillan. 10s. 6d.)

MRS. EARLE goes on with the big book, of which her Home Life in Colonial Days, her Child Life in Colonial Days, and the present work are virtually constituent volumes, though they appear under different titles. Hers has been a delightful hobby, pursued with zest, and made fruitful to others by a clever pen and illustrations which no hand but hers could have brought together. The present volume differs from the others only in affording glimpses of a less puritanic and more open-air life than that which was depicted in its predecessors, wherein we were often made to feel the pious stuffiness of New England life. The tavern now rears its head under strange restraints, and with strange freedoms. It was established by the elect for the convenience of travellers and the comfort of the townspeople ; indeed, a township which did not provide an ordinary was liable to a fine. But under how many restrictions ? Under a hundred, that gradually became fewer as the times broadened. " Sack or strong waters " might not be sold ; " carding," bowls, billiards, and quoits were forbidden at the ordinaries ; and the titling-man, an officer of intolerable importance, controlled not only the landlord but the customers, dashing the cup from the very lips of the too freely imbibing traveller. Tobacco was a sin, and no tavern might harbour it, under fine. Later, it might be smoked in a private room of the inn, but not " publicquely " ; and in any case two men might not smoke together. In Connecticut an indulgent Legislature permitted a man to smoke one pipe in a journey of ten miles. It is amusing to note that while a man might not under any pretence light his pipe within two miles of a meeting-house on the Sabbath-day, the tavern-keeper was often invited, even compelled, to set his roof-tree close to the meeting-house. This regulation harks us back to what Mrs. Earle has graphically told us elsewhere of the arctic temperature which was maintained in the meeting-house by its wretched stove. Men swung their arms to keep warm while they prayed, and women and children cowered half-frozen to receive grace from above. Hence, between morning and afternoon service, the whole company adjourned to the tavern ; and this " nooning," as it was called, was not without its scandals, many a godly church-member returning to the meeting-house in a state of warmth which affected his walk and words. We have not space to touch on Mrs. Earle's wealth of tavern curiosities, mugs, jugs, signs, landlords, and liquors. The great liquors were rum, cider, and flip. Flip was made in many ways ; but it could not be made without thrusting a red-hot poker into the beer on which it was built up.

As in England, so in New England, the tavern opened its arms to shows and stage-plays. The first attempts to " edge in " the drama were made in the Boston coffee-houses, in one of which two English strollers gave a version of Otway's " Orphans," and were sent packing. The word " play " was, indeed, anathema ; and one of the gems of this volume is the copy of a Shakesperean play-bill put forward by a manager in a Newport tavern. Here is a portion of it :

KINGS ARMS TAVERN NEWPORT RHODE ISLAND.

On Monday, June 10th, at the Public Room of the Above Inn will be delivered a series of

Moral Dialogues

In Five Parts.

Depicting the evil effects of jealousy and other bad passions and Proving that happiness can only spring from the pursuit of Virtue.

MR. DOUGLASS—Will represent a noble magnanimous Moor called Othello, who loves a young lady named Desdemona, and, after he marries her, harbours (as in too many cases) the dreadful passion of jealousy.

Of jealousy, our being's bane,

Mark the small cause and the most dreadful pain.

MR. ALLYN—Will depict the character of a specious villain in the regiment of Othello, who is so base as to hate his commander on mere suspicion and to impose on his best friend. Of such characters, it is to be feared, there are thousands in the world, and the one in question may present to us a salutary warning.

*The man that wrongs his master and his friend
What can he come to but a shameful end ?*

Various other Dialogues, too numerous to mention here, will be delivered at night, all adapted to the mind and manners. The whole will be repeated on Wednesday and on Saturday. Tickets, six shillings each, to be had within. Commencement at 7. Conclusion at half-past ten: in order that every spectator may go home at a sober hour and reflect upon what he has seen before he retires to rest.

God save the King
Long may he sway.
East, north, and south
And fair America.

The tavern soon became a coaching-house, and it is curious to see how coaching thrived English-wise in the new country. The first coach between New York and Philadelphia did the journey in three days, and was driven by one John Butler, "an aged huntsman who kept a kennel of hounds till foxes were shy of Philadelphia streets, when his old sporting companions thus made a place for him." That was in 1759. Butler was the father of a race of magnificent coachmen, men of science and dignity, who were adored by their passengers, and ruled the road from end to end. These men would boast that horses were changed before the coach stopped rocking. Their very whips were of the knowingest build and size. "The rule of perfection was that it should be five feet one and one-half inches from butt to holder, and twelve feet five inches long from holder to end of point of lash." An anecdote which lights up custom and character as well as any in the book, is as follows:

There was a closeness of association in stage-coach travel which made fellow-passengers companionable. One would feel a decided intimacy with a fellow-sufferer who had risen several mornings in succession with you, at day-break, and ridden all night, cheek by jowl. Even fellow-travellers on short trips entered into conversation, and the characteristic inquisitiveness was shown. Ralph Waldo Emerson took great delight in this experience of his in stage-coach travel. A sharp-featured, keen-eyed, elderly Yankee woman rode in a Vermont coach opposite a woman deeply veiled and garbed in mourning attire, and the older woman thus entered into conversation: "Have you lost friends?" "Yes," was the answer, "I have." "Was they near friends?" "Yes, they was." "How near was they?" "A husband and a brother." "Where did they die?" "Down in Mobile." "What did they die of?" "Yellow fever." "How long was they sick?" "Not very long." "Was they seafaring men?" "Yes, they was." "Did you save their chists?" "Yes, I did." "Was they hopefully pious?" "I hope so." "Well, if you have got their chists (with emphasis), and they was hopefully pious, you've got much to be thankful for."

Piquancy of humour and fragrance of regret mingle very happily in all that Mrs. Earle writes. And especially the fragrance of regret, now that the gates of another century are about to shut with a surly clang.

Academic Wit.

Reminiscences of Oxford. By the Rev. W. Tuckwell. (Cassell. 9s.)

MR. TUCKWELL was born in the reign of George the Fourth, and his remembrance of Oxford goes back to the dim and distant 'thirties, when the Duke of Wellington was Chancellor, and Keble and Newman first began to perturb a placid Church. Of those days, and of many days since, he has a budget of genial and racy stories to tell, and a number of detailed reminiscences to register which will have a considerable value for the academic historian of the future. Naturally, some of his jests are chestnuts, but he taps a stratum of myth beyond the reach of most of his contemporaries. Few, for instance, remember "Mo" Griffith and Frowd, the Senior Fellows of Merton and Corpus in the 'forties, and their daily walk round Christchurch Meadow, in the course of which Frowd was once heard to lament the lack of "Originals" in Oxford as compared with their earlier days, to be met with the stiffly delivered suggestion: "Has it never occurred to you, Dr. Frowd, that you and I are the 'Originals' of to-day?" Griffith was the greater character of the two, a notable eater:

Dr. Wootten, an Oxford physician, dined with him one day, and did scant justice to the dishes: "My maxim, Mr. Griffith, is to eat and leave off hungry." Mo threw up his hands, as he was wont: "Eat and leave off hungry! Why not wash and leave off dirty?"

The achievements of scholarship are necessarily fleeting, and there have been great Oxford Grecians whose names are preserved more securely by some traditional story than by all their commentaries and lexicons. Among such are Gaisford and Linwood. Of Gaisford, who was Dean of Christchurch, Mr. Tuckwell recalls the famous peroration in a Christmas sermon:

Nor can I do better, in conclusion, than impress upon you the study of Greek literature, which not only elevates above the vulgar herd, but leads not infrequently to positions of considerable emolument.

Linwood was a boor, with a genius for composition in the dead tongues. When an examiner for Greats, he scandalised his colleagues by proposing to "throw all that other rubbish into the fire, and go by the Greek prose." Late in life he read St. Paul's Epistles for the first time, and, being asked what he thought of them, reported "that they contained a good deal of curious matter, but that the Greek was execrable." A university is essentially a democratic institution, and, whatever the outside scoffer may say, it is not true that a courteous manner is the invariable passport to success. A late distinguished professor is said to have enjoyed writing a book on Holland because it was "a low country and full of dams." One day Thorold Rogers was invited to meet Freeman at dinner, and the conversation turned on political economy. "Political economy," said Freeman, "always seems to me so much garbage." "Garbage is it?" retorted Rogers, "then it ought to be good enough for a hog like you." A truly Shakespearian encounter! It was at Oxford, too, that Huxley told Bishop Wilberforce how he "would rather be descended from an ape than from a divine who employs authority to stifle truth." This, however, was excusable, for "Soapy Sam" posing as a scientist must have been enough to irritate a milder biologist than Huxley. Science is at home in Oxford now, and the days are gone when Gaisford could thank God on Buckland's departure for Italy, because "we shall hear no more of his geology," or when Keble could dogmatically declare that "when God made the stones he made the fossils in them." There was more humour in the undergraduate who broke up Dr. Acland's conferences on animal instinct by a grave statement that "he knew a man whose sister had a tame jelly-fish which would sit up and beg"; and more modesty in the churchmanship of Dr. Solomon Caesar Malan, who knew seventy languages, and when preaching always prayed into a cap within which was inscribed a text from the story of Balaam: "And the Lord opened the mouth of the ass, and she spake—."

Many readers will be glad to possess the collection of Balliol epigrams which Mr. Tuckwell prints in an appendix. Perhaps it was indiscreet of him, as many of the victims are living, and some are distinguished. But there they are, and one at least we cannot refrain from quoting:

I am Mr. Andrew Bradley:
When my liver's doing sadly,
I take refuge from the brute
In the blessed Absolute.

An Era and a Man.

The Englishman in China. By Alexander Michie. (Blackwood. 38s. net.)

It is extraordinarily difficult to arouse any interest in the affairs of China in the mind of the ordinary man. But it is not for want of trying, for everyone who has been in China seems to have written a book on the subject, and with singular unanimity denounces our supineness and ignorance of the Far East. To the stay-at-homes among us China is very far off, and a land of fairy tales and Arabian Nights' stories, so that they cannot be persuaded to take it seriously. However, the public must be roused or nothing will be done, and we shall see a magnificent trade slip away from the hands that are too nerveless to grasp it. For gaining an insight into the real China few books have been published of late that are better qualified to instruct than Mr. Alexander Michie's two bulky volumes, the full title of which is: The Englishman in China during the Victorian Era, as illustrated by the career of Sir Rutherford Alcock, K.C.B., D.C.L., many years Consul and Minister in China and Japan. This portentous title in reality very accurately describes the work, for it is more than a biography, and yet not quite a history: it is the story of an era as illustrated by the life of one great man.

History repeats itself, we are told; but nowhere does it repeat itself with such unfailing accuracy as in China. The changeless East is ever the same, and there are a thousand times as many changes in fifty years of Europe as in a cycle of Cathay. Hence it is that whole pages of the history of the 'forties are vital and actual to-day, and, with only the names of the protagonists altered, might serve as comment on what is going on to-day. In 1839, in 1869, in 1899, these words hold good: "the British Government was so friendly and pacific that they would endure anything"; and there is not a man living who, without previous knowledge, could tell in which of the three years they were originally spoken. It is true that we have ceased to leave the persons and property of British subjects at the mercy of Chinese officials, and to give up Englishmen to be strangled on the demand of the Chinese authorities, and for that those who have business in the Far East are, let us hope, duly grateful. But there seems some blighting influence in life in China which renders our officials out there subservient to the Chinese, and it was not to Sir John Davis, our Minister out there, but to Lord Palmerston that we owed the change. The Foreign Secretary wrote in 1847:

I have to instruct you to demand the punishment of the parties guilty of this outrage [an assault on some British officers]; and you will, moreover, inform the Chinese authorities in plain and distinct terms that the British Government will not tolerate that a Chinese mob shall with impunity maltreat British subjects in China whenever they get them into their power; and that if the Chinese authorities will not by the exercise of their own power punish and prevent such outrages, the British Government will be obliged to take the matter into their own hands.

To do Sir John Davis justice, he was anxious to act boldly; but he had been so tied down to a policy of "forbearance" by previous Foreign Ministers that he had never ventured to hold his own against the overbearing Chinese officials.

As Consul Sir Rutherford (then Mr.) Alcock had a large share in bringing about a better state of things in the relationship between England and China; and yet it was almost by accident that he went out to the Far East. He was born in May, 1809, at Ealing, where his father practised as a medical man. He, too, entered the profession, and in 1832 was sent out to Portugal as a surgeon in the British-Portuguese force which was fighting for Donna Maria, the rightful queen. In 1838 Mr. Alcock returned to England, and in 1842 was appointed Inspector of Anatomy under the Home Office; but soon afterwards was obliged to abandon surgical practice owing to a form of paralysis of the hands and arms consequent on a rheumatic fever of a particularly severe type contracted at the siege of San Sebastian. It was to the credit of the Government that, in 1844, he was one of the five chosen to fill the office of Consul in China under the Treaty of Nanking, which was concluded in 1842.

As we have already observed, Mr. Michie does not confine himself to Sir Rutherford's career, but sketches the position of the Englishman in China for sixty years. In many respects it is the most interesting book on China and Japan which the present crisis has called forth. Here and there are dull pages which the Judicious Skipper will avoid; but, on the whole, the book throws more light on the subject than any other we have seen. It has the advantage of the connecting thread of Sir Rutherford Alcock's personality, which gives it in places almost the air of an historical romance.

Soldier and Novelist.

Captain Mayne Reid: his Life and Adventures. By Elizabeth Reid, his Widow, assisted by Charles H. Coe. (Greening. 3s. 6d.)

THERE is a good deal of entertainment in this artless volume, which is an amplification of an account of the ever-delightful Mayne Reid published by his widow some years ago. It is a little startling, to begin with, to learn that the fire-eating soldier of fortune who produced so long a series of stories of blood-red adventure and hair-breadth escapes from Indians and other poisonous personages was intended for the Church. And, what is more, he actually spent four years in studying for the Presbyterian ministry. Mayne Reid's father, an Irishman of Scottish extraction, was, no doubt, highly disappointed at the failure of his efforts to hand on the apostolical succession to his son, for he was himself in Holy Orders; but, like so many other fathers, he was compelled to realise that youth will have its way, and so, at the age of twenty-one, Mayne Reid (who was born in 1818) went to America in search of fortune. He was long in finding it, for it was not until the war between the United States and Mexico, in 1847, that he got his chance. In the interval he had been trader, journalist, school-master, and friend of Edgar Allan Poe. In later life Reid wrote a passionate defence of his friend against what he considered to be the aspersions of his biographer, Griswold. Everything that he did, indeed, was done passionately, in the sense that he never minced matters, and that he often appeared to be in a great rage when he was merely a trifle impatient of delay or contradiction, or some little detail of that kind. Upon such occasions his terrific voice—we fancy we hear it still, for his wife's pious conjecture that it could almost be heard a mile away is not so very extravagant—was calculated to strike instant and abject terror into those who were unaccustomed to it and to its master's ways.

In the Mexican campaign Mayne Reid, who had obtained a commission in the American army, was the bravest of the brave. At Churubusco he led the last charge, and at the storming of Chapultepec was the first man to reach the enemy's walls. He was only prevented being first on the other side of them by a terrible wound, which was for some time supposed to have killed him—the newspapers even published elegies upon him. But he recovered, to become, in the delicious language of a full-blooded American journalist, "a mixture of Adonis and the Apollo Belvedere, with a dash of the Centaur." As a lady-killer he was clearly irresistible; but in the end he fell in love with his wife at first sight when, at the age of thirteen, he found her dressing a doli. At sixteen she was actually married, despite her early disappointment that her suitor was not like Jack the Giant-Killer. After marriage, Mayne Reid settled down to the production of the fifty odd romances which have delighted two generations of boys and their fathers. Nobody would dream of calling the author of The Headless Horseman a stylist, but the root of the matter was in him. The simple directness with which he told his stories, the easy and natural way in which he led up to blood-curdling situations, the dexterity with which he saved his people from murder and sudden death, brought him a popularity such as no other English writer of books for boys has enjoyed in our time, and would have brought him fortune likewise had he not frittered away his money in starting papers, building an expensive country-house, and driving a yellow chariot with a brace of spotted dogs trotting behind. His later years were dimmed by physical suffering, the result of his Mexican wound, but he was indomitable to the last, like one of his own Red Indian braves. The book is sometimes a trifle extravagant, but Mrs. Mayne Reid's frank and outspoken admiration for her interesting and remarkable husband is distinctly engaging, while her account of his impetuous wooing is highly amusing.

---

Defoe.

"WESTMINSTER BIOGRAPHIES."—Daniel Defoe. By Wilfred Whitten. (Kegan Paul. 2s.)

WE are not quite convinced that a crowded life, such as was Defoe's, can be profitably written in a hundred miniature pages. But small books are the order of this democratic day, with its desultory and wandering attention; and, if they are to be done at all, they should be done as Mr. Whitten does them. His Daniel Defoe is a model of thumb-nail biography. Its brevity is no measure of the work put into it. It is ex abundanti scientia, a most careful abstract by elimination of the unessential from the mass of what might have been said. Defoe is there in outline merely, but in his right proportions, and with the self-same expression which his face wears in the most faithful of his larger portraits. And it was a crowded life. Mr. Whitten has kindly saved us the trouble of summarising. The Defoe who wrote Robinson Crusoe and the Defoe who wrote the pamphlets are familiar:

But Defoe wrote books on Magic and Apparitions, and many books on Commerce. He thrashed out ecclesiastical questions and wrote a history of the Devil. He travelled seven times over England, and turned his tours into books. He composed a poem on the Complete Art of Painting, and treatises on the Complete Gentleman and the Complete Tradesman. He wrote biographies of Rob Roy and Jack Sheppard, and drew up manuals of conduct for parents, and of "religious courtship" for lovers. He wrote a newspaper with his own hand three times a week, and threw off satires in verse in odd moments. He was a diplomatist and a hesier, and a spy and a brick-maker, and a member of the Butchers' Company. He was favoured by Cabinet Ministers and pursued by bailiffs; he stood in the pulpit at Tooting and in the pillory at Temple Bar; he wrote two hundred and fifty books and lost several fortunes.

Mr. Whitten has achieved the difficult task of writing under fetters without loss of literary quality. His closely knit paragraphs still find space for the telling epithet and the characteristic quotation. You may read him as the man of letters and not as the Dry-as-dust of the biographical dictionary. Style, adapting itself to conditions, but retaining the dignity of style, is here. Where we rather part company with Mr. Whitten is in his ethical judgment of Defoe's career. He conceals nothing. Rather he tries to disarm us by the very frankness with which he sets before us the complicated and discreditable web of Defoe's political intrigues. But he insinuates charity, the misplaced charity, which the fashion of historians extends to bad men and of reviewers to bad books:

Let no reader suppose that Defoe was a mere party adventurer. His changes of side were often excusable in an age when parties themselves were subject to sub-division and exchange of functions.

It is special pleading. If this last sentence means anything, it means that Defoe did not quite know where he stood politically. He knew well enough; nor were the issues between parties particularly obscure in 1715. No! Defoe had the backstairs instinct, and candid history must not pretend otherwise.

---

Other New Books.

SEMANTICS: STUDIES IN THE SCIENCE OF MEANING.

BY MICHEL BRÉAL.

IN this volume M. Bréal's Essai de Sémantique is presented in an English form, with some additions and a lengthy preface and appendix by Prof. Postgate. That delightful "Essai" dealt with the changes and developments, not of the forms of words, but of their meanings—the history not of their bodies, but of their souls. To those readers in this country—alas, how few!—who really care about the uses and values of words, the book came as a delightful revelation. Each page as it was turned was accompanied by the unspoken words: "Why did I never think of this myself?" To see the minds of men working, intelligently but unconsciously, at the shaping of man's special tool, the spoken word, is to enter by a new avenue into the province of psychology. It is impossible to read the chapters headed, Analogy, The Extinction of Useless Forms, The Parts of Speech, On Certain Grammatical Instruments, and The Order of Words, without feeling new light shed on our own mental processes. Our eyes are opened; the tongue we talk becomes suddenly alive, and words, instead of being blank counters, become commemorative medals carrying history on their faces.

The English version fails to give quite the same delight as the original. Yet it is accurate, and far superior in elegance to nine translations out of ten. Something of the charm, however, has evaporated. M. Bréal's happy touch upon that fascinating instrument, the French language, is not—perhaps could not be—reproduced; and Mrs. Cust has not succeeded in replacing it by equivalent virtues in English. Her style, however, is distinctly more readable than that of Prof. Postgate, whose preface and appendix—the preface especially—are, though full of useful and interesting matter, so fatally unattractive in the manner of their presentation, so inducive of an inclination to lay down the volume, that they will rather, it may be feared, serve to "devote," as Charles Lamb said, than to attract readers. It would be an interesting exercise to trace exactly why writing that is correct (the grammatical error in the first sentence may be attributed, no doubt, to the printer), that is not pompous, nor assertive, nor affected, is so dull that a reader deeply interested in its subject can only read it with repugnance; but this is not the place.

Finally, it may be earnestly hoped that the publication in English of this admirable book may help to awaken some few English readers to the need of knowing and of teaching our language. In no other European country are boys and girls educated without any attempt to teach them how to speak and compose their own tongue. In no other do educated persons think it "good form" not to speak correctly; in no other are to be found a whole class of young persons belonging to the wealthier strata whose vocabulary of verbs, nouns, and adjectives consists wholly and solely of slang. (Heinemann. 7s. 6d. net.)

LETTERS RECEIVED BY THE EAST INDIA COMPANY FROM ITS SERVANTS IN THE EAST. VOL. IV.

EDITED BY WILLIAM FOSTER.

The new instalment of the East India's "Original Correspondence" series deals with the year 1616. The most important event of that year was the mission of Sir Thomas Roe, in the interests of the trading company, but with the rank of an ambassador from James I., to the Great Mogul. A full account of this important event was separately compiled by Mr. Foster last year for the Hakluyt Society, and fully reviewed in the ACADEMY at the time. We need not, therefore, return to it now. For the rest, the reports and intercommunications of the factors are mainly occupied with trade details, especially with the gradual falling off of the Japan trade, which led soon after to its practical abandonment. From time to time, however, a more personal element touches the arid chronicle with human interest. Richard Wickham writes furiously from Japan to Richard Cocks with regard to some complaints of insubordination brought against him.

I pray conceive not so ill of my writing or speaking without ground or cause. Every worm desires to live, and if it be trodden on it will turn again. Suffer me not thus to be wronged by the malicious reports and slander of such as in all honesty ought to more love, yet now forget once to look back into the hinder part of the wallet; such is the height of oblivion now grown to in Japan.

The appointment of General Keeling as "Factor-General and Supervisor of the Factories and Merchants in the East India and all other parts and places belonging to that trade" also gave rise to difficulties and jealousies. Keeling's authority was not altogether relished by the factors, and this feeling finds very candid expression in a pompous, racy, and entertaining letter from Joseph Salbank at Agra, "the ancientest servant that you have in all this country."

The first matter that I will intimate unto you shall be the discovery of a great indignity and wrong done unto me by your insolent General Keeling, towards whom though I carried myself in every respective manner in our whole voyage betwixt England and the Indies, yet without any desert of mine or the least colour of any just cause that could be objected against me, he disgraced me (as I may properly say), removing me from the place which your Worships had allotted and assigned unto me, and placed punies and young men in my stead, which yielded more discontent unto me than any injuries I sustained this long time; for I know that as your Worships did in your mature wisdom and discretion bestow such a place upon me, so you would not allow of such insolency in your Generals to displace me again without cause and so to disannul and annihilate your authority.

Mr. Salbank then waxes oriental in a reference to the fact that "the almond tree hath displayed his white blossoms upon my head," since he entered the Company's service. He also espouses the cause of a poor mariner who, condemned harshly by Keeling for a petty fault, "nimmed a bag of money out of one of the merchants' chests," and that of Mr. Edwards, whom "the arrogant General Keeling" summoned by "the thunderbolts of his threats" before him, and "publicly scandalised and disgraced his person." "So that," quoth Salbank, "the old rule is to be observed in all countries, I think, of the world, that envy is the inseparable companion of virtue." (Sampson Low.)

THE GREAT FAMINE.

BY VAUGHAN NASH.

He is a bold man who, since Mr. Kipling pilloried the globe-trotter in undying verse, ventures to lay down the law about India after a few months' scamper through the land. Mr. Vaughan Nash is bold enough to write of the great famine in India after eleven months' study of it, and to set right those who have spent their lives and their health in battling with Nature and trying to hold back

Nature's laws among the natives of Hindostan. Mr. Nash appears to have gone out as the "commissioner" for a provincial paper; and, therefore, it is perhaps more his misfortune than his fault that he has to be omniscient. This will also account for his bias against his own countrymen in administrative offices which leaks out all through the book, and his tendency to praise the work of native States in contradistinction to that of the English officials. Much that Mr. Nash says of the bunya, or native money-lender, is perfectly true; but men who have spent not eleven months only, but twice or thrice eleven years in working for India, know all this, and know, too, the difficulties which beset the whole intricate question. Successive Viceroy's have recognised how the ryots suffer from the extortions of the money-lenders; but the laws of usury have been the most difficult to arrange satisfactorily in all countries and through all the ages. "Under the native States there are laws of leather; in British territory laws of iron." In other words, there is equal justice in British States; and to the Oriental mind this is hard. The Eastern likes laws of leather which will stretch to his benefit if the right means be used. Mr. Nash's book is conscientious; but we venture to think that to those who do not know India it will give an inadequate idea of the famine, and of the devoted men who have laboured so hard to minimise its effects among the improvident natives. (Longmans.)

As a powder-and-shot historian Mr. W. H. Fitchett has few rivals. He is an Australian minister, and from his far-off home he launches book after book on the model of his Deeds that Won the Empire. In his latest, Wellington's Men (Smith, Elder), Mr. Fitchett edits and weaves together "a cluster of soldierly autobiographies," bringing the skill of a literary man to their proper compression and display. Four such narratives are taken up: Captain Kineard's Adventures in the Rifle Brigade in the Peninsula, Sergeant Anton's Recollections of Service in the 42nd, the tale of Rifleman Harris in the old 95th, and Mercer's story of the battery he commanded at Waterloo. They are all old books, and three of them are out of print. Mr. Fitchett gives us their best passages with a connecting commentary.

Happiness: its Pursuit and Attainment, by the Rev. W. J. Kelly (Long, 1s.), is a rather wordy and very orthodox discussion of its subject under such titles as "Love and Friendship," "Glory," "Power," "The Positivist," "The Christian," "The Heaven of the Senses," &c., &c. The conclusion is that "they who desire a life of joy and pleasure can only have their desire completely fulfilled in that happy land, where it is truly said they shall be . . . inebriated with the plenty of His house, and made to drink of the torrents of His pleasure . . . They will have joy beyond measure—joy in the joy of the God-head, joy in the joy of all their heavenly companions, joy in their own ineffable joy."

Mr. Newnes's "Library of Useful Stories" has been concerned chiefly with severely practical kinds of knowledge, but it now includes The Story of Thought and Feeling, in which Mr. Frederick Ryland endeavours to open up some portions of the field of Psychology to unaccustomed readers. The book will be found interesting and illuminative, especially if read with Prof. Baldwin's Story of the Mind in the same series.

Hazell's Annual comes again replete with the year's story, and thoroughly up to date. We have a detailed account of the military operations in South Africa, the official list of casualties, the names of those who have won the V.C., the proceedings in Parliament, the financial measures necessitated, and the military problems raised by the war, &c., &c. Similarly, "full information" is given in regard to China. The literary summary of the year is very useful.

Fiction.

The Ivory Bride. By Thomas Pinkerton.
(Long. 6s.)

ONE of the principal characteristics of the man born literary, him whose preoccupation is the art of writing, is that he does not limit himself to one vein. This characteristic is Mr. Pinkerton's, an admirable novelist who still awaits general esteem. Of his nine novels each is different from the others. His last book, Dead Oppressors, was a naturalistic study of modern life. The Ivory Bride is a romance—and, what is rarer, a romance composed with true romantic feeling. The machinery of the plot is not new; when the Scottish Earl has a premonition that a certain ivory statue will come to life, we confidently expect something of this sort:

I kept vigil that night on the deck of the Melinde. I could not sleep, because that day the most wonderful thing that could happen to me had happened. Of course I knew that history repeats itself, because people are repeated. And the Princess Beatrice was undoubtedly descended from the daughter of the Princess whose tomb was at Ulpha, just as I was descended from her son. The daughter had remained in Italy. But the amazing thing was that the repetition should be so perfect. Every lineament, every curve, every dimple matched. The two sleeping doves I had seen nestling together were a replica of the ivory bosom of the chryselephantine statue.

I felt the solemn joy of the man who can say: "To-day the finger of God touched my thread of life!"

I kept vigil until those rays before the dawn, the out-riders of Phœbus, touched the towers of the old castle with rose. Over the room where my love lay sleeping, stood, sending a track of greeting to me across the violet water, splendid harbinger of good hope, the golden star of morn.

But the treatment is original and fine, and the writing, as may be seen, better than ordinary. Mr. Pinkerton makes brave pictures of warfare in the Italian state of Princess Huldine; and Princess Huldine herself, that terrible woman, is conceived with an audacious imagination. One is at once reminded of the creature of Baudelaire's great sonnet, "La Géante":

Du temps que la Nature en sa verve puissante
Concevait chaque jour des enfants monstrueux,
J'eusse aimé vivre auprès d'une jeune géante,
Comme aux pieds d'une reine un chat voluptueux.

The Ivory Bride is the production of an artist.

Love in our Village. By Orme Agnus.
(Ward. 6s.)

MR. AGNUS is of the idyllists; his reputation is growing; and his work, judged by the usual standards, is pleasant and satisfactory enough. But this volume of twittering recitals of Dorsetshire life leaves us chiefly with a sense of its triviality; its preoccupation with the unimportant, and careful ignoring of the essential. "My friends in town," says the introduction, "cannot understand how I manage to exist year after year in civilisation and yet not of it. It may be a pretty village, say they, and rural life may have its charms when taken in small doses and at proper intervals; but . . ." And so on to the inevitable apology for rusticity. This air of having discovered that village rustics are men and women, of "insisting" that they can furnish you with "interest and excitement," is rather tiresome. The discovery has been made so often during recent years. We know it, we have always known it; and we should be infinitely obliged to the idyllist who would write about village-folk not as though they constituted a Zoo. We seem ever to hear the idyllists saying, with naïve pride: "See! These people can fall in love, just like you and me. After all, they are human, and, in their little way, they have their comedies and tragedies."

It is the attitude of bland patronage which is insufferable. One wonders whether the idyllists have grasped Goethe's profound saying that the "folk" are the only real people; whether it has ever occurred to them that the word "ignorant" has come to mean "ignorant of certain specified things"; and that the ploughman who meets the idyllist on the high road of an evening is probably less ignorant than the man to whom he touches his cap. These remarks do not apply specially to Mr. Orme Agnus's book; they apply to a school of which Mr. Agnus is a very creditable example. Mr. Agnus may say that he has not discovered his village, nor does he patronise it. Nevertheless, he continually has the manner of the discoverer on a lecturing tour, and patronage is implicit in all his gay, innocuous badinage at the expense of the villagers, even in his careful sympathy with them. If he had truly realised the humanity of his rustics, he would not be content to get nearly all his effects out of their superficial peculiarities.

Philip Winwood. By Robert Neilson Stephens. Illustrated by E. W. D. Hamilton.
(Chatto. 6s.)

FOR solidity and graphic colouring the "Independence" novels of Mr. Paul Leicester Ford and Mr. Winston Churchill were hard to beat. In the fiction before us, put in the mouth of one of his subordinate characters, Mr. Stephens does not beat them, but he treats their subject and epoch with a delightful air of reality. The hero of the title fights on the American side, while his wife schemes on the other, and her scoundrel elder brother betrays both in turn. History is touched passingly—Washington being almost a personnage muet. The novel is a sketch of domestic life as darkened and deformed by vital differences of opinion and conduct. That its domesticity is sufficiently tempered a scrap of dialogue will attest:

"Won't you come into my room and have a glass of wine?"

"No, sir. If I had a glass of wine I should only waste it by throwing it in your face."

The flight of the heroine to London in platonic, but wholly objectionable, company is a rather obscure episode in her career; but, like most things in the world of fiction, it is by no means irremediable. She is in many passages admirably realised in witchery, wilfulness, and in what only women will hold to be unfeminine audacity. Her father is, however, in some respects, the most notable figure in the book—a merchant of iron for whom one develops the gradual affection worth much sudden and blazing beauty-worship and hero-love.

Lines Written after Reading "Martin Chuzzlewit."

"Who is the lady you love best—
The fairest form in fiction drest?
Whose face a heaven-descended sight
Sheds beauty like the stars at night;
Whose distilled breath in perfume trips
O'er pearly teeth and cherry lips,
Whose gentle voice strikes sweetest chords
That tremble in her tender words?"

This quest put I to persons three,
And thus, in sooth, they answered me:

"First, Dante's Beatrice drawn divine,
Then Homer's Helen superfine,
And Shakespeare's Portia formed the trine."

Ineffable ladies of highest stamp!
But what, ah! what of SAIREY GAMP?

M.

THE ACADEMY.

Editorial and Publishing Offices, 43, Chancery-lane.

The ACADEMY will be sent post-free, if prepaid, to every Annual Subscriber in the United Kingdom.

Price for One Issue, Threepence; postage One Halfpenny. Price for 52 issues, Thirteen Shillings; postage free.

Foreign Rates, for Yearly Subscriptions, prepaid (including postage) . . . . . 17/6
„ Quarterly . . . . . 5/0
„ Price for one issue . . . . . /5

American Agents for the ACADEMY: Brentano's, 31, Union-square, New York.

The Nineteenth Century.

As, fore-announced by threat of flame and smoke,
 Out of the night's lair broke
 The sun among the startled stars, whose blood
 Looses its slow bright flood
 Beneath the radiant onset of the sun;
 So crouches he anon,
 With nostrils breathing threat of smoke and flame,
 Back to the lairing night wherefrom he came.

And who is She,
 With cloudy battle smoking round her feet,
 That issues through the exit-doors of death;
 And at the alternate limit of her path,
 Where first her nascent footsteps troubled day,
 Forgotten tumult curls itself away?
 Who is she that rose
 Tumultuous, and in tumult goes?

This is she
 That rose 'midst dust of a down-tumbled world,
 And dies with rumour on the air
 Of preparation
 For a more ample devastation,
 And death of ancient fairness no more fair.
 First when she knew the day,
 The holy poets sung her on her way.
 The high, clear band that takes
 Its name from heaven-acquainted mountain-lakes;
 And he
 That like a star set in Italian sea;
 And he that mangled by the jaws of our
 Fierce London, from all frets
 Lies balmed in Roman violets.
 And other names of power,
 Too recent but for worship and regret,
 On whom the tears lie wet.

But not to these
 She gave her heart; her heart she gave
 To the blind worm that bores the mold,
 Bloodless, pertinacious, cold,
 Unweeting what itself upturns,
 The seer and prophet of the grave.
 It reared its head from off the earth
 (Which gives it life and gave it birth)
 And placed upon its eyeless head a crown,
 And all the peoples in their turns
 Before the blind worm bowed them down.
 Yet, crowned beyond its due,
 Working dull way by obdurate, slow degrees,
 It is a thing of sightless prophecies;
 And glories, past its own concoit,
 Attend to crown
 Its travail, when the mounded time is meet.
 Nor measured, fit renown,

When that hour paces forth,
 Shall overlook those workers of the North,
 And West, those patient Darwins who forthdrew
 From humble dust what truth they knew,
 And greater than they knew, not knowing all they knew.
 Yet was their knowledge in its scope a Might,
 Strong and true souls to measure of their sight.
 Behold the broad globe in their hands compest,
 As a boy kneads a pellet, till the East
 Looks in the eyes o' the West;
 And as guest whispers guest
 That counters him at feast,
 The Northern mouth
 Leans to the attent ear of the bended South.
 The fur-skinned garb justling the northern bear
 Crosses the threshold where,
 With linen wisp girt on,
 Drowns the next-door neighbour of the sun.
 Such their laborious worth
 To change the old face of the wonted earth.

Nor were they all o' the dust; as witness may Davy and Faraday;
 And they
 Who clomb the cars
 And learned to rein the chariots of the stars;*
 Or who in night's dark waters dipt their hands
 To sift the hid gold from its sands;†
 And theirs the greatest gift, who drew to light
 By their sciential might,
 The secret ladder, wherethrough all things climb
 Upward from the primeval slime.‡

Nor less we praise
 Him that with burnished tube betrays
 The multitudinous diminutive
 Recessed in virtual night
 Below the surface-seas of sight;
 Him whose enchanted window gives
 Upon the populated ways
 Where the shy universes live
 Ambushed beyond the unapprehending gaze.
 The dusted author's globe of spiky stars;
 The beetle flashing in his minute mail
 Of green and golden scale;
 And every water-drop a-sting with writhling wars.
 The unnoted green scale cleaving to the moist earth's face
 Behold disclosed a conjugal embrace,
 And womb—
 Submitting to the tomb—
 That sprouts its lusty issue: § everywhere conjoins
 Either glad sex, and from unguessed-at loins
 Breeds in an opulent ease
 The liberal earth's increase;
 Such Valentine's sweet unsurmised diocese.

Nor, dying Lady, of the sons
 Whom proudly owns
 Thy valedictory and difficult breath,
 The least are they who followed Death
 Into his obscure fastnesses,
 Tracked to her secret lair Disease—
 Under the candid-seeming and confederate Day
 Venoming the air's pure lips to kiss and to betray.
 Who foiled the ancient Tyrant's grey design
 Unfathomed long, and brake his dusty toils,
 Spoiling him of his spoils,
 And man, the loud dull fly, loosed from his woven line.

* Measuring the stars' orbits.

† Discovery of new stars.

‡ Evolution.

§ The prothallus of the fern, for example; which contains in itself the two sexes, and decays as the young fern sprouts from it.

Such triumph theirs who at the destined term
Descried the arrow flying in the day—
The age-long hidden germ—
And threw their prescient shield before its deadly way.

Thou, spacious Century!
Hast seen the Western knee
Set on the Asian neck,
The dusky Africa
Kneel to imperial Europe's beck;
And that refused head plucked to the day
Of the close-hooded Nile.
Hast seen the West for its permitted while Stand mistress-wise and tutelar
To the grey nations dreaming on their days afar,
From old forgotten war
Folding hands whence has slid disused rule;
The while, unprescient, in her regent school
She shapes the ample days and things to be,
And large new empery.
Thence Asia shall be brought to bed
Of dominations yet undreamed;
Narrow-eyed Egypt lift again the head
Whereon the far-seen crown Nilotic gleamed.
Thou'st seen the Saxon horde whose veins run brine,
Spawned of the salt wave, wet with the salt breeze,
Their sails combine,
Lash their bold prows together, and turn swords
Against the world's knit hordes;
The whelps repeat the lioness' roar athwart the windy seas.

Yet let it grieve, grey Dame,
Thy passing spirit, God wot,
Thou wast half-hearted, wishing peace, but not
The means of it. The avaricious flame
Thou'st fanned, which thou should'st tame:
Cluck'dst thy wide brood beneath thy mothering plumes,
And coo'dst them from their fumes,
Stretched necks provocative, and throats
Ruffled with challenging notes;
Yet all didst mar
Flattering the too-much-pampered Boy of War:
Whence the far-jetting engine, and the globe
In labour with her iron progeny,—
Infernal litter of sudden-whelped deaths,
Vomiting venomous breaths;
Thicker than driven dust of testy March
When the blown flood o'erswells,
The armed parallels
Of the long nations' columned march;
The growl as of long surf that draweth back
Half a beach in its rattling track,
When like a tiger-cat
The angry rifle spat
Its fury in the opposing foemen's eyes;—
These are thy consummating victories,
For this hast thou been troubled to be wise!

And now what child is this upon thy lap,
Born in the red glow of relighted war?
That draws Bellona's pap,
Fierce foster-mother: does already stare
With mimicked dark regard
And copied threat of brow whose trick it took from her?—
The twentieth of Time's loins, since that
Which in the quiet snows of Bethlehem he begat.
Ah! born, grey mother, in an hour ill-starred,
After the day of blood and night of fate,
Shall it survive with brow no longer marred,
Lip no more wry with hate;
With all thou hadst of good,
But from its blood
Washed thine hereditary ill,
Yet thy child still?

FRANCIS THOMPSON.

Things Seen.

Gentility.

It was in a Bayswater 'bus, and the day was very hot. I luckily was on the shady side, but though there was some room next me, the two middle-aged women opposite, uncomfortably hot though they looked, were too much absorbed in their conversation to move. The stouter and more voluble of the two fanned herself energetically with the pair of limp gloves she was carrying (by no possibility could they have been got on to those hot, red hands). "Yes," she was saying, "they have come into a lot of money now. I went down to see her in the country—quite a nice little place they've got, and everything most genteel, and they've taken to breeding prize poultry. I said to her: 'How nice it must be for you to get plenty of fresh eggs.' And she said: 'Oh, no! Not at all. Of course, the hens can lay if they wish to, but in our position it isn't necessary!'" A pause of admiration—and then I heard her mild little friend murmur: "Well, I never! How genteel!"

Ragged Robin.

THE Christmas season brought me face to face again with the old home library. A copy of Kenilworth caught my eye: I knew the medallion portrait of Sir Walter, printed in gold on the back. On the flyleaf was written my own name, with a birthday date and the year 1882.

I had received the book at school: I remembered the morning of its arrival, the first eager glance, the anxious waiting until the useless tedium of lessons should be over. Then I was alone with it in the deserted schoolroom. Through the open windows came the sound of laughter, scurrying feet, shouting, the rat-tat of ball against bat, all the delightful mingled noises of a playground. But they lured me not. I was already reading of Varney and Leicester, of Tressilian and Amy Robsart.

The dews of summer night did fall,
The moon, sweet regent of the sky,
Silvered the walls of Cumnor Hall,
And many an oak that grew thereby.

That stanza, standing at the head of the sixth chapter, sent me out into the free air. I ran past the school-farm, across a broad meadow, and plunged down through tall grass and tangled blossoms to the edge of the slow stream which was our majestic river, leading into the world. Lying there, I read on and on until the clock struck the hour for returning. I plucked a head of ragged robin for a marker, shut it into the book, and went back to Ovid and Logarithms.

All this came back to me with poignant vividness, for in the book was still pressed the bit of ragged robin, survivor of many vicissitudes, a beautiful frail reminder of the permanence of all impressions, of the imperishability of youth.

A Hit.

A FLAT parcel. I opened it, and found a sketch of The Spaniards Inn, at Hampstead. No letter. Nothing but the postmark to tell me that a friend had seen it in a remote English town—lurking, may be, among blue Nankin, rusty tomahawks, German helmets, faded samplers, and copper bed-warmers. He had entered the shop, bought it, and despatched it, believing that it would hit a soft place in my breast.

His aim was true. The Spaniards! Ah, nights of the 'eighties, when I sprang up-hill from London's plain of brick, and earned by honest walking a long draught of beer and the smile of twilit Middlesex!

The Curious Eye.

IN his little book of essays called Domesticities (Smith, Elder), Mr. E. V. Lucas writes with knowledge and grace about tea, toast, walks and walking-sticks, schoolboys, animals, fires, catalogues, clothes, and correspondence. These are the very subjects beloved of the amateur essayist, who sees in toast a subject on which he may enlarge sagely, and from which he may digress beautifully. The smallness of such subjects is his joy, and if walking-sticks be his choice he dips his pen in serene confidence that it is his to make a thousand angels dance on one ferrule. But it is odds that his ardour soon abates, that his inspiration flattens on itself, and that the burning of much oil results in disillusion. He discovers that it is not easy to write on easy subjects, not even on tea, toast, walks and walking-sticks, schoolboys, animals, fires, catalogues, clothes, or correspondence. As for digression, he may be said to avoid his subject as successfully as a learner avoids skating—by not standing upright for two seconds together. If, now, in a humbler mood, he wishes to see how the thing can be done, let him observe Mr. Lucas. In these pages things-to-the-point are said on almost every page, and the digressions are simply bends and flourishes in the skater's progress.

Not that these are very remarkable essays. Mr. Lucas is careful to tell us that they leave a great deal of him unexpressed. They are witty little deliverances by a man whom a London landlady would hold in awe as a "very partickler gent," and from whose wrath waiters would fly in holy dread. "Toast should not be waferlike, nor crisp throughout. On the contrary, it should be cut just thick enough to leave in its very inward midst the merest tissue of soft bread, if only by way of compliment to the butter spread upon it, which thereby gains in flavour. . . . Toast is one of the few delicacies that can be made better by the amateur than the professional, and as well by a man as by a woman. Cooks treat toast perfunctorily: it does not interest them. Indeed, toast might well be kept strictly to amateur ambition. For several reasons: one being that its fragrance is pleasant in a sitting room; another, that making it is an agreeable diversion; and a third, that whereas bad toast produced in the kitchen leads to annoyance and irritation, bad toast produced by a guest or a member of the family makes for mock abuse, sham penitence, and good-humour." Most of the philosophy of toast is there, is it not? Into Mr. Lucas's great disputation with the Spectator on the question whether toast should be hot-buttered (Mr. Lucas permits this, and finds a separate and seductive food in the result) we shall not enter further than to say that we take the Spectator's view, but that we follow Mr. Lucas in practice. Toast ought not to be hot-buttered, and we hot-butter it. We are sorry that we never went to Tyson's, "the most famous hot-buttered toast house in the world," in Rook-street, Manchester. There Tyson lorded it over clerks and merchants, supplying only chops or steaks or Cumberland ham, with hot buttered toast for vegetables, and compelling every customer to drink ale, stout, coffee, or tea. He walked about in his shirt sleeves, and was a very beadle to his customers. Reading was not permitted, and a customer who dared to glance at a letter from his pocket was told "This is not a library." Mr. Lucas briefly says that "toast-and-water is cooling as the wind of the morning across fields of dew." Which is correct; but as the beverage has nothing like the vogue it deserves, he would have done well to give injunctions as to its delicate brewing. Mr. Lucas is so sound on toast that we come with confidence to the essay "Concerning Breakfast." And here, again, we find a salient utterance; a kind of Test, offered sternly under small-talk.

No matter of what the breakfast consists, marmalade is the coping-stone of the meal. Without marmalade the finest breakfast is incomplete, a broken arc. Only with marmalade can it be a perfect round. Every one's home-made marmalade is notoriously the best; but, where the commercially-manufactured article is used opinions differ. Her Most Gracious Majesty (it is stated so on the pot) prefers a viscous variety which is impossible to Oxford men bred on Cooper's. Tess of the D'Urbervilles, it will be remembered, favoured Keelwell's; or, at any rate, it was this maker who assisted in the embellishment of Sorrow's grave. The Universities are nobly loyal to marmalade. At Cambridge there is a saying that no man can pass his Little-go until he has consumed his own weight in it, while Oxford first called it Squish. The attitude of women to marmalade has never been quite sound. True, they make it excellently, but afterwards their association with it is one lamentable retrogression. They spread it over pastry; they do not particularly desire it for breakfast; and (worst) they decant it into glass dishes and fancy jars.

There is another way, which Mr. Lucas may have thought too sordid to mention, in which women go wrong on marmalade. They constantly allow their grocers to lure them from ancient and trustworthy brands to the purchase of "our own make." It may be unhesitatingly said that if everyone's home-made marmalade is notoriously the best, every grocer's "own make" is indisputably the worst. It is marmalade without pedigree or peel. By the way, we do not know what Mr. Lucas means by saying that when there is no marmalade "shift may be made with honey or jam." With jam certainly; but honey a makeshift? Never!—not even for "Squish." Honey is the Queen of the breakfast-table, invincibly pale and sweet, irremovably regnant in her season. Of course, if Mr. Lucas means grocers' honey . . .

On walking-sticks (in the essay "Concerning Walks") we have these admirable queries: "Where, one wonders, are the old walking-sticks? Where are George Borrow's sticks? He must have had noble fellows . . . Where is that wonderful stick of Coleridge's which, when a young man, walking in Wales, he lost, and advertised for so piquantly?" Yet the hue-and-cry is too brief; what of the stick that Dr. Johnson lost in Scotland, and despaired of recovering because its value to the inhabitants as timber rendered its return unthinkable? On the vexed subject of woods Mr. Lucas touches lightly. Cherry and ground ash come nearest to his liking, but he does not name gorse, which provides strong, interesting sticks, if you forgive an excess of rigidity tending to breakage under actual misuse. The least satisfactory essay in the volume is, we think, the one on Correspondence; but then the genius of the volume hardly permitted this subject to be threshed out. Mr. Lucas says nothing about the greatest of letters—love-letters; and love-letters being now the regular reading of the man on the bus, the omission seems the greater. We should like in passing—and in all casualness—to present him with an instance of one mood of tender correspondence, touched by a master hand. In his Journal to Stella Swift writes under the date January 20, 1710-11, to Stella and Miss Dingley:

Then I walked in the Park to find Mr. Ford, whom I had promised to meet, and, coming down the Mall, who should come towards me but Patrick, and gives me five letters out of his pocket. I read the superscription of the first, Psah, said I; of the second, psah again; of the third, psah, psah, psah; of the fourth, a gad, a gad, a gad, I'm in a rage; of the fifth and last, O hoooa; ay, marry this is something, this is our M D ["My Dears"], so truly we opened it, I think immediately, and it began the most impudently in the world, thus. Dear Presto, we are even thus far. Now we are even, quoth Stephen, when he gave his wife six blows for one. I received your ninth four days after I had sent my thirteenth. But I'll reckon with you anon about that, young women.

Swift's use of initials and other cryptic designations reminds us that letters stand in need of such private inventions. We know of one large family that has adopted in its correspondence a hieroglyphic for a smile, and it is prodigiously useful. To be introduced to that hieroglyphic, and to be allowed to smile in it, is to receive the freedom of the family.

Here we part company with Mr. Lucas's book, but not with his gift. We wish to point out to young writers that the gift of observation, of a wakeful taste, is among the most valuable that they can possess, or, possessing in a measure, can cultivate. Mr. Lucas has it. But it is found in almost every writer of any "parts." It feeds the interior fund of common sense, and provides a vast amount of small change into the bargain. Some writers, indeed, have had little of it. Johnson, for instance, lacked this nimble spirit of appreciation, these swift gustos. A thousand things were impossible to Johnson that were inevitable visitors to Lamb's mind. Even in literature Johnson rarely enjoyed the tang of words, the sojourn of a phrase on the tongue. A coarse eater, a loud talker, a life-scarred giant, he had few of Lamb's exquisite appetites. Lamb it was who gave to the softness of candle-light and the lusciousness of pineapple their classic expressions. Lamb is full of the knowledge of little things. But look around literature, and where do you not find proofs of the value of this knowledge? Think of the minutiae in Don Quixote. Montaigne is the high professor of this little knowledge, this penetrating eagerness; and it has been said that he has wise and witty words for every hour of life. Balzac's genius was sometimes in danger of drowning in a sea of noticed things; his catalogues and composite backgrounds are the marvel of literature. Hazlitt is full of the nicest interests. "The taste of barberries, which have hung out in the snow during the severity of a North American winter, I have in my mouth still, after an interval of thirty years." His description of the fives-playing of John Cavanagh is immortal. Goethe was full of savoir faire, and his mind, elephantine in dimensions, was elephantine in its prehensile tact. "Goethe," says Eckermann, "appeared now solely as father of a family, helping to all the dishes, carving the roast fowls with great dexterity, and not forgetting between whiles to fill the glasses." Great is such wakefulness in an old man. Goethe spent hours in discussing with Eckermann the right way of making bows and arrows, though he had never bent the one or shot the other in his long life.

Now the point we wish to make is this: a wakeful attention to life and a rapidly judicial taste of its kindly and unkindly fruits are more important to a young writer than the formation of a style. If there is a deliberate exercise which we would recommend to the aspirant it is not the apeing of Hazlitt or Stevenson or Maupassant, but the whetting of the mind on actualities. Let a young fellow study the name and origin of every article in his mother's house, of every plant in his father's garden, and treasure the words of the gardener, the joiner, the tradesman, and the odd man. Let him exactly know what he may easily know, and appreciate carefully what is his to appreciate. That is real training for authorship. Not that such conscious studies can be indefinitely indulged or prolonged. But if conscious training is of use, it should be training in the acquisition of matter, as well as manner. Only a habit of wakeful appreciation, wakeful at table, in the street, on the heath, and in the crowd, can provide those stores of small experience which must be acquired as we go along, or not at all. It is this habit which enriches and enlivens any style, and it alone can furnish forth the writer who undertakes to discourse in print on toast, tea, walks and walking-sticks, schoolboys, animals, catalogues, clothes, and correspondence. We have written and quoted enough to show that Mr. Lucas has the habit, and has joined to it a graceful wit. Let the budding writer, if he has the wit, acquire the habit.

Correspondence.

"An Englishwoman's Love-Letters."

SIR,—I do not suppose there will be any dispute over Theta's explanation of the story contained in An Englishwoman's Love-Letters, but in respect of some of the praise she (for I presume Theta to be of the Englishwoman's sex) bestows upon this "heartrending romance," there might be some divergence of opinion. Pure, delicate, artistic are pretty epithets, but are they entirely justified? I have no personal experience of the terms of endearment applied by young ladies to their lovers, and to be called "a common or garden Englishman" may, for aught I know, sound sweetly in a young man's ears from the lips he loves, though I should hardly have thought the phrase natural to such an extremely cultivated young person as this unlucky Englishwoman. But when I find her writing to her lover from Venice of "the sound of many waters wallowing under the bellies of the gondolas" I cannot refrain from asking Theta if she calls such language pure, or delicate, or artistic. Why, Sir, a decent housemaid would not write so to the young man she walks out with.—I am, &c., KATTA.

Facsimiles of the First Folio.

SIR,—After reading your bibliographical contributor's remarks on a projected facsimile edition of the First Folio, it seemed to me scarcely probable that such a work is called for at present. During the nineteenth century four reprints have appeared: the first in 1807, of comparatively small value, being disfigured by some 370 errors; the second in 1862, known as Booth's edition, in type a little smaller than the original, and highly esteemed on account of its legibility and correctness; the third, in 1866, edited by Howard Staunton, a handsome full-sized replica; and the fourth, in 1876, the Chatto & Windus reprint, which is so greatly "reduced" that it cannot be easily read. All the foregoing turn up now and then in the dealers' catalogues, marked at moderate prices; not long since I noticed Booth's facsimile at ten shillings, and Chatto's at four shillings.

There is, however, another reprint which is really wanted, and would no doubt be readily purchased by Shakespeare students—namely, a new edition of "Steevens's Twenty Quartos" (4 vols., London, 1766). Its re-issue in our day would render necessary rather extensive modification, and the addition of fresh matter; it would also call for the intelligence and judgment of an editor well versed in the subject: happily there is no lack of men who would take up such a task in the right spirit.—I am, &c., S. W. ORSON.

Brunch.

SIR,—We were much interested in seeing in the ACADEMY of December 15 an allusion to the word "brunch." Does the poet of the Westminster Gazette think he has invented it? If so, it is another case of plagiarism.

This useful word was introduced to us about four years ago by a youthful subaltern of artillery, since when we have used it constantly.

There are some other words of the same type which we might mention. "Brupper" is the joyous meal you have after a very late dance, for instance, and consists of supper, which might almost be breakfast. "Brea" is early morning tea, or chota haziri. "Tunch" is rather a common meal in the country, and would be partaken of on coming back late in the afternoon, after a long morning's hunting or bicycling; some people call it "an egg to their tea." "Brinner," on the contrary, can only be eaten by those people whose custom it is to dine heavily in the middle of the day. Germans probably find it a favourite meal. But, of course, "brunch is undoubtedly far the best of them all, and is, indeed, as you remark, the 'resource of the indolent.'"—I am, &c., M.

SIR,—Anent the paragraph in your issue of the 15th ult. on the subject of "Brunch," permit me to inform you that the word is no new thing in this university, where it has been in use for many years past, as also in the sister university of Oxford, I believe.

When and where it originated I cannot say, but it undoubtedly owes its conception to Lewis Carroll's "port-manteau words," of which, indeed, it is a favourable example, being compounded of the opening letters of "breakfast"—BR, and the final letters of "lunch"—UNCH. A cognate word—"slithy"—will at once suggest itself to readers of Alice in Wonderland.

With the definition of the word, as given by the writer of the verses in the Westminster Gazette, I beg leave to differ. True, a "brunch" combines the essential features of breakfast and lunch; but, far from being an "unhappy combination," it is, on the contrary, a particularly happy one, agreeable alike to late and early risers, since it spares the former the bother of breakfast, and the latter the labour of lunch.—I am, &c., H. D. C.

Mr. Whiteing and Bacon.

SIR,—In your review of Mr. Richard Whiteing's new book, The Life of Paris, you say: "What could be neater or more accurate than his definition of the reason of every Frenchman's desire to have the Cross of the Legion of Honour? 'To have it not is more of a reproach than to have it is a distinction.'" That phrase had such a peculiarly familiar ring about it that I took down my copy of Bacon's Essays, and on turning to that "Of honour and reputation" found: "A man is an ill husband of his honour that entereth into any action the failing of which may disgrace him more than the carrying it through can honour him."

That the definition is extremely neat I agree, but are we indebted to Mr. Whiteing or to Lord Verulam for the neatness? Perhaps to both, but in that case the affinity is striking.—I am, &c., T. E. TURNBULL.

Our Weekly Competition.

Result of No. 66 (New Series).

LAST week we offered a prize of One Guinea for the best sonnet on the change of century. We award the prize to Miss Mary A. Woods, 20, Clifton-gardens, W., for the following:

From Time's great water-clock—whose seconds spell
Our centuries—into the timeless sea
A drop has fallen to-night, not silently
But with an answering music; in whose swell
And fall are mingled tones innumerable,
Pean and battle-ery and splash of tears—
Echoes of all things that, a hundred years,
The world has wrought and suffered, ill or well.
What shall the master-note be, when the days
Bring back that music? What shall most resound
Of the new century's gain? A pathway found
Through yielding air; a garnered sunlight; skill
To sense the soul? Or but an old, cold phrase
Fanned into living flame—"Peace and Goodwill"?

The five next best sonnets seem to be these:

One Æon dies, an Æon new is born
To fill the hungry world with ampler store,
Yet richer blood into its veins to pour,
Make poverty less grim, want less forlorn.
The past lives on; no planted good upturn,
No laggard step, as hast'ning to the fore,
Wisdom and knowledge, art and hoarded lore
Crown the new century, its brow adorn.

With such inheritance of light and power,
To what may not the century expand?
Upon the level of the present hour
My vision swims; then let me take my stand
On Pisgah height, or see from some high tower
The glory of the new enchanted land.

[J. G., Bradford]

As one might pause, who from the dizzy height
Of some keen ridge looks down upon a sheer
And beckoning prospect, now first seen but dear
By long anticipation, then to flight
A craven panic urges him, despite
His hope of kindlier welcome—so the fear
Of unacquainted voyagings pangs us here,
Where sways the silent vessel in the night.

There is no flutter on board of delicate wings,
No treasury of tradition's hoarded stores,
No peerless precedents or rich garnerings,
But vacant rooms and vainly opened doors;
Yet must we leave our old home derelict,
To compass Time's immutable edict.

H. B. R., Bradford.]

Full soon the iron tongue of time shall toll
The century's knell! At midnight we shall glide
Into a new one on a flowing tide—
It is an hour to stir the sleeping soul,
For, lo! before us lies a virgin scroll
Where all is blank; alas, for human pride,
We cannot push the future's veil aside,
Or guess what writing yet shall stain that roll!

As Nineteen-hundred slides into the vast
That gulfs the countless ages of the past
For evermore, the Twentieth shall arise
Before a weary waiting world at last.
And men will hail it then with kindling eyes.
Hope points to "Peace on earth," and clearer skies.

[F. B. D., Torquay.]

The wheels of Time turn slowly with the wain
Of years, that "homes" the harvest of each one:
Dream brought to deed accompt tho' late-begun,
Or rotted gold of hope, or full ripe grain,
One load—a hundred garnered stooks—again
Is "led," and we who muse to mark it "Done,"
Take a reflection from the low, red sun
That for an instant sunders Being in twain!
Who saw the last load are not here—at least!
And who view this, the next one shall not know!
If mightier this, and greater, so, the feast
Than that which Eighteen-hundred squandered so,
Then blest are we! as the years darkward go
Next century through us shall have joys increas'd.

[F. A. M. D.]

What of the night? Shall we find any rest
With the new age that breaks along the sky?
Or shall old hopes and aspirations die,
'Mid the red glare of ruin in the West?
Hope on, faint hearts! The dying years attest
Not all in vain has been our strife of old:
The world shall see, e'er all the tale be told,
Perfection won with marvels manifest.

We or our sons—who knows?—the gods are great.
The hands that sow the harvest one by one
Drop from the working weary, and are gone.
The future grows beneath the hand of Fate—
Hope on, faint hearts, the gods are good and great.

[F. S., Manchester.]

Twenty-one other sonnets received, with thanks.

Competition No. 67 (New Series).

WE offer a prize of One Guinea for the best observations on the change of the year and century in the manner of Samuel Pepys—with resolves.

RULES.

Answers, addressed "Literary Competition, THE ACADEMY, 43, Chancery-lane, W.C.," must reach us not later than the first post of Wednesday, January 2. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found on the second page of Wrapper, or it cannot enter into competition. Competitors sending more than one attempt at solution must accompany each attempt with a separate coupon; otherwise the first only will be considered.

ADVERTISER, well known in the Publishing World, will be DISENGAGED in JANUARY, and desires to associate himself with a firm issuing high-class Books, and has been accustomed to sole control. Is familiar with every detail of Publishing. Could create a Fresh Department and introduce New Business. London or New York preferred.—Address SHIRE, care of H. A. Mouchell, 19, Ludgate Hill, London, E.C.

CATALOGUES.

NOW READY.

CATALOGUE OF SECOND-HAND BOOKS
Theology—History—Biography—Law—Political Economy—Philosophy—Greek and Latin Classics—Mathematics—Natural Science—General Literature—Fine Arts and Illustrated Books.

DEIGHTON, BELL &amp; Co., Cambridge.

WILFRID M. VOYNICH.

CATALOGUE No. 3 IN PREPARATION.

CATALOGUE No. 1, 1s., and CATALOGUE No. 2, 2s. 6d.

May be had on application at 1, SOHO SQUARE, W.
A Large Collection of Fifteenth and Sixteenth Century Books on view.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE,
IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN BOOKS,
14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, 2, South Frederick St. Edinburgh, and 7, Broad Street, Oxford.
CATALOGUES sent free on application.

BAEDEKER'S & BADDELEY'S
TOURISTS' GUIDE BOOKS.
New fully detailed CATALOGUE sent post free on application.
DULAU & CO., 37, SOHO SQUARE, LONDON, W.

BOOKS, RARE and OUT-OF-PRINT, SUPPLIED.—State wants. CATALOGUES free. Libraries and Small Parcel. Purchased for Cash. WANTED, Gardner's HISTORY, 2 vols., 1863.—HOLLAND Co., Book Merchants, Birmingham.

BOOKS WANTED.—25s. each given for any Preservation Volumes with Inscriptions written inside by Dickens, Thackeray, Browning, Lamb, Keats, Shelley, Tennyson, Scott, Lang, and any notable Authors. Special List 3,000 Books Wanted free.—BAKER'S, John Bright St., Birmingham.

LITERARY RESEARCH.—A Gentleman, experienced in Literary Work, and who has access to the British Museum Reading Room, is open to arrange with Author or any person requiring assistance in Literary Research, or in seeing Work through the Press. Translations undertaken from French, Italian, or Spanish.—Apply, by letter, to D. C. DALLAS, 151, Strand, London, W.C.

GRAHAM'S TYPE-WRITING OFFICE
23, COCKSPUR STREET, PAUL MALL.—All kind of difficult MSS. receive careful attention from EXPERIENCED workers. Specimen page and references sent if desired. Over five years' experience.

TYPE-WRITING promptly and accurately done. 10d. per 1,000 words. Samples and references. Multi-Copies.—Address, Miss MESSER, 19, Mortimer Crescent, N.W.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK,
Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London, W.C.

CURRENT ACCOUNTS
2% on the minimum monthly balances, when not drawn below £100. 2%

DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS
2½% on Deposits, repayable on demand. 2½%

STOCKS AND SHARES.
Stocks and Shares Purchased and Sold for Customers. The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free.

FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

Telephone, No. 5, Holborn.
Telegraphic Address, "BIRKBECK, LONDON."

PORTRAIT SUPPLEMENTS

TO

"THE ACADEMY,"

Consisting of Thirty-seven Portraits of Old and New Celebrities in Literature, may still be obtained, singly, or in complete sets for 3s. 6d., on application to the Office, 43, Chancery Lane, W.C.

SIR JOHN CASS'S TECHNICAL INSTITUTE, Jewry Street, Aldgate, E.C.

The Governors of Sir John Cass's Foundation are prepared to receive APPLICANTS for the APPOINTMENT of PRINCIPAL of their new Technical Institute in Jewry Street, Aldgate, which will rank as a London Polytechnic. The Principal will be required to devote his whole time to the work of the Institution, his full duties commencing on 1st September, 1901. The stipend will be £500 a year, and a special arrangement will be made in order to secure the advice and assistance of the Principal elected, in the equipment of the Institution during the next few months.

Applications must be received on or before the 26th day of January, 1901, on forms which, together with full particulars respecting the duties of the appointment, can be obtained on application to the undersigned.

W. H. DAVIDSON,

Clerk to Sir John Cass's Foundation.
St. Dunstan's Chambers,
10A, Idol Lane, Eastcheap, E.C.

UNIVERSITY of EDINBURGH.

LECTURESHIP IN ANCIENT HISTORY.

The University Court of the University of Edinburgh will, on Monday, 18th February 1901, or some subsequent day, proceed to APPOINT a UNIVERSITY LECTURER on ANCIENT HISTORY. The duties of the Lecturer would mainly consist of the delivery in each year of two Honours half-courses of twenty-five Lectures each, in Greek and in Roman History respectively—one of these half courses to be given during part of the Winter Session, and the other in the Summer Session. Each applicant should lodge with the undersigned, not later than Monday, 4th February, 1901, twenty copies of his Application, and twenty copies of any Testimonials he may desire to present. One copy of the Application should be signed. Further particulars on application.

M. C. TAYLOR, Secretary University Court.
University of Edinburgh,
21st December, 1900.

UNIVERSITY COLLEGE SCHOOL,

GOWER STREET, W.C.

Head Master—J. LEWIS PATON, Esq., M.A. (formerly Fellow of St. John's College, Cambridge).
NEXT TERM commences JANUARY 14th.

The School is carried on in strict accordance with the principles laid down by the Founders of University College, and is organized as a First Grade Modern and Classical School.—For Prospectus apply to the Office, Gower Street, W.C.
T. GREGORY POSTER, B.A., Ph.D., Secretary.

THE DOWNS SCHOOL,

SEAFORD, SUSSEX.

Head Mistress—Miss LUCY ROBINSON, M.A.
(Late Second Mistress St. Felix School, Southwold).
References: The Principal of Bedford College, London, The Master of Peterhouse, &c.

A GRADUATE of Cambridge is prepared to COACH TWO PUPILS for Exams. Legal, Army Preliminary, or Public Schools. Country home, riding, billiards, &c.—Brynardoz, Newcastle Emlyn.

SERMONS BY
REV. ALEX. MACLAREN, D.D.

Crown 8vo, cloth boards, price 6s. each, post free.

THE UNCHANGING CHRIST, and other Sermons.

"Distinguished by the finest scholarship and most exquisite literary finish."—Christian Leader.

THE GOD of the AMEN, and other Sermons.

"The several sermons contained in this volume are replete with a keen spiritual insight, combined with an aptness of illustration and beauty of diction which cannot fail to both impress and charm the reader."
—Methodist Times.

THE WEARIED CHRIST, and other Sermons.

"They show the same wonderful fertility of apt and beautiful illustrations, the same exquisite use of language, the same direct heart-searching power which we are accustomed to find in all Dr. Maclaren's works."—Christian World Pulpit.

PAUL'S PRAYERS, and other Sermons.

"They are plain enough to be understood by the unlearned, and yet have sufficient richness and cogency to attract the most cultivated."
—New York Observer.

CHRIST'S "MUSTS," and other Sermons.

"Felicitous exposition, rugged, intense eloquence, and beautiful illustration."—Word and Work.

THE HOLY of HOLIES. A Series of Sermons on the 11th, 15th, and 16th Chapters of the Gospel by John.

"No British preacher has unfolded this portion of Scripture in a more scholarly style."
—North British Daily Mail.

THE BEATITUDES, and other Sermons.

"An excellent exposition of the Beatitudes.....full of thought and knowledge and power."
—British Weekly.

ALEXANDER & SHEPHEARD, LIMITED,
21 & 22, Farnival Street, Holborn, London, E.C.

THE FAUNA OF BRITISH INDIA,

INCLUDING CEYLON AND BURMAH.
Published under the Authority of the Secretary of State for India in Council.

EDITED BY W. T. BLANFORD.

Medium 8vo, with numerous Woodcuts.

MAMMALIA. By W. T. BLANFORD, F.R.S. 1 vol., complete, price £1.—FISHES. By F. DAY, C.I.E., LL.D. 2 vols., price £1 each.—BIRDS. By EUGENE W. OATES, F.Z.S. Vol. 1., price £1; Vol. 2, 15s.; Vols. 3 and 4, by W. T. BLANFORD, F.R.S., price 15s. each.—REPTILIA and BATRACHIA. By G. A. BOULENGER. 1 vol., complete, price £1. Completion of the Vertebrates.

MOTHS. By Sir G. F. HAMPSON, Bart. 4 vols., price £1 each.—HYMENOPTERA. Vol. 1. Wasps and Bees. By Lieut.-Col. C. T. BINGHAM. Price £1, with 4 Coloured Plates.—ARACHNIDA. By R. J. Pocock. Price 10s.

London: TAYLOR & FRANCIS, Red Lion Court, Fleet Street. Calcutta: THACKER, SPINK & Co. Bombay: THACKER & Co., Limited. Berlin: R. FRIEDLANDER & SOHN, Carlstrasse, 11.

MUDIE'S LIBRARY

(LIMITED).

ENLARGED AND CLASSIFIED CATALOGUE

(Over 500 pages, 8vo, bound in green cloth).

All the Principal Works in Circulation at the Library

ARRANGED under SUBJECTS.

Forming a Comprehensive Guide to Notable Publications in most Branches of Literature.

Books of Permanent Interest on POLITICAL and SOCIAL TOPICS, the ARMY, NAVY, ARTS, SCIENCE, PHILOSOPHY, SPORT, THEOLOGY, HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, and FICTION. Price 1s. 6d.

Also a FOREIGN CATALOGUE, containing Books in FRENCH, GERMAN, ITALIAN, RUSSIAN, and SPANISH.

Price 1s. 6d.

MUDIE'S LIBRARY,

30-31, NEW OXFORD STREET;
241, Brompton Road; and
48, Queen Victoria Street, London.

An American Transport in the Crimean War.

By Capt. CODMAN.

In this work Capt. Codman relates his experiences of an American Chartered Transport in the Crimean War..... The Crimean War is the connecting link between old and modern methods of warfare.

Frontispiece.

198 pp.

Price 3s. 6d.

London:

SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, HAMILTON &amp; CO

P Academy
Eng.Lit. v.59(1900)
A

PLEASE DO NOT REMOVE CARDS OR SLIPS FROM THIS POCKET

---

UNIVERSITY OF TORONTO LIBRARY

---

